Before going into the subject of curative treatment, I must mention parenthetically that not only do the Insurance Institutes undertake these cures, with a view to permanently relieving their funds, but that also at the expiration of twenty-six weeks they give temporary allowances to insured persons incapacitated through illness. The invalidity insurance and sickness insurance supplement one another it will thus be seen in a most perfect manner. With the object of insuring the success of such treatment many hospitals and convalescent homes have been built. At the end of 1909 the 41 Insurance Institutes and admitted Club Institutes owned 71 hospitals, &c., of which 37 were for the use of consumptive patients. The remaining 34 consist of 25 convalescent homes, 2 hospitals for nervous disorders, 1 for venereal diseases, 1 for rheumatic patients, 1 open-air cure establishment, and four general hospitals. The average cost per day per head is 4s. 7d. in the consumptive hospitals, and 4s. 0½d. in the convalescent homes. The Insurance Institutes treat in their own establishments about 50 per cent. of the patients whose cure they undertake. Open-air homes have been largely made use of for persons not actually requiring medical treatment, but whose general state of health leaves much to be desired. In 1909 2,811 persons were treated in these establishments.

The fall in the death-rate from tuberculosis has been largely due to the energetic efforts made by the Insurance organisation to combat this disease, efforts which have been heartily supported by the Imperial Insurance Office in many ways. Under its presidency conferences of doctors have decided upon the best uniform method of treatment for consumptives, and have drawn up model plans and general arrangements of future consumptive hospitals. At one of these conferences a revision of the health statistics of the Insurance Institutes was effected. On another occasion the insistence by the Insurance Office on the necessity of deciding promptly if a patient was suffering from tuberculosis, led to the adoption of a uniform method of early diagnosis. The questions of subscribing money towards the disinfection of the dwellings of tuberculous persons and of the participation of the Institutes in the fight against lupus and of emigrating consumptives to South-west Africa were debated in these conferences, in many cases with positive results.

The co-operation of the military authorities has of late been successfully enlisted, with the result that recruits suffering from tuberculosis are handed over to the Insurance organisation for treatment. While the organisation has in two instances undertaken the treatment of lupus, it has up to now refused to undertake cases of venereal disease. Only one institute, that of Berlin, which is quite at the head of the movement, has founded a hospital for treatment of such cases. But the Imperial Insurance Office is of opinion that this disease—which is so rife in Germany—must be seriously tackled without undue delay, and treatment of it on an extensive scale is only a question of time. The Berlin Institute has established a dental hospital, but this is an isolated case. This institute has further distinguished itself by establishing home-treatment for the sick. I add a few figures illustrative of the results that have been accomplished. In the years 1897 to 1909 over 600,000 persons were treated, of whom 275,000 were suffering from tuberculosis. In the year 1897 nine persons were treated per 10,000 of the insured. In the year 1909 sixty-nine persons per 10,000 were so treated. The cost of treatment amounted in 1909 to £1,213,778, being 10·3 per cent. of the contributions and 12·2 per cent. of the annuities.

As regards the success of the treatment, in 1909, 83 per cent. of tuberculous patients, as well as 84 per cent. of those suffering from other diseases, were dismissed as being capable of earning a living. A system whereby these patients are kept under observation for five years has been adopted. The successful cases on discharge averaged in the last thirteen years 76 per cent. In the observation period since 1897 the percentage of these cases sank to 37 per cent. The Insurance Institute of the Province of Brandenburg, in its report for 1909, gives the result obtained by it during the five years 1905-9. It appears that the percentage of successful treatment sank in this period from 76·74 per cent. to 44·21 per cent. in male and from 79·53 per cent. to 59·29 per cent. in female cases.

These figures will perhaps help us to realise the magnitude of the task that has been accomplished, and the painstaking industry with which this great organisation has been built up. In my conversations with German authorities on this subject I have never yet found any pretension on their part either to claim perfection for or to resent criticism of the work achieved. Want of money is the great obstacle that stands in the way of the accomplishment of many further reforms. The fact remains that State insurance had to be inaugurated, and that while other nations hesitated Germany went ahead. She faced not only the scepticism of the intellectual classes, but the opposition of the workers. The latter, from convinced opponents, have become thorough-going supporters of State insurance, and their objections to the new law which have been so loudly voiced have nothing to do with insurance per se, but relate to social discords from which we may claim to be exempt. Reference in articles on the subject is frequently made to the Imperial message to the Reichstag of November, 1881. May we not at thirty years' distance now estimate at their true value the boldness, tempered with discretion, so characteristic of Prince Bismarck and his aged master, and take for our guiding principle in these matters the motto of the latter: "Erst wägen, dann wagen"?

CHRISTOPHER R. TURNER.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH SCENERY

By FRANK HARRIS

To the artist all things are beautiful. But the loveliness of English scenery is more retiring and discreet than the gorgeous beauty of French landscape. The other day I wandered about in the forest of Fontainebleau, and was ravished by scene after scene that caught the breath and left me thrilling; now it was simply an aisle of trees in fairyland, filled with mystic blue shadows—but as Ruskin said, there are no trees in the world so graceful-lovely as the trees of Northern France; now the vision of a great hill, flaming with massive red boles of firs, all crowned with purple-black plumes, in sharp contrast with the lighter greenery of chestnuts, sycamores, and limes. Now we came on a little open plateau, with an outlook that recalled Turner's pictures. Below us the forest rolled away in wave after wave of green; in the middle distance a river like a thread of silver, a bridge, and a few cottages, with their red tiles glowing bright rose in the sunshine; over the river and the adjacent forest on both banks lay a mist of gossamer; further away beyond the rolling wave of forest a broad upland like a skein of many-coloured silks, the brown of tilth, the pale green of barley intermingling with the silver of ripening wheat and the gold of corn through which the sickle had passed. The width of view, the effect of the sunshine on the evening mist, the bridge, the little rose-tiled houses, the wide upland aglow with many colours—it all looked as if arranged by a master-artist. I have in mind, too, scenes in Burgundy and in the Dauphiny of a width and grandeur that lift the spirit.

On returning from France our English scenery all seemed cramped and shut in—the view bounded everywhere by hedgerows and trees. I felt like a South African friend who, when I took him for a run through Surrey and showed him the view from Boxhill said, “Yes, it is pretty; but where’s the veldt? Have you no country without houses, lonely like the sea, and like the sea unpath’d, untamed?”

After living a little while in England this sense of cramp and garden and park—of nature combed and washed, and precisely dressed in Sunday clothes—gradually left me, and I began to recognise again the special appeal of the English countryside.

A visit to Wimbledon Common one afternoon made me ashamed of my vagrant faithlessness. There is a walk which skirts the whole length of the common, from the old “pound” on Putney Hill to the older “pound” near the village of Wimbledon. The walk is a sandy track wide enough for two, which meanders at its own sweet will with uncertain curves and hesitations to suit the wandering, vague steps of lovers. The trees shading it on both sides are for the most part silver birches with their boles gleaming like mother-of-pearl flecked with patches of russet. I always think of these trees as the girl-children of the forest: there is the same slim grace in both, the same adorable awkwardness of unexpected curves; the colouring, too, and feathery foliage seem purely ornamental. Thanks to the secluding trees and the windings of the shadowed path the walk is everywhere discreet and secret, made for confidences and shy caresses: naturally it is called “The Lovers’ Walk.” The reticence and modest charm of it are emphasised here and there by momentary vistas over the level heather-clad plain: these glimpses into the larger world of plateau and sky lend enchantment to the withdrawn, embowered way.

I made my way across the common, and lo! the grass and heather in the distance suddenly took on lustre and reddish glow like the hide of some strange animal: I could fancy the earth breathing under the tawny, hot skin.

A few hundred yards and I came to a patch of woodland scarcely more than an acre; a little dell between two sandy banks a few yards in height. The ground was clothed sparsely with harsh tufts of grey-green grass across which dead leaves of birch and walnut and oak had drifted. I paused in wonder: why had I never before noticed the beauty of it? It was as if some artist had seen this splendour of green grass and copper-red leaves and with subtle cunning had blended and subdued them to this magnificence of colour. Little silver birches and willows climbed the banks; behind them, on one hand, a sturdy, half-grown oak showed dark, strong foliage amid the light feathers of the other trees—it was nothing, a few common things, and yet the loveliness of the little glade and its magic carpet and the faint blue of the sky above were enough to bring tears to one’s eyes.

All this common is a pageant of pleasures. Walking over the heathery moorland I came suddenly on a little tree-fringed lake. It was a silent, luminous evening, when the colours fading in the sky were in harmony with the colours of shadowed water, dim, yet with a spiritual, strange transparency. The trees fringing the dark, peaty shore mirrored themselves in the still water so that I could hardly tell shape from shadow. It seemed to me an artistic symbol of this incomprehensible world in which realities are dreams and dreams realities—this world in itself so mysterious, with the surprise everywhere of beauty in spite of the simplicity of things, and the miracle everywhere of happiness in spite of the eternal sameness of things as they are.

I came out from among the trees on the open common. It had not rained for weeks, and the dry air was astonishingly clear, the cope of sky uplifted to infinity. The only blue like this blue dome of the heavens is the blue of the thrush’s egg. This word “dome” is a misnomer; it is a blue-bell, or rather a bubble resting on rose rims with green spaces set in the blue side by side with crimson islands.

Why are the heavens painted for us, or, rather, why do our eyes see beauty in the clouds? For it is our eyes that transform the illimitable spaces of air into a blue bubble; our eyes that select the gorgeous colours for the sky-palette.

And, above all, if the beauty is in our seeing, why is it that we only notice it now and then? The artist sees beauty often where the ordinary man can see nothing but ugliness. Whistler taught most of us the mysterious charm of black fogs and the magic of the purple shadows in our moisture-laden air. The moral of it all is that the overmen who are coming after us will see beauty everywhere, and in all natural things.

And as the consciousness of beauty grows in us we shall ask for it even in the things made by man: in our cities and our streets, in our monuments, and perhaps at last even in the souls of our shopkeeping-masters. Fancy what it would be like to see a beautiful city, or even a lovely street, when now one can wander for miles in London without a moment’s joy in any lovely sight. Think of our street lamps, all as stiff as policemen, and all alike hideous, unlike policemen, who are all different in spite of the brutal uniformity of their clothes, and then imagine what street-lighting might be if we had the sense even to imitate the heavens, and throw constellations here and there, starring Regent Street with Orion’s belt and flaming another Southern Cross as a symbol above that dull Hall of discord at Westminster.

And why should we not have a Comic Street, too, for childish people without imagination, like Strachey of the Spectator, or George Russell—a street in which the lamp-posts would curtsy to each other, or indeed kneel or stand sadly alone, like lilies with drooping heads? Of course, the paving-stones would arrange themselves here and there into card-castles; the chimneys, too, might be trained to lean naturally over the eaves to listen to the street gossip below, and some windows should be given thick heavy brows and deep, shadowful sockets; and then the railings—the prim English railings—should be a bestiary of little fantastic figures interlinked with trails of vine and broad-leaved foliage; delightful birds and beasts seated or kneeling with more than human gravity, awful dragons and tailed monsters, eagles with round owl’s eyes, and dogs with human faces. Here I would make my railings all of gargoyles, and there of comic men’s heads held round the chin by linking hands. The doors should be of all patterns, differentiated like the owners: this one should be deep set like the miser’s soul, and of wrought iron like his hands, menacing dark in colour, too, with a sombre sense of power; but in it a little loophole should be practised, and above it a child’s face, painted of gay colours and all laughing, just to show that even the miser is human still. Another door should be fashioned to hold a ladder emblazoned on it, for the owner is a lady with social ambitions and belongs to the set known as “The Climbers,” and the ladder would naturally be of gold, or at least gilded to show off against the green background; and here should be a poet’s door, all lattice-work to let you see inside, and always a-jar to welcome the wanderer and wastrel: and this door must be very poor, for those who give love and joy have nothing else to give, and those who have money have never enough for themselves.

REVIEWS

WAGNER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

My Life. By RICHARD WAGNER. Two Vols. (Constable and Co. 31s. 6d. net.)

WE have read this extraordinary book with feelings of shame, dismay, humiliation. From the enormous mass of literature which has been written about Wagner one had learned that it was impossible to respect or like the man, to whatever extent one might admire his genius. That such a composer could, as a man, have been so contemptible has made men wonder ever since the main facts of his life became known. But his amazing genius seems to have blinded his family, as it hypnotised his long-suffering friends; for on any other hypothesis it is incomprehensible that those he left behind him should have permitted the circulation of this autobiography, which must set an indelible seal of shame on its author, though he bears one of the greatest names in music. We have here the callous confession of a man who can have had neither heart nor conscience, neither conduct nor character. In these miserable pages there is never a gleam of kindly, natural affection to lighten the sad story of a man who must have been one of the most colossally selfish persons that ever existed. The boy who was ready to rob his mother of the greater part of her fortune in order to gamble with it was, in truth, the father of the man who in later life could calmly dictate to a second wife the details of his treatment of her predecessor, and that with a view to ultimate publication. There are incidents in this autobiography which fill the reader with a sense of indescribable loathing for the unmanly creature who could bring himself to transcribe them. We said that he was colossally selfish, but what shall be said of the stupendous vanity which made it possible for Wagner thus to proclaim his shamelessness? He considered himself, as it seems, so great as to be above and independent of all the ordinary rules by which men's character is to be judged. Self-love and self-advertisement can surely go no further than this, that a man should be anxious for the public to know the evil of his private life, as if anything, forsooth, can be pardoned to a genius! We are reminded by this book of what Macaulay said of Boswell: "Everything which another man would have hidden, everything the publication of which would have made another man go and hang himself, that he has told about himself; he has used many people ill, but assuredly he has used nobody so ill as himself."

But if this book is in many respects the most painful human document we remember to have read, it is none the less true that it is a wonderfully well done piece of autobiography, and that it is, on the whole, absorbingly interesting. It suffers, as does all Wagner's work, literary as well as musical, from its length, and the minuteness, which is its chief merit, becomes tiresome when episodes which were not worth remembering are treated with the same care for detail which is so valuable at other times. Wagner had no "tact of omission." The first volume is decidedly the more interesting of the two. Here we are given an extraordinarily vivid portrait of Wagner in his younger days. It may be that the unsettled circumstances of his boyhood had something to do with the marring of his character. He was moved about from pillar to post in the charge of fathers and stepfathers, uncles and step-uncles; sometimes he was with his mother, who was not perhaps very tender or wise. She "threatened him with her curse if he should ever go on the stage," and her conduct when the son confessed that he had gambled with her money was certainly singular. Now he lives in poor lodgings; then we hear of him with relations who occupied a suite of rooms occasionally used by the Electoral family and decorated under Augustus the Strong. He was a trouble to his teachers (not that there was any great harm in that), except when one of them found that he could write what was called "poetry," and desired him to compose a "grand epic."

He was always enormously imaginative. Such "parties" as he was admitted to seemed to him "brilliant," and picnics at which Weber acted as cook were, no doubt, interesting enough. Like Charles Lamb, he was horribly afraid of ghosts, and he believed this fear was an important factor in the development of his mind. Left in a room for some time, gazing at lifeless objects such as furniture, he would suddenly scream with fright, because they seemed alive. Bits of scenery and costumes at the theatre seemed to come from another world. His sisters were actresses, and "my heart would beat madly at the touch of one of their dresses." From an early age he was susceptible of female charms, and he remembers that he used to pretend to be too helplessly sleepy to move, so that he might have the pleasure of being carried up to bed by the girls. Of course he adored music, but was the only child in the large family who was not given music-lessons, not, that is, until he was twelve years old. Weber was his delight, "'Don Juan' appeared frivolous to me, but perhaps that was because it was Italian." His joy in the orchestra was always intense. The sounding of bare fifths on the violin seemed like a greeting from a spirit world, and he never could pass a certain house without a shudder, for there he had first heard a violin, and its tones seemed to him to come not from the spirit world, but from one of the stone figures with which the façade was adorned. When he hears music of Beethoven for the first time the boy is overwhelmed with emotion: "I conceived of him as a sublime and unique supernatural being; this image was connected with that of Shakespeare; in ecstatic dreams I met both of them, saw and spoke to them, and, on awaking, found myself bathed in tears."

To learn enough of the technique of music to enable him to compose, he borrowed Logier's "Methode des General-basses" on a weekly payment system from old Wieck, Clara Schumann's father, and then began the financial difficulties with which he was to be familiar for so many years. He did not like the book when he had got it: "Music seemed to me a spirit, a noble, mystic monster, and any attempt to regulate it seemed to lower it in my eyes." His friends were a queer lot, and he does not appear to have come under any wholesome influence. Wayward, undisciplined, he must always have been a law unto himself; his education, if such it can be called, was proceeded with intermittently, though he was conscious of a desire to know everything except mathematics. He longed to study Greek and read Sophocles, and we cannot wonder that his first attempt to enjoy the classics came to nothing, "for my tutor's room overlooked a tanner's yard." The smell overcame the desire for Sophocles. An epoch in his life was the hearing "Fidelio" sung by Schoeder-Devrient, "young, beautiful, ardent, whose like I have never again seen on the stage: if I look back upon my life as a whole, I can find no event that produced so profound an impression on me." Only one other musical impression was as strong as this one: the first hearing of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Thus the story of the gradual evolution of musical genius is told, and we cannot deny that to every one who has been under the spell of Wagner's gigantic power as a composer its details must be of surpassing interest. But all this legitimate interest is set in a background of sordid horrors, and this background is the main part of the picture. We are spared no detail of the rowdy unseemliness and coarse vulgarity of the scenes amid which Wagner's early life was passed, and through it all there stands out the pitiless figure of the youth for whom self and music were the only two objects in life. Then he meets Minna Planer, makes her his mistress, and settles that the child she has borne to some previous lover shall always be considered as her sister. Into the further story of this wretched union, into the tiresome intrigues of the provincial theatre world through which this dismal pair threaded their way, only kept alive, as it seems, by the tireless generosity of friends on whom Wagner was never weary of sponging; into the hardships of the life in Paris; the hopes and fears of the life at Zurich, with its guilty secrets, we have neither the inclination nor the space to enter. Everything is told in the autobiography, which is carried up to the year 1864, when the summons to Munich came from the young King of Bavaria. It is an unhappy story, and Wagner must have been an unhappy man.

Never had any one more loyal or more devoted friends, but he was incapable of enjoying their friendship, and valued them only as almoners. We think he mentions no one at whom he has not at one time or another a nasty innuendo to deliver. His praise is seldom anything but niggardly, and he was ever ready to quarrel with his staunchest ally. How could such a man be happy? He mentions a two days' trip to Saxon Switzerland made in his youth, and is able, when approaching age, to say of it, "This is the sweetest and almost sole remembrance of unalloyed happiness in the whole of my life as a young man." Of his wedding-day he could write: "There was not one real friend amongst all those present;" and, again, "No lasting personal bond of friendship ever found its way into my life." That this loveless soul could not appreciate friends is not surprising, and it is not surprising that a being so magnificent as Liszt should have been great enough to regard only the genius and be blind to the baseness of the ingrat whom he succoured so nobly. But it is only by admitting the inexplicably constraining power of one who has genius that we can understand how Wagner had so many friends.

One thing we must set down to his credit. He worked hard, and his perseverance was indomitable. He admired the novels of Walter Scott as well as the dramas of Shakespeare, and he was foolishly fond of animals. "Robber," the Newfoundland, "Peps the petulant," and "Fips," his successor, "Papo" the parrot, with other animals, were objects of intense, wrong-hearted affection. When the first parrot died, "my inconsolable grief over this melancholy loss united me once again to my wife;" but when the third dog met his end we read: "The sudden death of this lively and lovable creature acted as the final rift in a union which had long since become impossible." No true dog-lover will like Wagner the better for this.

We have not had the opportunity of comparing the translation of the autobiography with the original German, and are therefore unable to pronounce upon its qualities of fidelity to the text. From what we know of Wagner's prose, we should be inclined to hazard a guess that the translator has sought, not unsuccessfully, to lighten the literary style of the book as it left the author's hands. Amateurs who wish to read about the genesis and growth of Wagner's operas will not find much that is new or important in these volumes. They will learn much more from such a book as the correspondence with Mathilde Wesendonk. Here they will be rewarded by being let into the secrets of the ignominy of a man of vast genius who has unveiled himself with a hand as unshrinking as that of Balzac.

STEVENSON'S LETTERS—II.

The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Edited by SIDNEY COLVIN. Four Volumes. (Methuen and Co. 5s. net each.)

WE have mentioned that one of the most striking features of Stevenson's letters is their many-sidedness, and in this they reflect faithfully enough the brilliant variety of his conversation. He wrote in strict obedience to the mood of the moment, and his moods were as changeable as those of a child, though, like a child, he was predisposed in favour of cheerfulness. One consequence of this quick alternation of grave and gay has been to lead certain critics to question his sincerity. For instance, after writing beautiful letters to Henley and Miss Ferrier on the death of the latter's father, he wrote to his cousin, "Poor Ferrier, it bust me horrid," and this has been charged against him as a proof of soullessness. Yet to any one who has seen a child laughing when it is hurt for fear that it should cry, the flippant wording of the phrase is evidence in favour of the sincerity of his regret. This flippancy of Stevenson was as much a part of his character as his desire to preach, but those who have escaped the influence of his enchantment will forgive him neither the one nor the other. That the author of "Jekyll and Hyde" should also have written "The Wrong Box" is interesting, but not unnatural; that the farce is better done than the parable touches the author's art rather than his sincerity. So when he writes to his friends with laughter on his lips we are not always sure that there is laughter in his heart. Touchstone is labelled a comic character, though his is a more tragic case than Hamlet's; and Stevenson for all his schoolboy fun and courage, could cry on occasion, "and if it had not been for my small strength I might have been a different man in all things." Your airy trifler does not write like that.

This emotional variety, while enhancing the value of Stevenson's correspondence to the reader, does not make it easy to do justice to it by quotation. His painful contests with his father on matters of belief, his methods of work, his joyous appreciation of children, his relationship with the natives of Samoa, his happy use of slang and his advice to young authors would each supply materials for a complete article, and still the great bulk of his letters would rest untouched. In THE ACADEMY, however, a paper for which at one time he did a certain amount of literary criticism, his judgments on books and their writers, to which we made some reference last week, call for fuller notice.

Stevenson was a good critic, in the sense that his criticism was individual and based on no academic theories of art. He stated his preferences with agreeable energy. "I mean to read Boswell now until the day I die." "'Le Crime et le Châtiment' is easily the greatest book that I have read in ten years. . . . Dostoeffsky is a devil of a swell, to be sure." "The best of the present French novelists seems to me, incomparably, Daudet." He reads a book by Anatole France and vows he has no use for him; then he falls across the Abbé Coignard, proclaims himself a faithful adorer and records his impression that no better book has ever been written. His less appreciative criticisms are no less emphatic. George Eliot is "a high but, may we not add? a rather dry lady." Zola's books are "Romance with the smallpox . . . diseased anyway and blackhearted and fundamentally at enmity with joy." "Ugliness is only the prose of horror. It is when you are not able to write 'Macbeth' that you write 'Thérèse Raquin.'" Yet later he expresses a great admiration for that unsatisfactory book "La Débâcle."

When we come to his criticisms of his English contemporaries we find no diminution of energy. Mr. Weyman's "A Gentleman of France" is "a real chivalrous yarn," Mr. Gosse's well-known lines to his infant daughter are "blooming good." His contrast between the poetry of Henley and Mr. Kipling is piquant. Writing of Henley, he says:—

There is perhaps no more genuine poet living, bar the Big Guns. How poorly Kipling compares! He is all smart journalism and cleverness: it is all bright and shallow and limpid, like a business-paper—a good one s'enten!; but there is no blot of heart's blood and the Old Night: there are no harmonics, there is scarce harmony to his music; and in Henley—all of these; a touch, a sense within sense, a sound outside the sound, the shadow of the inscrutable, eloquent beyond all definition.

A sense within sense, a sound outside the sound, that is praise that any poet would be content to earn. It should be added that Stevenson had a high appreciation of Mr. Kipling's prose works. Of Mr. Barrie, the Barrie of "The Little Minister" and "A Window in Thrums," he wrote "stuff in that young man; but he must see, and not be too funny. Genius in him, but there's a journalist at his elbow, there's the risk." For Meredith, both as poet and novelist, he had an unbounded admiration. "Have you read Meredith's 'Love in the Valley'? It got me, I wept; I remembered that poetry existed." On Meredith the man there is a strange criticism that the Editor only partially softens in a footnote. "There is something in that potent, genialisch affectation that puts one on the strain even to address him in a letter. He is not an easy man to be yourself with; there is so much of him, and the veracity, and the high intellectual humbug are so intermixed."

In a letter to Henley, written in his thirty-fourth year, we find a statement of his attitude towards art in general. "My view of life is essentially the comic, and the romantically comic. 'As You Like It' is to me the most bird-haunted spot in letters; 'Tempest' and 'Twelfth Night' follow. These are what I mean by poetry and nature." He refers to Molière, Musset, and Meredith, and continues:—

And to me these things are the good; beauty, touched with sex and laughter; beauty, with God's earth for the background. Tragedy does not seem to me to come off; and when it does, it does so by the heroic illusion; the anti-masque has been omitted; laughter, which attends on all our steps in life, and sits by the deathbed, and certainly redacts the epitaph, laughter has been lost from these great-hearted lies.

Yet afterwards, as we have seen, he was to praise "Crime and Punishment," which certainly does not succeed by aid of the heroic illusion; and in any case he would have been well advised to substitute the "Midsummer Night's Dream" for "The Tempest" in his trio of romantically-comic plays. "The Tempest" is not haunted by birds, but by rather disquieting ghosts.

We will not specifically mention his numerous appreciations of Scott and Dumas; these were to be expected from the author of "Kidnapped" and the "Master of Ballantrae." But it is interesting to read that in his opinion Scott, Balzac, and Thackeray were the three people who had had the "true creator's brush." In a famous passage he severely criticises Balzac, and states a theory of art that is, in our judgment, mistaken. Balzac

Was a man who never found his method. An inarticulate Shakespeare, smothered under forcible-feeble detail. It is astounding to the riper mind how bad he is, how feeble, how untrue, how tedious; and, of course, when he surrendered to his temperament, how good and powerful. And yet never plain nor clear. He would not consent to be dull, and thus became so. He would leave nothing undeveloped, and thus drowned out of sight of land amid the multitude of crying and incongruous details. There is but one art—to omit! O if I knew how to omit, I would ask no other knowledge. A man who knew how to omit would make an Iliad of a daily paper.

We have been more concerned with stating Stevenson's criticisms than debating them, but we fancy that few readers of Balzac would subscribe to the above criticism as it stands, and equally few perhaps would be found to say that it was wholly unjust. But it may safely be said that the art of omission never produced one line of literature by itself, and that practically all writers of genius have patently lacked it.

Here, then, are a bare handful of the opinions of a very stimulating and individual critic, and in considering Stevenson in this light we have merely chosen one of a hundred that are faithfully reflected in the pages of his correspondence. By so doing we have naturally failed to do justice to the effervescent gaiety which bubbles quenchlessly in these letters and fills them with delightful surprises. We must leave the sure discovery of their further merits to the many thousands of readers who should take advantage of this definitive edition to make the acquaintance of a letter-writer who can have had few equals in the English language. When we express the opinion that on these letters Stevenson's name as an artist will ultimately depend, we are confident that we are giving him no mean measure of fame. It is hard to believe that an age will be born that will not find them charming.

A NATION'S LOVE SONGS

La Lyre d'Amour. An Anthology of French Love-Poems from the Earliest Times down to 1866. Selected and Annotated by CHARLES B. LEWIS. (Chatto and Windus. 5s. net.)

POETRY is the cult of the elemental. There are other definitions, but this one is convenient for our purpose, and contains besides a fair share of the truth. Poetry teaches our carnal eyes to look on the sea and the mountains, and our spiritual eyes to look on Life, Death, and Love. The last-named of this great trio of mysteries has, in the common estimation, claims to a special and almost exclusive dominion in the realms of poetry. This vulgar notion has a certain justification. Whenever a commonplace or prosaic mind has found expression for a moment in poetry, it is always love that has been the source of inspiration. But what is undoubtedly true of the occasional lapse into song is far from applying absolutely to the whole field of poetry. There are other high themes, other lofty conceptions. We have only to look through the pages of any judicious anthology, in any language, through a volume of any of the poets whom Time has consecrated, to be convinced of this truth—that love, in any ordinary sense, is not the whole stuff of imagination. In a wider sense, no doubt, love and poetry may be taken to be synonymous, just as love and Christianity are synonymous; but the synthesis is rather too enormous for subsequent analytical processes.

An anthology entirely devoted to love-poetry would probably have a rather cloying effect if treated like most ordinary books of verse. Such a selection, if made on very strict principles, would form, we venture to think, one of the most intolerable volumes to spend an afternoon with that could possibly be imagined. When we speak of strict principles, we mean roughly that nothing should be considered under the heading of love-poetry but which has reference to a particular passion, or—a rare case—that which deals with love in the abstract. In his very excellent Anthology Mr. Lewis has included certain poems that seem to us to have rather doubtful claims; the book is none the worse on that account—gold is the better for an alloy. We should, for instance, be rather disposed to quarrel with the inclusion of those two exquisite and famous poems, the “Ballade des Dames du Temps jadis,” and “Mignonne, allons voir si la Rose”—the first-named would be very difficult to justify as a love-poem, and the other strikes us as more properly an Epicurean ode, in the manner of Horace, on the instability of human things, with an incidental love-element.

Love is a universal passion, and we cannot believe that there is any really great and essential difference between the feelings of lovers in different ages and in different countries. But as there are great differences of degree between various temperaments, so there is enormous divergence in conventions and social conditions from country to country and from land to land. French observers of English customs are never tired of telling us, what in some cases is almost obvious, that amour and “love” are two very different things; it is really quite a superficial observation; amour and “love” both exist in both countries. All that is really certain is that “lover” cannot be translated by amant. Mr. Lewis has given in the course of an excellent introduction a very clear view of the development of the idea of love in French poetry. The early traditional poems exhibit a curious social phenomenon; the woman is the suitor, and is often treated and regarded with indifference by the man. Then came the age of chivalry, and the positions were reversed. The trouvères prostrated themselves before their dames as before a deity, and initiated a fashion that lasted through centuries. Ronsard and his school put new life and variety into this conception, which waxed fainter and fainter, till it was once again awakened by the trumpets of the Revolution and the Romantic Movement. Victor Hugo, de Musset, and Lamartine explored every corner of the domain of love, and realised the Golden Age of French lyric poetry. Sully Prudhomme was a survivor of the great school, and symbolists and decadents have consummated the inevitable reaction. We think it would be true to say that the great ages of lyrical expansion have generally coincided with the most stirring epochs in the world's history, or they have preluded them, or they have sung them out. In any case, the periods that have been lyrically barren have been also the periods of a general want of faith.

Poetry is not always the faithful mirror of a time or a country. It is always by its nature more or less the slave of conventions, and no kind of poetry is so liable to convention as love-poetry. The conventions sometimes acquire such strength that it is difficult for even the most tempestuous genius to break through them. We are tempted to infer that, apart from certain short periods, certain movements, and certain names, the distinction between the songs of certain nations of a similar culture, and at the same moment in their development, would be extraordinarily difficult to establish. French love-poems are not a real species. There are undoubtedly moments when French love-poetry is something apart, but these moments occur seldom, and are associated with names of overpowering genius. The structure of French verse gives an illusion of strong individuality. The alleged difference between the English and French conceptions of love does not enter into poetry. In the earlier ages lyric love was wholly in the hands of convention, and the convention was European rather than national. After the Renaissance Englishmen had not yet learned to conceal their dearest emotions, and they spoke both in prose and in verse on the great subject with as little restraint as their neighbours. After the eighteenth century our tongues were sealed in ordinary intercourse, and love was relegated to books, while Frenchmen continued to speak of amour wherever two or three of them foregathered. Incidentally we have no word in the common speech for patrie, but that want seems to be secular. It is partly the horror of abstractions that makes us shudder at Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité, but it is also based on the feeling that our deepest emotions are not for everyday speech. But this restriction does not apply to literature; lyrical poetry is by definition personal, as contrasted with other genres, but it is impersonality itself compared with familiar conversation. The difference between Byron, Burns, and Shelley on the one hand, and Musset and Hugo on the other, is entirely one of degree, and depends on the fineness of the individual perceptions. “L'amour est fétichiste”—we quote from one of M. Anatole France's heroes—and there is no truer word to describe the Romantic attitude towards love. It is the note in the “Lac” of Lamartine, in Hugo's “Tristesse d'Olympe,” and in the finest passages of Tennyson's “Maud.” Love levies tribute on the whole world; the lover calls in Nature to form an integral part of his passion.

Mr. Lewis' selection is by no means commonplace. He has given a large place to the Middle Ages, and has presented many charming writers and poems, from a period little known to English readers. He has taken the very sensible step of giving his explanatory notes in French, whereby a ray of light is often shed on philological obscurities. Canon de Béthune and King Thibaut of Navarre are among the singers; the poetry of their age makes us think a little of James I. of Scotland and the Scottish successors of Chaucer, though the dates do not correspond; but the mediæval uniformity justifies the comparison. Mr. Lewis is debarred by copyright obstacles from including contemporaries and recent masters; he particularly regrets the impossibility of giving some selections from Sully-Prudhomme's works. Sometimes we miss an old favourite; we have often thought that the song from “Érivadnus”— contains the quintessence of love-poetry; but after all the old favourites are not difficult to find elsewhere. The value of the book is that it gives what is not so easily accessible, and supplies a key for the reading of it. Many of the specimens have no great intrinsic worth, but serve to illustrate periods. Mr. Lewis presents them with apologies, but it is easy to tolerate the presence of a few daubs in a gallery of masterpieces.

Si tu veux, faisons un rêve,

SHORTER REVIEWS

Some Old Devon Churches. By JOHN STABB. (Simpkin, Marshall and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

EVERYONE knows how rich Devonshire is in beautiful churches and fine old chancel-screens, about which many books have been written. Yet a new one is always welcome, especially when it is well illustrated with original photographs, of which this volume, the second of the series, contains no less than one hundred and sixty by the author. Mr. Stabb has taken great pains not only to present excellent pictures of the interiors of churches with their screens, but also of many interesting and less-known bits of architecture. Among these we notice two of Easter Sepulchres, four of the remarkable font at Dolton, made probably from the shaft of an ancient Celtic cross, carved with interlaced and serpentine patterns. Another most interesting photograph is that of the Tabernacle of the Blessed Sacrament at Warkleigh, which is supposed to have been made on the Accession of Queen Mary to take the place of the hanging Pyx, which had been appropriated to the King's use in 1552.

The descriptive letterpress is full of valuable information concisely told. Many quaint epitaphs and inscriptions on bells are given. The poet Herrick was Vicar of Dean Prior from 1629 to 1674, and in the church is an epitaph written by him on the monument of Sir Edward Giles. It is "now almost washed out by the sponge of time," and certainly ought to be restored. Mr. Stabb has rescued it from oblivion by giving a transcript. It is a pleasure to read a work so thoroughly and accurately done, and we may add one that is printed in clear and beautiful type on excellent paper, pleasant and comfortable features lacking in too many books of to-day, and—a great joy—no tiresome cutting of the leaves.

Papua: a Handbook to its History, Inhabitants, Physical Features, and Resources, &c. Compiled from Government Records and other Sources. By W. CHARLES PRITCHARD. (S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.)

PAPUA, the curiously shaped island which is so nearly joined by coral reefs to Australia, is one of those far places of the earth which most people know only by name and perhaps by rumours of cannibalism. Dr. Pritchard, Archdeacon of Broken Hill, New South Wales, who was attached to the staff of the Anglican Mission in New Guinea from May, 1907, to March, 1908, was asked to prepare a little book which might serve as a manual of information on this unfamiliar land, and this handy volume is the result. It was only in the middle of the nineteenth century that New Guinea became at all known to the civilised world, when H.M.S. Rattlesnake, commanded by Captain Owen-Stanley, surveyed the southern shores, and the first accurate examination of the coasts was made by Captain (afterwards Admiral) John Moresby when in command of H.M.S. Basilisk as late as 1873.

History repeats itself. In 1884 the Germans were bothering us over their share of the island, but since 1888, when the protected territory became an acknowledged British possession, affairs have run smoothly. The horrors of cannibalism have practically vanished, although the fate of the Rev. James Chalmers on April 8th, 1901, is a sad reminder that the customs and passions of the natives cannot be held in check without many years of patience and perseverance. The chapters on the resources of Papua and the precautions to be taken for the avoidance of malarial fevers are of great interest, and the book will certainly be of valuable assistance to any one who thinks of settling in the island for business purposes. Papua is rich in possibilities, and will probably be much more before the notice of the commercial and investing public in the next twenty years than it has yet been.

Guide to the Exhibition of Animals, Plants, and Minerals mentioned in the Bible. Illustrated. Special Guide No. 5. (British Museum, Department of Natural History. 6d.)

THE enterprising trustees of the British Museum initiated this most interesting exhibition at South Kensington as a supplement to the literary and historical Biblical Exhibition arranged at Bloomsbury for the Tercentenary of the Authorised Version. Mr. R. Lydekker, F.R.S., and Dr. G. F. Herbert Smith are respectively responsible for the selection, arrangement, and labelling of the animal and mineral specimens, and Dr. A. B. Rendle, F.R.S., performed a similar service with regard to the plants. The zoological and botanical parts of the Guide-book are virtually reprints of the exhibited labels, the information on which is, to a considerable extent, derived from the late Dr. H. B. Tristram's fine work, "The Natural History of the Bible." Notwithstanding all that has been written about them during many centuries, there is still great uncertainty as to the original signification of the Hebrew and Greek names of the Biblical minerals. They are not considered in Dr. Tristram's work, and as the subject presents much difficulty, Mr. L. Fletcher, Director of the Natural History Museum, has contributed to the Guide-book a short, erudite essay showing how modern interpretations of the ancient names of Biblical minerals have been deduced. It will thus be seen that no pains have been spared in the preparation of this booklet, which contains a rich fund of most curious, interesting, and useful information.

NEW EDITIONS

Letters from a Self-made Merchant to his Son. Edited by G. H. LORIMER. (Methuen and Co. 1s. net.)

Poems of Oscar Wilde. (Methuen and Co. 1s. net.)

The Pickwick Papers; Nicholas Nickleby. (Nelson and Sons. 2s. each net.)

THE acute and amusing letters "from John Graham, at the Union Stock Yards in Chicago," to his son Pierrepont at Harvard, have reached their nineteenth edition since they were first published in the year 1903, and such a statement is high praise in itself. The stern admonitions—"You're not going to be a poet or a professor, but a packer;" the smart advice—"Have something to say: say it: stop talking;" the aphorisms, maxims, stories—all are as fresh as ever, and in its present neat and handy form the volume is certainly splendid value for a shilling.

From a literary point of view the "Poems" of Wilde are also good to possess at this small price and in this compact binding, although only a selection is given. Some of the best are included, however, and the "Ballad of Reading Gaol, which in itself should attract many purchasers.

By the use of very thin paper the 880 pages which contain the story of "Nicholas Nickleby" and the 845 pages of "Pickwick" are compressed into quite handy volumes; Messrs. Nelson and Sons are to be congratulated on issuing their "New Dickens" in such an attractive form, especially as the welcome "Phiz" illustrations are reproduced cleverly, and, wonderful to relate, appear in their correct positions with regard to the text. The novels of Charles Dickens will apparently bear the test of unlimited editions and reprints, and for those who do not possess sets of the classical—almost historic—leather-bound volumes which are so familiar a feature of many libraries, the present clearly-printed and neatly-presented series will prove a capital substitute.

FICTION

Ladies Whose Bright Eyes. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

THE lost age of chivalry is one which has been so often and so indifferently well revived on paper that it is always with a feeling of distrust that one opens a novel dealing with it. If Mr. Hueffer speedily removes that distrust it is not only because he is so obviously master of his subject, and without any desire to make his characters either strutting chanciers or drunken buffoons, but also and largely because he has so cunningly connected his period with the twentieth century. He has taken a more than usually up-to-date and disillusioned man, and projecting him into the fourteenth century, has made it his business to show, among other things, how that time might appear to modern eyes, how it might affect a modern man, and how little a modern man could hope to affect it.

We first meet Mr. William Sorrel, the smart publisher, on a boat express, where he is standing in the corridor smoking and considering the mild flirtation he has recently indulged in with a Mrs. Lee-Egerton, an adventure which has caused him to lend the lady a considerable sum of money for the redemption of her scapegrace son. As security he holds the Tamworth-Egerton crucifix, a relic of the Crusades, and he is examining it when we make his acquaintance. He cannot bring himself to keep it, and presently goes back to the compartment where Mrs. Lee-Egerton is sitting to restore it; but before he can accomplish this, an accident occurs to the train, the carriage telescopes and turns over, and the collapsing roof strikes Mr. Sorrel into oblivion. He wakes to find himself clad in a turban and a shift, still holding the crucifix and trudging over Salisbury Plain to bear it to the castle of the Knight of Egerton, its owner. The immediate effects of the transition are humorous, and Mr. Sorrel vents some very amusing remarks as he notes the peculiarities of the landscape—the robbers hung on every hilltop, the unaccountable absence of train-smoke, a golden eagle long extinct floating overhead, and a nun on a white mule journeying beside him. In a short time he reaches the castle of the De Courcys, kinsfolk of the Egertons, and is welcomed by a procession of nuns and priests from a neighbouring convent, chanting and swinging censers, all very eager to obtain possession of the cross. There is a contest between them and the Lady Blanche de Courcy, who, with a few retainers too old to follow her husband to the wars, overpowers the priests and makes Mr. Sorrel her guest. He at first believes himself to be taking part in a pageant, but is soon convinced that all is real by the internal arrangements of the castle. He is appalled by its mingled filth and sybaritism, its beautiful clothes and the horrible food, the luxurious bath and the offal-strewn courtyard in which it stands. He wisely retains the cross, since its possession makes him a man of mark. Presently the Lady Dionissia, wife without ever having seen him to the Knight of Egerton, puts in another claim for it, and, in the absence of their lords, the two ladies decide to settle the matter by personal combat according to the rules of the tourney.

While this event is preparing we are taken North to the borders of Scotland, where Queen Eleanor and Earl Mortimer are conducting a series of forays, with the Knights of Courcy and Egerton in their forces. One incident, though portrayed with a wonderful attention to details of dress and manners, does not quite convince us. Surely in that day rulers were not compelled to hold audience with knights in the bedchambers of the latter while they were dressing; surely, also, knights of small power and possessions would not have flouted Mortimer and the Queen in such an easy and careless manner. About the knighting of Mr. Sorrel and the ladies' tournament, however, we have no doubts. It is a splendid picture, and Sir Ygorac, the aged master of the ceremonies, is a charming figure. Ultimately the Lady Dionissia conquers, and Sir William Sorrel rides off with her. We need not disclose in what way he is swept back again to his original century, bereft of his smartness and clothed with a new idealism. In the girl who nursed him after the accident he discovers a descendant of the Lady Dionissia, bearing the same name, and it is a fitting conclusion to the tale that he should marry her and set about the restoration of that small castle of Winterburne St. Martin which Sir Ygorac gave to Sir William Sorrel on his knighthood.

The Little Green Gate. By STELLA CALLAGHAN. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 5s.)

MOST of us have heard the story of the frugal housewife who, when purchasing some Gruyère cheese, indignantly protested against having to pay for the holes in it. After a perusal of "The Little Green Gate," any purchaser of the book who is not an expert decipherer of dots and dashes will have no difficulty in understanding, and sympathising with, the worthy woman's irate feelings. What can be more tantalising to the omnivorous fiction-reader, who is ever in search of new sensations, than such a passage as this?—"Passionately, burningly, he whispered" What did he whisper? Apparently four dots. Just that and nothing more, which leaves much to the imagination, and that is all that can be pleaded in favour of such a style of writing. Dots and dashes, indeed, pervade the whole volume. There is a dash on the first page and forty-nine dots on the last one. These dots are even made to figure in a telegram—"May I come to you . . . want work . . . urgent . . . Peter." We wonder what the Post Office charged for them.

Peter is the hero of the story, and a rather despicable hero, too; for, after becoming engaged to Moonie, with whom he has, to say the least, a very "dotty" and "dashy" adventure in a punt, he makes love to Nina at the little green gate while a thunderstorm "ragged above their heads and the rain pelted on them." But that was a mere detail, of which neither took the slightest notice, as the following, dots and all, will show:—

She lifted her lips up to be kissed. He bent and kissed them, a long, long kiss, with all the world in it . . . their first, their last, their only kiss . . . but to them worth all the rest of time. There is always one moment in one's life when one understands eternity. . . .

Then Peter "became acutely conscious of the miserable dripping state of his evening clothes," and, "petering out," returned to Moonie, otherwise Muriel, and her mother, Mrs. Jimmy, who "purred from the sofa" at him. Yet before he settled down to a humdrum married life "the old cynical smile twisted his thin lips" once more, showing that he was not only a fickle lover but also an expert contortionist. The illustrations to this most emotional though somewhat lackadaisical story help to elucidate in a measure the ubiquitous dots and dashes which the printer is to be congratulated on having so generously supplied in these days of strikes, earning thereby, no doubt, the heartfelt gratitude of the fair authoress, if not that of her readers.

A Woman of Small Account. By M. E. MARTENS. (The Walter Scott Publishing Company. 6s.)

If the De Villers family, so ably depicted here by Miss Martens, is at all typical of its class, then the Boers are not people among whom we should care to live. The patriarchal and self-righteous Hendrik and his numerous daughters and sons-in-law are an extremely unpleasant lot, but their unpleasantness is that lifelike variety possessed, for example, by some of Jane Austen's and George Eliot's characters. Content that the victory is with the right side, we follow with deep satisfaction the bickerings between them and Hester, the old man's grandchild and ward of the son he has almost made a half-wit by his brutality. Family quarrels in Miss Martens' hands are anything but trivial, and we have seldom read a more convincing domestic scene than that where the old man has married his lady-help, a bumptious girl, and has ordered his granddaughter to address her late menial as grandmother, only to be met by the information that granddaughter and son are about to leave his house for ever. Hester's love-making and marriage with John West, a type of the "wooden" Englishman, are not so good, but there is much pathos in this latter part of the book. Hester, with her strong views on sex questions (strong enough to break up her home), is a powerfully-drawn character—never insipid, far from perfect, and often touched with a human aggressiveness. Miss Martens' chief fault is her style, which, except in the dialogue, is never very good, her opening paragraph in particular being a terrible piece of writing.

MAGAZINES

FOR many readers the pièce de résistance of the English Review for September will doubtless be Mr. Alfred Noyes' article, or rather review, entitled simply "Poetry," since all who are familiar with Mr. Noyes' work recognise that in treating his special subject, whether in a deliberately written article or in a notice of the poetry of others, he must in some degree give us an essay. He will be illuminating, whether we agree with him or not, and this appreciation of an anthology, "Eyes of Youth," by one who knows well and truly what laws should go to the making of an anthology, is no exception to that rule. He protests against the tendency to be "too deliberately artistic"—the "transitional stage between that of the mere Philistine and that of the artist to whom the method of expression has become so natural that he thinks no more about it," and the whole article is good fare for the literary reader.

Sir Hugh Gilzean-Reid, LL.D., vice-chairman of the Middlesex County Association, contributes a reasoned study of "Our Citizen Defence," demanding close attention. In the light of recent events, however, some of its statements may have to be qualified, as when he remarks that "nowhere else in the world are the sovereign and representative institutions of a country regarded with profounder respect, supported with livelier interest, or served with readier loyalty than by the industrial class in Great Britain, which unquestionably stands unrivalled in its patriotic impulses." Despite this it is an important and thoughtful article, to be read by all who are interested in the question of home defence.

The unpublished MSS. of the late Charles Reade, "Androgynism, or Woman Playing at Man," is concluded, and proves very amusing, although one must be thankful that civilisation is not complicated by many such embarrassing cases. Mr. Arnold Bennett has one of his neat little sketches, "Watling Street," and Mr. Christopher Stone has a capital short story, "The Tutor." The article by Vernon Lee is not particularly to our mind; it is a hopeless and unprofitable task to analyse the work of an artist such as Thomas Hardy and to discover the proportion of nouns to adjectives or verbs, &c., ad nauseam. It seems the least permissible form of "literary" criticism, this; not in such a manner is the magic secret of style to be betrayed. Other fine essays, stories, and some moderate poetry assist in making this number of the English Review a budget of good things.

The most important article in the Atlantic Monthly for August, which reaches us rather late, is by Sir William H. White, K.C.B., entitled "The United States Navy." Avoiding any undue controversy, the author discusses and compares, with the accuracy and insight of comprehensive knowledge, the navies of the United States, Japan, and Germany. Sir William White, treating of warlike themes, throws his influence strongly on the side of peace, and advisedly refrains from any comparisons of the naval strength of the two great English-speaking peoples, since he regards the question of war between them as "lying beyond the region of probability." "Their supreme interest," he writes, "is centred in the maintenance of the peace of the world:"

By united action it lies in their power to ensure the continuance of peace to an extent which is possible to no other combination of Powers, and they wish to obtain that desirable result without injury to the interests of other nations. In these circumstances it appears to be not only undesirable but useless to make comparisons of their naval strength.

Another excellent point is made when Sir William emphasises the need for practical men at the head of affairs. "It must be recognised that programmes of ship-building, the provision of naval bases, methods of training seamen, strategical plans, and all other matters incidental to preparation for war, cannot possibly be dealt with satisfactorily by politicians, Parliamentary bodies, or congressional committees." The nation must be guided by trained experts, who, however, must not be allowed to take sole charge—"they should be treated as trusted advisers on, not as full masters of, the situation." The whole article is full of sound sense, and is so free from technicalities that the ordinary reader can appreciate it thoroughly.

Mr. W. A. Smith strikes a decidedly new note in a capital article on "The Uses of the Comic Spirit in Religion," and a very interesting contribution deals with the New England of Louisa Alcott's stories. The fiction of this number and the lighter matter are well up to the Atlantic Monthly's usual high standard.

The illustrations to the September Harper's Magazine are calculated to make the casual reader purchase it at once; one of the two coloured pages, "On a Thames Backwater," is well worth framing. Miss May Sinclair concludes her study of "Miss Tarrant's Temperament"; Mr. Howard Pyle contributes a weird and rather gruesome tale entitled "The Dead Finger"; and one of the finest little stories we have read for some time is "The Turning-Point," by Alan Sullivan. The article on the River Thames is excellent, although one of its illustrations, "On a Thames Steamboat," idealises the average river steamer considerably; ladies in exquisite dresses and gentlemen in spotless flannels do not pose so exquisitely on many of the boats, we fear, nor does the man at the wheel look quite so intellectual. Many other articles and good stories complete a very fine issue.

In The Hindustan Review for July the place of honour is properly given to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's article on "East and West in India," intended to be read at the late Universal Races Congress. Such a paper merits fuller consideration. It contains the views of the advanced reformers, who look forward to "representative Government on a democratic basis" for the political evolution of India. He admits that the progress must be slow. Meanwhile the requisites are, he considers, improved relations on an enduring basis between Europeans and Indians, a Government more national in spirit and sentiment, that England should send to India only her best, and that Englishmen in India should all have good manners. As a fact much political advance is being made and the pace cannot be unduly forced. It might be suggested that a preliminary requisite is an improvement in the standard of truth throughout India: nothing would bring the East and West closer together.

Mr. Saint Nihal Singh recounts the unpleasant reception he met with in the United States, and has some scathing observations to offer in return. Some of the articles are severe reading, such as "The Philosophy of Life," "A Gold Currency for India," "India and Neo-Malthusianism," "Dualistic Asceticism," "Kalidasa, a Study." It is always desirable to know what the Mahomedans have to say of Islam and its politics. A Mahomedan barrister writes cleverly of "Islam and Socialism," though his co-religionists might not all accept his views. The notices and reviews of books are rather belated; in some cases the books have been published for months. "The Man in the Public Eye" is a biographical appreciation of Lord Crewe, neatly done and brief. In the "Topics of the Day" there are slips, and passages which might be criticised if space permitted. Altogether it is a creditable number: but the price is too high.

TROUBLOUS LIVERPOOL

(Reprinted by kind permission of the Editor of the "Surrey Comet")

FOR ten days or more during the strike some forty members of the Liverpool Bench were on duty almost without intermission. The call came to most of them when they were on holiday, but they promptly responded to the summons and hastened back to the city to do their duty, realising full well that in its discharge they might be face to face even with death itself. The periods of service were arranged by rota, and were supposed to be eight hours at a stretch, but circumstances sometimes greatly extended the hours of duty. The magistrates cheerfully roughed it with the soldiers and the police, resting as best they could on hard floors and benches, and sharing any modest refreshment that came to hand. Nobody asked or looked for special treatment, and the most dangerous duty was undertaken uncomplainingly.

Mr. R. J. Ward, J.P., one of the Liverpool Justices, gave an interview to a representative of the Surrey Comet. Mr. Ward said that very early in the morning of August 16th he received an urgent message asking him to proceed at once to Liverpool in view of the alarming state of affairs in that city; he arrived at 10.25 the same morning. At 1.30 he was sent on duty with the Staffordshire Regiment at St. George's Hall, and after spending four hours there he was detailed for the duty of swearing-in special constables, which lasted until 10.30. Only one hour's rest was allowed him, and from 11.30 p.m. to seven o'clock on the morning of August 17th he remained on duty with the troops, so that from the time he left home he was on the go continuously for nearly thirty hours. Each magistrate had to keep an accurate record of every duty performed, and carried with him a copy of the Riot Act for use in case of emergency.

Mr. Ward's narrative was as follows:—

A good deal of popular misapprehension exists with regard to the reading of the Riot Act by a magistrate. Many people suppose that it consists of a long document which takes a good deal of time to get through. As a matter of fact it can be read in one minute, as all that the magistrate is required to read is contained in the following proclamation:—

Our Sovereign Lord the King chargeth and commandeth all persons, being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves and peacefully depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the Act made in the first year of King George the First for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies. God save the King.

In the instructions issued to the Liverpool magistrates it was stated that when a magistrate arrived at the place where the troops were stationed—

"He will find that the troops will not act unless he is present with them and accompanies them. If more than one magistrate is present, one of the number must be selected to give the orders to the commander of the troops to act. The commander of the troops will consult with the magistrate and with the senior police officer present, and the commander will decide as to the disposition of the troops. The commander will, as far as possible, move the troops to any place to which he may be directed by the magistrate. The magistrate must accompany the troops and remain as near the commanding officer as possible. In the event of a disturbance amounting to a riot, it will be the duty of the magistrate in his discretion to read the proclamation under the Riot Act, and care must be taken that the exact words of the proclamation are followed. Before reading the proclamation the magistrate should cause silence to be called for, and, whether silence has been procured or not, should then read, or cause to be read, the proclamation in a loud voice, as near to the crowd as he can safely come.

"Having read the proclamation, the magistrate should also call upon all persons present to assist him in the suppression of the riot. He should also note and write down the exact time at which it is read, and if circumstances allow he should wait for one hour before giving such orders as he may think necessary to the officer commanding the troops. The waiting for one hour is very important if it is possible, as it makes the offence of being assembled together at the expiration of that time much more serious than it otherwise would be. But if it is not possible to wait for the hour, the magistrate must not hesitate to give such orders as he may think necessary to the commanding officer for the maintenance of order and peace. In the giving of such order the magistrate will naturally consult with the commanding officer and with the senior officer of police who is present. If time permits the magistrate should write down the terms of the order which he gives to the commanding officer. When the magistrate has issued his request to the commanding officer, it will remain with that officer to decide as to what steps he shall take to accomplish the desired end, and if the officer thinks that time is not ripe for acting upon the directions of the magistrate, such commanding officer has the discretion and the responsibility of such delay. The magistrate must remain with the troops at the place of disturbance until it is decided by him and the commanding officer that they can safely withdraw."

Mr. Ward said he was not called upon to read the Riot Act, but one of his colleagues had to do so no less than five times. Some very exciting experiences, however, fell to the lot of Mr. Ward. The most narrow escape he had from a terrible scene of bloodshed was on the occasion of the funeral of the man Sutcliffe, who was shot while attempting to unhorse the officer in command of the troops. Attempts were being made to hold up the trams at different points, and it was necessary to hurry up troops and police, who were conveyed in a couple of two-decker trams, a company of the 2nd Yorkshire occupying the top deck and the police the inside of the cars. Mr. Ward was the magistrate detailed to accompany the troops, and on their appearance the crowd hurriedly decamped. Then a most unfortunate incident occurred. In returning the cars met the funeral cortege of the man Sutcliffe. It was entirely accidental, for the hour of the procession and the route it was to take had been kept secret. "Had I known," said Mr. Ward, "that it would pass this way at this hour I should certainly have advised the choice of another route." They could not go back. There was only one thing to do, and that was to halt and await the passing of the sad procession. Fierce resentment was shown at their presence, and the respectful compliment to the dead paid by the troops was wholly misunderstood.

As the cars stopped, the men responded sharply to the command of the officer, and stood at attention, thus saluting the dead. The magistrate bared his head and silently waited. Inside the police spontaneously stood up while the cavalcade walked by. "Look at your bloody work," shrieked a woman as she pointed at the coffin. "Yes, look at your bloody work," piped a little girl of some seven or eight years, whose father lifted her up to see the procession, imitating her mother and pointing at the hearse. "Murderers!" "Assassins!" "Butchers!" yelled the crowd in savage anger. "Wait till the Germans come here," shouted some one—a phrase that was taken up by a good many. "We haven't forgotten South Africa!" cried others. These are but a few of the milder expressions used by the angry mob, who now seemed to have forgotten the reason of the assembly. Foul and filthy epithets were flung with passionate hate at the soldiers and the police, who stood calmly at attention. For a while it looked as though there would be trouble. No one on the two cars stirred, fearful, with the knowledge of the deadly powers he possessed, lest any movement might still further excite an already frenzied mob. Slowly the cortège passed by, and, finding themselves being left behind, the crowd contented themselves with hurling fresh abuse at the occupants of the cars, and hurried after the hearse and carriages. "We continued our journey, thankful that no act of violence had been committed to mar what had thus far been a peaceful reconnaissance."

On one occasion, near St. Anne's Street, in the very centre of the strike area, Mr. Ward saw the mob seize a large lorry laden with huge cases of bacon and hams just imported by Liptons. The shafts were broken off the lorry, the cases were torn open, and large quantities of the meat carried away before the police could get near them. The sides of bacon were cut in half, and in many cases were stowed away in dustbins and cellars. In Scotland Road, another storm centre, he saw a brewer's dray raided and a large cask of beer rolled down a side street and broached. In a third case a load of imported mutton was intercepted, and the mob divided the spoil. A police convoy had been arranged for the meat, but as the latter was four hours late in arriving the police had retired.

Mr. Ward was on duty all night on five occasions, and only once did he get a share of the refreshments sent in. The state of things was so alarming that the troops slept in their accoutrements, and had their rifles with bayonets fixed alongside of them ready at a moment's call. Both officers and men were in excellent spirits, and bore the strain of duty with the utmost cheerfulness. The public sent a supply of periodicals, and came in and gave concerts to the soldiers, who were not allowed to leave the military stations except on duty. Mr. Ward said anybody who had not seen a Liverpool mob could form no conception of its insensate fury; there was no mob in the world equal to it for determination. At Trinity Church, St. Anne's-street, they actually tore down the churchyard fence, using the iron railings and the bricks as weapons to assail the police. Asked if the disturbances were the work of hooligans or strikers, Mr. Ward said they both took part in it. The carters on strike had armed themselves with the large iron pins with which the shafts were fastened on to the lorries. Plenty of the strikers were also found with their pockets filled with stones. A large stone just missed his face on one occasion, but he came through the ten days without injury. Considerable difficulty was experienced in driving from place to place, as taxicab drivers were very loth to take the risks involved, and only did so on compulsion. "I don't want to risk my life," said a taxi-driver to Mr. Ward, who replied "My life is as dear to me as yours is to you, but I have a duty to perform and I require you in the King's name to drive me to my destination." "I shall charge double fare," said cabby. "You can have treble fare if you like," said Mr. Ward, "so long as you do your duty."

Questioned as to the action of the police, Mr. Ward said there was not a finer body in the world than the Liverpool police, whose forbearance was marvellous, but he thought it was a mistake that they were not permitted to take the offensive until the crowd got entirely out of hand. If they were given a little more latitude they would prevent a great deal of the mischief. There was a striking contrast in the action of the Birmingham police, who had evidently been trained to attack a mob before they got too unruly. Mr. Ward was an eye-witness of the occurrence which had figured so prominently in the papers, in which it was alleged that the Birmingham police provoked a riot, and he said there was not a word of truth in the allegation. The fact was that the mob had mistaken their men, and imagined that they could treat the Birmingham police with the same defiance as those of Liverpool, and as soon as they appeared the mob began stoning them. "But," said Mr. Ward, "the Birmingham men went for their assailants for all they were worth, and gave them such a pasting that they did not want to meet them a second time."

Mr. Ward spoke very highly of the services of the Liverpool special constables, who consisted largely of fine, athletic young fellows of the middle and upper classes, and did much to quell the disturbances. Whenever he could do so unobserved, he used to get into the crowd so as to learn what their sentiments were. On one of these occasions he heard a hooligan remark to his mate, "I care nowt about our bobbies, but what I don't like is them there specials as 'its afore they're 'it." The closing of the public-houses also contributed much towards the preservation of order, and very few cases of drunkenness arose during the strike troubles. The policy of the magistrates was throughout, said Mr. Ward, to avoid infuriating the mob and yet to keep a firm hand upon them, and but for the strong action taken the whole city would have been wrecked.

WHAT IS LIBEL?

BY A NOVELIST

THE query which stands at the head of this paper should perhaps be qualified as "libel in a novel," for it is the unlucky novelist who, going gaily on his way, finds himself—too late—surrounded by mysterious pitfalls, which to avoid passes the wit of man. Once, in my innocence, anxious to be clear on the matter, I tried to discover how the law stood, to be faced with such an array of precedents, of judgments over-ridden by other judgments, of opinions and counter-opinions, all enunciated with a weight of finality, now on this side, now on that, that I withdrew discomfited, bearing away only a befogged idea that the law did not know its own mind. It would appear that any chance resemblance to a living person, albeit only in position and surroundings, any accidental use of a name, however common—at least of Christian and surname in juxtaposition—most of all a too faithful picture of a locality, may constitute grounds for an action at law—nay, even for a conviction.

Not long ago a case was reported in the newspapers in which a suit was brought by a man who found his own name bestowed on one of the less admirable characters in a certain story. The author's defence was that she did not know the man, had never heard the name in connection with him—"it came to her," as she said, and might have been unconsciously recollected from some newspaper paragraph or obituary notice, and the two names going swimmingly together had lurked in some corner of her brain. Of intention on her part there was no trace, of injury to the aggrieved party no proof, yet the case went against her and she was mulcted in heavy damages.

Is it not time that some authoritative definition should be arrived at to save imaginative writers from sinning in ignorance and affronting the terrors of the law? As to the minor risk of incurring vexatious accusations of "showing up" not their friends merely, but persons they have never even heard of, that will have to be reckoned with by those who enjoy the dangerous gift of visualising scenes, and creating characters that come home to our common human nature. In the present vague condition of things the student of life pursues his task, making notes here, there and everywhere, clear of all evil intent, bent only on seeing distinctly in his mind's eye, and making the reader see the scenes that pass so vividly before his inward vision. If such an one fails, he fails, to sink into a safe if inglorious obscurity; if he succeeds, to find he has stirred up a hornet's nest, at least if he has not brought himself within reach of the long arm of the law.

The scene of his tale is recognised—it is far safer, let me remark, to create places, as the painter did the dromedary he had never seen, "out of your own inner consciousness," though even then you are hardly safe; some one is sure to claim to have been born there. Having established the identity of the place, somebody forthwith recognises—or imagines he does—some local celebrity, and thereupon the whole reading neighbourhood is busy with the fascinating game of fitting caps to each other's heads, till presently one, not quite flattered with the particular headgear assigned him, gets up a grievance, confides it to the ear of his lawyer and, presto! a suit is entered; for the astute man of law smells money in it, knowing full well that whoever loses he stands to win, since costs must come out of somebody's pocket.

Truly if a mere proved resemblance—proved, that is, by the fancied recognition of a certain number of readers, whatever that may be worth—is held to constitute libel, then are we novelists all in a parlous state, and owe whatever immunity we may enjoy to the sluggish reluctance of the average mortal to take up arms in what may prove an expensive quarrel, even if he establish his cause. Anyhow, the menace is always there, and not to be evaded by an absolutely rigid abstention from making copy of friend or foe, as the most purely imaginative creation is quite as likely to be recognised and sworn to as a faithful transcript from life.

It once happened to a novelist well known to the present writer to pourtray with some measure of success a certain locality with unique features, in themselves forming the substance of the plot. Though very familiar with the region, he was a total stranger to the inhabitants of the little town adjacent, and great was his astonishment, on receiving a local paper containing a review of his book, to read: "Every character, except the painter, can be easily identified by one who knows the town." It happened that the painter was the only character in any degree studied from life, though, to be sure, he, or rather his prototype, belonged to a distant part of the country, and was not a painter at all.

A similar experience befell another writer of my acquaintance, whose too lifelike pen was held to have "taken off" some local magnate whom he had never seen in the flesh. "His very house," cried the indignant reviewer, "is accurately described!" On investigation it proved that the supposed victim dwelt in a grey stone house of a somewhat florid type standing flush with the pavement in the main street, while the offending character had built himself a house out of the town "between the sloping fields and the bay," a house described as "red—loudly, obtrusively red." An ornate style of decoration was the sole feature the real and imaginary houses had in common. This puts me in mind of an experience of my own when I was held to have "accurately described" a house I never saw on the strength of there being a door at the top of the basement staircase—a feature, I imagine, common to a good many houses of its type.

If traces of resemblance, whether accidental or designed, in places, surroundings, or characteristics, are to be held actionable, then is novel-writing indeed a perilous pastime. How readily people will pounce upon identities, given some one feature of resemblance, was amusingly related by that clever writer the author of "The Danvers Jewels," whose characters are pre-eminently life-like and convincing, in a more recent book, "The Lowest Rung." So determined were her friends to fit caps to heads in her own neighbourhood that they attacked her with—"Oh, we all knew directly that the Vicar's wife was Mrs. Blank—and we all said it was not in the least like her!" I remember reading the report of a case in which counsel proved a libel because a character was like the plaintiff, and so his neighbours thought it was intended for him, and also proved that it was a libel because it was not like him, and so he was not pleased. I think it was in the same case that the claim for damages was based not on an injurious portraiture, for the character was one of the best in the book, but merely because he was made to play second fiddle to the hero.

It is a truism to say that law and equity are by no means synonymous; the average lay mind could easily evolve a just law on the subject; but how get it placed on the Statute-book? To such simple conceptions of justice as we all share, unless we have had a legal education, it seems obvious that two things, or at least one or other of them, should be required as the foundation of a suit—namely, malicious intent, or proved injury to pocket or reputation. I remember a case many years ago in which the condition was fulfilled, and both things not only proved but acknowledged. The tale was used as a method of taking vengeance for an injury; the victim's character and work were shown up with relentless bitterness, and as the latter played a part in some philanthropic scheme the injury might have been serious: the law stepped in and promptly and justly quashed the book. One is by no means concerned to defend such abuse of the novelist's powers, but surely that a real person be identified with some wholly innocuous character in a story is hardly sufficient justification for haling the author before a jury. The resemblance may be more than half fancied and wholly accidental, but people go about saying "Have you read such and such? Why, So-and-so is old Blank to the life." Blank is a little annoyed, especially if So-and-so be rather funny; but to make his vexation ground for a suit for damages is a law fit for the country through the looking-glass. If, as I fear, it is hopeless to get the law either amended or defined, we must needs start an Insurance Company against possible damages and costs.

It is rather singular that certain novelists, and those by no means of the most satirical, seem always liable to incur the charge of showing up their acquaintances, while others, whose wit is far more mordant, escape scot free. Considering the matter, I perceived that novelists may be roughly divided into two classes—those who visualise and those who form intellectual conceptions of scenes and characters—though, of course, they shade off into each other and many may be difficult to classify. The two greatest novelists of our own day are sharply divided—Thomas Hardy is the protagonist of those who see; George Meredith of those who think out their theme. It may be the masculine and feminine form of the faculty of imagination; it will be seen, I think, that the greater number of women writers belong to the school of Hardy, and of men to that of Meredith; yet are there notable exceptions. Lucas Malet may be counted pre-eminently as one who sees and makes her readers see her conceptions; on the other hand, John Oliver Hobbes must be reckoned amongst the intellectuals, though certain scenes in The School for Saints it is true rise in the mind's eye and claim for her the possession of the inward vision.

There is a curious experience known to those who create imaginary scenes which seems almost to indicate the possession of some faculty akin to second-sight, of recognising later places they had invented and had certainly never seen with bodily eyes. This is an awkward gift if it comes to a question of libel, and a writer may be proved to have had an intimate knowledge of houses, of rooms, of interiors in localities where he has never set foot. I remember a very odd incident of the kind; I had placed an imaginary house in a real spot where there was indeed a house, but one which I had never beheld, since it was enclosed on the side of the beach, from which alone I had approached it, with a wall too high to look over. Great was my surprise when two old ladies, sisters, whom I met in another part of the country, expressed astonishment at my familiarity with their old home. "Your description was exact," said they, "to the very green stains where the plaster had fallen off by the front door, for we saw it not long ago, and noticed how neglected it was." They refused to believe me when I told them I had never seen it. The next time I was in the neighbourhood I made a special expedition by the road which passed the front, which I had never hitherto traversed, and found it exactly as my fancy had painted it, the position of the windows, the damp stains, the mossgrown drive.

This is by no means an isolated case; such things happen again and again, far too often to be mere coincidence; I mention this one because a little personal experience lights up odd corners, and may not improbably draw forth similar incidents from other writers who have found the same thing. The material of our craft is life itself, no less, and the better we succeed in hitting it off, the greater the risk that the shaft goes home to some one. The ethic of the matter would seem to be that injury, though unintentional, should be made good, malice should be punished; but where there is neither injury nor malice, that we hold the mirror up to Nature and some one recognises his own face in it, should not be an indictable offence.

[We invite comment—legal and otherwise.—Editor THE ACADEMY.]

FOREIGN REVIEWS

"DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU"

THE principal feature of the August number is a selection from the letters and manuscripts of the Empress Augusta, dealing with the political situation in Germany from 1847 to 1850. The documents are of enormous value and interest, both as illustrating the views of those in authority during a period of stress and anxiety when great events were shaping themselves, and as giving an insight into a noble, womanly, and princely mind. The period was marked by Prussia's first bid for German hegemony, and by a current of agitation for internal reform. Prince, afterwards King and Emperor, William, husband of the Empress, was considered as the head of the reactionary party, and had at one time to flee to England. The Empress was, as he told her himself, "der progressiven Richtung zugetan;" but that did not prevent the most cordial interchange of views between them. The Prussian effort broke down, partly through internal dissensions, partly through Austrian bluff. The Empress's comments on this momentous failure supply an object-lesson in true patriotism.

Herr Dickhuth finishes his comparison of Napoleon and Frederick the Great with an account of the preliminary campaign of 1796 against the Austrians and Piedmontese, and concludes a little obviously that if the Great Frederick had been alive in 1805, Prussia would never have got to Jena. Herr Dickhuth is amusing on the "Rokoko-Kriegführung" of the Austrian commander. There is a historical account of the London police by Claud W. Mullins, a rationalistic-apologetic account of the Old Testament earthquakes and the Flood by Herr B. Mendelsohn, and a discussion, by Herr von der Leyen, of Ibsen's posthumous works, with a view to giving a complete survey of the dramatist's development. "Lotte von Brobergen" is a series of love-letters belonging to the period of "Werther." We were very much struck by the story, "Die Erscheinung," by Anselma Heine.

"LA GRANDE REVUE"

The number for July 25th contains M. Ferrand's final article on Naval Reform. He considers that the task of restoring France's naval prestige would be a comparatively light one, needing "neither the power of a Bonaparte nor the long patience of a Bismarck." The first thing to do is to liquidate the present organisation, and to put the business part of naval administration on a business footing. Such services as commissariat, construction, and navigation are to be carefully separated, and respect is to be paid to local interests. M. Dumont-Wilden, in a very interesting article, traces the social status of painters through the eighteenth century and their own view of their art. At first simple fournisseurs, they ended by claiming to be the "high priests of beauty." M. de Mestral Combremont begins a series of articles on Madame Louise Colet, "une déesse des romantiques." The first article, introducing us to this unhumorous lady, with her great personal attractions and strong passions, her rather second-rate talent and her unbounded self-confidence, is full of graceful irony, and makes us look forward to its successors. The "Pages Libres" contain an extraordinary paper by Dr. Adrien Guébard, in which he exposes a diabolical conspiracy on the part of the Roman Catholic Church to monopolise the sources of archæology; it is amusing, if not quite convincing. M. Edgar-Louis Müller has an article on Politics and Economics in England, and informs his countrymen that there is a line of political cleavage between North and South. In "A Travers la Quinzaine," M. Maxime Leroy discusses a proposed Self-denying Ordinance, forbidding deputies to sit twice, and M. Gaston Doumergue, formerly Minister of Education, writes on the politics of the moment in France.

"LE MERCURE DE FRANCE"

In the number for August 1st Anne-Mare and Charles Lalo have a very just and entertaining article on the "inaptitude of contemporary novelists to observe questions of money." They trace this inaccuracy, which consists in making people live in impossible comfort on an inadequate income, or in practical distress on a sufficient one, to three causes—the exigences of argument, snobisme, and faulty observation. Zola is severely handled on the first count, and M. Bourget on the second. We wonder what the investigators would have said about Ouida. M. Gilbert de Voisins writes charmingly in "Neuf Images de Chine." M. L. Maeterlinck has a curious and discursive account of "Péchés Primitifs."

For August 15th, M. Henri Monod shows that Mérimée's letters to Panizzi have been "edited" almost out of their identity. To give one instance, a passage in a letter in which the novelist speaks of Bismarck as a madman is completely suppressed. M. Paul-Louis Hervier narrates the love-affairs of Charles Dickens. M. Edmond Beaurepaire discusses the sites and arrangements of the theatres and arenas of Paris in Gallo-Roman times. Two pages of Arthur Rimbaud's prose are given to the world for the first time. The sketches called "L'Épopée au Faubourg," by M. Alfred Machard, are particularly spirited. In the "Revue de la Quinzaine" we may note a summing-up of the Spectator and English Review controversy by M. H.-D. Davray.

"LA REVUE"

In the first August number a conclusion is made of Marie Bashkirtseff's diary. Dr. Alfred Gottschalk tells us of certain people, chiefly in Denmark, who have brought down their food-bill to 33 centimes or less per diem, and yet manage to keep up their vigour. He guards wisely against hasty deductions from these experiments. M. Louis Holtz gives a gloomy picture of the French possessions in India, especially criticising the injudicious application of European democratic methods to Orientals. He suggests that these colonies should be transferred to England. M. Faguet reviews "L'Âge dangereux." M. Arthur Chuquet begins an account of the experiences of a certain Dr. Meyer, of Hamburg, who went to Paris in 1796, and examined everything curiously; the article is concluded in the next number. The first two instalments of "Le Mandarin" by the Portuguese writer, Eça de Queiroz, are to be found in these same two numbers, with an introduction by M. Claude Frazac, who esteems the author "unique et sans pareil," though with a touch of Zola in him.

Other contributions to the number for August 15th are some translations of Lafcadio Hearn, translated from the English by Marc Logé; an account of an asylum for abnormals at Imola, by Professor Lombroso, who is full of enthusiasm for the splendid service of the Principal, Mlle. Francia. But perhaps the two most interesting articles in this excellent number, considering the vogue of foreign politics, are those by "XXX"—"La France et l'Allemagne," and by M. A. de Pourville—"Lettres d'Asie." The latter is very pessimistic about French Indo-China, and the former, as if he could read his fellow-contributor's thoughts, suggests that the Moroccan difficulty might be solved by the cession of these regions to Germany. "XXX," as usual, speaks with authority, but he appears to ignore the position of certain other nations—Great Britain, for instance—in the event of his bold and generous schemes coming up for practical discussion.

"LA REVUE BLEUE"

The number for July 29th contains some letters of Littré's old age, edited by M. Paul Bonnefon; they give a new and less austere view of the great lexicographer and positivist. There is a short article on the "Écoles Hôtelières" of Switzerland that contains suggestions for British enterprise and reform. That excellent and upsetting writer, M. Paul Gaultier, has a short synopsis of recent philosophy. M. Serge Evans tells the story of the simple-minded and chivalrous botanist, Louis Bosc, the loyal friend of Mme. Roland. M. D. Menant begins and continues in two more numbers the story of Bassein, a decayed relic of the Portuguese Empire in India. His description of former methods of proselytising reminds us of Browning's "Holy Cross Day."

For August 5th (as also the 12th) we have letters of Ledru-Rollin. Fresh surprises! The ardent democrat hardly pierces at all. M. Paul Louis writes on State Socialism in Ancient Rome. M. G. Miraben gives two little Japanese stories. M. Louis Villat is very illuminating on the Corsican character and the Corsican climate. M. Lucien Maury discusses a study by M. Yovanovitch of a celebrated literary imposture, "la Guzla" of Mérimée; he compares it with a similar work of Nodier.

For August 12th M. Charles Lalo begins a comparison of Taine and Zola, and undertakes that subtle task, the distinction of naturalism from realism. M. Maurice Lair, in dealing with the new constitution of Alsace-Lorraine, justifies the new phase upon which the patriotism of those regions has entered. M. Witold Lovatelli tells the story of the Abbey of Grottaferrata. M. Jacques Lux speaks of the Thackeray centenary, and gives résumés of articles in the Fortnightly, the Saturday Review and the Nation, where the great Victorian is judged.

M. Lux has another English subject for August 19th—Disraeli's youth and début. M. de Bonnefon edits some letters of 1815, written from Germany by the Marquis de Custine. M. Gaston Loth gives a short survey of Tunisian history, and, in contrast to other more pessimistic French writers on Colonial affairs, who appear to advocate the policy of "cutting the painter," concludes very much in favour of the French administration. M. Maury genially banters M. Clemenceau, whose book on the South American Republics has just appeared.

"LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE"

In the number for July 29th "L'Italie Contemporaine" of M. Henri Joly is very favourably reviewed. For August 5th there is a notice of Dr. Hedgcock's "Garrick," which has already been criticised in THE ACADEMY. Vol. XII. of the "Cambridge Modern History" is noticed, and the whole work receives very high praise. "My" deals with M. Legrand's work on the "new" Greek comedy, and makes some judicious remarks of very general application on the too-ready recognition of filiation or borrowing. The number for August 12th is largely devoted to books on Phonetics. Two English works on other subjects receive the highest commendation—The Clarendon Press "Cicero's Orations," edited by Mr. Albert Clark, of Queen's, and Mr. Ashburner's "Lex Rhodia," published under the same auspices. M. Loisy occupies a good deal of space in the August 19th number. M. Feuillerat's work on Lyly is accepted by M. Bastide as definitive. For August 26th M. Meillet freely criticises the second volume of Brugmann and Delbrück's great work on the comparative grammar of the Indo-Germanic languages, while M. Hugo Koch's work on the relation of St. Cyprian to the Papacy is also reviewed. "R." treats Carlyle with small respect, while noticing a translation of his "Cromwell." In speaking of M. Boutet de Monvel's "Les Anglais à Paris," M. Baldensperger defends Thackeray against the charge of puritanical aloofness.

THE HERO

THERE have been many voices heard in definition of the hero. Hero-worship has been acclaimed in a thunder of eloquence; and it, or what is at the base of it, has been made the chief corner-stone of a philosophical edifice. Carlyle has declared the historical aspect of it by saying that "Universal History, the history of what man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the History of the Great Men who have worked here;" and, having declared so much, has forthwith made it his touchstone of discovery among the sons of men. History, and Politics, which essay to be the making of History, resolved themselves for him into the question as to where lay the hero who might sway the destinies of his fellows one way or another. Moralities, for him, well-nigh shaped themselves in people great and small. Nietzsche, a somewhat different soul, reared a philosophy in which the world ranged itself out similarly into great and small, strong and weak, Hero and Non-hero; and in it he, all unwittingly, gave logical expression to a system of politics of which it was the only possible goal.

In all these the hero had been an active force in human affairs. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a hero whose activity could be expressed in any other terms than the mundane. To do so would seem to be like cracking a paradox for the display of lawless beholders; and yet there remains the enunciation of a hero the chief perplexity of which is just this, that the hero is not concerned with this earth at all, but with another and distant sphere of activity. With the virtue of Beethoven the musical enthusiast may deal; and it must fall to the same authority to apportion the respective excellences of the various symphonies that sang themselves out of his brain: a mighty series, that fronts Time beside Shakespeare's tragic sequence and Michaelangelo's decorations for the Sistine Chapel, as the supremest energies of the human mind. Yet even a layman may be permitted to see visions and to dream dreams; and it was to such minds as these that the Third Symphony—the "Symphonie Eroica"—was addressed.

And how does this dream translate itself as the harmonies that convey it pass into the air? That there should be no doubt as to the initial mood that is to be awakened, two swift, eager chords break like percussions on the ear; and as they brace the mind to their vigour a large melody rises powerfully up from the depths. Evidently, whatever energy the hero is to be possessed of, it is not to be an energy conceived of irritation, but framed in a mighty repose, even though a more rapid energy is already expressing itself nearer the surface of emotion. Up in rushing tides from the depths of things comes the strength of repose translating itself into the energy of action, so to pass on the melodies it began with to the more eager musics that have hitherto stirred the surface of the waters: and the hero is heard rising up to put his strength into activity. Hereafter combat and conflict are in the air; exultant joy and fierce desire, mighty laughter and furious challenges rend the ear. And lest we should imagine all this to be but the chance fury of a weak soul, it is repeated again in identical terms before more sober reflections take their place. But sober reflections, though most necessary to the hero, are not in themselves the heroic quality of him; and, therefore, through the reflections philosophies play and interplay, and strange rogueries flit and flash, till at last they all flame up again into titanic energies. Again philosophic reflections rule the mind; and again tenderness lights along the surface; and again mighty strength compels its own supremacy: till the whole man stands revealed to us compact of all things, but distinguished chiefly by strength, might, and power. In truth, the power is seen as power indeed, inasmuch as it is based in the depths of emotion, and embraces a great width and variety. The hero is revealed foremostly as a man of splendid stature, yet with that stature no slender uprush to the heavens, but broad-based on the grossness of which it was the pure refinement.

Such a man, it would be thought, was fit for all things. The whole earth, surely, awaits him, that he should achieve on it the magnificent destiny for which he is so clearly fitted. The first movement was, as might have been assumed, an Allegro con brio. Will not the next be a Molto vivace, to be followed by a Presto, and concluded in triumph by an Allegro maestoso? One would imagine so. Instead of which the next movement is a Marcia funèbre! All this splendid strength and power and versatility swiftly and ruthlessly is cut off from the land of the living, and with the first note of the second movement we are called in to attend at the obsequies of the hero. It certainly seems a sufficiently perplexed enough matter to engage doubt and challenging question; but that there is no doubt about it is very evident, for the earnest beat of the funeral march soon succeeds to a bitter wail. In the first was heard a certain ruthless tread that bade us know that the death was irrevocable, however untimely. In the latter is heard the human sorrow in loud lament. The first may stir revolt; in the second there is neither room nor opportunity for revolt. And then the sorrow spends itself as it dies down into the minor.

Truly it is perplexed. Nevertheless, as the funeral march closes there is heard something very like passion, and we have brought to our memory the fact that the beat of the funeral tones was heard in the philosophy of the hero when first he engaged our attention. So as the third movement opens there is in our minds a strain of eagerness to see what shall transpire. At first it is even more perplexing than the opening of the previous movement. Succeeding to the ruthless step and wailing sorrow of the strange celebration of death there comes the lightness of a Scherzo. This seeming gaiety after the earlier lament puzzles the wit, until at length the commingling of ravelled melodies transmutes the delicacy to a wizard aspiration of soul. No strain is developed, but there is infinite aspiration everywhere.

Then the meaning of the Marcia funèbre is discovered. The Scherzo has taken its own significance, and unravelled the purpose of all that erstwhile had seemed so perplexed. For we are witnessing the upward flight of resurrection. The very completeness of the hero, his very height, his splendour, his wisdom and gaiety, was the enunciation of the fact that he was meet for his destiny, that destiny being reserved far otherwhere than on this terrestrial globe. It was no mundane hero that was in consideration, but a man who claimed his heroism in spiritual power and beauty, which is to say that he was replete and furnished for a court, the portal to which was the grave. And in the joy and delicate radiance of the Scherzo he is to be discovered joining his great companions in a bright and upward flight.

Thus the concluding movement is of necessity a Finale. It opens with a rush of wings, to which, after a few eager chords that gather all things together, there succeeds, first in a grave staccato, and then in more complex bewilderment, the measures of an elaborate dance. It is no more struggle, combat, conflict and stress. These things, however exultantly they may have been engaged in, were not the end of things: they were the things that proved and fitted the soul of the hero. By them he was tested, and by them he rose. The goal at the end of all was not conflict, but joy, though it was by the conflict he was enabled to claim the joy in the splendour of soul he had achieved thereby. And now the hero is transported thither where joy is the natural function and aptitude of the soul. The hero is in the hall of his equals. Yet since the hero must needs ever aspire, even this cannot be the note of conclusion. To the dance, the symbol and symptom of joy, there succeeds a large Andante, full of power, full of aspiration, full of eagerness. There are further heights that must yet be reached; there must never be completion, since completion is a fashion of failure. But there is no hesitancy in this; progress upward is his of right as the proven hero.

Yet what an irony that such a conception first bore inscription the name of Napoleon, for all that it was erased thereafter!

DARBELL FIGGIS.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE CABINET CRISIS IN JAPAN

THE resignation of the Katsura Cabinet affords a striking illustration of the extraordinary methods resorted to in Japan whenever it becomes necessary to steer the ship of State through more than ordinarily troubled waters. Of the crisis itself I shall have something to say at a later stage in this article. For the present it should be interesting, and perhaps instructive, to recall some of the salient features in the brief but eventful life of Constitutional Government in that country. The history of political parties in Japan goes back as far as 1874, when three leading statesmen—Soyejima, Goto, and Itagaki—began to agitate for the granting of a Constitution. Their views were regarded as revolutionary in an age which had just emerged from feudalism; but their cause appealed to those classes of the community who, having been recently delivered from the bondage of serfdom, longed for a form of liberty that would carry with it some share in Representative Government. The three statesmen who led the movement, and their supporters, became known as Liberals. In 1882 another body, whose programme was almost identical with that of the Liberals, was organised by Count Okuma, and this formed the nucleus of the now defunct Progressive party. Thus the two parties were opposed not so much on grounds of policy as by reason of personal rivalries. At the time of their inauguration there was only one object to be attained—the granting of the Constitution. When, on November 29th, 1890, at the expiration of the probationary period stipulated in the Emperor's famous Rescript, the Diet came into existence, the Liberals and the Progressives were still the only two political parties in the country. Had they chosen to unite, it is not inconceivable that, as far as Japanese politics are concerned, destiny itself would have been affected. With the whole Chamber in constant conflict with the Administration at the very outset of the establishment of Representative Government, it is probable that not even repeated dissolutions would have prevented a drastic amendment of the Constitution.

The Ministers of State, while recognising that Representative Government in the true sense of the term was sooner or later inevitable, looked with marked disfavour upon the advent of party politicians in the Legislature. They held that the Cabinet should consist of non-party statesmen, and that as it was alone responsible to the Emperor, the defeat of the Government in the House of Representatives should not necessarily involve resignation. From the earliest days the views of the Ministers were diametrically opposed to those of the party politicians, and there were frequent collisions between the Government and the Diet. Time after time, in order to enforce their will, the Government persuaded the Emperor to dissolve Parliament. Writing in the Contemporary Review at about this period, an anonymous contributor declared that:—

In the beginning of July of last year Japan presented the spectacle of a house completely divided against itself. Some of the best friends of the country, and some of the most intelligent amongst her citizens—men, too, who had welcomed the advent of representative institutions with enthusiasm—were anxiously and moodily discussing the advisability of the suspension of the Constitution and a reversion to the time-honoured régime of despotism, tempered by assassination, to which the nation had been so long accustomed.

The struggle between the constitutional power and the representative element grew in force. So determined, indeed, was the opposition of the party politicians that in a brief period of eight years no less than five Extraordinary General Elections took place. But a change was at hand. In September of 1900 Prince Ito, realising the inevitable, came to the conclusion that the time had arrived when he could assume the rôle of a party leader. Instead of seeking an alliance with one or other of the organisations then in existence, he promptly proceeded to form his own party, under the title of the Seiyu-kai, or Political Association, now commonly known as the Unionists. As soon as he frankly entered the domain of party politics men of prominence in the land, appreciating the value of his enormous influence to the cause which they had at heart, made haste to rally round him. The Seiyu-kai commanded a majority in the House of Representatives, and it was not long before they made the position of the Ministry, under the premiership of Marshal Prince Yamagata, untenable. Ito was called upon to form the new Cabinet, and for the first time in the nation's history representatives of a political party were honoured with Ministerial rank. The experiment proved anything but a success, for not only were there repeated collisions with the Upper House, whose attitude towards the party politicians was bitterly hostile, but the Cabinet itself was unable to agree upon fundamental questions of policy. After being in office for only seven months Ito tendered his resignation.

With the passing of the Ito Administration it may be said that there came to be recognised as a factor of supreme importance in the affairs of the State a small group of men, who henceforth were to be known to the world as the Genro, or Elder Statesmen. By the Japanese the term is also made to apply in an historic and more comprehensive sense in that it embraces the names of those pioneers of modern statecraft, both dead and living, who guided the destinies of Japan during the early period of her transition. Not all of those who enjoy to-day the title of Elder Statesman can claim to have any influence in the Councils of the Empire; and at the time of which I am writing—the Ministerial crisis of 1901—there were but four men whose wisdom, experience, and administrative ability gave them an unchallenged authority to proffer advice alike to the Throne and to the Cabinet of the day. These four were Ito, Inouye, Matsukata, and Yamagata. Of the four, the late Prince Ito was undoubtedly the greatest. He was pre-eminently a constructive statesman and a diplomatist of the first rank. Not only had he initiated historic changes, but he had proved himself adaptable to the changing times.

When, in 1901, the Ito Ministry resigned, none of the Elder Statesmen would take upon himself the task of forming a new Government, and a younger man, the then Viscount Katsura, stepped into the breach. But the Emperor, who in the troubled days that preceded and followed the granting of constitutional government had depended for advice upon the Elder Statesmen, was not willing that their services should be even temporarily dispensed with. While he recognised that the active duties of administration called for the energies of younger men, he placed at its true value the experience of former Ministers who had been largely responsible for bringing about the national transition. He was not slow to realise that their retention in high advisory capacities would lead the country along lines of progress that were consistent with the lessons of the past, and would act as a brake upon any excess of zeal that might be displayed by statesmen new to office. In other words, he sought to combine in his councils the experience of age with the energy of comparative youth.

Governing on strictly non-party lines, Viscount Katsura, whose knowledge of modern statecraft had been acquired in the politico-military schools of Germany, succeeded in retaining office until the closing days of the year 1905. But the longevity of his leadership was not due to any remarkable exercise of administrative ability. Throughout the whole course of the negotiations which preceded the outbreak of war with Russia, and so long as the campaign lasted, there was a tacit agreement among all parties to sink their differences, and to give whole-hearted support to the Ministry. In this respect it may well be said that Japan set a splendid example to the world. Her people were deserving of all the more credit for their patriotism inasmuch as the Cabinet, which on two occasions had advised the Emperor to dissolve peremptorily the national Assembly was not in any sense of the term a popular one. They were content to be governed by a body of men whom they regarded as essentially bureaucrats rather than show any signs of internal dissension in the face of a foreign foe. But this admirable stoicism on the part of her people disappeared as in a moment when it became known that the Treaty of Portsmouth provided not a penny in the form of the oft-promised and long-expected indemnity which was to relieve the nation of the burdensome war-taxes. The country clamoured for the resignation of Katsura and his colleagues, and the Government meekly complied with its demands. To the Emperor the retiring Premier recommended the Marquess Saionji, of the noble house which claimed direct descent from the Kamatari Fujiwara, as his successor. "Contrary to the proverbial estimate of scions of nobility in Japan (and elsewhere)," wrote a Japanese writer in a panegyric on the new Chief of the Administration, "he showed, when young, a high degree of precocity, and at an early age he came into favour with the late Prince Iwakura, then the loyal leader of the extreme Imperialist party at the Kyoto Court." Truly remarkable was the contrast between the comparatively plebeian origin, the stern training, the rigid life, and the paradoxical conservatism of his predecessor and the aristocratic descent, the courtly surroundings, and the equally paradoxical Republicanism of the Marquess.

As Chief of the Staff of the Imperialist Army Saionji had taken a prominent part in subduing the supporters of the Tokugawa Shogunate in 1867. Subsequently his leaders, recognising his ability, persuaded him to proceed to France for the purposes of study. He remained in that country for ten years, and while there allowed himself to come under the influence of the teachings of the Republican school. Consequently, from a stern Imperialist, he became an ultra-Radical. On his return to Japan he founded a newspaper called the Toyo Jiyu Shimbun, and devoted himself to propagating the principles of liberty and democracy. From the point of view of popular appreciation the journal was a conspicuous success. The conduct of the Marquess, however, was made the subject of earnest discussion among the nobles, and Prince Iwakura, whose protégé he had been in the days of his militant Imperialism, prevailed upon his elder brother, the Marquess Tokudaiji, to advise him not only to abandon the publication of his journal, but also to change his views. The Marquess Saionji, however, firmly rejected the proffered counsel, whereupon the Emperor issued an Imperial Ordinance commanding his retirement from Radical journalism. Apparently the Republicanism of the Marquess was not sufficiently sturdy to withstand pressure from so high a quarter, and, as he was not prepared to become a rebel in defence of his principles, he displayed a timely inconsistency and submitted with a gentleness that was only to be expected from one of such noble birth.

The Saionji Ministry remained in office until July, 1908. It had inherited an impoverished exchequer, an ambitious Imperial policy, and a largely inflated National Debt. In view of these distressing circumstances, and having regard to the temper of the nation, it must be conceded that the Marquess and his colleagues showed a commendable patriotism when they consented to assume the reins of Government. It is a pity that their reputation should have been sullied by their subsequent achievements. No sooner had they come into power than they proposed an ambitious programme of armaments for which it was utterly ridiculous to expect the country to pay. That they succeeded in remaining in office for so long a period can be attributed to only two circumstances—the large automatic majority forming the party-Premier's adherents, and the fact of the very natural reluctance of Katsura and his colleagues to take up a burden which they had so eagerly cast away. But all things come to an end. And the nation, discovering that it could hope for no remission of taxation under the policy pursued by the Marquess, cried aloud for his removal from office. Once more Katsura was called upon to take over the reins of government.

When the new Cabinet accepted office something approaching to a financial crisis threatened the country. Widespread depression existed throughout the industrial and commercial classes, and the national credit had almost disappeared from the markets of Europe and America. The Premier lost no time in announcing his programme of reform. He stated that, with the object of placing the finances of the country on a sound basis, the Government would adhere strictly to the practice of fixing all expenditure as against only reliably ascertained receipts, thus forsaking the former speculative policy of prearranging disbursements in anticipation of an increase in revenue; that they would abstain entirely from future recourse to loans; and that unissued loans provided for in previous budgets would be abandoned. Other measures also were to be taken with the object of improving the financial stability of the country. During the three years in which he has held office Prince Katsura has certainly managed to maintain Japan's credit in the markets of the world. But he has not succeeded in giving any relief to a heavily over-taxed population, nor can it be claimed that he has effected much in the direction of furthering the productive undertakings of the country. Japan requires, and must have, the assistance of foreign money if she is to avert disaster. And it is here that we must look for the cause of the present crisis. For it goes without saying that a reversion of the no-loan policy could not well have been executed by Prince Katsura himself.

If we are to place reliance upon the statements that have appeared in the responsible daily journals of this country, we must accept the explanation that the Marquess Saionji succeeded to the office vacated by Prince Katsura for the simple reason that the latter was unable to carry on the Government in face of the overwhelming opposition offered by the Sei-yukai. In other words we must believe that the compromise arrived at in the beginning of this year, when the warrior-Premier consented to sink his Conservative convictions and to come forward as an adherent of the strongest party in the State, has proved a failure. Such an explanation is plausible, but it will not satisfy those who have taken the trouble to acquaint themselves with the actual conditions that have existed throughout the whole of the post-bellum period.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

DURING the present season there has been an exceptionally large number of serious accidents arising from the bursting of motor tyres, and there is little doubt that in the majority of cases the carelessness of the motorist himself in the matter of maintaining correct inflation has been responsible. He is apt to overlook the fact that heat expands, and that in such tropical weather as we have been experiencing recently the expansion due entirely to the high temperature may be so considerable as to impose a dangerous strain upon even the best-made tyre. It has been found by actual experience that the pressure in a hack tyre may rise from 20 to 25 per cent. after an hour's running in very hot weather, and, needless to say, this represents such an increase over the pressure recommended by the tyre manufacturer as to involve considerable risk of accident. The only remedy is to make frequent use of the tyre-gauge and increase or reduce the pressure, as the case may be, when it is found to have varied materially from the maker's figures. But, however careful the motorist may be in seeing that his tyres are neither under nor over inflated, it is to be feared that the risk of accident from the bursting of tyres can never be completely eliminated until the satisfactory substitute for the air-tube has been found.

An Act has recently been carried through the Minnesota Legislature making it a misdemeanour to sell a motor-tyre unless the name of the manufacturer and the year in which the tyre was made are conspicuously and indelibly marked thereon. No doubt this drastic measure is the result of concerted action on the part of car owners, who have a quite natural desire to be safeguarded against the risk—not unknown on this side—of having foisted upon them, as new, tyres which, by reason of their age, are more or less stale, flat, and unprofitable. For it is well known that tyres, the rubber in which is necessarily only semi-vulcanised, are subject to continuous deterioration by the mere effluxion of time, and that a tyre which appears to have just left the hands of the maker may, if from any reason it has been kept in stock for any length of time, have lost much of its resilience and durability. Of course, the measure has aroused a storm of opposition in tyre trade circles, and strenuous efforts are being made to secure its repeal. Whilst, however, one can understand the objection of tyre dealers and middlemen to an Act which will prevent them from palming off stale tyres on buyers, the attitude of the actual manufacturers, who are reported to be complaining bitterly of the new regulation, is not easily intelligible. In this country, at any rate, the great objective of the principal makers is to build up a reputation for the excellence and durability of their tyres, and one would think they would vigorously support a measure designed to prevent the motorist from being victimised by the dealer.

With a view of ascertaining whether the aeroplane is likely to become an important factor as an offensive instrument of warfare as apart from its utility for scouting purposes—which has already been sufficiently demonstrated—the Michelin Tyre Company has announced its intention of offering £6,000 in prizes to aviators who succeed in accomplishing certain feats designed to throw light upon the problem. The first prize of £2,000 will be presented to the aviator who by August 15th, 1912, shall have dropped the greatest number of projectiles within a circle of 32ft. from a height of not less than 650ft. A second prize of £1,000 will be awarded to the airman who, by the same date, shall have dropped most bombs into a space measuring 100 metres by 10 metres from a height of 1 kilometre. The remaining £3,000 will be given in the following year to the winners of competitions held under similar but somewhat modified conditions.

There are numerous indications that the time is at hand when the British car manufacturer will have to take American competition very seriously. Judging from published statistics, the home demand in America, enormous as it has been for years, and still is, is rapidly being overtaken by the supply. In three years the Americans have trebled their exports of cars and accessories, and for the year ended June 30th last the export figures showed a great increase over those of any previous year. It is true that so far there has been no great influx of American cars into this country, the figures for this year being about the same as those for 1910; but that the American makers have now determined to obtain a firm footing in the British market is certain. It remains to be seen how the British makers will meet the attack—whether they will adopt the ostrich policy of attempting to ignore it, or recognise its seriousness and prepare to meet it. The principal weapon of the Americans will be that of price, as it was in the case of the memorable dumping of their cycles over here some twenty years ago; and when it comes to a question of price-cutting it is difficult to see how the British maker, with his comparatively insignificant output, can hold his own. But there is quality also to be considered, as well as the fact that there is still a considerable amount of prejudice in this country against the American-made vehicle. Whether this prejudice, due to the cycle-dumping referred to above, will ever be dissipated is an interesting subject of speculation.

R. B. H.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE steady fall in prices that has characterised the past two months has naturally produced a crop of rumours. It can hardly be expected that the slump will pass away without victims. But rumour has been busy with big names. One big international banker has been singled out for attack; one famous English bank and two large Stock Exchange firms. I was assured last Monday that the whole of the Yankee selling came about through the financial difficulties of a great house. My informant was a serious person. I promptly went to one of the senior clerks in the house, who happens to be a friend of mine. I asked him where the partners were. They were all away enjoying themselves! Not one was left in London to face the supposed débâcle! So much for rumour. This same house was once talked about before, and talked about so much that its paper was actually offered at 20 per cent. discount. A terrified bill-broker rushed in to tell the senior partner. It is said that the senior partner used nearly a million of his funds in purchasing his own paper on the market at a discount of 20 per cent., and that he himself did not discourage the tales about the stability of his firm. Why should he? He made £200,000 in a few hours. These scare cries always come with any serious fall in prices. People seem to forget that great banking houses make their money out of crises. They act with just as much courage when prices fall as they do when prices rise. If they had not the capacity to act both ways they would never become great firms. They never get out of their depth. No doubt the tremendous fall in American Rails will ruin a certain number of reckless punters. But these people would have been ruined sooner or later, for no one can win who gambles on the Stock Exchange. But the big firms do not gamble. When prices are at the top they sell everything in their portfolio. When prices are at the bottom they buy back again. They know exactly the psychological moment for smashing a bull campaign, because it is they who lend money to the punters, and when they find that the bulls are borrowing beyond their strength they sell the collateral and then call upon the bull to repay the loan. In nine cases out of every ten he is unable to do this, so a forced sale takes place and a collapse ensues. We may dismiss the stories about banking difficulties. I do not believe that there is a word of truth in them. Some Stock Exchange brokers have undoubtedly been hard hit, but they have not been crippled, and they will not fail. The liquidation that has been going on has cleared the air and prepared the way for a fresh bull campaign.

The Java Investment Agency had the courage to issue the prospectus of the Tjiwangie Estates, a Java tea property. As the Java Investment is a strong corporation with rich people connected with it, it probably does not care whether the public takes the shares or not. It hopes to market them when things improve. But no one else has followed the example of this promotion syndicate. Underwriters are difficult and shy in these days. They have all of them far too much on their books, and they are more anxious to sell what they have than to add to their stock. It is unnecessary to criticise the Tjiwangie, for the prospectus itself does not promise much more than 5 per cent., which is not enough to induce any one to take shares in a tropical plantation.

Various rumours are going about with regard to Morocco, and last week Berlin got scared and sold out its Americans and Canadians. But it is hardly likely that the German Emperor would have made a peaceful speech had he been contemplating a war. On the contrary, he would have roused his subjects—for in these days it is not easy to induce a nation to go to war in cold blood. The best-informed people anticipate no trouble whatever over the Morocco question. Germany is merely bargaining, and she is not likely to fight until she is ready; even if she fights then. English-people complain of the growth of the German Navy. They entirely forget that it grows no quicker than German commerce. The same may be said of our English Navy.

MONEY.—Our Bank balances are gradually mounting up, and we shall soon have more cash in hand than we can profitably employ. The American harvest will not be large, and although the cotton crop is prodigious, the price is gradually drooping. Egypt will require less, and it looks very much as though we should get through the autumn with great ease. The Stock Exchange Settlement was practically level, and the fall in prices has eased the position tremendously. All our Joint Stock Banks have more money in their tills than they have had for many years past. The Bank of England's position, as far as the ratio reserve to liabilities is concerned, is also much above the average. Taken all round, the banking position is now very strong, and even if the story of another bank failure were true we could view it with more or less equanimity.

FOREIGNERS.—Foreigners have not been quite so steady during the week, and German Threes have fallen. But although this national security has been weak, it is probably due to some internal arrangements amongst the Berlin Banks, and has nothing whatever to do with political considerations. Tintos were flat, but look like recovering. French Rentes keep steady, and almost everything in Paris that is good looks good. It can hardly be said that the Paris market has been seriously affected by the tales that one reads in the newspapers.

HOME RAILS.—The traffic receipts for English railways have been disgustingly bad, and it is probable that the dividends for the current half-year are irretrievably damaged. The strike cost more than we thought. Nevertheless, I still advise the purchase of English Rails mainly because the yield is far too high for such a security, and also because I feel sure that the scheme for the nationalisation of the railways will now go through with much less opposition than if the strike had not taken place. The yield on North-Easterns is about 5 per cent., on North-Westerns it is over 5 per cent., on Great Easterns it is over 5 per cent., on Great Westerns it is 5 per cent., while Midland deferred give nearly $5\frac{1}{2}$. If the railways are purchased under the Act of 1844 they will be bought at twenty-five years' purchase of the profits, plus a sum, to be settled by arbitration, for future prospects. The Great Western and Great Central would therefore come out very well, for each line has been spending large sums on which it now obtains no return, and any arbitrator would be compelled to take into consideration the fact that these lines would eventually get a considerable return on the capital they have expended. Great Central preferred would probably be paid off at par. But even if Great Central receive but its twenty-five years' purchase of the profits for the past three years, the stock now to be bought at $28\frac{1}{2}$ would receive £50 for every £100 nominal. It is impossible, however, that any arbitrator could overlook the chance that Great Central has of earning a dividend on its preferred. The '94 preference and the '91 preference, both now under par, would of course receive their full par value. Therefore, not only are these shares cheap as a speculation, whether nationalisation is carried through or not, but they are also a good lock-up investment.

YANKEES.—It would seem to the ordinary person looking at the American market dispassionately that Yankee Rails had touched the bottom, and this is the view taken by most of the dealers in London who are in the closest touch with the Houses in Wall Street. The representatives of the big American banks in London admit that they are nonplussed. Some one must have been gambling out of all proportion to his means, and the banks must have gone for him just as they went for the Pearson Farquhar Syndicate. The tale goes that the Standard Oil are unloading, but this is a story we always hear in every slump, and there seems very little chance of it being true. Union Pacifics, at their present price, yield about $5\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., and Northern Pacifics a shade more. Both these lines are admirably managed and are thoroughly sound investments. It is always dangerous to advise a speculation in American Railways, but it certainly seems a very fine opportunity to buy Unions to-day. There is persistent talk of a railway strike, and of course, if such a strike occurred, we should see a further fall. But it is doubtful whether the Labour party in the United States is prepared to do battle.

RUBBER.—Mincing Lane is making a strong effort to put up prices, and during the last few days the jobbers in the rubber market have been very busy gambling among themselves. But the public do not come in, and a gamble that is confined to Mincing-lane and the Stock Exchange can only end in collapse. Rubber seems harder in price, but this is probably due to the fact that the big plantations are holding back supplies. The great rubber-buying houses on the Amazon, whose head offices are in London, have also probably now made their contracts for the new season's crop, and having made these contracts they will not be averse to a rise in rubber. There may be a little battle therefore between the consumers on the one side and the dealers on the other. The dealers having bought below 4s. 6d. will try and force the consumers to pay 5s. or more. The victory depends upon whether trade in the United States springs up. At the present time it is dull, and there is no inducement for the great tyre-makers in that country to give out big orders for rubber.

OIL.—The Oil Market is depressed to the death. Not a bargain is done, and Maikop shares are simply unsaleable. I should not be surprised to hear of trouble in this market, for the public hold a good many shares, and they find them quite unrealisable. Fortunately the bull account has been cut down. The Scotch oil trade also appears to be in a very bad way, and the competition in burning-oil is extremely severe. On the whole the oil market looks to be in worse shape than that of any market in the House, for it is now admitted by everybody that Maikop has turned out a most unfortunate speculation. How any one can invest in oil shares in a new field passes my comprehension, for there is nothing that calls for more capital or is more speculative than an oil share. Some of the companies that were floated are very little better than swindles.

KAFFIRS.—Kaffirs continue weak, and if the price falls much lower I should advise my readers to abandon their attitude of reserve and purchase such stocks as Crown Mines, Nourse, City Deep. Van Ryn Deep has ore reserves of 365,000 tons, worth 6·6dwts. It also owns 764 claims. This would give it a life of fifty years, treating about 500,000 tons a year. Van Ryn Deep is short of money, but it is backed by the Joels, Sir Abe Bailey, Sir George Farrar. If these wealthy people would lend the mine a couple of hundred thousand pounds it might become a dividend-payer in about two years time. The shares are now quoted at 9s. On paper they are therefore one of the cheapest things in the Kaffir market.

RHODESIANS.—The liquidation in this market seems to have ended, but prices have not improved. Indeed, Chartereded are now at very low level, almost low enough to tempt a purchaser. The public is completely disgusted with the tactics of the Rhodesian magnates. I am not surprised. Nevertheless there are good mines in Rhodesia. Giants, Globes, and Eldorado are all reasonable mining investments at a low price. But the speculative Rhodesian is a thing to be only purchased when the market is blazing, and when the share can be held for a few accounts and then disposed of. Perhaps when Sir Abe Bailey is married he will take up this market again. It needs some personal magnetism if it is ever going to resume its vitality.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Evidently somebody was found who could not pay for his Hudson Bays, for they have had a very severe fall. They are even now over-valued as an investment, and are only good from a lock-up point of view. Marconis seem to me the best purchase in the market. A man with £10,000 to invest might easily obtain a perfectly safe income of £600 a year if he laid it out in the Miscellaneous Market, for prices all round are below their normal level, and the yields on some of the stocks are ridiculously high. The great trouble with the Miscellaneous Market is the very poor prices made by the dealers. But the dividend record of the best companies is unblemished.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE REAL ISSUE OF THE CRISIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With the defeat of official Constitutionism (which is representative of written law or statutory procedure) the crisis is supposed to be over, though, as a matter of hard fact, we have merely had the prologue of a stupendous drama. The real part of the drama has still to be enacted. The unwritten law (which is representative of the Constitutional conscience, that is to say, of the actual laws of freedom) has yet to play its part. Thus it becomes a matter of vital importance to all free-born Englishmen to have a straight answer to the following question, which raises the whole affair out of the slough of party disputation:—

Can an Act of Parliament be held to destroy another Act of Parliament?

If it can, then written or unwritten law of whatsoever nature is an impotent thing, as all Acts of Parliament, under such conditions, must count for nothing. Each Act can be made invalid by another Act, and so on ad infinitum. Thus the very basis of government is an absolute absurdity. The very Parliament Act in question is, in this sense, an Act of Parliamentary impotence.

It is time we looked at our present situation honestly, and cast aside all this business of self-deception. The British Constitution can never be destroyed—not even by the present Parliament Act, nor because of the default of duty by the Lords, because it (the B.C.) was founded upon an Act of Parliament (an Act passed by King, Lords, and Commons), which constituted the legal basis of all Acts of Parliament. In other words, the Act of Parliament (Habeas Corpus Writ) upon which real freedom rests constitutes the legal basis of revolt from illegal rule or absolute forms of government. It is significant of Party ideas in this purely national matter that the principal organ of the Government (Daily News) has challenged me to prove my indictment of the unconstitutional nature of its own particular position. In this sense, like thousands of my fellow-countrymen, I am a free-born Englishman and belong to no particular organisation. If Unionist policy is going to act in defiance of an Englishman's free rights, then it is going to be a policy of doom to its propagators, and nothing can save it from the same fate which is dogging the actions of the present Government. Here is written the warning to the Unionist Party. If it is intent on assuming, as the Government itself assumes, the Parliament Act to be a legal form of revolt from tyranny, then the House of Lords possessed no legal ground whatever for rejecting or even amending the said Act. The attitude of the Peers, during the crisis, was in every sense an illegal one. There is no gainsaying this. Moreover, should the Unionist Party ever be returned to power, they will have no legal ground of excuse for repealing or even modifying the Act. The Opposition will look to this, and the consequences will be a similar crisis to the present one.

If, on the other hand, the stalwart or honourable policy of resistance is adhered to as the legal and constitutional form of repudiation or rejection, then not even the use of armed force on the part of the Government can justify the executive form of the Act. But whether official Unionism remains true or disloyal to the strict demands of English law, English justice, and English freedom, it is certain that unofficial Constitutionism (the rank and file of free commoners) may be depended upon. Freedom to them is that which makes life worth living, and it needs but the patriotic soul of one man to set fire to such an inextinguishable spark. The country may be both politically and clerically rotten, and its Press, to a great extent, may be despotic, but the nation, as a nation, is not yet fallen to a level of a community of slaves or bondmen.

Here, then, is to be seen the real issue. One party in the State has, by means of craft or intimidation—it does not matter how—revived the absolute powers of the Crown which the Great Charter of freedom destroyed. The Act, with the exception of the Stalwarts, or Men of Honour, has been meekly acquiesced in by another party. It now remains for the independent people of the State to discover the whole farce of the thing by a declaration of their freedom or independence.

This Act stinks in the sight of God, since it completely wrecks what the greatest Christian apostle of freedom instituted, and this, above everything else, must eternally damn such an Act.

Your obedient servant,

H. C. DANIEL.

Loughton, Cherry Hinton, Cambridge.

CARLYLE'S PROPHECY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Now that the "Strike Mania" has subsided, there is again time for reflection and consideration as to why such things happen and what can be done to prevent their recurrence. May I suggest through your serviceable medium that all men who desire to assist a movement in this good direction should at once commence by re-reading, marking, and inwardly digesting Thomas Carlyle's essay entitled "Shooting Niagara, and After"?

This wonderful and prophetic utterance of the great teacher was published in 1867. Its masterly, brave warning to England and English leaders has not been without effect; but now, as then, his lesson will be neglected and scoffed at except by the few. Are those few "this company of poor men who will spend all their block rather"—are they a growing minority or not? This is the simple, straight question I desire your readers to ponder over.

I am confident that deep in many hearts of good men and true there is the conviction that what Carlyle wrote fifty years ago is "God's truth," and no argument is possible to alter such opinion, such faith.

The late Labour crisis is but one phase of the whole bad business, which, gradually perhaps, but surely will become worse and worse under present-day conditions and ideals.

I am no pessimist, knowing that the Universe, based as it is on evolution, will progress, and wrongs which may exist are here waiting only for the strong to conquer them. My object in troubling you at all is merely to voice again Carlyle's battle-cry (caught from Goethe), that those who have ears to hear may perhaps hear:—

"The future hides in it
Gladness and sorrow.
We press still thorough,
Naught that abides in it Daunting us—Onward."

Yours faithfully,

EMPLOYER.

Southwark.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to say a few words on one or two of the points raised by Mr. William Archer in his very interesting exposition of the work being done by the Simplified Spelling Society? If Mr. Archer's society has discovered a satisfactory system of English spelling acceptable to the Board of Education, the literary fraternity, and the people at large, it is obvious that any such restricted scheme of reform as suggested in my article would be wholly superfluous. But I must confess to considerable doubt as to the possibility of any society of men coming to an agreement upon many of the points involved in this difficult question—such, for instance, as the use of diacritical marks, in reference to which Mr. Archer admits that he himself differs from some members of his society. And even if a clear system of reform were propounded, it seems doubtful that the Board of Education could be induced to adopt it, knowing, as they would, that the whole weight of public opinion was against the change. Lastly, even supposing the scheme formulated and introduced into all our National Schools, it seems doubtful whether we should be much nearer the desired end, for all the great public schools would still be free to take their own line on the subject, which would probably be to retain the existing system, whilst literary men would almost to a man adopt the same course. This would mean that the old system would come to be regarded as a mark of breeding and education and the new system would be looked upon as a sign of illiteracy and vulgarity, with the result that the absurdities of the old method of spelling would be more prized than ever. As I understand the account given by Mr. Archer of the scheme proposed by his society, the reformed system will be introduced at the base of society and gradually spread to its apex. Our children will learn the new system at school, and we shall be surreptitiously studying their lesson-books after they are gone to bed. The illiterate will learn first, and the literate will slowly and reluctantly follow suit. It seems to me that the force of gravity, the law which ordains that fashions begin at the apex of society and spread to its base, will oppose the advance of such reform.

It was because I despaired of finding any feasible scheme of wholesale reform that I turned towards the idea of introducing it tentatively and piecemeal. There are two ideas almost universally prevalent to-day which militate irresistibly against reform, the first being that to spell correctly is a mark of education; and the second, that the question of reform is of little or no importance. Some believe (and I am among them) that by simply calling attention to the facts of the case we may hope to substitute for these ideas their exact opposites. We see no reason why the force of example and the influence of fashion, so powerful to propagate error, should not be politely invited to undertake for once the dissemination of truth. We think if it were once recognised that to spell "correctly" is often no more than a weak concession to error, and that to spell "incorrectly" is often to dispute the authority of folly and to assert our spiritual independence of fashion, the first steps towards reform will have been made.

With regard to the idea that Spelling Reform is a matter of no importance, it is, of course, impossible for those who have had no practical experience of education to understand how unsatisfactory it is to be continually warring against the natural instinct of the child to represent like sounds by like signs, and how fatiguing is the task of the teacher who has constantly to impose chaos and unreason upon the mind struggling towards system and order. There is, however, one aspect of the matter which ought to appeal with some force to all Englishmen. Our language has two points of superiority over all the other great European tongues: it has a rational system of genders, and has no case terminations. It has one point of inferiority: its chaotic spelling. If this were rectified, English would be the easiest language in the world to learn and to use correctly.

What, therefore, the cause of reform most needs at the present moment is to be discussed. Perhaps Mr. Archer would allow me to suggest that his society publish a list of a score or so of words misspelt according to the orthodox system with the proposed corrections. Let us suppose that the new forms were adopted by half-a-dozen authors and journalists of repute. The appearance of the new words would provoke discussion on all sides; the pros and cons of the new spelling would be widely discussed; and the old arguments of conservatism would be brought forward again and again, and every time they would be worsted. In short, the glacial rigidity which has held our spelling for about two hundred years would be at last thawed. The question of reform would be taken off the shelf and placed upon the carpet. If the new spellings triumphed over the old it would then be time to promulgate a more extensive programme of reform, such as the docking of superfluous ue's, as in demagogue and picturesque, the unification of the termination of words indicating a trade, as seen in baker, sailor, soutar, pvivour. A series of such partial reforms would soon bring the semblance of cosmos into the existing chaos and would prepare public opinion for some more thorough scheme, such as that which the Simplified Spelling Society are engaged in formulating.

First of all, however, we want a definite scheme with which to make the first experiment—a clear programme supported by the authority of an association such as the Simplified Spelling Society; but, above all, it must be a scheme against which the most stolid conservatism can make no just reproach. To adopt the language of metaphor, the advocates of reform would, it seems to me, be well advised not to attempt a frontal attack on the massed hosts of prejudice, but dispose their forces en échelon. Mr. Archer will recall how Alexander of Macedon, by this famous manœuvre, twice defeated an army ten times greater than his own; but his right or attacking wing was composed of none but picked warriors.—Faithfully yours,

J. R.

August 22nd, 1911.

THE CHÂTELAINE OF VERGI

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In opposition to Mr. Frank Harris' article in THE ACADEMY (July 29th, 1911), my book entitled "Die Kastellanin von Vergi in der Literatur" (Halle, 1909) sets forth the impossibility of identifying the persons of the romance as he does—namely, the Duke with Hugue IV., the Duchess with Beatrice of Champagne, and the Châtelaine of Vergi with Laure de Lorraine.—Yours truly, EMIL LORENZ.

Berlin, August 24th, 1911, Bredowstrasse 6.

AN ENQUIRY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In a new work lately published concerning the famous Elizabeth Chudleigh there are some lines of verse attributed to Robert Burns. They are said to be published for the first time, and are certainly not included in any accessible edition of Burns' poems, and, if written by him at all, I conclude that they must have been written at a very early age. The first two lines of the poem are as follows:—

Say who is this with Heaven and Earth at strife,
At once Miss, Mistress, Mother, Maid, and Wife.

They occur in a new edition of "The Amazing Duchess," a book written by a Mr. Charles E. Pearce.

Can any of your readers throw any light on the question of the authenticity of these lines? All lovers of Burns must be interested in the discovery of any genuine production from his pen not known before.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

R. BURKE HENRY.

Burkeville, Dagmar-avenue, Wembley-hill,
August 29, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- The Earthen Drum*. By E. S. Stevens. Illustrated in Colour by C. R. Andrae. Mills and Boon. 6s.
Lord Stranleigh, Philanthropist. By Robert Barr. Illustrated. Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.
The Woman Wins. By Robert Machray. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
The Woman-Haters. By Joseph C. Lincoln. Illustrated. D. Appleton and Co. 6s.

PERIODICALS

- The Windsor Magazine*; The Traveller's Gazette; The Literary Digest, N.Y.; The Bookseller; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Cornhill Magazine; Publishers' Circular; The Atlantic Monthly; The Platform Bulletin; Revue Bleue; La Grande Revue; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Harper's Monthly Magazine; The Modern World, Madras; Everybody's Story Magazine; Friendly Greetings; Sunday at Home; Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine; Boy's Own Paper; The Nineteenth Century, and After; The Antiquary.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND ... THROUGH CANADA. ...

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON,
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE TO SOUTH and EAST AFRICA. WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES LIVERPOOL

to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery. Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £8 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, .400, .500, .600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,
JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year,
according
to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,
NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
122 Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1839).

To	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	Days 8 upwards.	Fortnightly Friday.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
THE AZORES.	£17†.	19.	Every Wednesday Fortnight.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day.	12 upwards.	During August.	Grimsby & Leith.
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.
Illustrated Booklet on application to

THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 319	A Dead Man's Books 332
Repentance 320	The Theatre—
Rodin 320	"Macbeth" at His
The Remarkable Hero ... 322	Majesty's 334
All on a Summer's Day ... 323	"The Concert" at the
Reviews:—	Duke of York's 335
Mr. Chesterton as a Poet 324	What is Immortality in
The Poet and the Age—I. 325	Art? 336
Indian Emperors..... 326	Nikko 338
The Panama Canal 327	Imperial and Foreign
Shorter Reviews 327	Affairs 339
Fiction 328	Motoring and Aviation ... 340
Some Aspects of the Na-	In the Temple of Mammon 341
tional Insurance Bill ... 330	Correspondence 342
The Psychology of Belief 331	Books Received 343

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

The INDEX to VOLUME LXXX. (January-June, 1911) of THE ACADEMY will be forwarded post-free for ½d. to any address on application to the Publisher, 93-94, Long Acre, W.C.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

IF the Trade Union Congress does not compose itself into a more business-like frame of mind than that which characterised its first two meetings, reports of which are to hand as we go to press, we fear that not much good will result from it. After effervescence, however, comes precipitation of whatever solid matter may be found, and possibly the angry clamours of the preliminary gatherings will pass off and leave some grains of common sense. Naturally there was anger in some of the speeches, since the authority of the Union—whose title will surely soon have to be altered—has been defied many times, all over the country, of late; and anger again was shown because the Government used the military forces at its disposal to stop the recent outburst of sabotage and general lawlessness. To say, as the resolution, carried without debate, said, that such a step was "designed to hinder" the improvement of the worker, and that it signified "a grave menace to civil liberty," is the purest nonsense. It was designed to protect life and property, and the burden of blame lies with the Government that the forcible suppression of rebellion was delayed so long.

B

Noise, of course, is an inevitable attribute of any large city, but there are times and seasons when even London wants to be quiet; from the hour after midnight, let us say, until six o'clock in the morning we may expect some slight relief from the horns, sirens, and whistles which mingle with the roar of the traffic during the day. Such sounds are more noticeable, and proportionately more irritating, in the night, and the Commissioner of Police has acted wisely in issuing his reasonably worded admonition to all users of motor-vehicles during those hours when "the very houses seem asleep." The chauffeur in command of a car with a horn that "plays tunes" will have to curb his musical enthusiasm, and it is possible that the restraint thus learned may have an ameliorative effect upon the din of the day. Croydon, it is pleasant to note, gives power to its inhabitants to suppress the strepitous coalman and the shouting street-hawker, as far as their vocal powers are concerned. About the only street-cry which we hope will not be lost is the cadence of the seller of lavender, which is plaintive, haunting, and is heard but for a week or two.

Even this musical call, were it to last the whole year round, would probably become a nuisance, and we shudder to think of the discordant state of our highways and byways should the suggestion, recently made in the columns of a contemporary, that each hawker should adopt a regular chant, be put into practice. Errand-boy songsters and melodious milkmen do not appeal to us, and we fear that the complaint of "nerves," under such a régime, would be even more fearsome and more prevalent than it is now. Better the healthy and robust clamour of the present state of things than the theme of five or six notes repeated until the brain of the unwilling listener gives way, and he goes out, "seeing red," to damage the musician.

Paris, the "city of great artistic events," is to have a Festival of Music on a very large scale next Whitsuntide, and preliminary announcements with regard to the competitions and prizes are already to hand. Over two hundred orchestras, bands, and choral societies have signified their intention of competing, and it is hoped that the response from England will not lack heartiness. We note among the names of the Honorary Committee those of Sir Edward Elgar, Saint-Saëns, Widor, and Debussy—four which, standing alone, would be a guarantee of success.

The Indian reviews to hand recently contain much interesting matter, apart from affairs purely Eastern. The Parsi, for example, of August 13th has a very thoughtful article by Mr. Khandalavala, entitled "The Homer of Philosophy," in which the struggle between religion and philosophy in ancient Greece is happily treated; the rise of the rhetoricians and sophists in Athens also forms part of the theme. Issues of the Wednesday Review for August 2nd and August 9th can also be read with enjoyment by folk on this side of the globe. The Modern World, the first number of which has just been published, is a monthly with headquarters at Madras; the English of its leading article is most quaint and at times peculiarly expressive—as often happens when a man uses a language not completely familiar to him. Describing the Coronation festivities, the writer says: "Dinners, Cordial invitations, new Make-friends were as numerous as they were interesting"—which is capital. The contributions are of good literary quality, and cover a wide range. We wish the Modern World success, for it starts well, and its list of writers is a good one.

REPENTANCE

How can I bear thy sad eyes' mute regard
 And feel the deep rebuke of all their pain?
 How meet their anxious questioning again,
 And see them, by my fault, with sorrow marred?
 Soon have I found that faithlessness is hard;
 That all the joy of sin is worse than vain;
 Canst thou, amid this trial, still retain
 Some pure compassion for a soul ill-starred?

Loose now the wealth of all thy womanhood,
 Thy spendthrift love, for evermore unspent,
 To purchase peace and joy, all undeserved,
 For one who in an hour of weakness swerved
 And found sin's riches false! Lo, I repent, Craving thy pardon's swift beatitude!

WILLIAM DAW.

RODIN

BY FRANK HARRIS

A BOOK has just been published about Rodin and his work by a M. Gsell. It is an admirable piece of work, and shows us the very soul of the great sculptor in spite of the fact that Rodin is not very articulate, words not being his medium; M. Gsell has drawn him out and interpreted him with singular sympathy and understanding. As I have known Rodin for twenty-five years, and regard him as one in the line of great French sculptors—a worthy successor to Houdon and Rude and Barye, and certainly the greatest of living sculptors—I shall use M. Gsell's book as a sort of pedestal or frame for Rodin's portrait.

Rodin is to me the creature of his works: the bodily presentment even is a true symbol of the soul: a French peasant in figure—a short, broad man with heavy shoulders, thick thighs, and great, powerful hands. His face can best be seen in Tweed's bust. The neck is short and thick, the nose large and fleshy, the forehead high but retreating, the eyes grey, by turns reflective and piercing. There is an air of transparent sincerity about the sturdy little man, with his careless grey beard and worn clothes. Always I see the large, strong hands, the short neck and lumpy shoulders—a master craftsman with a tremendous sensual endowment.

The first chapters of this book are weak, but when Rodin talks of "the science of modelling" he begins to hold us. He learnt it when a young man, it appears, from a fellow-workman who taught him to model the human figure as if the surface were pushed out from the inside. There is no flat part of a body; it is all hills and valleys: this to him is the secret of modelling, and he declares that this was the practice of the Greeks, the only method which makes every statue a picture in black and white. No etching, he asserts, has such a boldness of light or such a velvety depth of shadow as a well-moulded statue: "By such modelling the masterpieces of sculpture take on the radiant aspect of living flesh."

The fourth chapter is still more interesting, because it brings out a modern phase of the eternal conflict in art between what is beautiful and what is true. Gsell asks him about his "L'Homme qui Marche." Rodin begins by declaring that he wants life, and that life is movement. "I have hardly ever," he adds, "represented complete repose. . . . Fine modelling and movement are the two master qualities of good sculpture." But the moment the pair begin to study Rodin's "L'Homme qui Marche," they both notice that the movement is not true, that the man has both feet on the ground at the same time, whereas in walking one foot is always just leaving the ground as the other reaches it. A better illustration still occurs to Rodin. He takes the picture of Géricault in the Louvre, the famous "Racing at Epsom." Géricault represents the horses galloping, according to the French expression, ventre à terre—the front legs outstretched in front and the hind legs outstretched behind. Now instantaneous photography teaches us that this is not in accordance with fact. Before the front legs touch the ground the hind legs have already been drawn up in preparation for the next spring; so that if you picture a galloping horse properly you picture it with all four legs bunched together, the hind ones unnaturally drawn up underneath the stomach, almost overtaking the front ones, which are just leaving the ground. In fact, the animal seems to be caught in the act of jumping with its legs all hobbled together. Rodin immediately puts the matter properly: our eyes do not give us the truth of things. When we see a man walking we see both his feet on the ground; when we see a horse galloping we first see his fore-legs thrown out in front and then his hind legs stretched out behind; and thus we represent him to ourselves. The expression ventre à terre is true to our vision though false to fact. And the truth to us is all that matters to the artist.

The two collaborators discuss other interesting problems. Rodin insists that both painting and sculpture can represent action to a much greater extent than is commonly supposed, and he takes for example his own figures the "Bourgeois of Calais" and the masterpiece of Watteau, "L'Embarquement pour Cythère." His criticism of Watteau's masterpiece is an exercise in eulogistic analysis. The painter begins, he says, on the right, by showing a lover kneeling to his mistress and trying to persuade her to accompany him. A little more towards the centre another gallant is helping his mistress to her feet, as if they were just about to start; and so on. Below these figures on the knoll, and nearer the water's edge, a crowd of people are going towards the boat, the women as eager as the men. Rodin has nothing but praise for this conception, declares that the picture is a masterpiece—"un ravissement qu'on ne peut oublier."

This praise is fairly deserved if we look only at the painting or even at the drawing of the various figures and groups; but, architecturally considered, "L'Embarquement pour Cythère" is anything but a wonder-work. The whole action takes place from right to left of the picture, whereas it should proceed from left to right. It is probably our habit of writing and reading which makes it much easier for us to follow action from left to right than from right to left. I have always felt a certain inconvenience in regarding this masterpiece of Watteau. The action of the picture should have begun on the left, and the eye would then have passed naturally towards the right from group to group instead of unnaturally and with a certain effort as it does now.

I find a similar want of thought in the much-bepraised

French coinage of to-day : the medal of the woman sowing is effective and well modelled ; but the artist presents her with her hair flowing out straight behind as if she were sowing against a gale—a feat always avoided in actual life.

In the fifth chapter Rodin's gift as a draughtsman is discussed. It is not sufficiently known that Rodin makes hundreds of sketches both with pencil and with wash of colour. Some of these drawings are among his boldest and most characteristic work. "Ordinary people don't understand them," he says ; "but ordinary people never know anything about Art. They imagine that drawing can be beautiful in itself. In all crafts truth and simplicity are the master-qualities." And then he goes deeper :—"Colour and drawing—style at its best—is nothing but a means to display the soul of the artist. It is the soul one ought to try to know ; artists should be classed according to the soul."

The seventh chapter is taken up with a superb criticism of the great French sculptor Houdon, to whom we owe a number of busts of celebrated men, such as Voltaire, Rousseau, Franklin, Mirabeau, and Napoleon—heads which might really be considered Memoirs of the time. Nothing on Voltaire, nothing on Mirabeau (except Carlyle's study), nothing on Napoleon has yet been written more soul-revealing than the busts of Houdon. Rodin, too, in this field has done memorable things ; his Rochefort, Hugo, Berthelot, and Puvis de Chavannes are all superb, worthy to rank with the best. Just here, however, a certain bitterness comes to show in him :—

There is no work (he says) so ungrateful as this : the truer your portrait, the more like it is, the more it reveals character, the less your sitter will appreciate it. Men and women both want to have insignificant, regular features ; masterpieces of expression are usually regarded as insults. One has simply to do one's best and pay no attention to the remonstrances of puerile conceit.

Like all the great moderns, Rodin is often preoccupied not with the subject but the symbol. He has fashioned the head of a young woman imprisoned to the very neck in a rough block of marble. "Thought" he christens it—thought struggling for expression, without hands to help itself and doomed to inaction as one without feet. Or take "Illusion, the Daughter of Icarus"—a young angel's figure with broken wing and face crushed against the hard ground of fact. No one of these attempts, in my opinion, can be called successful, simply because the striving itself, being purely intellectual, transcends the sculptor's art. Two lines of Goethe are more expressive :—

All things transitory but as symbols are sent ;
Earth's insufficiency leads to event. . . .

Rodin is more successful when he asserts that all artists are necessarily religious, "believers by nature :"—

No good sculptor (he says) can model a human figure without dwelling on the mystery of life ; this individual and that in fleeting variation only remind him of the immanent type ; he is led perpetually from the creature to the creator. . . . All the best work of any artist must be bathed, so to speak, in mystery. That is why many of my figures have a hand or foot still imprisoned in the marble-block ; life is everywhere, but rarely indeed does it come to complete expression or the individual to perfect freedom. . . .

Then Rodin goes on to tell how as a youth he fell in love with the serene and typical beauty of the works of Phidias, and only later, after his first visit to Italy, came to appreciate the tortured strivings of Michelangelo. The great Florentine, he exclaims, was the last and greatest of Gothic sculptors. Like all great creators, Rodin is one of the most stimulating of critics, and in especial he finds deathless words to describe the Greeks, his masters. It is the accepted idea that the Greeks of the best period treated their subjects with reverence as gods and goddesses, and showed their piety by only unveiling part of the human figure. While admitting that there is some little truth in this, Rodin insists that the spirit fashioning all their best work is an intense sensuality. "The human form," he says, "never moved any people to such sensual tenderness. The very ecstasy of sensual delight seems to be shed over every part of the figures they modelled." And any one who has ever studied the little women's figures with clinging draperies on the balustrade of the Temple of Nike Apteros must agree with him. Passionate desire is the very soul of Greek plastic art.

And here comes naturally that chapter on "The Beauty of Women," which should be at the end of this book, and not in the middle, if the true crescendo of interest is to be observed, for this is Rodin's special kingdom. No decadent artist of them all, no master of the Renaissance, has equalled him in this field either as craftsman or lover, either in skill of workmanship or in passionate appreciation of the loveliness of every curve and every round. His best girl-figures are the best ever modelled.

Rodin has now several studios, both at his home in Meudon and in Paris, but the one he prefers is in the old and famous Hotel de Biron, which for ages was used as the Couvent du Sacré-Cœur. Here generations of lovely and charming girls were educated, and from this retreat sent forth into the sinful world. Behind the hotel is an old, neglected garden, with trees and arbours and winding walks. In the shade here one still seems to hear the ripple of girl-laughter, or sees hot cheeks flushing with whispered confidences. Looking out over this garden is the great room which Rodin keeps for his drawings and modellings of women. Let us listen to him on his own subject. Gsell asks him : "Is it easy to find beautiful models ?" Rodin answers : "Yes." "Does the figure keep its beauty for long ?" The master replies :—

"It changes incessantly, as a landscape changes with the sun. The perfect bloom of youth, the flower-time when the slight figure is as graceful as the stem of a lily, only lasts for a few short months. . . . The young girl becomes a woman and her beauty changes its character—admirable still, it is perhaps not quite so lovely pure."

"Do you think the Greeks were more beautiful than modern women, or have you as fine models as posed for Phidias ?"

"Just as fine. Modern Italian girls have all the peculiarities of the best Greek type : the essential character of it is that the shoulders are practically as broad as the hips."

"But our French women ?"

"Generally, like the Germanic races and the Russians, they have narrow shoulders and large hips : this is the characteristic of the nymphs of Goujon, the Venus of Watteau, the Diana of Houdon."

"Which is the most beautiful type?"

"Who shall say? There are hundreds of beautiful types. I have modelled little Eastern dancers whose finger-slim ankles and soft round outlines had an infinite and perverse seduction. On the other hand, the Japanese actress Hanako seemed to have no fat on her body; her muscles were all outlined and firm like those of a little fox-terrier. She was so strong that she could stand on one foot and hold the other leg at right angles with her body for ever so long; she seemed to take root in the ground like a tree; but there was a rare beauty in her singular vigour. There is nothing commoner than beauty for those who have eyes to see. . . . I often get a girl to sit on the ground just to study the adorable vaselike outlines of her torso, the sacred amphora which holds in it the promise of future life. Look at that shoulder: I have modelled the curve of it a dozen times and yet it could be improved. Often and often beauty overpowers me so that I feel like going on my knees to it. Was I right in saying that to the artist his art must be a religion?"

"Ah, they pretend that Art has no utility: it has the greatest; everything that makes for happiness is of the highest usefulness. And it must never be forgotten that we artists are the only moderns who take joy in our work and find delight in labour. Every workman ought to be an artist, and take pleasure in his toil; every mason and carpenter and house-painter should have joy in his endeavour; but with our wretched modern wage-system we have almost banished joy out of life. It will come back; we artists will bring it back."

A memorable book, which sends me to the Carfax Gallery to have another look at that "Satyr and Nymph," which is the high-water mark, so to speak, of Rodin's achievement: a masterwork in which passion finds supreme expression and bronze takes on the satin-softness of woman's flesh.

THE REMARKABLE HERO

THE time is not distant beyond the memory of living men when the hero of a typical novel had to be, if not a person of title, at any rate a man of tolerable family. If, in the days of his affluence, he did not possess a valet, or if when leaving home under a cloud he could not bestow his last sovereign on a head gardener, he was not likely to have many admirers. The snobbishness of those days was not greater than the snobbishness of these, but it was far simpler and more straightforward. It demanded quite honestly, on behalf of the middle-class reader, to mix with its social betters. No doubt it was perfectly right; if a man cannot choose his company even in novels things are in a bad way. But, however that may be, the distinction of the hero of that time was on the side of birth and breeding. He might be compelled by circumstances to associate with coal-heavers, but even when his coat was shiny at the elbows the cabmen called him "My lord." When he told the landlady of his humble lodging that he had come into a marquise and forty thousand a year, she always reminded him that she had known him at the first for a "real gent." His brains might be of feeble quality—indeed they usually were—but his manners were of the best. He might not know how to counter the most childish plot, but he invariably knew what to do with his hands in a drawing-room, a problem which has puzzled more people than ever troubled about the riddles of life and death.

In these days, however, good breeding is usually left as a minor perquisite to the villain. The hero may, as far as his social position is concerned, be anybody. He may drop his aspirates, he may be a boor, he may be ignorant of the most elementary rules of polite behaviour. Common honesty is not in the least a necessity to him. If he is fiendishly ugly, his adventures are all the more piquant. He may even be deformed, and his Life will sell in tens of thousands. He may squint, he may be club-footed, he may wear ready-made clothes, he may smoke in church, he may shoot foxes, he may browbeat women and patronise old men, he may do any of those forbidden things, for doing the least of which we would cut our dearest friends, and yet he may charm voracious multitudes. We care nothing for his clothes, nor his manners nor his antecedents nor his actions; in these respects we are all-tolerant. But there is one quality which we demand in him: he must be a remarkable person. It matters very little in what his fate lies, whether in art, finance, sport, politics, exploration, swindling, or throat-cutting, but his intellect must be of the cast of great men.

The superficial reason is not very far to seek. Satirised out of his old, honest, matter-of-fact reverence for rank and wealth, the commonplace reader has to satisfy his inborn humility by looking up to an intellectual superior. Forbidden to act the flunkey to the aristocrat, he allows himself to adore the prima donna, the brilliant statesman, the swaggering freebooter, or the subtle master of intrigue. As he can no longer delight in the conversation of a duke, he accepts instead the conversation of an eminent house-breaker. And seeing that, however slight his knowledge of aristocratic circles might have been, his acquaintance with men of genius is even slighter—he is seldom able to detect the fraud which is so often played upon him. He may have a shrewd conception of how a duke would behave in a given situation, but a man of genius is above laws, and his actions are therefore incalculable. So the reader takes, with shut eyes and open mouth, whatever the journeyman novelist cares to offer him in the way of inspired heroes. He is unaware that the great detective whom he so much admires is as unlike any possible great detective as he is unlike a Patagonian anteater; these mysterious and incomprehensible actions pass not, as they should, for the well-meaning, but rather futile, efforts of an uninspired writer to simulate inspiration, but for the unfathomable deeds of a demigod. The more extraordinary they are, the more convinced is the reader of his hero's genuineness. In the result, one reads of a great realistic author who studies his situations by kidnapping people, and forcing them to act for him; one finds a great thief who lives, surrounded by objets d'art, in a castle in the middle of a sea-girt rock; one finds a great poet who, by way of seeking inspiration, wanders like a madman over the face of the earth for several months, then, returning home, scribbles for four days without stopping, and finally falls dead over his completed masterpiece. The convenience for a second-rate author of a public which accepts such creations may easily be estimated. If extravagance be a sign of genius, then it is infinitely easier to portray genius than mediocrity. The man in the street is quite capable of judging his kind, but to judge the weird antics of an inspired soul he has only the unreliable experience of nightmares. He can but devour and hold out his innocent hands for more. So the curious fashion grows, until the remarkable becomes more common than the commonplace; an amusing development enough, if one does not pause to reflect how swiftly this highly-seasoned fare can destroy any lingering taste for the products of a restrained and disciplined art.

ALL ON A SUMMER'S DAY .

A FEW days ago a young Colonial said to the present writer, "I'm in love with your English twilights. We get nothing like them in Australia." A summer such as we have been having diverts that attitude of depreciation toward the British climate which has become a pose with so many of us. The fact is, the most perfect climates of the world are the worst, and our capricious skies are an invaluable national asset.

It is a delightful experience to make a trip to the West Indian Islands what time the drear evenings of November begin to settle about our cities. The season of the "Nortes" is then over, and the balmy north-east Trade winds blow over the Caribbean Sea without intermission. After eight or nine days spent on one of the loneliest quarters of the ocean, the look-out man sights the yellow flats of Barbadoes. There, girdled by sands, about which the white horses of the Atlantic fret, is our first glimpse of the Tropics.

The black policeman, dressed in white ducks and a little brief authority, is a humorous parody on the familiar "bobbies" we have left behind. His air of mingled majesty and condescension is truly comical to the newcomer. The European officers have a funny task to keep order amongst their constables. We went on one occasion with the Chief Commissioner on his country rounds. This was a typical inspection. In a tiny police station in a forest clearing enter a sergeant and two P.C.'s, all as black as Day and Martin could make them. Salutes. "Now, then," says the Commissioner, "what's the matter with you?" The sergeant reports you two men are quarrelling." "Dis man call me 'black fella,'" says Number 1. "I no' be called 'black fella' by dis man." Then the Commissioner talks to all three as if he were addressing a Sunday-school class, but with a suggestion of laughter in his voice, and we ride away to find a similar storm brewing in a teapot a mile or two distant.

One day we were in the queue passing through the Abbey. Behind the Coronation Chair three policemen were discussing amongst themselves a knotty problem in arrests. "What would you charge him with?" asked Number 1. "Felony," was the answer. "But he hadn't turned a key." "Then have him up for loiterin' with intent," chuckled Number 3. The constable of colour revels in that sort of discussion. He is a very Hamlet for "putting cases." The white roads of Barbadoes are glaring, and the island is too full of blacks to make the voyager regret his departure, more especially as the chain of islands to the south—St. Vincent, Grenada, and the Grenadines—are veritable fairyland. Then comes Trinidad. The steamer threads her way through the "Boca" which the captain has selected. There are the Five Islands and the mountain chain that bounds the island on the north, and the Gulf of Paria, turbid with the flotsam of the mighty Orinoco. Every adjective and epithet has been brought out of our armoury of words to describe the seraphic climate about us—the sapphire blue of sky and sea, the balmy breezes of content. You land, and out of any ten Britishers you meet nine will say to you, "Going back to London next month? Lucky beggar! I wish I were." The tropical climate is, we veritably believe, the origin of the legend of the Sirens. It is for ever wooing one to slacken pace, to take things easy, to put off any irksome duty till to-morrow. "Mafiana" is its perpetual motto. Close your eyelids to keep out the glare, get into a hammock in the shade and think. You may be awakened by the shrill horn of the mosquito; sand-flies will be sure to pay you court; but you will have to telephone peremptorily to your will if clear thinking is required or resolute work has to be done. Few of those who live in these delightful islands can resist the spell of the siren climate. We once had to interview a Mexican resident in London. It was November, and a London particular had settled on the City like a vampire. We commiserated the Mexican on the hard fate of our grimy "blanket of the dark." His answer was, "It is better so than always blue sky."

Now that the Siren is with us, let us listen to her wiles. The stars of the summer night bear her message to all who have ears to hear. Wander out from indoor heat and glare, and the gemmed canopy of the heavens hangs over you, like a mighty swarm of fireflies, shedding tranquillity on a still world.

There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins."

In the quiet sky, four hours after the sun has dipped beyond the verge of our ken, the half-twilight grows a shade more still and solemn. The mountains and the sea are robed in glamour. An owl hoots dreamily; bats flit. Trees and plants are taking up the animal wastage of the day. Nature's laboratory is silently at work, moulding, withering. Birth and death, change and range. The loom is weaving or unravelling tissue in all living things. Poesy is an ocean; birth and death its ebb and flow. The dead poet does but sleep:—

He is made one with Nature. There is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder to the song of night's sweet bird.

Stroll across the velvet terraces of Down and drink in a restless undertone, if your ears be quick enough to catch its echo, as the breakers chafe on the pebbled beach three hundred feet below. Then look upward and learn to emulate the utter calm of created things about you. The cycle of life rolls on unchanging. The wanderer on the Down headland is a partner in wide silences and deep content. Thus to him watching, the striking of the church clock in a distant village reveals the fleeting foot of Time. Two o'clock. A faint air draws up from the sea, a blush is kindling in the East. Day is coming. Soon its growing glory is suffused. The kaleidoscope of the seascape changes. The sea's sombre outline takes on a paling sheen of green. The sun is rising, and

When, from under this terrestrial ball,
He fires the proud tops of the Eastern pines, the splendour of God is once more clothed in earthly symbols. Another day is born. Young angels pass. The blackbirds and thrushes, who had been harping on muted strings, now burst into a chorus, rising to the swelling of harmony of Nature's orchestra. The smoke of cottage chimneys floats upward into the pellucid air. Man goes forth to his labour until the evening.

Then the Sun, no longer content to woo with hint and glamour, turns tyrant, pouring on man and beast the burden of his wrath. The air grows sultry, robbed of its ozone. The birds hide themselves away, as from some fierce taskmaster. The trout lies under a ledge of rock, where swirling weeds waver in the stream. Only the merry cicala fiddles cheerily with his legs for bow and strings. He recalls to his mates the story of the birth of his race under fierce suns of yore.

Then the wanderer, as he retells the magic of the brief darkness and babbles of the majesty of the Sun-god, careering in his dazzling chariot of fire, perchance may say to those about him: "It's an old-fashioned Summer we are having. The English climate is not too bad after all."

REVIEWS

MR. CHESTERTON AS A POET

The Ballad of the White Horse. By G. K. CHESTERTON.
(Methuen and Co. 5s. net.)

STRICTLY speaking, Mr. Chesterton is primarily a poet. We do not in remarking this allude to the fact that some years ago he made his first appearance in the world of letters with a volume of poems, "The Wild Knight," although that is in itself no small indication to a man's fount of inspiration; we have in mind, rather, his outlook on life, of which this was the first and most vital evidence. In a sense it is true to say that the modern economics of existence (which is frequently and wrongly referred to as life) have bent him aside from the speech of instinct, and compelled him to voice himself in the looser meanings of prose. His native outlook is that of a poet. Even his prose reasoning—sharp, sudden, and elliptical—is such reasoning as a poet, with his instinct for the simple essentials of the matter, finds most native to himself. It makes one very nearly despair to see some critic sleekly and complacently dismiss as paradox what is in fact the sudden placing of the beauty of a primary unalterable principle beside the hideous distortion of modern civilisation. There are some passages in his prose so extraordinarily right that to hear them laughed over as paradoxes makes one suspect that some one or other has been touched on a raw place. It is a churlish or timid age this, too grudging or too fearful to acclaim greatness when it sees it; yet there are perceptions strewn throughout Mr. Chesterton's work, verse or prose, that compel one to say of him, with neither sycophancy nor log-rolling, that he is a great man indeed and a poet by truth of instinct.

That, however, is a big matter—too big for the space of such a review as this. It has been prompted by the fact that this book is Mr. Chesterton's second volume of poetry, with the space of over a decade between it and its predecessor. Those who know "The Wild Knight"—those, indeed, who know no more than the various verses, authentic or travesty, which he has distributed through his prose—will scarcely need to be told that his special fitness in poetic speech is for the ballad form. Perhaps afterdays will notice to what extent some in our day are experimenting with the old poetic forms side by side with others who are rashly throwing away the old forms altogether. Here is Mr. Chesterton, for instance, giving us a long poem of eight books and 182 pages which he calls a ballad, and which, despite the straining of the borders of the form as hitherto understood, is nevertheless both in form and inspiration rightly so characterised. The subject of his ballad, since a ballad must have a personal, and, if possible, a heroic, subject, is King Alfred and his attempt to hurl the Danes out of Wessex. Ostensibly this is the subject, actually and more truly it is the defence of Christianity against the inroads of barbaric heresy, with an eye turned aside now and again in order that the gay, brave fight of the gay, brave days should awake a suggestion of what is even now happening in Mr. Chesterton's own day and clime.

To get the proper proportions for his hero, Mr. Chesterton has very wisely elected to go behind the King Alfred of the carping historian to the King Alfred of tradition, back to him who sang in the Danish camp and burnt the good wife's cakes. And in order that the proper colours should be given to this (say, brave) tale, Mr. Chesterton has introduced three characters as chieftains to aid Alfred—a Saxon, Eldred; a Celt, Colan of Caerleon; and a Roman, Marcus—each being representative of the various layers of peoples that had "fought for the Christian civilisation against the heathen nihilism." In resonant verse Mr. Chesterton picks out the salient features of each national representative with an insight and accuracy that comes not short of actual mental fascination. This, for example, is the Celt:—

And the man was come like a shadow,
From the dusk of Druid trees,
When Usk with mighty murmurings
Past Caerleon of the fallen Kings,
Goes out to ghostly seas.

His harp was carved and cunning,
As the Celtic craftsman makes,
Carven all over with twisting shapes
Like many headless snakes.

His harp was carved and cunning,
His sword prompt and sharp;
And he was gay when he held the sword,
Sad when he held the harp.

For the great Gaels of Ireland
Are the men that God made mad,
For all their ways are merry,
And all their songs are sad.

He made the sign of the Cross of God,
He knew the Roman prayer;
But he had unreason in his heart,
Because of the gods that were.

And whether in seat or saddle,
Whether with frown or smile,
Whether at feast or fight was he,
He heard the sound of a nameless sea
On an undiscovered isle.

It is a slight and trite task open to any pedant to point out that the first of these stanzas derives clearly from Kubla Khan. It is more to the point to ask where else one may find bold, free verse that is yet so subtle. This is Marcus the Roman:—

A bronzed man, with a bird's bright eye,
And a strong bird's beak and brow,
His skin was brown like buried gold,
And of certain of his sires was told
They came in the shining ship of old,
With Cæsar in the prow.

His fruit-trees stood like soldiers,
Drilled in a straight line.
His strange, stiff olives did not fail,
And all the kings of the earth drank ale,
But he drank wine.

Near the end of the book, when the fight of Ethandune has been fought, when Alfred has lost and is gathering together his distributed band for the last essay, this is how the four are differentiated. He has described the child's way of building stone-towers that fall down, as patiently to be rebuilt again; and then he adds:—

And this was the might of Alfred,
At the ending of the way;
That of such smiters, wise or wild,
He was least distant from the child
Piling the stones all day,

For Eldred fought like a frank hunter,
That killeth and goeth home;
And Mark had fought because all arms
Rang like the name of Rome.

And Colan fought with a double mind,
Moody and madly gay;
But Alfred fought as gravely
As a good child at play.

Since quotation must necessarily be a limited matter, we have so selected our quotations that they indicate a certain manner of sequence throughout. They are also apt examples of the quality of the poem. To those who have given thought to the respective characteristics of the Celt and Saxon the last stanza is almost startling, so truly does it see, and so admirably does it express its vision.

Yet if such quotations be apt examples of its quality, the ballad contains much else besides. Mr. Chesterton has often stirred some of us strangely with his appeals for the clearness and rightness of personal combat; but never has he spoken with such effect as in his description of the Battle of Ethandune. Book Eight is a book to stir the blood and exalt the mind with the great gusto of living. There is also much in the way of such a lusty religious faith as brings other great things of life in its train. But since it is time to make an end, let this be said fairly and frankly. Mr. Chesterton will pass to the great silence, and perhaps, too, his direct contributions to life and thought will pass from regard and memory; but of few things now said and written is it more possible to aver that in that day "The Ballad of the White Horse" will not be permitted easily to die. His other works are admirable, and they are entertaining; but they are chiefly an exalted journalism. In this book he wins past to something more perdurable and permanent.

THE POET AND THE AGE—I.

Mariamne: a Conflict. By T. STURGE MOORE. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. net.)

Desiderio: a Play in Three Acts. By MAURICE BARING. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s. net.)

Poems of Men and Hours. By JOHN DRINKWATER. (David Nutt. 1s. 6d. net.)

The New Hesperides and other Poems. By JOEL ELIAS SPINGARN. (Sturgis and Walton, New York. $1 net.)

No one can say that we lack poets when confronted with four volumes of such fine and sincere poetry as these. There is true poetic fervour in each of these small books, powerfully and often exquisitely expressed. The tone of every one of them is high, and it is refreshing to note that no minor-poetical pessimism disfigures their pages. They have also escaped almost completely from the decadence which once so seriously threatened this art. But when we have said all this, and have fully recognised the worth and high purpose of these poets, the question forces itself upon us—What is the relation of their art to the age in which we live? We have here two dramas and two books of short poems; to what extent are they the product of this age, and what message have they for the times?

No doubt questions like these will incur the wrath of the "Art for Art's sake" devotees, but such questions will continue to be asked whether they are approved of by select coteries or not. It cannot be denied, at any rate, that Shakespeare had a direct relationship with the art of his age, and in some sense a message for it, though that message propounded no new moralities and was far enough removed from the style of the pulpiter. Milton, too, had a word for his times, however heedless of that word those times were. And it is eminently true of Tennyson that he was the product of the nineteenth century and spoke unmistakably and vitally to its needs. But amongst these four poets, some of whom display the technical ability of a Tennyson and possibly the equivalent of his powers of thought, not one has the same dominating spirit which would make his volume a vital book to the men of to-day. We have, indeed, few modern poets who have attempted to make poetry out of the century in which they write, and those few have not been particularly successful. Our poets too largely derive their technique and their themes from an earlier age, and make of their art a temple of refuge from the storms and sordidness of the present. The new poet of his times will no doubt melt and refashion in the fires of his own poetic fervour the diverse facts of his age and compel them to serve his art, welding them all into a perfect whole of beauty and of strength.

Take, first, Mr. Sturge Moore's new dramatisation of part of the life of Herod. We have here a sinewy strength of phrase and a fine resonance of line which occasionally call to remembrance the achievements of the great masters of the past. For instance, this from Mariamne's repentance after her condemnation:—

I was too set upon a perfect life.
Must no fault be to find in Herod's love?
Because a leat was led aside to turn
The mills of darkling thought and gross desire,
Such tampering with my fortunes' copious stream
Appeared a crime inhuman—human fault
Scarce marring much less fortune, it had seemed To women husbanded at lesser cost
Of God's supreme endowments.

Mr. Sturge Moore has caught something of that dark, passionate atmosphere of intrigue and suspicion which marked the reign of Herod the Great. His foolish, overweening jealousy for his unhappy Queen Mariamne, which led to her judicial murder, is also well displayed. As a drama it is well-knit, working to a swift and tragic conclusion, though lacking somewhat in the clear characterisation which so few dramatic poets achieve in blank verse. But this ancient story of the anger of Herod and the doom of Mariamne—what is its net value for our age? Little, that we are aware of, beyond the fact that beauty is its own excuse for being.

When we approach "Desiderio" we find ourselves in an entirely different atmosphere. The quality of the blank verse is less resonant, but what it loses in this respect it gains in clearness, though it has its moments of power, as the following passage testifies:—

I come to break the tyranny of dreams—
Dreams of ambition, dreams of power and wealth.
If men can only know these things are dreams,
Content, they shall inhale the quality
Of life and find it new; . . .
They, in the brutal chariot-race of life,
More glad shall pass, not thinking of the toil,
But of the splendour of the race.

The story of the idealist who was set up as king by the machinations of conspiring courtiers to serve their own ends has its suggestions for our modern problems, and in this respect comes nearer, perhaps, to the standard we have set up than any other of these poets. We are reminded of the difficulties that wait upon government of either the aristocratic or the democratic type. We see once more the ever-recurring spectacle of the martyred idealist. We behold afresh the misunderstandings caused by any man whose love is general rather than for individuals. This is a high-minded play, and we commend it to all lovers of poetry for its thoughtful qualities.

The outstanding characteristic of Mr. Drinkwater's verse is its complete sincerity. This he claims for it himself, and we are glad to be able to endorse his claim. His subject-matter is usually of a somewhat grave order, and there is more than a touch of true religious feeling, which, however, is far removed from the banal type with which we are only too familiar. Mr. Drinkwater survives many tests in such a lyric as this entitled "Love:"—

Lord of the host of deep desires
That spare no sting, yet are to me
Sole echo of the silver choirs
Whose dwelling is eternity,

With all save thee my soul is pressed
In high dispute from day to day,
But, Love, at thy most high behest
I make no answer, and obey.

There is in all these short poems that individual note for which the critic looks so earnestly. Where this is present there is hope that achievement of a very high order may follow. Mr. Drinkwater has both thought and truth which are more or less apposite to the needs of the age, and for these we the more gladly commend him to the searcher after beauty and truth.

The author of "The New Hesperides" bears a name less familiar than any of the foregoing. He is Professor of Comparative Literature in Columbia University, and has already proved himself a critic of a very high order in a lecture on "The New Criticism," recently reviewed in these columns. Remembering our standard, we turned to him with large expectations as the inhabitant of a new world whence some new authentic utterance might come. Beauty of expression we found; fine technical ability also; but it is disappointing to note that this technique was almost all of a European type. True, America is often referred to, but she is not herself the inspiration of any mighty, compelling song. From this new land we look for something almost as individual as Whitman's compound of prose and poetry; but it is not to be found in Professor Spingarn, though we very gladly recognise the many fine qualities which proclaim him to be a true poet. There is very little of the direct lyrical cry in this collection; the work is rather that of a careful and conscientious artist who knows exactly how such things should be done. We are, however, rather surprised to find that some of the writer's sonnets depart from the pure sonnet form in certain details. Mr. Spingarn's gift is well represented in a tiny poem entitled "The Poet:"—

I have not gathered these dreams out of the reading of books;
They came to me, flowers of dusk, sweet with the odour of stars:
Some of them live not a day out of their shadowy nooks;
Some of them still show the touch where my fingers bruised them with scars.

While four such poets can be found there is no necessity to despair as to the poetical powers of our age; but we still wait with more than a little wistfulness for the commanding poet who shall speak unmistakably to our needs.

INDIAN EMPERORS

A History of the Great Moghuls; or, A History of the Badshahate of Delhi from 1605 to 1739 A.D. By PRINGLE KENNEDY, M.A. (Thacker and Co., Calcutta. 6 rupees.)

THE period of rather more than two hundred years between the invasion of the first Great Moghul, Baber, in 1526, and the sack of Delhi by Nadir Shah, the Persian, in 1738-9, is perhaps the most interesting of the different epochs of Indian history. It witnessed the rise of the Moghul Empire, its zenith, its decadence, and the subsequent anarchy, caused partly by internal misrule, partly by the development of the rival power of the Marathas, who in later days were themselves beaten by the Afghans at Panipat in 1761, and subsequently by the English. In a previous volume Mr. Kennedy has dealt with Baber, Humayun, the usurpation of Sher Shah, and Akbar; herein he completes the period with accounts of Jahangir, Shah Jehan, Aurangzeb, and their unworthy successors. The story has often been told, and in very different styles. Mr. Kennedy avowedly writes for the man in the street, for those who know but little, but who desire to know something of mediæval Indian history, and who are not able to find exactly what they want in other books.

In this limited purpose the author has succeeded. His book has no pretension to becoming a standard work, but he gives, pleasantly enough, a lighter account of the reigns and characters of the Emperors mentioned. Comparison would show that many matters have been omitted. He has brought out well the characteristics of each Emperor and alluded to the more important events. Thus Jahangir is shown to be a drunkard and sensualist, fortunate in the possession of a wife, the famous Nur Jehan, improperly obtained, who took too leading a part in the administration. Jahangir, generally regarded as more scrupulous in religious matters than the eclectic Akbar, is pronounced tolerant, whereas Shah Jehan was intolerant, and Aurangzeb's bigotry ruined the empire. Shah Jehan's reign, 1627-56, was the golden period of Moghul rule. The empire and dynasty were firmly established, the government was conducted with ability. The State expenditure was enormous, though the figures are probably exaggerated. His buildings, including the glorious Taj Mahal, testify to his splendour. Aurangzeb's treatment of his father and brothers was inexcusable, but characteristically Oriental. His constant fruitless and exhausting contests with the Marathas, especially with Sivaji, and his fighting for twenty-five years in the Deccan in attempts to subjugate the smaller kingdoms, sapped the resources of the State, and led to the anarchy during the forty years of his successors, Bahadur Shah to Muhammad Shah, which left India a prey to Nadir Shah, and eventually to the Marathas. These matters are the commonplaces of Indian history.

There is a special feature in this book, in that it contains long quotations from Bernier, the French physician and traveller, and from the native writers, especially Khafi Khan, whose works were edited by Henry Elliot and Mr. Dowson. Aurangzeb, unfortunately, forbade the writing of history, but it was done surreptitiously. It is surprising that Mr. Kennedy, who knows India and the tendency of Orientals to flatter, and to ignore anything disagreeable, should write so strongly in favour of the native historians. "The kernel of veracity, the desire to tell what is true, and the trouble to find it out, are everywhere to be found in our Indian Muhammadan historians. They have the practical historical sense strongly developed, and their accounts are to be preferred to those of any European traveller when one wishes really to study the history of the times." This is not the generally received view of the writings of Indian historians; their works have to be accepted pour faute de mieux, but with a reservation engendered by their intrinsic defects.

Mr. Kennedy has some sensible remarks on England's policy and modern politics in India, but he is not literally exact in the expression "All India is British now;" nor is his statement correct that Clive, in the 'forties of the eighteenth century, defended Arcot. We have again noted some slips in his proof-reading, which he admits is not good (e.g., "Junda," "Akbar," "Ahmedabad," for "Jumla," "Abbas," "Ahmednagar"). But the class of readers for whom he has written should be grateful to him for rendering Indian history palatable, while they would be repelled by more substantial treatises. For their purposes the half is better than the whole.

THE PANAMA CANAL

The Panama Canal. By HARMODIO ARIAS, B.A., LL.B.
(P. S. King and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

SHOULD the Panama Canal be fortified? Certainly the United States have a right to do it, since self-defence is the first law of Nature; for they not only bought out the former Canal Company and paid the Republic of Panama a large sum for the right to construct a canal, but they also expended hundreds of millions of dollars to the benefit of the community. Panama and Colon, fever holes before the work was begun, were converted into healthy cities by the Americans. When finished it will save thousands of miles in ocean travel; this not only benefits the foreign ship-owners, but the countries on the West Coast of America from Mexico down to the northern part of Chili as well.

Many thousands of acres of land on the West Coast of South Central America and Mexico which now lie idle will be taken up and cultivated and produce valuable crops in the near future. European countries will have the benefit of this canal without having spent a cent to have the waterway opened. All countries could have demanded and agreed to keep the Canal neutral if a private company had completed the Canal, or even if a European Power had undertaken the work, as they had no immediate disaster to fear, since they were so far away. With the United States it is altogether different; they want to concentrate their fleet as quickly as possible to protect their own coast, either in the Pacific, Atlantic, or the Gulf of Mexico, and also to present as many hindrances as they can to the enemy. That is the principal science of warfare.

In 1850, when they entered into a treaty with Great Britain to assure the neutrality of the Canal, neither England nor the U.S.A. had any intention of constructing it, but both wanted to safeguard themselves in case Columbia had given a concession to another Power. To enter into a treaty and to keep one are two different things. A weak Power can be forced to fulfil an agreement, whereas a strong Power does as she likes. We have seen the effect of the latter policy with the treaties made by Napoleon, or rather his Minister Talleyrand, who made, signed, and constructed treaties which he did not intend to keep; some were even broken before the ink of the signature was dry.

When De Lesseps undertook to finish the Canal with French money it was to the interest of the U.S.A. to see that it was neutral, and not fortified. The French company could not finish the Canal; thus came the opportunity of the U.S.A. to construct it for themselves and to obtain the French interest as cheaply as possible. For this reason the Spooner Act was framed in America.

A cutting from San Juan del Norte (Greytown) across Nicaragua to Briton, where the Canal should enter the Pacific, would have cost considerably more money to construct than a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. Greytown is a bad harbour, sanding up all the time; and Briton, on the Pacific, is open to heavy rollers during the northerly gales. Extensive and very costly breakwaters would have to be built to make any kind of smooth haven in the Pacific from which vessels might enter the Canal.

This the Americans knew well; therefore the Spooner Act was passed as a bluff, and brought the French company to terms. The other opportunity to deal with the Columbian Government came soon. The people on the Isthmus revolted against Columbia, as they had done several times before, without aid from the U.S.A., but now America saw a chance.

To help Panama would mean to help themselves, which they did to a certain extent, and Panama became independent of Columbia. Panama ceded the Canal Zone to the United States, and they started to construct; if it had not been for this there would be no Republic of Panama now.

Mr. Arias compares the Suez Canal with the Panama Canal. The former, he observes, is neutral; but how will it be in case of war? Would England allow an enemy's fleet to pass the Suez Canal to attack India? Probably not; so apparently the United States have a right to fortify the Panama Canal to protect themselves.

There is one consolation for outsiders who do not like the way Americans conduct the Canal affair: let them keep away, and send their ships around the Horn or through the Straits.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Village Sermons on Uncommon Texts. By the REV. RUSSELL H. JEFFREY. (Skeffington and Son.)

Not many weeks ago we were spending a very peaceful holiday in a delightful country village. On the Sunday we wended our way to the parish church, expecting that, amid such beautiful surroundings, we should hear a sermon which would in some way at least correspond to the charming exterior. Our hopes rose high when the text was given out: "Where there is no vision the people perish" was surely a message calculated to provide ample scope for any preacher. But we were grievously disappointed: we heard not one word about a vision; there were no haunting thoughts or inspiring allusions in the half-hour's homily; there was nothing to cause any of the congregation to hunger and thirst after the righteousness with which it is promised that seekers shall be filled. The text was used merely as a tag upon which to hang the various things the preacher wished to say, and had little or no relation to the sermon. We will not go to the length of saying that these "Village Sermons on Uncommon Texts" resemble our uninspired village sermon of a few weeks ago. It is only just and right to give a parish priest credit for knowing better than any one else the needs of his parishioners, and in all probability the sermons contained in the present volume entirely met the wants of the people to whom they were originally addressed. But when such matter is collected, printed, and presented in book form complaint must not be made if it is judged on its merits alone.

If a sermon be preached from an uncommon text it is only reasonable to suppose that a good explanation of the text will be given or a difficult meaning explained. It is futile to choose uncommon texts, drag them from their context, and bring them by a long process of illogical reasoning to ordinary deductions when the same deductions would be much better obtained by a reference to the passage from which they are usually illustrated. For instance, from "O Baal hear us" Mr. Jeffrey proceeds to teach the lesson of the Pharisee and the publican; from an exhortation of five pages on "he buildeth his house as a moth" two are devoted to an explanation of the evolution of the silk-producing caterpillar; while the idea "that there must be many mansions in the Place of Departed Spirits to suit the requirements of those abiding there" sounds very comfortable, but we have not hitherto understood that our "requirements" would carry much weight when it was a question of our position in the next world. The doctrine is also put forward that that State which is going to provide so well for our requirements will also give us an extra opportunity of redeeming the time "made so little use of when on earth." The plea for this doctrine is that it is "a more pleasing one than that preached by Calvin and his followers." We must really read the Gospels again and search diligently for Christ's "pleasing" methods of dealing with the Scribes and Pharisees, immorality, hypocrisy, and similar vices. Is it too much to hope that the next book of sermons we have to handle will deal with "Uncommon Sermons on Familiar Texts"?

La Légende de Don Juan, son Évolution dans la Littérature :
I. Des Origines au Romantisme. II. Du Romantisme à l'Époque Contemporaine. By GEORGES GENDARME DE BÉVOTTE. Two Vols. (Hachette and Co. 3f. 50c each.)

DON JUAN, his adventures and crimes, and the episode of the statue of the Commander—"le Festin de Pierre," as it came to be inaccurately styled—belong to the common fund of European literature, and have been drawn on to an incredible extent, witness the two present volumes and the index, contained in the later of them, of writers who have in any way used the legend. Moreover, we understand that M. Gendarme de Béville is the author of a much larger work on the same question. The subject is interesting enough, and the treatment is scholarly and conscientious—almost too much so, we were on the point of saying, for the ordinary reader. It would be difficult to recall a writer who has been completely ignored, or any considerable work hinging on the adventures or the psychology of the reprobate that has escaped a detailed analysis. And moreover the volumes, quite apart from the judicial character of the more general chapters, should have a distinct value for the literary man as works of reference. They are full of suggestions for the study of many phases of literary history.

The development of "Donjuanism" in literature is very curious. Though nowadays it is common property, it is a comparatively modern growth. The first "Don Juan" in the classical shape, as we know it in Molière's great play and Mozart's opera, was a Spanish play of the beginning of the seventeenth century, by Tirso de Molina. In the original version the moral was of course edifying, being the long-suffering of Heaven and the certain punishment of the sinner. Then greater interest began to be taken in the character of the hero himself, which became more complex. Already in Molière a sort of apology is hinted at. Romanticism turns the whole situation inside out; the libertine becomes a repentant sinner, a victim of the tyranny of society, or, as in some very recent works, its possible regenerator. Mr. Bernard Shaw is a good representative of the last-mentioned point of view, and "Man and Superman" marks the last stage in the history of Donjuanism. Byron, though his poem is analysed at great length, had too independent and irresponsible a fancy to be really important in the development of the legend.

M. Gendarme de Béville gives good reasons for the late invention of Don Juan. He attributes him, and Faust as well—the intellectual and the moral rebel—to the revolt against mediævalism. Antiquity had no place for Juans or Fausts. We feel that it is so, but we have a kind of uneasy feeling about Prometheus and Alcibiades. The protest was not quite the same perhaps, but moral or intellectual revolt has always been at any rate possible, though its forms and fashions change.

Loretto School, Past and Present. By H. B. TRISTRAM. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE story of Loretto School is centralised in the robust and unconventional figure of its famous Head Master, Hely

Hutchinson Almond, whose reign of over forty years makes quite a remarkable chapter in the history of educational enterprise. An autocrat, not hampered by Governors or Committee, a man of strong personality and original character, keenly alive to mistakes and abuses, he sets himself the task, in defiance of theory, practice, and tradition, of building up an altogether distinctive school, having its own very peculiar methods in work and games. His struggles and ultimate success are alike well known. He waged war against all convention. Boys were allowed to go about hatless and coatless. He himself taught, and even read prayers in flannels, without his coat. Caps and gowns for masters were unheard of. But this apparent disregard of discipline and dignity begot no corresponding impudence. Almond was too strong for that. Yet the strength of such a system lies solely in the strength of its administrators. Where Almond might succeed, numbers would fail. It is alleged, though we have our doubts, that he was "the first Head Master who openly set himself to make the physical education of his boys part of the regular school system." Quite the finest part of his system was his contempt for examinations, but here, unfortunately, the rising tide of competition proved too strong. His idea of independence of thought was based on the narrow and negative spirit of Protestantism which he instilled into the boys. He published a volume of sermons with the title "Christ the Protestant." The measure of his great personal success is best described by saying that he achieved the position, very rare among Head Masters, of becoming a hero to his boys. All this, the fortunes of Loretto School and its original experiments, is very well told by Mr. H. B. Tristram, Almond's brother-in-law and successor. The book should be read with interest, not only in the Loretto circle, but generally in the scholastic world. Original experiments always have their value in showing what is best to copy and what to avoid. On both sides, Mr. Tristram writes with as fair and sound a judgment as may be possible to hero worship and natural patriotism; and he gives an admirable picture of school life and work under novel and empirical conditions.

FICTION

THE FASCINATING CHAUFFEUR

A Rolling Stone. By B. M. CROKER. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

Sylvia's Chauffeur. By LOUIS TRACY. Illustrated. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THERE are few present-day novels that cannot boast a chauffeur and an automobile, for the daring motorist has been rapidly supplanting older types of hero in popular favour, though the advent of the more venturesome airman bids fair in no short time to deprive him, in his turn, of his pride of place. In the two novels before us the leather suit, the holland coat, and the goggles occupy a prominent position, for Mrs. B. M. Croker and Mr. Louis Tracy have each chosen a chauffeur, or rather a handsome young aristocrat more or less masquerading as such, for hero. These two scions of ancient houses have many points in common, and there is a "strange coincidence" in the adventures that befall them.

"A ROLLING STONE"

is Owen St. John Willoughby FitzGibbon, "a wild, harum-scarum young fellow," nephew and heir to Sir Richard Wynyard of Wynyard, Bart., a county magnate of ancient lineage and considerable wealth. Having sown his wild oats "not wisely, but too well," young Owen is cast adrift by his irate uncle for a period of two years, during which time he must maintain himself honourably by working for his living and earning his daily bread. He is quite at a loss what to do with himself, but fortunately he has a sister, Lady Kesters, who, besides being the happy possessor of a "smart new Rolls-Royce," can also boast a "clever and contriving mind." On her advice the nonplussed young prodigal becomes chauffeur to two maiden ladies who have just been cheated into acquiring a faked-up ramshackle old motor "lined with real morocco leather" and newly painted dark green. The Misses Parrett have a niece, Aurea Morven, and, after the way of the chauffeur of fiction, Owen at once falls desperately in love with her; and though he feels that his passion is reciprocated, he is debarred from declaring himself until his period of probation is over. Nevertheless, pleasant interludes like the following, when the crazy motor came to grief at a time of flood, helped to make his trial less unbearable:—

Little, little did Aurea guess that, as she leant her head upon his leather shoulder, how Owen, the chauffeur, had to fight with a frantic, almost overmastering, desire to kiss her! . . . Fortunately, with a superhuman effort, he pulled himself together, steadied his racing pulses, and thrust the dreadful idea behind him.

Eventually, after "a few cuts and bruises, a slight concussion, and a broken collar-bone," the result of the inevitable accident, Owen was received back into Sir Richard's good graces, and then Aurea "wondered, was any girl in all the wide world as happy as herself?" For, you see, she had married her aunts' chauffeur!

In the course of her pleasantly conceived, interesting, and wholesome story Mrs. Croker displays her intimate acquaintance with things rural, as witness Mrs. Hogben's post-mortem reminiscence of her last pet pig:—

"Well, of course, he grew fat, and ready for the butcher, and when he was prime, he had to go—but it just broke my heart, so it did; for nights before I couldn't sleep for crying," here she became lachrymose; "but it had to be, and me bound to be about when the men came, and the cries and yells of him drove me wild; though of course, once he was scalded and hung up, and a fine weight, it wor a nice thing to have one's own pork and bacon."

"SYLVIA'S CHAUFFEUR"

is also a Fitz, if you please—George Augustus Fitzroy, Viscount Medenham, son and heir to the Earl of Fairholme. He takes the place of a real chauffeur whose car has broken down on Derby day, and in his stead drives a charming and wealthy American girl, Sylvia Vanrenen, and her chaperon from the Savoy Hotel to Epsom Downs. Fitzroy, whose family motto is "I dare all," drives a "purring Mercury," which "sang the song of the free highway, and sped through the leafy lanes of Surrey with a fine disregard for Acts of Parliament and the 'rules and regulations therein made and provided.'" After the Derby the noble viscount drives the ladies on a tour through the South and West of England, and Mr. Tracy gives a fine picture of a run through the Cheddar gorge on to the bleak and desolate tableland of the Mendips, though some of his descriptive writing savours rather of the guide-book. At Symond's Yat Sylvia goes for a moonlight row on the Wye with her aristocratic chauffeur. The boat fouls something, and a whole seam is torn open, followed by an inrush of water. Whereupon Fitzroy leaps overboard and carries Sylvia to dry land—on his shoulder, much in the same way that Owen carried Aurea:—

Her hair brushed his forehead, his eyes, his lips, as he lifted her down. His hands rested for an instant on the warm softness of her neck and shoulders. His heart leaped in a mad riot of joy at the belief that she would have uttered no protest if he had drawn her nearer instead of setting her decorously on her feet.

He next fights a duel with a French count, who has designs on Sylvia and her fortune, and receives a sword thrust "in perilous proximity to the right lung." A wedding at St. George's, Hanover-square, naturally follows, and more American dollars go to enrich the British aristocracy.

Love—and the People. By EDITH ANNE STEWART. (Lynwood and Co. 6s.)

FOR the theme of her story Miss Stewart has chosen some of the subjects which are now uppermost in people's minds, Socialism and the woman's movement having a large hearing in the present romance. There are portions of lectures delivered by Socialists at Socialistic meetings, scribblings of a young girl eager to enter any sphere that will give her more excitement than keeping her father's house, and extracts from sermons delivered by one Paul Marten, who is also a would-be reformer and worker for the people. Whether we agree with the object of many of the persons depicted in the book, or whether the result obtained in many cases is worth all the time devoted to its achievement, it is not for us to discuss. The small group of people who meet with the avowed object of doing good to their fellow-creatures are as a rule pleasing and interesting. Perhaps the two we like best are Paul Marten and Sir John Illet, because, although keen, practical workers, they still manage to combine a little of the dreamer's spirit with their very material tasks. Two or three love affairs are introduced to explain the first part of the title; one of them at least is very unconvincing. Cupid, we believe, has a curious knack of drawing many a bow at a venture, but that the same arrow should strike Marjorie Keswick and Sidney Gower requires a very large stretch of the imagination; for, after allowing for the fact that the difference in their social positions could be satisfactorily bridged over, Sidney still remains the uncouth, selfish, and ignorant democrat that he ever was. The description in many places is good, and the characters are well and sympathetically drawn, although frequently it is obvious that they are made the mouthpieces of the author's religious and democratic ideas rather than living, thoughtful people who really believe the words they utter.

Anthea's Guest. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

THE majority of modern fiction-writers still persist in allowing their stage to be occupied for an unreasonable period by people who are decidedly unpleasant. Mrs. Sidgwick has spent much force and a good deal of splendid material in depicting the character and actions of a woman utterly unworthy of the energy devoted to her portrayal. We have no wish to go back to the prim virtues and samplers of the early Victorians; but, on the other hand, we certainly feel inclined to rebel when the limelight is so persistently focussed on a woman of Lydia's limitations. In earlier days Lydia would merely have flitted across the stage to act as a foil to the tender Anthea; now things have entirely changed. Anthea must give place to the woman who can deceive, tell lies, and be altogether dishonourable. Possibly some day a novelist will arise who will have sufficient courage to take the bull by the horns, as it were, and draw us a few characters which are interesting without being immoral, and fascinating without the desire to allure other women's husbands from their promised allegiance.

Meanwhile, until this much-hoped-for day dawns there is nothing we can do but read the books supplied to us and feel sorry that so much skill is wasted on unsavoury subjects.

Lord Stranleigh, Philanthropist. By ROBERT BARR. Illustrated. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THOSE who enjoyed reading of the experiences of "Young Lord Stranleigh" will no doubt be glad to make the further acquaintance of that remarkable young millionaire nobleman in the present volume of short stories which have previously appeared in the Windsor Magazine. For our own part—true, our appetite may be jaded—we are beginning to feel as though we had had enough of the wonderful doings of his lordship of Wychwood, and were it not for the relief of the occasional appearances of the grave and dignified Ponderby we feel we should have to cry a halt. But so long as Mr. Robert Barr's other innumerable admirers remain unsurfeited and, like Oliver Twist, ask for more, there is no doubt but that that entertaining and versatile writer will not treat them à la Bumble. What strikes us most in these stories is that they usually begin about one thing and end about something totally different, so that the reader who is weary of the beaten track might read them backwards with equal enjoyment. The volume is well illustrated, but it would have been an improvement had the binder condescended to place the pictures opposite the text they illustrate.

SOME ASPECTS OF THE NATIONAL INSURANCE BILL

By the REV. PREBENDARY CARLILE, Founder and Hon. Chief Secretary of the Church Army

THE National Insurance Bill bristles with controversial matters. It might be discussed from many points of view; for instance, in its relations towards the medical profession and the Friendly Societies and charitable institutions; its finance; the amount and nature of benefits; its probable effect on the flow of public charity and so forth. On innumerable details it offers ground for criticism; yet on the whole it may fairly be considered a well-intentioned measure, and one which will have a far-reaching effect on the national life.

I propose to consider the Bill from one standpoint only: its probable effect on the moral character of the nation.

As a nation the English are not conspicuous for the virtue of thrift. It has become a national habit to live up to, frequently beyond, one's income. This tendency affects all classes, rich and poor; and to lay by for a rainy day is no longer regarded as a matter of duty. Common observation is sufficient to prove the existence of an enormous class who could well afford to save something, even if only a little, out of their weekly wages; and yet who, on the first breath of unemployment or sickness, have to fly to the relieving officer or to charity. I am not unmindful of the tens of thousands who, out of very slender means, pay week by week into a society or club, and who are thus sheltered from, at all events, the first blasts of adversity. All honour to them. The fact that so many find it possible to do so throws into strong relief the unthriftiness of those in a similar station of life who do not attempt the making of any such provision.

The legislation of recent years, whatever have been its merits, has not tended to promote the habit of thrift—for a habit it is, and it may be cultivated or lost like other habits. When the average man sees that the State is willing to relieve him of the burden of educating his children, feeding and doctoring them, to provide him with cheap and wholly unremunerative travel on railways and trams, to give him gratis, or at prices under cost, advantages which less than a century ago were beyond the reach of the wealthiest, it is hardly to be wondered at that he begins to think that the future may take care of itself, and that it is an act of wisdom to spend his income up to the hilt. If he falls sick, he knows that he will be cared for in a hospital. In old age, if the worst comes to the worst, there is always the workhouse between him and starvation. Even old-age pensions, so inestimable a boon in many ways, have fostered this way of looking at life.

I should be afraid to say what proportion of the innumerable cases of poverty and distress with which the Church Army becomes acquainted are the direct outcome of lack of thrift. And where other causes have been at work, the want of the moral qualities needed for thrift—foresight, self-denial, will-power—which would have been called into action by exercise, frequently makes the whole nature of the man weak, purposeless, and deficient in power to struggle against misfortune. The thriftless man is, as a rule, unfit for much except to swim with the stream, and if the stream is carrying him towards the brink of a precipice he is unable to make headway against it.

If the National Insurance Bill will encourage the virtue of thrift and the sense of civic responsibility, one must approve and welcome it, even though it be imperfect in many details.

With the general principle of the Bill, the meeting of contributions by the insured with contributions from other sources, it is impossible to quarrel.

In the case of men earning 2s. 6d. per day and upwards, who will, I suppose, form the bulk of those coming within the scope of the Bill, their contributions are fixed by it at 9d. per week, of which 2d. will be paid by the State, 3d. by the employer, and 4d. by the contributor. In the case of women earning similar amounts the weekly contribution will be 8d., of which 2d. will be paid by the State, 3d. by the employer, and 3d. by the contributor herself.

The share of the State—in other words, the over-burdened taxpayer—seems to be somewhat excessive. Granted that society at large has an interest in the matter, both on altruistic grounds and as making for social stability, it does appear that two-ninths in the case of men, and one-fourth in the case of women, are larger proportions than can be justified.

The employer's 3d. a week, amounting to one-third of the whole in the case of men, and three-eighths of the whole in the case of women, also seems to be more than the employer should fairly be asked to pay. All employers are not great corporations earning good dividends. Most of them are small men enjoying a very narrow margin of profit, and even the smallest addition to their burdens may make all the difference between ability to make a humble living and bankruptcy. The middle class already pays the greatest share of the rates, and in this way bears a heavy burden for the good of those who will chiefly benefit by insurance.

Possibly, however, the proportions stated in the Bill have been arrived at after full consideration, and for reasons with which I am unacquainted.

The steady regular contribution by the insured of the 3d. or 4d. a week, even though its proportion to the whole may be less than justice appears to demand, cannot but have a good effect on men and women who are now little inclined to thrift. It will carry home the duty of making provision for the future and not leaving everything to be done for them by others. As they see their payments mounting up week by week in their books, they will begin to take an interest and pride in them; and one can well imagine that in many cases great efforts will be made to prevent the payments falling into arrear. One cannot doubt that self-reliance and independence will be fostered, sometimes in unpromising quarters.

If I may use an illustration from my own experience in the Church Army Labour Homes, where the men's surplus wages are banked for them, we find it a most encouraging sign to see a man, who never before perhaps did an honest day's work in his life, begin to take an interest in his bank-book and to watch the entries swelling. The consciousness of saving, of having a stake, even a small one, in the country gives a wonderful interest to the drudgery of work. Similarly, one may hope, a man hitherto thriftless will find a new meaning and interest in life when he knows that he himself, and possibly his family also, are provided for against sickness and disablement, and that this provision is due to a little self-denial on his part.

Yet to my mind there is a fatal flaw in that part of the Bill which relates to contributors' payments. The contributions are to be paid in the first instance by the employer, and are to be recoverable from the employee by deduction from wages or otherwise. I venture to say that this course of dealing will fail to encourage the sense of self-help. If the contributor were paying his 4d. week by week to a Government officer, and seeing it entered in his book, it would give him a pride and pleasure in the transaction which will probably be wanting when it is a mere matter of finding 4d. a week docked off his wages by the employer. This will grow to be a dangerous source of irritation between masters and men, and more likely than not, agitation will arise from time to time (and, if so, it will probably succeed in the end) for the abolition of the employer's right to reimbursement; so that the whole of the contributor's payment will fall on the shoulders of other people. If and when this should happen there can be no more question of encouraging thrift and independence. The insurance scheme will be one more nail in the coffin of sturdy self-reliance; one more step towards the stage when the once honest, independent working man will look for everything to the State as his universal Providence and provider.

It may be said that the difficulty of collecting these small sums directly from contributors would be too great. But the Friendly and Provident Societies do it; and although, of course, the problem of making a national weekly collection is vastly greater than that confronting any individual Society, the advantages attending a direct collection are so great as to make it worth while to adopt some plan bringing contributor and collector into personal contact.

The result of relieving occupiers of small property from direct payment of rates is a parallel case. Working men pay rates, but as they never come into contact with the rate-collector, but pay their rates as an indistinguishable part of the rent, they lose sight of the fact that they have an interest in keeping rates down, with the result that in many, if not in most places, the rates have swollen to quite unreasonable dimensions. Similarly, if a contributor pays his contribution by way only of deduction from wages, he will lose all sense of personal interest; and although he will duly receive, in case of need, his sickness and disablement benefits, with medical treatment and the other boons promised by the Bill, he will hardly be conscious that they are the result of his own thrift and saving. To put the matter shortly, the contributions will bear the aspect of an unwarrantable deduction on the part of the employer; the benefits, that of a free and pauperising gift by the public authority.

For these reasons I consider that the Bill, from the point of view of its probable effect on the thrift and self-reliance of the nation, is capable of much improvement. There is still plenty of time for alterations, and I am confident that, with wisely-drafted amendments on the points which I have mentioned (the respective proportions of contributions by the State, by employers, and by contributors, and the method of collecting contributors' payments), the Bill will have a great and beneficial effect on the life of the nation. It will relieve thousands from the necessity of applying for Poor-law relief, or becoming objects of charity, for it will give them as their right, as something for which they themselves have honestly paid, the help in time of trouble which hitherto they have had to ask as paupers.

I have only discussed the Bill so far as it gives sickness and disablement benefit. Unemployment benefit is a separate subject, which may prove to be of the vastest importance, and space is wanting to consider it here.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF BELIEF

A WELL-KNOWN writer, being asked on a certain occasion what was his religion, answered that it was that of "all sensible men," and on his interlocutor desiring to know what that religion was he replied that "sensible men never tell." In much the same way it might be said of all matters of belief that all sensible men are of the same opinions, but upon what these opinions are even the most sensible of men cannot agree. For there is beneath all the manifold phases of belief in all the matters of life a still deeper belief that, if all things were truly understood, there could not possibly be two opinions about anything, and that if it were not for some unaccountable freak of nature all men, being of the same essential nature, would believe alike, just as they hunger and thirst alike. The object of all disagreement, it may be said, is to agree. This belief is formulated by Sir Leslie Stephen, who says of truth that it is of such a nature that "all men recognise it when it is put clearly before them, though they may have not previously thought about it or evolved its remoter consequences." And to a similar purpose was the shrewd observation of Dr. Johnson upon a certain occasion that "a wise Tory and a wise Whig will agree. Their principles are the same, though their modes of thinking are different."

But when we turn aside to observe the belief-attitudes of men and women nothing seems so impossible as such uniformity of belief, for here in practice we find scarcely any two individuals holding precisely the same set of opinions with regard to politics, religion and all other affairs of life: thus, perhaps, we find two men whom we have always known to be shrewd men of business, whom it is almost impossible to deceive in all common matters, and who have perhaps been at the University through a course of mathematics and logic, holding almost diametrically opposite opinions with regard to a certain article of theological or political belief. Here we find that men who are shrewd to a remarkable extent in all matters of pounds, shillings, and pence hold tenaciously and with sincere conviction to apparently most absurd and fantastic doctrines or systems of faith, and facts appear to suggest that there is no new or old religious cult, however absurd and ludicrous to the eye of reason and experience, which would not find its adherents. It is probable that no impostor, charlatan, or madman would fail to find a following of some sort although every article of his faith contradicted all human reason and experience, and there is, perhaps, some evidence of this in the success of many thought systems or esoteric creeds and "isms" which flourish to-day. In matters of belief it is impossible to say of what human nature is capable, or to predict what particular turn that of any individual may take, however reasonably he may seem to account for his opinions to himself or to us; and hence, unless he volunteers the information, it is not usually possible for us to know or guess whether he will be a Free Trader or a Protectionist, a Suffragist or an anti-Suffragist, a Socialist or an anti-Socialist, a Christian Scientist or an ordinary Christian. There appears thus to be no reliable rule for determining what any man's belief will be, for his shrewdness or sanity has little or nothing to do with it, and, in fact, we feel in many cases that the original thinker or leader of a movement might have led, if his beliefs had chanced to have been turned so, just as ably the opposite party, or that he might have reasoned almost as well, or perhaps better, to the precise contrary of his present line of reasoning.

Nothing in fact is more extraordinary than the use to which the human reason has often been put of defending what is unreasonable—as, for instance, in the puzzles and metaphysics of many ancient philosophers and schoolmen of the Middle Ages—so that it appears to us, whose beliefs are different, incomprehensible that the reason which was used so ingeniously and the intelligence which was so acute should not have turned about and recognised the absurdity of their whole position. As an illustration of this one may quote the Sophists of Athens, the beginnings of European philosophy, or perhaps, to take a more modern illustration, Sir Thomas Browne, who, accepting the popular belief in witches without question, discusses, among other “Vulgar Errors,” whether witches may sail in eggshells, and so on. It may, in fact, be suggested here that men sometimes believe in certain things because they practise them and do not practise them because they believe in them. Thus witches were probably believed in latterly because they were burned, and not burned because they were believed in. Or in all matters of belief it may be nearer the truth to say that there is no other reason for belief possible than belief itself, for that which is only believed for a reason is not belief, but merely a more or less doubtful degree of knowledge. It is of the essence of belief that the evidence should be insufficient or even opposed to the belief of the believer, for it is precisely this which makes belief a virtue when it is a virtue or a vice when it is a vice. But one cannot logically weigh belief in the scales of good and evil, for every man regards his own belief as his especial and singular virtue, and therefore to blame or persecute him for it is in the highest degree inconsistent both with reason and belief. It follows logically that a man holding one belief who persecutes or ridicules another for holding a contrary belief is himself committing a folly, for if a man believes one thing it implies clearly that he holds it a sin or a folly to believe the contrary. Whereas, in fact, each man in his belief is but being true to the light which is his or to himself. Of course this raises the old problem of whether belief is voluntary, and the answer as given by Pascal in the well-known passage of the wager, but it is impossible to discuss this within the scope of the present article.

It scarcely, however, needs further observation that men's beliefs do not follow evidences on lines of reason, for men will believe for almost any reason rather than for reason itself. It is the intellect (which, it seems, should be the first to be convinced) which, nevertheless, usually holds out to the last. Belief, in fact, is a matter of emotion, habit, instinct, rather than of intellect. Thus men believe certain things because it has never occurred to them that any other attitude or doubt is reasonable, and because it is the belief of their parents, people, and class. A Radical among Church of England clergymen, or a Tory workman, is clearly an exception to the general rule, and it is superfluous to observe that throughout all history ninety-nine of a hundred millions have been of the same opinions as their own people and class. Protestants and Catholics are born and not made.

But the strange thing with respect to this belief-attitude is the intellectual agility with which a man usually defends his beliefs, as if they had been attained only by a life-long study of the evidences, or were conclusions arrived at from infallible premises, whereas a wider survey of history and experience reveals the real laws and principles of action and beliefs. Bishop Butler, for example, wrote the “Analogy of Religion” because he believed Christianity, and did not believe Christianity because he wrote the “Analogy of Religion.” A very striking article on this subject of the will to believe appeared in the March issue of the Nineteenth Century, the writer, Professor Jastrow, taking for his text the reflection of Theophrastus Such (George Eliot): “It is a narrow prejudice of mathematicians to suppose that ways of thinking are to be driven out of the field by being reduced to an absurdity. The absurd is taken as excellent juicy thistle by many constitutions.” To this one may add the very similar reflection of Richard Baxter's: “We mistake men's diseases when we think there needeth nothing to cure them of their errors but the evidence of truth. Alas! there are many distempers of mind to be removed before they receive that evidence.”

It is, we may remind the reader in concluding, the “belief” or conclusion of the pragmatist philosophy that whatever a man believes rests finally, not on his knowledge or power of reasoning, but upon his will to have a thing so. One may surmise, as Professor Jastrow surmises, that a man's beliefs are an expression more of his taste and character, his culture and general calibre, than of his knowledge or intellectuality. To a similar purpose was the observation of Professor Tyndall in his “Apology” for the famous Belfast Address that beliefs “professed and defended by different people are often merely the accidental conduits through which they pour their own tempers, lofty or low, courteous or vulgar, mild or ferocious, as the case may be.”

Men, verily, live to believe, and does not the very word belief imply some degree of personal option or predilection? The majority of men will believe for no reason whatever rather than remain detached or take no action. They believe merely in order to have an interest in the question, whether they know anything of it or not, just as schoolboys favour the colours either of Oxford or Cambridge on the day of the boat-race, and the same boys do not lose their enthusiasm and beliefs when they arrive at years of discretion and the day of an election.

F. H. M.

A DEAD MAN'S BOOKS

WORD has reached me from California that eleven long-treasured and greatly-coveted books have at last been sold after much spirited bidding by millionaire book-lovers. For many years these eleven volumes, exposed to withering sunlight, stood in a frail and rickety bamboo bookcase in the tiny parlour of a restaurant-keeper's cottage at Monterey, in the State of California. So many persons came from afar to see and to handle them and to read the inscriptions on their flyleaves that the little wooden cottage embowered in roses and honeysuckle became, in its way, a shrine for literary pilgrims. Grim poverty, old age, and illness overtook the owner of the books. He lost his famous little restaurant, and was finally driven forth to peddle Mexican dainties, called tamales, upon the streets and highways. Still every tempting offer made him for his treasures was politely refused. At one time over two thousand dollars had been offered him by one person for the set; one hundred dollars by another for the little pamphlet in defence of Father Damien. Beside the books there were many letters written by the famous author of the books. The generous offers made for these were also declined.

"The letters are the letters of Stevenson to Simoneau," said their possessor; "the books are the gifts of one gentleman to another. They are not for sale."

But Jules Simoneau, the friend and benefactor of Robert Louis Stevenson, died in 1908, and his daughter, a widow, and herself very poor, has at last succumbed to the temptings of the collectors. The books are sold, though they could be sold only over the dead body of the devoted old Frenchman to whom they were part of his life with, and part of his love for, his beloved crony Stevenson.

Bidder after bidder left the battle around the auctioneer's desk, until the general contest shrank to a duel between a wealthy sugar importer and a banker with literary tastes or the collector's passion. John S. Drum, of the Savings Union of San Francisco, was the successful man, and into his hands the eleven volumes, nearly all of them first editions, have finally passed. The man of money, coming in contact with things of artistic, literary, or antiquarian value, is often tempted to give them a more tangible and material value by means of an elaborate dress or frame. So these books are to be encased in a special box of Monterey cypress, a peculiar tree of withered limb and stunted trunk which grows in eerie fashion along the ocean headlands of this region—true witches' trees, blasted as by curses, and greatly admired by the Scotch author. Isobel Strong, widow of Joseph Strong, the artist-friend of the writer while at Samoa, is to compose an essay to accompany the set, and a skilled woman bookbinder is to give each volume a distinct and appropriate binding.

Were Stevenson alive he might smile in his impish and whimsical fashion at the picturesque enthusiasm and generosity of this literary banker of San Francisco, a blithe and careless city in which the unknown author suffered many hardships during days of ill-health and poverty. As for the letters, soiled, crumpled, faded, written on thin foreign paper, and bearing foreign stamps upon their envelopes, these, it appears, were not sold with the books, and are probably still in possession of the restaurateur's dark-skinned daughter. These epistles were written to his French friend after Stevenson had left California, and most of them begin with the salutation: "Mon Cher et Bon Ami Simoneau."

It was of Jules Simoneau that Stevenson wrote in 1879 to W. E. Henley, describing his first meeting with "a most pleasant old boy, with whom I discuss the universe and play chess daily." It was of Simoneau's little restaurant in a rude adobe building in the semi-Spanish town of Monterey that Stevenson penned this genial and luminous paragraph:—

Of all my private collection of remembered inns and restaurants—and I believe it, other things being equal, to be unrivalled—one particular house of entertainment stands forth alone. I am grateful indeed to many a swinging signboard, to many a rusty wine-bush; but not with the same kind of gratitude. Some were beautifully situated, some had an admirable table, some were the gathering places of excellent companions; but, take them for all in all, not one can be compared with Simoneau's at Monterey."

It is now some thirty-two years since Stevenson, sick and weary and penniless, fleeing from the stony streets and bleak winds of San Francisco, and after dangerous exposure in the hills, came to the sleepy little town on the great curving bay of Monterey. Its scimitar of white sands, its long, shelving beaches and benign sunshine have since then converted it into a fashionable holiday resort. In the days of the gold discovery, and, before then, during the Mexican occupation of California, Monterey enjoyed high prestige as the capital of the Pacific coast; but when this dignity was withdrawn and given to the city of Sacramento the little sea-coast town on its bay of blue waters went to sleep for some decades. Its inhabitants were chiefly Spanish and Mexican folk with an admixture of the Indian, and the indolence, glamour, and dolce far niente of the old pastoral days went on but little disturbed by the general development of California. Most of the houses in Monterey were built of adobe (a sun-dried brick), had immensely thick walls, were whitewashed within and without, and roofed with heavy red tiles of semi-cylindrical shape. This was a type of architecture introduced by the Spanish Fathers in their romantic Mission-buildings. Up and down the dusty, unpaved streets the Mexicans, with heavy sombreros, gay sashes, and wide trousers, galloped on their little mustangs yelling loudly, loafed under awnings during the noonday siesta, gambled in the saloons, and at night serenaded their women-folk with guitars, mandolins, and Spanish love-songs.

The painters of San Francisco began to haunt this idyllic spot and set its charms and beauties forth on their canvases. Jules Simoneau, described by Stevenson as "a jolly old Frenchman, the stranded, fifty-eight year old wreck of a good-hearted, dissipated, and once-wealthy Nantais tradesman," at that time made his living through his little restaurant, in which spicy and well-cooked food was furnished the townspeople, the Bohemian artists and vagabond scribes who straggled in and soon made it their headquarters. Between them and Simoneau a bluff fraternity was established, usually to the loss of the restaurant-keeper, who carried his charitable principles of credit and trust to ruinous lengths.

I have myself a pleasant and picturesque memory of cycling down the curving coast from San Francisco—inland through wheatfields, primeval redwood forests, and leagues of orchards, along dusty valley roads, and through magnificent landscapes splendoured by the brilliant Californian sunshine and skies Italian in their azure—the one hundred and forty miles to Monterey. There a few lazy fishermen lounged on the ancient wooden pier, three or four boats with ruddy-coloured lateen sails heaved at their moorings, white gulls swooped and squawked over the wide ultramarine levels of the arching bay. To south and north the purple promontories stood out into the Pacific. The old adobe Customs House, with cracked, uneven walls and weather-beaten woodwork, seemed falling into ruin. The tall flag-staff from which the American flag has been streaming since California was annexed by the Americans pointed white against the heavens. A scent of pungent Mexican cookery came from some of the open doorways of the houses. In the old Mission church the priest, opening black carved chests of Spanish oak, showed me the splendid silken vestments, silverware, monstrances, and gold-stitched processional banners of the Fathers who had founded the Mission and the town some hundred and forty years ago. Every house had its history, Spanish, Mexican, or American. A great hotel, a mile from town, had sprung up since Stevenson's day.

Jules Simoneau's restaurant, as I remember it, had changed but little since Stevenson sat at its tables and leaned against its massive walls. I believe these were still smeared with rough sketches "in the manner of Barbizon and Cernay," and the tablecloth, as in former days, was still "not spotless." But the food was as appetising and piquant as ever—a cosmopolitan menu of French, Mexican, and American dishes—the first inspired by Simoneau himself, the second by his Mexican wife, and the third by some of his patrons from the metropolis. Simoneau had grown quite old, a Prophet-like figure with a long white beard, refined features, and limpid blue eyes. It was his delight to recount how he had first found Stevenson, sick and almost starving after his disastrous experience in the foothills of the Coast Range—where two shepherds had acted as Good Samaritans—how the writer had improved under his nursing and feeding, how they had sat by the hour at the tables playing chess, discussing philosophy, literature, and the glories of France. Sometimes the old Frenchman, who was a graduate of the University of Rennes, was the victor, not only at chess, but also at the argument. At Stevenson's request he would frequently bring forth his flute and play a few of his favourite pieces. The friendship that sprang up between the pair was lasting and idyllic. In after-years Stevenson always referred to Jules Simoneau, the picturesque, kind-hearted old innkeeper of romantic Monterey, in terms of the tenderest affection. He wrote him many letters and sent him copies of nearly all his books, all affectionately inscribed.

In his extreme old age, Simoneau, who had fed and benefited so many, was himself forced as a pedlar to trudge back and forth between Monterey and Pacific Grove with his heavy can of chili-con-carne or tamales. Nevertheless the bibliophiles and Stevenson enthusiasts who sought to persuade him to sell his precious books always found him a sort of polished adamant on the subject, a patriarchal statue of faith in friendship, reverently and jealously guarding the tokens of it. Now the two friends are both in their graves, Stevenson on the hill-top at Vailima and Simoneau in the little cemetery at Monterey. And the eleven volumes, rescued at last from the rickety bamboo bookcase, the sunshine and dust, are to be clothed in splendid cerements of goldleaf and morocco and entombed in a sarcophagus of cypress-wood in the library of a San Franciscan banker.

H. S.

THE THEATRE

"MACBETH" AT HIS MAJESTY'S

A NOTABLE production and a fine spectacle. We have seen many Macbeths, from Phelps to Irving. Many conceptions of the play are possible, and consequently many renderings of the parts of Macbeth and Lady Macbeth may be defended, so long as they are consistent throughout, and do not run counter to specific character-delineation in the text.

Sir Herbert Tree's presentment is from the beginning of the play that of the subtle intriguer—of the Wolsey type—an intriguer whose martial instincts are entirely subordinated to the hypnotic suggestions of an insatiable ambition. The interlude of the witches—weird and picturesque as it is—is only the eleventh-century equivalent of hypnotic suggestion.

It is possible to contest Sir Herbert Tree's reading even in the first Act. In scene five Lady Macbeth soliloquises thus:—

Glamis thou art, and Cawdor, and shalt be What thou art promised; yet do I fear thy nature;
It is too full o' the milk of human kindness
To catch the nearest way.

There has been no sign or symptom of Sir H. Tree's Macbeth being possessed of a nature which is incommoded by the presence of a single minim of the milk of human kindness.

Even with his wife he is the coolest, most preoccupied spouse whom it is possible to imagine. He looks past her, keeping his eyes upon the throne from the moment that his great victory over the Norwegian lord suggested to him that he had qualified as occupant of the Scottish throne:—

My dearest love,
Duncan comes here to-night.
LADY M: And when goes hence?
MACB.: To-morrow as he purposes.

The concluding words, uttered with all the truculence which Sir Herbert is able to convey, leave no doubt that the iron has entered into his soul, and that murder is the occupant of his mind.

There is no trace of the bluff soldier—ambitious indeed, but needing all the leading on, all the subtle suggestions and the witchery of his wife, until the vision of an impalpable hope is transformed into a determination to wrest from fate its realisation. To seize a throne, to found a dynasty!

At last, seduced by Lady Macbeth's pleading, he exclaims:—

Bring forth men-children only;
For thy undaunted mettle should compose
Nothing but males.

If the conception of Macbeth's character when he is first presented to us does not appeal to our idea of the man whom Shakespeare intended to portray, a feeling of discomfort remains with us as the play proceeds. We can have little sympathy with the villain, who is not even a bold villain. Whether he is cowering at the sight of Banquo's ghost or moralising on the vanity of human achievements, he is a poor creature. There is really nothing virile in him. Where is the majesty of Milton's fallen archangel?—

And reassembling our afflicted Powers
Consult how we may henceforth most offend
Our Enemy, our own loss how repair,
How overcome this dire Calamity,
What reinforcement we may gain from Hope,
If not what resolution from despair.

Exactly the same want of dignity and composed resignation in impending fall, when the stake which has been boldly played for is lost, is exhibited in this reading of "Macbeth" as we witnessed in Sir H. Tree's representation of Wolsey, in which the fallen Cardinal's attitude is one of sheer—almost lachrymose—abasement—

Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition,
By that sin fell the Angels; how can man then,
The image of his Maker, hope to win by 't?

Such lines can be delivered with manly dignity, albeit with excessive bitterness. So Macbeth in the text, with intermediate lapses, keeps right royal at the close. It is not so at His Majesty's. Once the crime is done, Macbeth, who claimed little of our sympathy before, claims none of our respect to the end.

That there is much cleverness, and that there are many touches of genius, in Sir Herbert's Macbeth we gladly and readily acknowledge, but we found his performance unconvincing and disappointing.

If, however, we are obliged to give very qualified approval to the presentation of the great character in the play, what can we say of those whose adequate support, had it been forthcoming, would undoubtedly have enhanced the attributes of Sir Herbert's performance?

To cast Miss Violet Vanbrugh for the part of Lady Macbeth was to court disaster. Miss Vanbrugh is an able actress where no great call is made on her powers. It was a grievous error to think that she could supply an adequate foil for the ambition of Macbeth, inspire the actor with a semblance of enthusiasm, or present, except in the lachrymose sleep-walking scene, in which Lady Macbeth's fibre was broken and gone, any semblance of a woman who would have had power to move the Macbeth of the text as distinguished from the Macbeth of His Majesty's to "Murder most foul, as in the best it is."

Miss Vanbrugh, too, entirely failed to convey whether her ambition was for her husband to be king or for herself to be the consort of a king. In the murder scene she was for the most part inaudible beyond the first few rows of the stalls. From Macbeth's contortions and the actress's scintillating eyes and brilliant teeth it was obvious that something was going on, but what it was did not transpire beyond the distance mentioned. So far as could be conjectured, obviousness was the characteristic of Macbeth's spouse; subtlety and witchery were unplaced.

The banquet scene did not appeal to our approval. We think the disposal of the tables was an entire mistake; the one long table, which has formerly been adopted, gave an opportunity to the audience to note the horrified expression of the noble guests as Macbeth saw the vision of Banquo. The result of adopting small tables, after the custom of the modern supper-room, was that the majority of the horrified spectators had their backs turned towards the audience. There is another small detail of staging which is perhaps worthy of mention, because Sir Herbert is usually so exact as to details. At his stage banquets there is never anything to eat. Whether the guest be bluff King Hal, who is reputed to have had a capacious appetite, or voracious Scottish clansman, there is ever an unsatisfying reminiscence of Charbonnel and Walker's after having been granted an on-licence. How much more effective would have been the scene if a table, spread as described in "Ivanhoe," had appeared on the stage of His Majesty's! The total absence of all solid refreshment, and the copious libations which Sir Herbert consumed under stress of the appearance of the ghost, led to the fear that apparitions of a quantity of nasty creeping things might be added to the horror of the ghostly presence.

In this Act Sir Herbert exhibited his tour de force, and his acting was masterly and entitled to the highest praise. Miss Vanbrugh was here unequal to the very great strain placed on her powers.

One or two trivial scenes, which might very well have been condensed or omitted, led on to the sleep-walking Act, in which Miss Vanbrugh was genuinely successful and obtained the enthusiastic applause of the house.

The final scene on the battlements of Dunsinane was marred by the extraordinary unsuitability of Mr. Arthur Bouchier for the part of Macduff. In the previous scene, when the news of the slaughter of his wife and children—

All my pretty chickens and their dam
At one fell swoop—

is brought to Macduff, it is a long time before Mr. Bouchier's Macduff puts on the man and cries—

Front to front
Bring thou this fiend of Scotland and myself;
Within my sword's length set him; if he 'scape,
Heaven forgive him too.

Other Macduffs whom we have seen have been young, comely men, the type of the toughened, war-worn Scottish warrior, who have declaimed with energy and vehemence, and who in the final combat with Macbeth have "laid on" with thwacking blows. Mr. Bouchier, however, represents Macduff as a grey-headed man of more than fifty-five years of age, with long plaits of white hair like the tails of a full-bottomed wig.

When this curious and obese creature advanced to fight Macbeth a titter incontinently rippled through the house. In Shakespeare's text Macbeth and Macduff exeunt fighting. Had the stage directions been adhered to, the audience would have been spared a really ludicrous encounter.

There was no laying-on of broadswords, but a sort of wrestling-match, in which first Macbeth and then Macduff gained apparently easy successes, meanwhile using bare hands to wrest away sharpened weapons with no visible hurt. Finally, daggers having been resorted to, the venerable Macduff, by a process which was not intelligible to the audience, manages to do deathly hurt to vigorous Macbeth, who falls and expires without a speech. When Macduff, depicted by Mr. Bouchier as an enfeebled bon-vivant, placed a leg terminating in a foot, both unwholesomely enlarged, on Macbeth's digestive organs, the audience could no longer contain themselves, but frankly laughed.

The three witches were excellent, Mr. A. E. George giving a fine piece of character-acting.

The piece is beautifully staged, and when it has been condensed into a representation of less than four and a quarter hours, and with some modifications in the cast, it ought to hold the boards of His Majesty's for many months.

C. C.

"THE CONCERT" AT THE DUKE OF YORK'S

MR. CHARLES FROHMAN has reopened the Duke of York's Theatre a month too soon, not with an original play by one of our well-known dramatists, or with the work of an English dramatist hitherto unproduced, but with, as usual, an adaptation. This time it is one by Leo Dietrichstein of a German play by Herman Bahr. A good deal has been written about Mr. Bahr's play, which has been even more successful in America than it was in Germany. We were frequently informed that it contained a very original series of comedy situations and some brilliant studies of character. We hoped that this was true. We looked forward to an evening which should not be wasted. We told ourselves, optimistically enough, that because it had been adapted by an American it need not necessarily be as foolish as other plays which had undergone similar treatment, and that, although it had enjoyed great success in American theatres, it need not be wholly bad.

We found that it was, as a matter of fact, better than any other American adaptation that we have seen, but that it was to a very great extent unoriginal. We found that it owed its main plot entirely to an English comedy called "A Sense of Humour," which was, we discover, copyrighted some years ago at the Duke of York's Theatre, and put on later at The Playhouse. It is true that there is no copyright in ideas. The same handful of plots has been retold a thousand times upon the stage. The treatment, the wit, the neatness of construction have frequently caused us to forget the age and hackneyed condition of the imbroglia. In "The Concert," however, the imitation is so close as almost to amount to plagiarism, and it is unfortunate that the play should have been produced in London when "A Sense of Humour" is still fresh in the memory of critics and playgoers.

In the English play there were two couples. A man of something over forty, who resented his increasing grey hairs and suffered from the artistic temperament, was married to a charmingly capable and shrewd woman. They were entirely devoted, and the man would have been lost without his wife who was paradoxically, but humanly enough, a mother to him. His friend, a soldier, if we remember rightly, and a very honourable, self-satisfied, excellent person, was married to a woman of a somewhat flamboyant temperament, who desired not only to be loved, but to be told and retold that she was loved, in season and out of it. This foursome was thrown together in a cottage in Scotland, near a trout-stream, and when the man of forty-something plunged into a harmless flirtation with his friend's wife merely in order to prove to himself that he had not yet lost his power of attraction, his shrewd wife, finding that the other husband was stirred to rapid jealousy, set to work to kill the flirtation by pretending to have fallen in love with the unerring husband. It was a set to partners, a lesson to flirtatious husbands. After a good deal of incident, conducted with much ingenuity and wit, the curtain fell on two reunited couples.

Now for "The Concert." Here we find that the man of something over forty not only has the artistic temperament, but is a celebrated pianist with long hair, which is, when necessary, dyed by his wife; that the wife is in the same way a mother to him, and that they are altogether devoted. One of the pianist's chief stocks-in-trade is his power of attracting women. He has a house in Central Park West, New York, and a bungalow in the Catskill Mountains, near a trout-stream. Once a year or so he leaves New York, in order ostensibly to give a concert elsewhere, so that he may retire, with a bewitched pupil, to the bungalow for a week or two and make sure of his attraction. On the rise of the curtain Gabor Arany, the pianist, who talks the broken English of the Dago who is also a Jew, is about to leave home to give one of these Catskill concerts, assisted by a young flamboyant person named Flora Dallas, who is married to an honourable, self-satisfied, excellent doctor, whom she finds just too honourable, self-satisfied, and excellent. We hear something of Arany's playing ("off"), and we see a good deal too much of his chorus of adoring pupils. We are not, however, unfortunately, able to believe for a single instant either in his attractiveness or his piano-playing. To us this Arany is merely a sensualistic outsider in whom it is impossible to conceive any sane woman taking interest. However, having lied to his wife, he goes, leaving his musical comedy chorus of noisy admirers distracted. One of them, a Miss Eva Wharton, knows that Mrs. Dallas is to meet him at a certain station, and that they are to leave the town for the Catskills together. Jealousy being a peculiarly unpleasant form of madness, this young woman has written a letter to the Doctor stating the facts, and this brings the Doctor into the story. He sees Mrs. Arany, reads the letter to her, and finally agrees to her plan of going to the bungalow to pretend that they, like Arany and the foolish wife, are "soul-mates."

Having brought the doctor's pretty, babbling wife to his queerly-decorated bungalow, in which the chief article of furniture is a dummy grand piano, Arany instantly proceeds to make hot love to her. The girl, who seems to have thought that she had come merely to listen to a long-drawn-out recital of Chopin, Grieg, Rubinstein, and Schumann, is frightened, and makes a fluttering exit into her bedroom to dress for the occasion. Arany flings himself at the piano, and his faithful and expert ghost duly performs upon another behind the scenes. Then, to his immense annoyance, his wife and the doctor arrive. There are further lies and subterfuges, and the girl in her terror jumps out of window to be brought in by her husband. Dallas then comes forward, just as the Major had done in "A Sense of Humour," and, to the horror and chagrin of the erring couple, discloses his adoration for Mrs. Arany, and their plan to throw in their lot together. Point for point, as several other criticisms have shown, the situation, and in some instances the very dialogue, is the same as in the English play.

In the third Act Mr. Herman Bahr continues his imitation; but he makes one great effort to be original, and succeeds. In a very admirable scene between Arany and his wife he makes the pianist explain himself and his temperament, and for a quarter of an hour the play takes a new and excellent turn. The whole of this particular scene is conceived and carried out on the best comedy lines. The man's confession of the weaknesses in which he has revelled since early youth is very true and human, and his utter inability to see himself even for a day without his wife's sympathy and motherly management is not without a note of genuine feeling and sincerity. Then the play slips into a listless, mechanical, and uninteresting finale, leaving the Arany alone to kiss again with tears, and the curtain falls on the self-effacing wife putting dye on her husband's shaggy locks.

In the expert and intelligent hands of Miss Irene Vanbrugh the part of Mrs. Arany was, of course, safe. All the same she brought in a false note of conscious martyrdom at the end when she ought to have shown an emotional delight and joy at the success of her plan. We should like to have seen her dyeing the egregious pianist's hair with enthusiasm, and not with a patient shrug and a rather tired sigh. As Arany Mr. Henry Ainley played noisily, eagerly, and boisterously, and gave a close though lumbering imitation of Mr. Boucicault, who produced the play. His accent was consistent, and he was the Jew-Dago to the life, but he lacked that indefinable touch of magnetism which lifts acting out of the ordinary dead level of excellence. He could not make us believe in his genius or his influence over women. The only true piece of acting in the play was provided by Mr. G. W. Anson, as the caretaker of the bungalow. His hard-drinking, gouty, Irish reprobate was a very fine piece of work. Miss May Blaney put several clever little touches into the part of Mr. Dallas, but failed to strike the right comedy note; she was altogether too peevish. Miss Florence Edney, like Mr. Ainley, was content to give a careful imitation of Mr. Boucicault. The effect was curious. Nevertheless, it was to Miss Edney, as the pianist's secretary, to whom all the laughter in the first Act was due. Miss Marguerite Leslie as the jealous pupil looked extremely pretty, and played with great enthusiasm and feeling. She has the makings of a good actress. The rest of the pupils did not seem to mean anything they said and did.

The impression left by the play was that Mr. Herman Bahr is a very capable dramatist, who would have made an infinitely better piece of work of "The Concert" if he had relied on his own inventiveness, and that, being as it is, he would have stood a greater chance of success if the play were not handicapped by the miscasting which is generally to be found in a Frohman production.

WHAT IS IMMORTALITY IN ART?

MANY a vainglorious pæan, many a defiant challenge, have been evoked by the defeats Time has suffered at the hands of Art. Poets and painters alike have dwelt with complacency on the broken teeth, the blunted scythe, and the battered condition of the Arch-Destroyer and his weapons on emerging from these unsuccessful encounters. Indeed, ever since literature became conscious of herself and her past, the phenomenon of literary survival has attracted the attention of the reflective artist. The distinction first clearly made by Thucydides between works which compete for an immediate reward and those designed to be a possession for ever has been approved by writers of every subsequent age, and has come to occupy a prominent place among the conceptions governing our estimate of the relative merits of works of art. No question in Art is more often or more keenly debated than the prospects of our distinguished contemporaries of withstanding Time's assault. No opinions are considered so heterodox as those which dispute the validity of this test, for among the various likes and dislikes peculiar to every individual, this is the one standard to which most of us are disposed to refer as to something superior to our own private sympathies and antipathies.

Now, though we all use the words ephemeral and immortal with the greatest ease and confidence, if we pause to examine them more closely we shall not find their exact meaning so easy to discover, nor shall we find it such a simple problem as might appear to define what precisely we affirm when we say that a work of art is, or is not, of the enduring sort.

On the one hand, it is quite clear that we do not use the words in the strict sense in which we employ them when we discuss whether the soul is immortal. We do not suppose the possibility of there being something indestructible in the nature of a great poem, as a material atom is indestructible; and though the followers of Dr. Pangloss might maintain that a great poem would survive even if the sole record of it were lost in the desert sands or dropped in mid-ocean, yet this belief can only be described as a pleasing fancy, for we have only too copious evidence to show that not only some, but the bulk, of the great works of antiquity are lost to the world for ever. In short, we know the certainty of the paradox that most of the deathless art of Hellas has utterly and irretrievably perished.

On the other hand, we do not simply use the word immortal in a loose way as an emphatic substitute for long-lived, as we use infinite for very great, or perfect for very good. We do not say, for instance, of a work of art: "This is a good piece of work, made of sound material, and may last for a hundred years, whereas that is of inferior quality and workmanship and will hardly last fifty." We admit no relatives into our judgment, but we make a strict dichotomy of all works of art into two classes—those of the quality to last for ever and those which are not.

It is clear, then, that we do use the word immortal in its full sense of living for ever, though this everlasting life is strictly conditioned by certain material circumstances. The life of a work of art consists in its being studied and admired. It cannot be studied or admired if every material record of it has been destroyed. We cannot, for instance, wax enthusiastic over the moulding of the arms of the Melian Venus, for the simple reason that they do not exist.

But a more serious difficulty awaits us when we come to inquire into the nature of this continuous life implied by the word immortal. As to its cause most people are agreed. Those works survive which give expression to emotions not specially of this or of that period, but of all times; to ideals of beauty, not local or contemporary, but universal. Now, it might reasonably be inferred that what appeals strongly to men at all times will appeal to all men at any one time. But if we turn to concrete examples we shall find that such is not the case. Can it be said of the works of Homer, Æschylus, Dante, or Milton that they possess a universal or even a wide appeal to-day? Each of these poets, it is true, continues to attract a small number of earnest students, but so do postage-stamps, chess problems, old pewter, Greek syntax, the language of the Hittites, the chemical constituents of the stellar bodies, and a host of other subjects of no importance to the world at large. Are we, then, to class the world's interest in the great dead masters with that of the faddist and the specialist? Is the whole value of Homer to the world simply the sum of his values to the historian, the grammarian, and the professor of ancient literature, or is there not a residue, more important than any of these special interests, by virtue of which Homer lives even for those who have never construed a line of Greek? Such a view certainly accords better with the language we habitually use in reference to him. Yet how are we to define this life of a great poet apart from the interest he arouses in those immediately acquainted with his work?

In order to do so we must conceive of Art not as a series of individual achievements, but as a cumulative product of humanity. Its growth, like that of a tree, is continuous and interdependent in all its parts, and is of two kinds and in two directions. There is the growth outwards and in the same plane, and the growth upwards towards new and higher planes. The outward growth terminates in the leaves, which endure for a season and then fall off to make room for their successors. The upward growth endures as long as the life of the whole tree, for the topmost twig of the sapling is destined to mature into the stem which supports and feeds the foliage of ensuing seasons. The ephemeral art of any period may be compared to the leaves which perish. In the early stages of growth they are few in number, but later they often spring in such abundance as to obscure from view the stem from which they grow. The art we call classic may be compared in its first appearance to the topmost twig which presses onwards into new planes, and is at first scarcely distinguishable from the growth which perishes, but will, in course of time, become the stem which sustains and nourishes the art of ensuing ages. As the leaves are fed by the sap they draw from the stem, so contemporary art is fed by the inspiration it draws from the classics; and as the stem breathes air and sunlight through the innumerable pores of its leaves, so the classics continue to breathe vicariously the applause and admiration of the people through the innumerable manifestations of ephemeral art which they generate.

Let us take an extreme instance of this phenomenon, showing how the work of a recondite master may penetrate even to those who inhabit the outermost skirts of the kingdom of Art. In the ranks of the great musicians there is no name so unsubstantial as that of Bach, and none whose greatness is so vaguely understood. His written works for the most part exceed the limit of obscurity which even professed music-lovers can support; while, for the multitude, they have as little interest as a Greek lexicon or a table of logarithms, and are much more actively disagreeable. Now let us imagine ourselves assisting at a musical performance of a purely popular character, either secular or religious, at a place of public resort. Shall we hear any of the forty-eight preludes and fugues, any of the cantatas and chorales upon which the fame of this composer rests? By no means. But we shall hear, in the first place, an instrument tuned according to the system initiated by Bach—a system as important in the development of music as the inventions of Newton in the development of mechanics. We shall hear melodies, not borrowed from Bach, but possibly from Mozart, Mendelssohn, Chopin, or another whose inventive faculty has been stimulated by one or other of the great composers, and it would be hard to name any of the latter who has not acknowledged the debt he owed to the study of Bach.

If it be denied that there is any connection between the works of our popular song composers and the work of Bach and his successors, we would ask, Where was the popular ballad composer in all the centuries preceding the advent of the great musical pioneers? How else can we explain the exuberant output of ephemeral music so characteristic of the age in which we live? If, on the other hand, it be urged that the results of exploiting and popularising the musical discoveries of the great masters are disgusting to the cultivated musical sense, we reply that this is not the point at issue; and whether such exploitation is desirable or not is a matter of opinion. For our part, we think that what gives innocent enjoyment to a large number of persons is, ipso facto, justified. If the melody of Mendelssohn's Spring Song fails to reach the populace in the native purity of its original setting, by all means let it reach them in the form of "Put me on an island where the girls are few." That it does reach them in this form is a fact which demonstrates the abiding quality of Mendelssohn's melody and the full content of the word immortal.

These facts are more clearly demonstrable if we turn from the arts to the sciences. The average individual who travels by railroad has probably never heard the name of Euclides of Alexandria, much less of Pythagoras of Samos, yet who can maintain that he is not subject to the influence of their thought, since his daily life is modified in a hundred particulars by a system which has been rendered possible by practical application of the abstract principles they were the first to enunciate?

In the light of these considerations, it will be seen that the destruction of so many masterpieces of antiquity, which we deplore, is more apparent than real; for that which is by nature immortal lives even when it is no longer manifest to the sense. Consider the fate of Sappho. Of her actual work only a few fragments survive. But when we reflect that she was the first great lyric poet of Europe; that she was read and studied by all the poets of Greece and Rome, from whose literature ours is an offshoot, we cannot resist the conclusion that her poems (though no copy of them exists) do none the less live more vigorously to-day than the works of many writers whose books may be procured by the hundred.

J. R.

NIKKO

It is difficult to take a neutral attitude toward the temples at Nikko, although indifference is said to be the "highest" of Japanese attitudes; I mean there are only two ways—like or dislike—for their barbarous splendour in gold and red lacquer deprived of the inspiration of the imagination and melancholy, definite to the limit. And it altogether depends on one's mood; if a man's large stomach is well-filled (also his purse), their despotic wealth would not be too overwhelming, and he might even be disposed to sing their eternal beauty as the ultimate achievement of human endeavour. I believe I have been sometimes in such a state myself. But the pessimistic mind, critical even where criticism is not called for, skipping all the physical expression for the spiritual communication, will find Nikko a sad dilettantism of art, at the best a mere apology of a squandering mind; there is nothing more unhappy than wastefulness in the world of art. It is not the real Japanese mind, I think, to build a house for the dead, as I know that it goes straight towards associating the dead with trees, mountains, water, winds, shadows, deer, ravens, foxes, wolves, and bears, and uses to leave them to the care of the sun and moon; indeed, it was the unlettered samurai mind to build such temples as I see at this Nikko, afraid to return to the gray elements and wishing to find a shelter even after death in materialism. Or it might be more true to say that it originated in the complete surrender to Buddhism; and it may not be too much to say that India begins right here from Nikko, in the same sense that Tokyo of the present age is spiritually a part of London or New York. We have only a few pages in the whole Japanese history where we are perfectly independent.

Whether it is fortunate or not, my recent evolution of mind is that I have ceased to see the fact itself, and what I am glad to indulge in is the reflection of its psychological relation with other facts; how thankful I am for the gate-tower carved with phoenixes and peonies, the large pagoda in red and gold, now loitering round the holy precincts of the Nikko temples, since the very fact of their existence makes, through the virtue of contrast, the cryptomerias and mountains greener, the waters and skies bluer, and besides, the human soul intenser. I am happy in my coming to Nikko in the month of May when the beauty of Nature quickens itself from the pain of passing Spring, and with the sunlight that overflows from the bosom of hope; your appreciation of Nikko would not be perfect till you see the wealth and grandeur of Nature's greenness; it is the beauty of cryptomerias and waters rather than that of the temples. And you will feel encouraged when you observe the real fact, how even the barbarity of human work can calm down before Nature, and happier still how they can form a good friendship with one another for creating the one perfect art known as Nikko. I am glad to see the proof of power of a Japanese landscape artist who could use his art on a large scale as I see it here, not merely in a small city garden; my mind, which was slightly upset from the artistic confusion of the temples belonging to Iyeyasu the Great, soon recovered its original serenity in seeing the most beautiful arrangement of temples of Iyemitsu, the Third Shogun of the Tokugawa family, with the hills and trees, quite apart from his grandfather's; what a gentle feeling of solemnity, as old as that of a star, what a quiet and golden splendour here! The arrangement might be compared with the feminine beauty of gems most carefully set. When I looked upon the temples from the Mitarashiya, or the "House where you wash your Honourable Hands," below, they impressed my mind as if a house of dream built by the Dragon Kings underneath the seas, that I and you often see on the Japanese fan; I looked down, when I stood by the gate tower of the Niwo gods, over that water-fountain below, where the spirits of poesy were seen floating on the sunlight; it was natural to become a passionate adorer of the Nature of May here like Basho, who wrote in his sixteen syllable hokku :—

Ah, how sublime—

The green leaves, the young leaves,
In the light of the sun!

I very well understand how Iyeyasu, the Supreme Highness, Lord of the East, the Great Incarnation, escaped the temple of gold and red lacquer, and wished to sleep in a hill behind, in silence and shadow; now I am climbing up the long and high steps to make him my obeisance where a hundred large cryptomerias stand reverent as sentinels. What peace! What broke the silence was the sudden voice of water and the sutra-reading of priests; a moment ago the crows in threes, twos, and fours flew away and dropped into the Unseen just like the human mortals who have only to stay here for a little while. Under my feet I found a small hairy caterpillar also climbing up the stone steps like myself. Oh! tell me who art thou? And what difference is there between us human beings and the caterpillar? Are we not caterpillars who may live a little longer? But I tell you that is a difference of no particular value. I met with a group of Western tourists in the middle of the steps, who hurried down; they set my mind thinking on the anti-Christian terrorism of Iyeyasu and other princes, the Japanese Neroes, awful and glorious. Is it not strange that they are shaking hands in sleep with the Westerners whom they hated with all their hearts?

The words of my friend when I bade farewell to him in New York suddenly returned to me when now the weather has changed, and even rain has begun to fall; my friend artist who had stayed and sketched here long ago said to me: "There were many idols of the Jizo god, the guardian deity of children, standing by the Daiyagawa River of Nikko; I loved them, particularly one called the Father or Mother, from its large size, whom I sketched most humbly. You see that the Nantai Mountain appears and disappears as if mist or mirage, right behind these idols; the place is poetical. But they seemed to be having a disagreeable time of it, all overgrown as they were with moss, and even with the dirty pieces of paper stuck by all sorts of pilgrims as a sign of their call. Once when I hurried down from Chuzenji and passed by them, I caught rain and wind; alas! those kind deities were terribly wet, like myself. I pitied them; I cannot forget their sad sight even to-day; however, the Jizo idol under the rain is a good subject of art. There are few countries where rain falls as in Japan. The dear idols must be wet under the rain even now while you and I talk right here."

When I reached my hotel and sat myself on the cushion, and after a while began to smoke, my mind roamed leisurely from the idols under the rains to the man wet through by the rains of failure; and now it reflected on this and that, and then it recalled that and this. Oh, how can I forget the very words of that reporter of one San Francisco paper who mystified, startled, and shocked me well by his ignorance or wisdom seven years ago? I said to him on being asked why I returned home that I was going to hunt after the Nirvana; he looked up with a half-humorous smile and said, "That so! But let me ask you with pardon, are you not rather too late in the season for that?"

It seems that it is too late now even in Japan to get the Nirvana, as that San Francisco reporter said. How can I get it, the capital-lettered Nirvana, even at Nikko, when I could not find it in London and New York? I laughed on my silliness of thought that I might be able, if the place were changed, to discover it. Oh, my soul, I wonder when it will wiser grow?

YONE NOGUCHI.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE POLICY OF RUSSIA IN EASTERN ASIA.

DURING the past three hundred years Russian enterprise in the Far East has met with many checks; but if the progress of a nation is to be measured in territorial expansion, then her policy has been justified over and over again. The Cossacks have achieved for Russia what the sea-rovers have accomplished for England. Towards the end of the fifteenth century, under Yermak, they crossed the Urals, and their progress eastwards, though gradual, was persistent. One hundred and fifty years later they had established themselves on the Pacific coast, having traversed a distance of six thousand miles of territory, which presented hardships and perils unequalled in any other part of the world. Hitherto they had confined their explorations to the north of the Yablonoi Mountains; but as soon as reports reached them concerning the wealth of the peoples who dwelt in the south expeditions were despatched in the direction of the Amur. It was in 1643 that the first Cossack band succeeded in penetrating as far as the banks of that river. Other expeditions followed in its wake, and as these were invariably successful in their conflicts with the Manchus, a number of Cossack posts and forts were established in the newly-exploited territories along the banks of the Upper Amur and in the neighbouring regions of Northern Manchuria. At this time the Manchus were engaged in a dynastic struggle with China, and consequently the Russians found the moment opportune for advance. Later, however, the Manchus rallied their forces, and operating from Aigun destroyed all the Russian settlements. They crossed the Amur river, and in 1683 besieged and captured the stockaded town of Albazin, where the remnants of the Cossack forces had assembled. But the Russian advance had only received a temporary check. It was not to be expected that the bold Cossacks, who had braved the dangers and hardships of numerous expeditions having for their object the penetration of the alluring country along the banks of the Amur, would beat an ignominious retreat. Albazin was recaptured and fortified, and from time to time frontier fighting took place. It was not until 1689 that an attempt was made to settle the outstanding differences between Russia and China by means of clearly-defined diplomacy. In that year the Treaty of Nertchinsk was concluded between the two countries, and in the light of subsequent events it is of interest to note that its object was "to repress the insolence of certain rascals who, making hunting incursions beyond the limits of their territories, pillage, murder, and stir up trouble and quarrels, as well as to determine clearly and distinctly the boundaries of the two Empires of China and of Muscovy." It was stipulated that the boundaries between the two Empires should be the rivers Argun and Gorbitza, and the Yablonoi Mountains from the source of the latter river to the sea. China thus retained both banks of the Amur and gained a distinct diplomatic victory.

For nearly two hundred years there was peace along the frontier. Meanwhile Russian navigators had made important discoveries in the Pacific. Naval posts were established in Kamchatka and far south along the coast-line of that region at present known as the Maritime Province, but which was then part of Manchuria. As a result of Mouravieff's memorable voyage along the Amur in May of 1858—a voyage which revealed the knowledge that there was water communication to the Pacific Coast—the Treaty of Aigun was concluded. Some doubt has been thrown on the validity of this document, owing to the fact that it was the result of negotiations with local officials and not with the Chinese Government. The Treaty gave to Russia the whole of the region between the Yablonoi Mountains and the northern bank of the Amur, while the Ussuri territory was placed under the joint jurisdiction of both countries. The French text declared that the joint jurisdiction should only last until such time as the frontier should be delimited; but the Chinese version did not include any such stipulation. A month later Russia hastened to secure a delimitation of her frontiers in a form the legality of which could not be questioned. A supplementary treaty concluded at Peking finally established the Russian right to the north bank of the Amur and to the Ussuri territory. "Henceforth the eastern frontier of the two countries shall extend from the confluence of the Shilka and Erguné (Argun) rivers down the Amur to its junction with the Ussuri river. The country to the north belongs to Russia, and that of the south as far as the mouth of the Ussuri, to China."

By a stroke of the pen the whole of the territory north of the Amur thus became indisputably Russian, while the Maritime Province extending southwards as far as the borders of Korea also passed into Russian hands. Moreover, Russian diplomacy had gained advantages beyond those set forth in the supplementary Treaty. Among other things, the original Aigun Treaty stipulated that the Amur, the Sungari, and the Ussuri rivers should not be opened to the navigation of any but Russian and Chinese vessels. This provision was not included in the supplementary Treaty, but as Russia maintains that the Aigun Treaty is a legal document the clause remains in operation to this day. At the close of the recent war the Japanese sought to obtain some modification; but their representations were not entertained. Thus as early as 1858 Russia obtained an important concession in Manchuria. For, while the Amur and the Ussuri may, perhaps, be termed boundary rivers, it must not be forgotten that the Sungari is a waterway of the first importance in Northern Manchuria. It was upon the banks of the Sungari that Russia, when in later years her position in Manchuria was strengthened by the construction of the Chinese Eastern Railway, built the important junction city of Harbin.

The policy of Russia during the last two hundred years has been a consistent one. In this respect it has also been conspicuous. For, whereas the scattered territorial possessions of other nations in the Far East bear evidence rather of the political expediency of the moment than of settled and far-seeing policy, Russia can proudly boast of an Empire consolidated and continuous, an Empire that stretches from West to East, and which casts its shadows far away to the south until, as it were, they are reflected in the warm waters of the Pacific. Russia has undeniably won her right to this position. Her people have penetrated into a land of which it could well be said that it was a No Man's Land. There they have planted the Russian flag, and the territory has become indisputably Russian. As far as the Eastern limits of these vast territories were concerned, Japan was, if anything, in a better position to effect a conquest. But Japan chose the parochial policy of isolation, whereas the aim of Russia was essentially a proud and an imperial one. It was the advance of Russia more than of any other Power that told Japan that she could not be in the world while refusing to be of the world. Recent events were clearly foreshadowed in the bygone years. In 1858-59 a Russian Admiral obtained from Korea the coaling-station of Port Hamilton, and demanded from China the cession of Manchuria. While he acted without official sanction, and, therefore, did not obtain the frank support of his Government, there was no doubt that he pointed the way to ultimate Russian policy in the Far East. When, several years later, the Russians plainly proposed that the island of Tsushima, which lies off the very gates of Japan, should be ceded; when, twelve years afterwards, Japan was compelled to relinquish sovereignty in Saghalien in exchange for the useless Kurile Islands, the eyes of the Japanese people were opened, and they saw for the first time the true significance of their position on the map of the world. And when, a score or more years later, Russia realised her dream of reaching the Pacific through Manchuria, Japan was ready to wage war with her.

Large as was Japan's gain in that successful campaign, it was insignificant when we compare it with all that she had lost during her years of slumber. On the few occasions that she had emerged from her isolation—those occasions when her marauders sailed to the coast of Fokien—she, too, like the Russians, went southward, and was checked by the Chinese as the Russians were checked by the Manchus. Had she chosen to turn northwards she might have been mistress of half that territory known to-day as the Siberian Continent, and there she might have met and fought the Russians instead of meeting and fighting them in Manchuria as she was destined to do centuries later. She awakened in time to check Russia, but the check she administered was not by any means the first which Russia had received in her progress southward. History shows that although Russia may be checked she will never be thwarted. She has gone from west to east, and she will go from north to south. And Russian policy has been justified again and again. While she has experienced severe reverses from time to time, never has she been thrown back on her original position. Even her defeats have ended in gain, and after each of these she has waited her opportunity and prepared her way for yet another step forward. Her advance is slow, but it is as sure as fate.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

ONE of the most unpleasant developments ever associated with motoring has now reached a stage which, without exaggeration of language, has become intolerable to the community. We refer, of course, to the widespread and unpracticed use of using warning signals of the most annoying and disgusting description. It is a development for two reasons: first, because of the discomforts of life for the motorists; secondly, because it indicates the utter selfishness of the motorists for the feelings of others. If attained by a people or a class may be measured by the amount of consideration they display for the feelings of others, which is a fair and reasonable criterion, then it must be admitted that a large section of the motorists of this country is not far removed from barbarism. It might be thought that the horrible noises emitted by many of the modern warning devices would be sufficiently unpleasant to the users themselves to ensure their discontinuance; but—and this is the most unpleasant part of it—the nuisance, like that of dust-raising, is comparatively non-existent to the occupants of the cars which cause it. It is to be hoped that the recent pronunciamiento of the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, although it savours more of an appeal ad misericordiam than of a stern determination to repress the evil by force if necessary, will bring the offending motorists to their senses and enable them to reform in time to avoid legislation which will otherwise be peremptorily demanded by practically every section of the community.

The discussion on the science of aviation which has taken place in the mathematical and engineering sections of the British Association will not afford much encouragement either to the numerous inventors who are engaged in attempts to solve the problem of automatic stability for aeroplanes or to those who are waiting for this desideratum before joining the ranks of flying men. Professor Petavel not only doubted the possibility of obtaining automatic stability, but even its desirability. His opinion was that any mechanism designed to secure such stability would be dangerous in other ways. Sir William White thought likewise, stating that he had an instinctive distrust of automatic appliances, and preferred to trust to human power, directed by a strong will and careful observation. This is precisely

SIX-CYLINDER PERFECTION.

POINTS to look for in your new

SIX-CYLINDER CAR:

ABSOLUTE RELIABILITY under all conditions,
ECONOMY OF UPKEEP, and SMOOTHNESS OF RUNNING
at high and low speeds.

ALL THESE are combined in the new six-cylinder
18-22 h.p.

BELSIZE CARS

—the result of years of experience.

Price £395.

CATALOGUE AND ALL INFORMATION FREE.

BELSIZE MOTORS, LTD.,
CLAYTON,
MANCHESTER.

LONDON { J. KEELE, LTD., 72, NEW BOND STREET, W.
BELSIZE LONDON AGENCY, LIMITED, DEAN'S YARD
CAVENDISH SQUARE, W.

EXPORT:
A. W. ROSLINGTON, LLOYD'S AVENUE HOUSE, LONDON, E.C.

why the art of flying is not and never will be for the multitude, but only for the chosen few.

Motor-cycling speed-records continue to fall with remarkable regularity. Last week A. J. Moorhouse, riding a 7-h.p. twin-cylinder "Indian" machine, fitted with "Continental" tyres, established fresh world's records at Brooklands for the fifty miles and the hour. The fifty miles were covered in 40 min. 59 sec., whilst in the hour the distance done was 70 miles 1,388 yards, which beats Collier's recent record by more than two miles. It is worthy of note that "Continental" seem to be almost invariably associated with motor-cycling records this season.

In view of the race for the British International Cup, which takes place this week in Long Island Sound, it is interesting to recall the history of the event from the time of its inauguration in 1903. In that year Napier I. was the winner; in 1904 Napier Minor was first past the winning-post, although, owing to a mistake on the part of the English officials, it was disqualified on a technicality; in 1905 Napier II. beat all competitors, whilst in 1906 the Yarrow-Napier secured first place. At this stage the Napier firm ceased to build boats for the competition, and it is significant to note that since then Great Britain has not once won the Cup. In 1907 and 1908 it was secured by the American-built Dixie boats; in 1909 there was no contest, and in 1910 a Dixie again proved the winner. It is a pity that for the 1911 contest there is again no Napier amongst the British representatives.

Since writing the above news is to hand to the effect that the first of the three races for the Cup has taken place and resulted in an easy win for the American hydroplane Dixie IV., the Duke of Westminster's hydroplane Pioneer II. being second, and half a mile behind. The other American boats were hopelessly beaten, but it seems a foregone conclusion that the Dixie will secure the rubber, and again leave America in possession of the Cup.

During August the A.A. and M.U. established still another membership record, no fewer than 1,748 new names being added to the roll. This brings the total number of members of this popular organisation to over 35,000. The work done by the Association on behalf of its members is also constantly increasing. During the past four weeks the touring department has issued four hundred triptyques to members, also two hundred certificates of fitness of cars, and 230 drivers' certificates, in accordance with the regulations governing international passes. In addition it has undertaken the shipping of over two hundred members' cars to British and foreign ports.

The "Victor Vest" appears definitely to have established itself amongst motorists all over the country as the most handy, efficient, and inexpensive tyre-saving device hitherto placed on the market. The writer recently had an opportunity of inspecting a heap of testimonials received within the last week or two from all parts of the kingdom, and all of them referred in terms of satisfaction to the great economies effected by using the Vests, more especially in covers which were practically worn-out. Those motorists who are still unfamiliar with the device are advised to write the makers, the Challenge Rubber Mills, Eagle Wharf Road, London, N., for a sample, which will be sent free on application.

Writing of the "Napier 15," Mr. Charles Jarrott says:—"I have now run my 15h.p. Napier over 13,000 miles, and for my own satisfaction I sent the car to my works for examination. I had the engine pulled to pieces, and found its condition was splendid, the only parts requiring renewal being the differential brake-shoes. The car has never given me any trouble, and I have had no mechanical breakdown of any sort. It is running even better to-day than when I first had it." It must be very gratifying to Messrs. Edge to receive such a report from so eminent an expert as Mr. Jarrott, whose experience and knowledge of cars of all makes must be almost unique.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE position grows no clearer. There is very little chance of any improvement until the Morocco question is out of the way. All the banks are cutting down loans, and for many weeks past no one who is not financially strong has been able to obtain an advance from the London banks. As soon as any margin has run off the stock is sold, and the perpetual closing of accounts has made the past four weeks distressing to everybody. For the past month Berlin has been stronger than Paris, but during the last few days all the banks have been turning stock into cash and pinching the borrowers. We have not had such an anxious week for many years past. Every big stockbroker has been wondering whether his clients are good or not. Every big banker has been hoping that his efforts to cut down loans and collect cash will be successful. It has been a rich man's panic. All the poor little weak bulls have long since been shaken out, and now we are witnessing a shake-out of the big people, who are not accustomed to such overbearing proceedings. Of course Morocco is the bugbear. The diplomats declare that peace is assured. The great foreign banking-houses are not scared, and until Monday none of them sold any foreign bonds. But the stockbrokers and commission-houses have been in deadly fear. They would permit no speculation. The account in Paris was so small as to be not worth considering. But in Berlin a large bull account in Yankees and Canadas had been built up, and this has been liquidated.

The collapse in Kaffirs is merely the result of one disappointment on the top of another. France did not like the retirement of Marston Beit and Co., the increase in capital of the Rand Mines, the arrangement with the Central Mining. Indeed, the past two years of Rand finance has disgusted Paris, and she has been selling wherever she has had the chance. Then last week came the astounding East Rand circular. The news that there was something wrong with East Rand has been known for many weeks, but the company has always denied the rumour. Nevertheless the shares have been sold. It is the last blow. The markets will take many months to recover. Mining shareholders now see that they are left every time. The investors get first news, and when they have sold then the poor shareholder is told. It is disgraceful. The Jumbo, the East Rand, and the Prestea Block A are scandals that will require a great deal of explanation.

MONEY.—Naturally lenders of money do not wish to part with their cash at the present moment. There is such an ample supply that rates keep low, and once Morocco is out of the way there will be so great a glut of unemployed money that rates must fall, even with the autumn crop to finance in Canada and the States. The cotton crop in the States and Egypt will require a large amount of money. Egypt may surprise us with a seven million crop, which, at $18, means forty million sterling. We know that the Southern States will turn out fourteen million bales, so on all sides the Lancashire mill-owners will be well supplied. But the larger the crop the more urgent the need for money. However, given peace, we must see weak rates for many months.

FOREIGNERS have at last given way. They have kept as stiff as steel through the whole of the crisis, but just as they appeared advancing to a close selling set in, and on Monday all Foreigners were decidedly weak. If they fall any lower the investor will obtain a splendid chance. There is really very little fear of war, but the banks who were so badly hit over the Argentine loan have had to fall back upon their last line of defence—the gilt-edged international stocks.

HOME RAILS continue to sag away under persistent stories of further strikes. None of these will come to anything, for the men saw in the last strike that public opinion was dead against them. Not even a Trades Union is strong enough to stand against the feeling of a united country. Leaders may talk, but they will do no more. The strike traffics were a stupendous eye-opener and disappointed everybody. We did not expect anything so serious. Nevertheless, I still say buy Home Rails, for, whatever happens, we are unlikely to get the chance again of buying gilt-edged stocks to pay us 5 per cent. — unless, of course, we get war. London and North Western at to-day's prices are too cheap. Lancashire and Yorkshire must benefit by the large cotton crop, and both Great Central and Great Western will be gaining in traffics week by week without any proportionate increase in expenses.

YANKEES are still sold, and by now every bull in Amsterdam, Paris, and Berlin must have been shaken out. The Labour troubles are exaggerated; the Union people would like to see a strike, for they are confident of victory; but they do not believe one possible. Little Northerns keep steady, and are worth buying. Indeed, these and Unions are the cheapest stocks in the market. The big houses are buying, and do not view the slump with any fear at all. The rich make money in days like these, for they have the courage to buy and the money to pay with.

CANADAS are evidently being turned out wholesale by the Berlin people, and the Britisher sits still, for he got into Can. Pacs. very much lower down, and holds as an investment. The line is doing well. The stories about poor wheat and great damage are much exaggerated. At the same time, I think we shall see lower prices for Canadas. They are still too high as compared with Unions.

RUBBER.—The little rubber spurt appears to have died down, and the buying from the East soon stopped. Had rubber shares fallen to slump prices one could have understood why big financiers and gamblers should go into the markets, but at present prices all the leading shares pay just round 10 per cent., with practically no chance of increased dividends. The position does not favour a bull campaign, and I was astonished to see such sturdy buying, though all the House noticed that it came from only one firm.

OIL.—We need not discuss the oil market. It has almost vanished, but a few people are buying Spies, which are not overpriced. But Shells have been sold steadily. A good many people wish they could sell Maikop shares, but the dealers will not put any on their books.

KAFFIRS.—We shall not get over the last Rand shock for a few weeks, if not longer. It scared out genuine holders all over the Continent and also in London. It is a scandal of the first magnitude. But East Rands to-day, after allowing for amortisation, do not pay $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and they are dear at anything over 3. There are very few cheap shares in the Kaffir market, and even if there were it is not the time to buy them.

RHODESIANS have steadied a little and look a shade harder. But there is no future in this market until the political atmosphere clears. Who wants to gamble in mines when the nations are at loggerheads?

THE JUNGLE has received the coup de grâce. The Prestea Block A has always been considered the best mine in West Africa—the one mine which had a future; now we find it just as bad as the rest.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

1215—1911

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In its economic aspect the year 1215 is on a parallel with the present year. In the former time the needs of the Crown, raised to a breaking-point of extravagance (tyrannous form of taxation) through the personal greed of a monarch and the cost of a disastrous war (Bouvines), provoked a revolt on the part of the whole nation. Had the nation remained true to precedent by meekly submitting to the absolute demands of the Crown, it would have been brought face to face with ruin, for the end would have been national bankruptcy. Precedent, therefore, was made subject to exigence, and the hitherto absolute monarchical form of the Crown's executive became, by common agreement or statute, limited.

Let us now look at 1911. The needs of the Crown, in this instance raised to a breaking-point of extravagance (tyrannous form of taxation), not through the personal greed of a monarch, nor through the cost of a disastrous war, but purely through common ideals of common needs, have provoked revolt on the part of the individual. The extravagance of 1215 caused a national form of distress, whilst our present extravagance is causing us individual distress. In the latter case, however, the individual element, wholly ignoring (apart from impotent forms of protest) the demands made by exigence, remained true to precedent; that is to say, we have had a revolution, in this instance, which cannot bring anything else than ruin to the nation. There is a Crown anachronism somewhere. How, for instance, are you going to combine the procedure from precedent in the one case with the procedure from exigence in the other case? If exigence demanded limit to the Crown's power of 1215, surely procedure from precedent of that limit ought to have given rise to results other than those which spell absolute disaster. If, as this Government assumes, exigence demands the passage of such an Act as their Parliament Act, precedent should discover urgent cause for the same. But precedent, wherever a cause of absolute or arbitrary forms of executive procedure has happened in history, has always been contrary to the demands of exigence. How, indeed, is the precedent upon which 1911 executive procedure is supposed to be grounded to be justified? Not, as we have just seen, by exigence in any shape or form. For instance, there must, as the events of 1215 proved, be a limit to necessity, otherwise there can be no possible reasons for the present Government's Act of absolute coercion. Exigence does not call for Crown, that is to say, for insular, forms of financial imposition or taxation. Exigence is crying aloud—louder maybe than in 1215—for a Crown form of relief from taxation. In other words, exigence is demanding legislative forms of retrenchment; it is asking for the very economic buttress (the Stalwart policy or Crown form of limit) which the said Act destroys. Apart from such a ground of precedent, exigence can only be allied to irresponsible forms of demand—that is to say, to forms which end by demolishing their own sources of supply.

No country can have a long existence where absolute forms of taxation prevail. Either it must revolt from or succumb to the strain thus placed upon it. Thus England revolted from the strain of the year 1215. What is she doing under the strain of the present year? Calmly taking it as a matter of course. But will she survive such fatuous irresponsibility? No; for such an attitude is contrary to the great law which governs all things. Absolute forms of demand must be allied to absolute forms of supply, otherwise they are doomed to perish. Upon what, then, does the life of a nation rest? Obviously, upon the conservation of its means of supply; never by the exhaustion of those means—that is to say, by any form of Liberalism. A nation that possesses no national form of conservatism is a doomed nation. Had the people, and not merely a party of stalwarts, followed precedent during the late great controversy, England would have been saved. As it is, her present policy, or apathy—which is it?—rings in her doom. She has failed to follow precedent, for there is no precedent which justifies suicide, whether on the part of an individual or a nation.

Thus we see the ultimate difference between the two crises. In 1215 the country was rescued from ruin through meeting the demands of exigence. In this year of grace 1911 she has been handed over to destruction through scorning the demands of exigence. The only form of opposition which can modify such a fate is a national form of opposition.—Your obedient servant,

H. C. DANIEL

Cambridge, September 4, 1911.

CRITICISM AND CONDUCT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Of all forms of expression, autobiography is of most value to those who do not know themselves, and for this reason alone your reviewer of "My Life" should have hesitated before judging Wagner as he has done in your current issue. He read the book, he says, "with feelings of shame, dismay, humiliation," and instead of expressing some sort of gratitude to one who, by evoking those feelings, was assisting him to further knowledge of himself, he speaks of his "indescribable loathing for the unmanly creature who could bring himself to transcribe" the incidents there related. One further example will suffice to explain his general attitude. He is reminded of what Macaulay said of Boswell:—"Everything which another man would have hidden, everything the publication of which would have made another man go and hang himself, that he has told about himself. He has used many people ill, but assuredly he has used nobody so ill as himself."

Sir, I affirm, without any hesitation, that if ever a man revealed his limitations, Macaulay revealed his in that passage. The obvious relish with which in a certain much-lauded essay he disposed of such poor game as Montgomery should alone compel critics to examine the foundations of his judgment. With what greater insight did Stevenson (quoted by another reviewer in your columns) say: "I mean to read Boswell now until the day I die."

I myself ought to be thankful to your reviewer for having warned me to this expression of feeling. When shall we all learn to approach our subjects, and above all, as in this case of Wagner, the subject of genius with a greater sense of our own ignorance? When shall we awake to possibilities in regard to our own conduct before judging that of others? When, in fine, shall we realise that all the qualities we find in others are no less in ourselves?

This letter I am aware is an example of "Satan rebuking Sin." But while I have no fault to find with the form of your reviewer's criticism, I want him to shift his point of view; to get farther back; to examine more deeply the motives for human action. His feelings of "indescribable loathing for unmanly creatures" will then change. He will be more ready then to wonder than to condemn. When Christ said in regard to conduct: "Judge not;" when He asked who dare "throw the first stone," it was because He knew that men are not free.—Yours, &c.,

H. SAVAGE.

Wimbledon.

THE "QUARTERLY REVIEW" AND SIGNED ARTICLES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I see that in your issue of August 12th you say that Mr. Arthur Symons was the first contributor to the Quarterly Review who signed his name. This is incorrect. The first signatures were those of two foreigners—M. F. Brunetière and Dr. Julius Rodenberg—who contributed two articles on the Boer War to the Quarterly Review for April, 1900. The first English author who signed was Mr. Swinburne, who published an article on Dickens in the Quarterly Review for July, 1902. The first number in which the practice became general was published in January, 1903. The first article signed by Mr. Arthur Symons did not appear till July, 1905.—Yours faithfully,

EDITOR "QUARTERLY REVIEW."

50A, Albemarle-street, London, W., August 31, 1911.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some of the questions raised in "J. R.'s" letter in your current issue can scarcely be handled with profit in any space which you are likely to accord to the subject. On one point, however, I wish at once to record my emphatic dissent from your correspondent. He says: "What the cause of reform most needs at the present moment is to be discussed." The question has been constantly discussed (and at times very actively) for the past forty years or more. If "J. R." will call at the office of the Simplified Spelling Society, I can show him a huge scrap-book containing the newspaper discussions of the past three years, to which must, of course, be added the discussions in books, pamphlets, and magazine articles. I can also show him about a dozen elaborate schemes of reform which were before the world thirty years ago, and half a dozen schemes which have reached me in manuscript within the past few days. What discussion can do in the way of merely ventilating the question has been thoroughly done.

Of course I am not denying that further discussion, and a great deal of it, must precede the victory of a reformed spelling. My point is that before further discussion can be of any use there must be something definite and tangible to discuss. At present this is not the case. Reformers do not know precisely what they are fighting for, conservatives have only the vaguest, and in most cases preposterously wrong, ideas of what they are opposing. The brain reels at the thought of the amount of pure nonsense which is talked on this topic, mainly because there is no definite question before the House. That, I admit, is the fault of my own party—the party of innovation. The burden of proof lies on us. I hope it will not be long before we face that responsibility, and undertake to demonstrate to the country not only the advantages which might, could, would, or should ensue from reform in general, but the advantages which must ensue from some definite scheme of reform.

"J. R." proposes that the Simplified Spelling Society should "publish a list of a score or so of words mis-spelt according to the orthodox system, with the proposed corrections." This is precisely what the Simplified Spelling Board of New York has been doing for years, and it has certainly led to a relaxation of the "glacial rigidity" of spelling in America, which, however, never was very glacial. Experience has shown us that this policy is absolutely futile here. No editors or publishers will adopt a few amendments, however obviously reasonable, and whatever the weight of scholarly authority behind them. They (the editors and publishers) very pertinently ask, "Why upset current usage for what is, on the face of it, such a very small gain?" When we reply "Ah, but this is only the thin edge of the wedge," their answer is: "Before admitting the thin end of the wedge, we should like to see the thick end," and as yet we have no thick end to show.

One word as to whether reform is likely to come from below or from above. My prophecy is that it will come from below, in the sense that those who are actively concerned in the education of the children of the more or less unlettered classes will be the first to agitate for it on a large scale. Certainly it will not be imposed by authority from above until there is a clamant and irrepressible demand for it from below. The literary classes, as a whole, will hang back as long as they can; but when it is realised that reform will practically add a year to the time available for education in the life of all coming generations of English-speaking children, besides immensely enhancing the efficiency of English as a world-speech, I believe their opposition will be swept away in a rush of national feeling, and the existing spelling (while it will be easily readable to all) will be practised only by a few of the dilettantes who would like, if they dared, to return to knee-breeches, hair-powder, and frilled shirts.—Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM ARCHER.

27, Fitzroy-square, W.C., September 5th, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- The Bees.* By M. Ellen Thonger. Chapman and Hall. 6s.
There was a Widow. By Mary E. Mann. Methuen and Co. 6s.
The Kingdoms of the World. By Lloyd Osbourne. Methuen and Co. 6s.
The Cardinal. By Newton V. Stewart. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

PERIODICALS

- St. Nicholas*; The Empire Review; The Educational Times; The Land Union Journal; The Bookseller; The School World; St. George's Magazine; Blackwood's Magazine; The Parsi, Bombay; The Wednesday Review; The Idler, N.Y.; Deutsche Rundschau; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; La Revue; University Correspondent; Publishers' Circular; Book Monthly; Peru To-Day; Le Nord Illustré, Lille; The Young Liberal; Golden Sunbeams; Dawn of Day; Tourist Magazine, N.Y.; The Bibelot.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND ... THROUGH CANADA. ...

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON,
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 15, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE TO SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA.

JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year,
according
to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,

NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
125 London Wall Street, E.C. 4, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1830).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

Illustrated Booklet on application to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.;

or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17.	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £8 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

COORDITE RIFLES, 400, 500, 600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 347	Shorter Reviews 357
At Night 348	Fiction 359
On Learning by Heart ... 348	Some New French Books 360
Cameron and the Stag ... 349	Across the Solent 361
Japanese Poetry 350	Sir Richard Burton 362
"Red Ruin and the 'Making' of the Laws"	The Magazines..... 364
—I. 352	M. Jules Ferry and War 365
A Summer Holiday 353	Autumn Novels 366
Reviews:—	Art Exhibitions 366
The Poet and the Age—	Imperial and Foreign
II. 354	Affairs 367
Mr. George Moore's Play 356	Motoring and Aviation ... 369
Reminiscences 357	In the Temple of Mammon 370
	Books Received 371

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

As a journal which has editorially been very friendly to German aspirations, and very tolerant towards claims for new areas of expansion for the activities of growing population, we break a silence which we have purposely maintained for many weeks past. Nurtured in an atmosphere of diplomacy, we are well aware that the business of the negotiator is to haggle over conditions and to tire out the mind of the public before a conclusion on the inevitable lines of compromise is arrived at. At the same time it is reasonable to seek to discover some evidence of bona fides on the part of a bargainer. On a general view of the course of the negotiations between M. Cambon and Herr Kiderlen-Waechter, we have no hesitation in saying that the German Foreign Minister has displayed extraordinary effrontery in the attitude he has adopted. He has alienated all sympathies from Germany, and he is tending to the goal, where the ruin of his country will be consummated. Europe never has been and never will be under the domination of the sergeant-major. Germany has attained a great position in Europe; it would be well if she concerned herself with the problem of how she is going to preserve it.

Peace and the quiet, restful hour will soon be quite unknown if science gives so freely and continuously from her store of wonders. Already we are worried by the telephone while dressing at morn or dining at eve; we cross the wide oceans with the "wireless" snapping out the latest events every hour, and the daily paper, printed on board, at our elbow; and now comes news of an invention known as the "aerophone," by the use of which every man may be his own telephone exchange—every man, that is, who cares to carry about with him a pocket apparatus. We are not clear as to its methods; shall we each have a number fixed to our back, or shall we only be "tuned," as it were, to the call of a friend? Will mysterious voices break in upon our repose when some wakeful worry in another town desires to relieve the monotony of the night? There are unpleasant possibilities about this machine. The lover and his lass, desirous of whispering sweet vanities apart from a rude, unsympathetic world, will seek seclusion in vain; the after-dinner slumberers at the club will be roused by intrusive inquiries from the other side of the county; the most inconvenient air-waves will be trapped and carried to precisely the wrong persons. There is one gleam of hope: so much unparliamentary language will be employed by poor, irritated, rest-seeking mortals that the use of this aid to human intercourse will probably be prohibited by law.

Another aspect of modern scientific development is suggested to us by the announcement of new short railways, worked on the ingenious screw system, to connect Tube stations which are at present a few yards apart—such as the Museum and Holborn. Somebody has been computing that we lose by unnecessary walking through subways and passages three minutes on each journey, which totals for four hundred millions of passengers to twenty million hours every year. Only when we have lost the use of our lower limbs and become unable even to walk across the street, shall we wake up to find that speed is not everything, pleasant though it be to rush through a dozen appointments at different places in record time. Leisure, too, has its charms, and even idleness has its wisdom—not the idleness of the striker or the vagabond, but the tranquil do-nothing hour enjoyed the more thoroughly for the consciousness of work finished, whether that work be labour of the head or of the hands. Statistics can prove anything, but we really do not want to be reduced to the state of children-in-arms and carried across the road. Why not let the winged minute fly away empty of all but the smoke of a cigarette now and then? And, inter alia, how did we manage before there were Tubes at all?

It is just as well, in view of the comments that have been made in various quarters upon the decline of English brawn and brain, that within the last few days three events in the world of sport have fallen to England's share. Burgess, after many trials, has succeeded in swimming across the Channel, accomplishing the feat well under the twenty-four hours, thus bracketing himself with the famous name of Captain Webb. No one will grudge him the honour and applause which naturally fall to his share, and we trust he will not lower the quality of his achievement by pandering to the desires of music-hall proprietors. Fame thus adulterated becomes of a very poor standard indeed, however fine the original effort may have been. The Channel has also been defied in another way; a Westmorland vicar, the Rev. S. Swann, has sculled across in three hours and fifty minutes—a very creditable record. And Barry has easily retained the championship of England in his sculling match against Fogwell of New South Wales, on the historic Thames course. If only Arnst will come to reasonable terms and meet Barry, there is some reason to hope that England may presently hold the sculling championship of the world. At any rate, there is no need to despond while such men are eager to pit themselves against wind and tide and each other, whether for substantial remuneration or not. The best point about it is that these things are generally done for the simple sporting instinct—the desire to excel.

AT NIGHT

A face looked in as here I sat,
And beckoned me with blessed eyes,
And took me in a swinging boat
Away across the gentle skies.

We wandered past the town asleep,
In gold oblivion peaceful grown,
We wandered past the waters deep
That softly made a silver moan.

Beneath the stars we journeyed on,
Beneath the stars in blazing crowds,
That blue and white and crimson shone
And past grey castles in the clouds.

At last it stopped and let me peep,
And through a window I could see,
My love was smiling in her sleep—
And then this room came back to me.

A. HUGH FISHER.

ON LEARNING BY HEART

ONE wonders sometimes whether it is in danger of becoming a lost art; whether the generation of to-day gets passages of its favourite authors "by heart," as the preceding generations were wont to do. Perhaps the shadow of the schoolmaster has come between, and the remembered weariness of acquiring many a woeful length of penalised pentameters overnight, the effort of which marred our dreams and embittered the morning sunlight, inculcated a distaste for all such exercises. For it can scarcely be reckoned as other than a wrong that ere yet the heart had thrilled to the beauty of the lines the poor head must labour to retain—

The quality of mercy is not strained, or the stranger accents of Purpureus veluti cum flos succisus aratro

Languescit moriens, lassove papavera collo
Demisere caput, pluvia cum forte gravantur.

The marvel is that John Ruskin lived to bless those dreary Sabbaths when, from pitiless necessity, he mastered the Psalms, even to the one hundred and nineteenth, "which was, to my child's mind, chiefly repulsive." That his heart did survive this sore discipline of the head says more for the sublime quality of Hebrew poetry than the disquisitions of many commentators.

Is not the suggestion of a task the very negation of the gentle idea conveyed by the phrase "learning by heart"? Surely, if it meant anything at all at its birth, it denoted that charmed and almost unconscious acquisition which is the helpless tribute of the brain to the heart's dominion. So we have stood, breathless and enchained, on one of those little tentative hills that mark the gateway to the Welsh Highlands, at gaze towards the far horizon-line of dim peaks and shoulders, dreamily opalescent in the waning sunlight. Long after the quick sweep of the eye has flashed the impression to the brain, the heart, unspeakably moved, has kept us lingering, while the good servant brain has added perception to perception and detail to detail, until the whole picture is so deeply and utterly engraved as to be unforgettable. We have learnt it "by heart."

Let that serve for a picturesque example, but, in good sooth, is not a very great part of our learning, the fruits of which give us pleasure and spiritual benefit in after-days, such learning "by heart"? It is but the generous device of Natura benigna whereby without effort we gather store of golden memories to stay us in less fortunate hours, and compact that mysterious inner self of beauty and wisdom borrowed of the universe. For there, once garnered, the harvest abides, touched with the immortality of the soul by whose agency it was gathered and assimilated. What the head learns the head may forget, or later argument may destroy; but what is learnt by heart none can take away, neither can the years dim.

If we cease, then, to learn our authors by heart, it argues that literature is losing its power over us. We have escaped the accusation of being bookworms to flirt shamelessly as book-butterflies. We mount the fashionable blush for enthusiasm, dropping the reference flippantly, "What is it old Quelque-chose says? something or other, you know," with what secret loss of self-respect! But, after all, is it not often a mask and an affectation? We come back to this, that in learning by heart there is an element of unconsciousness and inevitability which to elude means little less than Robinson Crusoe's island. Assuming any real secret love of literature, any appreciation of the sublime, the beautiful, the true, it will be difficult to read at all without memory paying its toll to the heart. Even old Samuel Pepys, who lived mainly for the pleasure of the day, and who appears a very Philistine as regards Shakespeare's acted plays—even he fell victim to the heart's learning. "The Taming of the Shrew" is "a silly play and an old one," "The Tempest" "has no great art," and "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is "the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life," but one Sunday evening sees him by the fireside "getting a speech out of Hamlett, 'to bee or not to bee,' without book." And we conclude that he simply couldn't help himself there.

And who of us, if he were caught in confessional mood, would not be able to recall passage after passage, and verse after verse—probably a most inconsequent, incongruous lot, for the heart is no respecter of consistency—as his witness to the heart-learning of years? There would be, perhaps, those stinging sentences of Carlyle, "The situation that has not its Duty, its Ideal, was never yet occupied by man . . ." melting into the sheer music of—

Dulce ridentem Lalagen amabo.
Dulce loquentem.

There would be epigrams from Meredith, aphorisms from Ruskin, paradoxes from Chesterton, word-pictures from Walter Pater, sublime flights from St. Paul, more than one "speech out of Hamlett," out of "The Merchant of Venice," out of "Richard II.," and stray poems and fragments of Homer, of Dante, of Browning, of Henley, of Keats—all in delicious confusion. How have we acquired all these? We hardly know. Few of them, in all probability, by the actual effort to memorise. They met us in the first instance with such an irresistible assault that they left their impression for ever, or they charmed us so sweetly that we returned to them, re-experienced them, mouthed them, sitting alone, again and again for sheer joy of the sound until they were transferred to us utterly and "without book."

Let us, in fretful humour, wish our aching head clear of all the dubious wisdom we have gleaned so arduously by virtue of fierce concentration and the midnight oil; but if we are honest and duly grateful we shall add a secret codicil in favour of the treasures we have "learnt by heart."

CAMERON AND THE STAG

BY A FOLLOWER

I LOVE to go to Scotland and see those two wily animals a Scotchman and a stag trying to circumvent one another over a lovely stretch of moor and forest, amidst the blue-coated mountains down which the lively burns flow sparkling in the autumn sun. I always feel grateful to Cameron and the stag for allowing me to intrude on their privacy and to form one of the party, but I never yet have succeeded in getting over the horrid feeling that I am de trop, and am regarded as an outsider both by the stag and by the stalker. The one great lesson to be learnt from deer-stalking is self-reliance; and as all great men, when asked to what they attribute their success in life, invariably reply, "At an early age my mother taught me to depend on myself," no doubt if Scotland ever produces a great man he will answer the same question thus: "At an early age I went deer-stalking, and thus acquired the great lesson of self-reliance at the hands of Cameron and the stag." In fact, everything in deer-stalking depends on oneself. The evening before your host says to you: "You will go stalking to-morrow, starting at 7 a.m. sharp on the Far Beat." At 6.30 you bestir yourself, with difficulty and discomfort, and sit down to a terribly severe breakfast. Promptly at seven the two other stalkers and yourself enter a comfortable motor and are conveyed to the loch at the foot of the hills. Here I meet Cameron for the first time; a venerable old gentleman, with a reddish beard and a still more reddish nose. He regards me with a look of good-natured contempt. His prolonged experience has taught him at what range it will be safe to intrust you with a shot; and he can also tell how much a dead stag will be worth to him, and how much you are good for if the day is blank. If he sees you are a perfect gentleman, and likely to fee a blank day almost as well as you will fee a royal, why then in all human probability you will enjoy your blank day and not the royal. This is only reasonable, for a Cameron's limbs are no longer as lithe as they were forty years ago, and a long day among the hills tires the old man almost as much as it wearies me, straight from a sedentary life in London.

Now we set off—or rather, to use a time-honoured phrase so beloved by the newspapers when reporting the last hours of a condemned criminal, "a procession was then formed"—Cameron in front, myself next, and then the young gillie carrying my double-barrelled rifle loaded to the brim with split bullets, a cartridge-bag containing a really stupendous luncheon and a flask of whisky, which Cameron and the gillie take it in turns to carry throughout the day. For two hours we climb the hills in silence, except for the short pants which will escape me in spite of my utmost endeavours to play the rôle of a Spartan sportsman. At every little burn, much to my surprise, both Cameron and the gillie stop and take a long draught of the pure water, lying on their faces and lapping it up like benighted Arabs lost in the desert. I feel this must be the thing to do, and follow suit. For a long time I cannot understand why Cameron stops to have a drink at every burn, but during the luncheon-hour the mystery was revealed when I offered the old man some whisky. He drank it neat, saying, "I niver like to mix anything with whisky, but I take a swill at the burn after I've drunk it." Now during the whole of the day the old man's mind was concentrated on the whisky-flask, and thus, whenever he came to a burn he stopped automatically to have a drink, trying to imagine he had swallowed a "wee drappie" the moment before. After two hours' walking up stony paths, through peat-bogs, and over the heather at a fearful pace, we halt just under the crest of the highest hill in the neighbourhood, and Cameron flings himself down, remarking "There be no need to hurry. I've brought you along doucely because the basties will n'er be oot yet." I am indeed glad of the rest. For the next half-hour I learn all about Cameron—his past life and that of his mother, father, sisters, brothers, and cousins. Then I listen to a long dissertation on the reason for the stags deteriorating so much since Cameron's youth. I learn the only remedies which will restore the monarch of the glen to his former size; I also hear a good many queer stories of stalkers he has taken out, of shots missed at point-blank range, of killing hinds in the winter, of the sport on neighbouring estates, and of the prospects of the forthcoming gillies' ball. Then, having regained our breath, we climb to the top of the hill, lie on our stomachs, and Cameron takes out his old telescope, which looks as if it has just been salvaged from the wreck of the Royal George. I take out my glasses and also survey the surrounding hills, and seeing nothing venture the harmless remark, "Well, there's nothing in sight on that hill anyway." Old Cameron looks up. "Nothing in sight!" he almost gasps, "why man it's alive with basties!" From this moment I relapse into complete silence, feeling completely snubbed. A minute later old Cameron adds, "But there neo be a stag amongst 'em, they be all hinds." When my eyes become accustomed to the light, I see that the old man is indeed correct. I had no idea until this moment that so many hinds existed in Scotland. The hills on every side are alive with them.

Finally, after a further careful examination through his battered old telescope, Cameron announces the discovery of three stags amongst the hinds on a hill which looks to me terribly steep, and an awful distance away. We descend into the valley in the old order, Cameron leading, then myself, and, finally, the gillie, with the rifle still tucked away in its case. We make a long detour, cross several burns, climb several small hills, and then descend again, trying to get within shot without giving the stags our wind. But it is hopeless; wherever we move those miserable hinds seem to spot us. They keep dancing round us in circles, and appear to know every inch of the ground as well as Cameron, for they anticipate every move he makes with marvellous intelligence. No sooner do we leave a hill than they climb up the other side, and seem to jeer at us as we ascend the next. Sometimes they approach, sometimes they retire, and again they trot all round us in a circle in which we occupy much the same relative position as the head of John the Baptist in Miss Maud Allan's Salome Dance. At other moments we are made to feel like Cabinet Ministers trying to reach the House of Commons through a Suffragette demonstration. These wretched hinds are determined to give due warning to the three stags, who so far have continued to graze, taking not the slightest notice of our approach. Finally, after walking for at least an hour and a half, Cameron suddenly throws himself at full length on the ground, and I follow suit. "There, just over the brow," he gasps. The gillie takes the rifle from its case and presses it into my trembling hands. I feel that at last my hour has come. I creep forward on my stomach through a peat-bog, which beslimes me all over, until I feel the damp on my knees and elbows. But I care not; I am going to have a shot and bring home a magnificent specimen of the monarch of the glen. I reach the crest and look over. There they are standing, head in air, gazing in our direction only 150 yards away. I lay my rifle on a piece of heather to obtain a sure aim, and am about to align my eye with the sight, when up trots a whole mass of hinds and away go the three stags with their lady-friends. In my disgust I fire a shot at random at fully 350 yards, but without result. The glens re-echo for miles around with the report. Everywhere on the distant hills the hinds pick up their heels and trot out of bounds into a neighbouring property. They display remarkable intelligence, for no sooner are they 20 yards over the border than they halt and continue to feed, taking no further interest in our movements, for they know they are safe.

Now I am thoroughly worn out, and venture to remark to Cameron, "I think it's about time for lunch." With this observation he finds no fault and leads the way to some downy grass near a lovely burn, where I open my bag and for the next half-hour enjoy an excellent meal amidst gorgeous surroundings, forgetting all about my disappointment, and not caring two straws for the finest royal in Scotland. Then I produce my whisky-flask, and, after taking a very small quantity, hand over the remainder to Cameron and the gillie, whose faces express an almost divine goodwill towards the world in general. Then an intense desire to sleep creeps over me, and soon I am dozing. In my dreams I am in Paradise; huge stags are walking towards me instead of away from me, presenting their majestic flanks for the easiest of shots. I see no hinds, for they have disappeared altogether, and I go on slaughtering the monarchs of the glen by the score. The number of points on their heads make them look more like trees than deer. I am happy and contented, and only wish to be left alone; but suddenly from my reverie I am aroused by Cameron whispering in my ear, "It's time to be moving." I arise with a groan, and, inwardly cursing, follow the old man up a fearful hill from which we survey the landscape. The hinds have gone, but on a high ridge, separated from us by a valley, we see several stags grazing peacefully. Cameron suggests we should stalk them. Of course I acquiesce, all the time hoping against hope that they will scoot into a neighbouring property and allow me to go home in peace. But they do not. Again I follow Cameron, learning the great lesson of self-reliance by doing everything I am told. For another hour we crawl along until I am so weary that I feel I shall collapse. But at length the quarry is within reach, the gun is handed to me, and this time they are so close that I cannot miss. I select the one which looks to be the biggest and pull the trigger. The report echoes through the neighbouring hills, and then, to my infinite surprise, not the stag I have aimed at but another—a smaller one leaps into the air and drops within a few yards. I dash forward, exclaiming in my joy, "It's a monster, is it not, Cameron?" "A monster!" exclaims the old man, in a tone of mingled contempt and disgust; "Why, man, you'll niver kill a worst!"

On our way home Cameron says to me, "Why did you shoot the wee bastie and let the big stag goo?" But I keep my awful secret to myself, and the old man is still wondering.

JAPANESE POETRY

THERE is a subtle charm about Japanese poetry peculiarly its own. I recall with pleasure the unforgettable hours I spent in reading Mr. Yone Noguchi's "The Pilgrimage." I was compelled, through sheer delight, to read the two volumes at a sitting. It is true that Mr. Noguchi is very much under the influence of Walt Whitman, and it has left its impress upon his work; but that only tends to heighten the effect of the purely Japanese element. A brief, haunting phrase of Mr. Noguchi has far more charm than an imitation of his American master's torrential manner. Japan has no need to imitate as far as her poetry is concerned. In the old days one of the characteristics of that country's poetry was its almost entire freedom from outside influences, not even excepting that of China, from whom, in other directions, she borrowed so much. I have mentioned Mr. Yone Noguchi because his work forms an excellent starting-point for the study of Japanese poetry. Too long we have been forced to read translations from the Japanese poets by well-meaning people who insist on rhymes, apparently ignorant of the fact that there is no rhymed poetry in the original. Mr. Noguchi, writing in English, has given us for the first time an intimate knowledge of the very spirit of Japanese poetry. When a book is written on comparative poetry, that of Japan will take a very high place.

It is far easier to describe what Japanese poetry is not, than what it actually is. To begin with, there are no Japanese epics, such as the Iliad and the Odyssey, the "Kalevala," and the "Mahabharata," and their phrase naga-uta ("long poetry") is to us a misnomer, for they have no really long poems. Philosophy, religion, satire are not themes for the Japanese poet; he even goes so far as to consider war no fit subject for a song.

Where, then, is the charm and wonder of Japan's Pegasus? The real genius is to be found in the tanka, a poem of five lines or phrases and thirty-one syllables. In many ways the tanka shows far more limitation than an English sonnet, and our verbose poets would do well to practise a form that engenders suppression and delicately gives suggestion the supreme place. It is surprising what music and sentiment are expressed within these limits. The tanka is certainly brief in form, but it frequently suggests, with haunting insistency, that the fragment really has no end, when imagination seizes it and turns it into a thousand thousand lines. The tanka belongs as much to Japan as Mount Fuji itself. One cannot regard it without thinking that a Japanese poet must essentially have all the finer instincts of an artist. In him the two arts seem inseparable. He must convey in five lines, in the most felicitous language at his disposal, the idea he wishes to express. That he does so with extraordinary success is beyond dispute. These brief poems are wonderfully characteristic of the Japanese people. They have such a love for little things. The same love that delights in carving a netsuke, the small button on a Japanese tobacco-pouch, or the fashioning of a miniature garden in a space no bigger than a soup-plate is part of the same subtle genius.

There is an even more Lilliputian form of verse. It is called the hokku, and contains only seventeen syllables, such as, "What I saw as a fallen blossom returning to the branch, lo! it was a butterfly." Butterflies were no mere flying insects in Old Japan. The sight of such a brightly-coloured creature heralded the approach of some dear friend. On one occasion great clouds of butterflies were thought to be the souls of an army.

Those who are familiar with the "Hyakunin-isshu" ("Single Verses by a Hundred People"), written before the time of the Norman Conquest, will recognise that much of the old Japanese poetry depended on dexterous punning and the use of "pivot" and "pillow" words. The art was practised, not with the idea of provoking laughter, which was the aim of Thomas Hood, but rather with the idea of winning quiet admiration for a clever and subtle verbal ornament. No translation can do full justice to this phase of Japanese poetry; but the following tanka, by Yasuhide Bunya, will perhaps give some idea of their word-play:—

The mountain wind in autumn time
Is well called "hurricane";
It hurries canes and twigs along,
And whirls them o'er the plain
To scatter them again.

The cleverness of this verse lies in the fact that yama kaze ("mountain wind") is written with two characters. When these characters are combined they form the word arashi ("hurricane"). Clever as these "pillow" and "pivot" words were, they were used but sparingly by the poets of the classical period, to be revived again in a later age when their extravagant use is to be condemned as a verbal display that quite overshadowed the spirit of the poetry itself.

There are Japanese love poems, but they are very different from those with which we are familiar. The tiresome habit of enumerating a woman's charms, either briefly or at length, is happily an impossibility in the tanka. There is nothing approaching the sensuousness of a Swinburne or a Rossetti in Japanese poetry, but the sentiments are gentle and pleasing nevertheless. No doubt there were love-lorn poets in Japan, as in every other country, poets who possibly felt quite passionately on the subject, but into their poetry the fire is ghostly rather than human, always polite and delicate. What could be more naïve and dainty than the following song from the "Flower Dance" of Bingo province?—

If you want to meet me, love,
Only we twain,
Come to the gate, love,
Sunshine or rain;
And if people pry,
Say that you came, love,
To watch who went by.

If you want to meet me, love,
Only you and I,
Come to the pine tree, love,
Clouds or clear sky;
Stand among the spikelets, love,
And if folks ask why,
Say that you came, love,
To catch a butterfly.

Or again, the following tanka by the eleventh-century official Michimasa:

If we could meet in privacy,
Where no one else could see,
Softly I'd whisper in thy ear
This little word from me—
I'm dying, love, for thee.

There is a good deal more ingenuity in this poem than would appear on the surface. It was addressed to the Princess, and though omoi-taenamu may be correctly translated, "I'm dying, love, for thee," it may also mean, "I shall forget about you." The poem was purposely written with a double meaning, in case it miscarried and fell into the hands of the palace guards.

Charming as are many of the Japanese love poems, they are not so beautiful or so distinguished as those describing some mood, some scene from Nature, for the Japanese poets are essentially Nature poets. Our National Anthem is very far from being poetry. Here is Japan's, literally rendered into English:—"May our Lord's Empire live through a thousand ages, till tiny pebbles grow into giant boulders covered with emerald mosses." It is based on an ancient song mentioned in the "Kokinshu," and, like all ancient songs in praise of kingship, expresses a desire for an Emperor whose very descent from the Sun shall baffle Death, one who shall live and rule past mortal reckoning. There is a symbolic meaning attached to Japanese rocks and stones, closely associated with Buddhism. They represent something more than mere stolidity; they represent prayers. It is the Nature poems of Japan that are supremely beautiful, those describing plum and cherry blossom, moonlight on a river, the flight of a heron, the murmuring song of a blue pine, or the white foam of a wave. The best of those poems are touched with pathos. Here is one by Isé:—

Cold as the wind of early Spring,
Chilling the buds that still lie sheathed
In their brown armour, with its sting
And the bare branches withering—
So seems the human heart to me!
Cold as the March wind's bitterness;
I am alone, none comes to see
Or cheer me in these days of stress.

I often think of that twelfth-century Japanese recluse Chōmei. He lived in a little mountain hut far away from City Royal, and there he read and played upon the biwa, went for walks in the vicinity, picking flowers and fruit and branches of maple-leaves, which he set before the Lord Buddha as thankofferings. Chōmei was a true lover of Nature. He understood all her many moods. In the Spring he gazed upon "the festoons of the wistaria, fine to see as purple clouds." In the west wind he heard the song of birds, and when autumn came he saw the gold colouring of the trees, while the piling and vanishing of snow caused him to think of "the ever waxing and waning volume of the world's sinfulness." He wrote in his beautiful "Hōjōki," the most tender and haunting autobiography in the Japanese language: "All the joy of my existence is concentrated around the pillow which giveth me nightly rest; all the hope of my days I find in the beauties of Nature that ever please my eyes." He loved Nature so well that he would fain have taken all the colour and perfume of her flowers through death and into the life beyond. That is what he meant when he wrote—

Alas! the moonlight
Behind the hill is hidden
In gloom and darkness—
Oh, would her radiance ever
My longing eyes rejoiced!

Here is a touching hokku, written by Chiyo, after the death of her little son:—

How far, I wonder, did he stray,
Chasing the burnished dragon-fly to-day?

The souls of Japanese children are often pictured as playing in a celestial garden with the same flowers and butterflies they used to play with while on earth. It is just this subtle element of the childlike disposition in Japanese people that has helped them to discover the secrets of flowers and birds and trees, has enabled them to catch their timorous, fleeting shadows, and to hold them, as if by magic, in a picture, on a vase, or in a delicate and wistful poem.

There is a Japanese phrase, mono no aware wo shiru ("the Ah-ness of things"), which seems to describe most accurately the whole significance of Japanese poetry. There is a plaintive and intimate union between the poet and the scene from Nature he is writing about. Over and over again he suggests that Spring, with all her wealth of cherry and plum blossom, will continue to grace his country long after he has departed. Nearly all Japan's people, from the peasant to the Mikado himself, are poets. Fortunately there is no kindly Mr. Elkin Mathews to publish their poems in dainty volumes, or Fuji would be concealed behind the vast accumulation of published verse. Many of the Japanese people are unconscious poets. They write poetry because they live poetry every day of their lives—that is to say, before Japan dreamed of wearing a bowler hat and frock-coat or became a wholesale buyer of everything Western. They live poetry, always that poetry steeped in an intimate communion with Nature. And when in July the Festival of the Dead takes place, there comes a great company of poet souls to see Nippon's blossom again, to wander down old familiar gardens, through red torii, or to lean upon a stone lantern, and drink in the glory of a summer day, which is sweeter to them than life beyond the grave.

F. HADLAND DAVIS.

"RED RUIN AND THE 'MAKING' OF THE LAWS"—I.

THE present political and economic imbroglio is due to many striking causes. Chief among these are the waning faith in the immutable economic laws underlying all human activities, the lack of lucidity in expounding these on the part of many of the exponents of the most vital science within our ken, and a growing confusion on the part of the majority as to the significance of certain financial, commercial, and industrial phenomena. No man can judge the value of a gem without scrutinising all its facets. No politician, no economist, no citizen can gauge the measure of good or evil emanating from an innovation in our system without a just and well-balanced review of all its ramifications and their manifold and ever-multiplying effects on human motives and actions. But unfortunately the least equipped are among the readiest to pass judgment, and thus a multitude of one-sided Sciolists may succeed in apparently triumphing over a few experts labouring in the service of truth.

This is especially applicable to the controversy which has arisen concerning such questions as Individualism and Socialism, as Free Trade and Protection. Their advocates, no doubt perfectly sincere in their advocacy, have shown themselves more vehement than logical, narrow than broad, or have allowed the passion of the platform to override the cold and careful reasoning of the Conference Room. Thus in the course of these heated conflicts the apparent has been made to play the part of the real, on the one side, while the real has been made to pass for the apparent on the other. Statistics have been adroitly drawn upon, ignored, or contemned, according to the gospel of the statistician. The unoffending factor has been blamed while the offending one has been praised. The ethical has been confused with the economic by many a sincere exponent of religion or philosophy, who, all unknowingly, recommends measures prompted by rightful sentiment, but deep-rooted in some dangerous fallacy.

Such questions, concerned as they are with the vital interests of all, and representing as they do the very foundations of the social fabric, should not be permitted to come into the category of party politics, but be strictly relegated to a body of unbiassed scientists, whose deliberations would be confined to the pros and cons of either side, point by point, in that truly scientific spirit whose mission it is to accept or dismiss each particular principle or fact as it arises, according to its claim to scientific treatment. Of course much of all this prevailing antagonism and dogged brief-holding spirit characterising the protagonists on either side are largely due to the tendency and habit of taking facts for granted and of adopting opinions second-hand. It might not seem so to many, but in truth all this is a sign and symptom of degeneration—degeneration produced by Socialism in the shape of official authority. For, under such a régime, presided over by bureaucrats and signalled by buttons, an insidious and unconscious mental process sets in, and finally dominates the citizen, rendering him an acquiescent victim of the worship of authority. This peculiar moral and mental malady has been strikingly illustrated among even highly educated peoples, and is manifested in the loss of self-reliance, individual enterprise, initiative, and, above all, in a falling-off in a faith in personal judgment. The case of the Germans is perhaps the most notable in modern times.

Here is a race for the most part highly gifted, singularly cultivated, and naturally energetic. Yet in any argument in which you may engage them—and they have a discussion—you will almost invariably find that sooner or later you will be confronted with the words, "zum Beispiel"—for example, and then, in the natural order of things, you will be bombarded with quotations from various supposed authorities. On matters associated with the science of government the name of Bismarck stands out as a favourite, and well illustrates the utter futility and danger of authority-worship. Here was a man who, because of his world wide reputation as a brilliant diplomat, a dominant manager of rulers and men, a wondrous wire-puller, a subtle slave-driver in a libertarian's guise, cited as an authority on political economy and sociology, and even imitated as a high example of successful Socialistic manœuvring by ourselves and others. Yet all the while he was bereft of either the aptitude for or the knowledge of the science of enriching nations.

To be the slave of authority is to be the slave of sciolism and prejudice. Such a mental attitude is the surrender of your own judgment to that of another. It is a menace and an impediment to all intellectual progress. It is the acceptance of the non-proven: a symptom and form of mental indolence. It may be a position rendered imperative in isolated cases, in exceptional branches of study; but no option should be allowed or allowable among the self-avowed exponents of the science of government or among the most ardent advocates of the principles they enforce. Rather than worship the authority, it were wiser and more profitable if the advocates or followers were to idolise the innovation—the measure rather than the man. For the measure, proving a failure, or an onslaught upon the general welfare, would serve as a more poignant disillusion, and its shortcomings or direct malefaction would prove more effective and enduring teachers and danger-signals for future guidance than would the spectacle of the broken human idol. But it is to be feared that there exists in the majority of Englishmen an inborn craze for apotheosis. Even during the last few generations the people have set up their demi-gods only to wake up and discover that these have been naught but throwers of dust into their infatuated eyes. And the illusion gone, they proceed to seek some substitute “for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still.”

Despite the one-sided attitude and methods prevailing in these controversies it must be surely palpable to many onlookers that the Socialist is at heart an individualist, and the Protectionist at heart a Free Trader. The true source of their conflict is misunderstanding. So-called Free Trade in this country was inaugurated not because the majority had mastered the principle underlying that reform, but because the masses were hungering for cheap food, and the leaders who favoured the acquisition of that much-coveted boon were regarded as “the pillars of a people’s hope, the centre of a world’s desire.” It might, indeed, be said that even the leaders themselves had not probed to their depth and breadth the infinite ramifications and potentialities of that principle—a principle which struck for the very first time in the history of man’s industrial and commercial activity almost at the very heart of economic freedom. They did not realise that even their slight application of this principle signified the arrival at the cross-roads, where, looking backward and onward, they were in the unique position of pioneers who should discard for ever the narrow path of economic compulsion and choose the broad highway of economic liberty.

A SUMMER HOLIDAY

DAY after day for thirty days the sun shone on the windless and perspiring city, the city that had complained so often of the cool, grey tent of clouds that had screened it from the heat of summer. Night after night for thirty nights the city lay in breathless torpor, while the feet of men who could not sleep echoed dully on the softening pavements, and the air was troubled with the sound of children crying in their dreams. The aged and the sick loosed their listless fingers and let life pass, and when he looked from his window the artist saw their dusty hearses creeping along the burning street.

In those days he was afflicted with a lethargy of mind and body against which, in moments of consciousness, his creative instinct struggled in vain. He would sit for hours in front of a white sheet of paper and at the end would start up to realise that in all his mental wanderings he had not shaped one coherent thought. He would lie in bed hour after hour in a kind of dreamless stupor, and sometimes when he had at last made up his mind to get up, the sky darkened while he was dressing and he knew that the day was over. On these occasions it gave him an odd sensation to stand at the window in his pyjamas and peep through the Venetian blinds at the men and women going home from their work. It reminded him of the sunny days of his childhood, when, having been sent to lie down for an hour in the afternoon, he would lift the blind stealthily to look out at the busy world with blinking eyes. The recollection made him sad, and he would stare at the crumpled bed-clothes in disgust of his age. It seemed as though the years had soiled him in their passing.

At this time it was as if his mind had lost the power of creation; it exhausted itself in the labour of thinking while he was dimly conscious that he was not thinking of anything at all. He achieved extreme misery as a condition of being and not as the result of any mental process. His senses became dulled and untrustworthy. He went for moody walks without realising any of the scents or sounds of the streets, and when he touched his body with his hands it was so insentient that he would dig his nails in to make sure that it was not dead. This numbness of his intellect and his senses seemed to make a break, or at least a weak link, in the continuity of his existence. When he closed his eyes to examine his consciousness he was aware of immense voids where normally he would have found pulsing blood and eloquent nerves. From being a man with rather more than his share of the wine of life, he became a sluggish automaton, but vaguely mournful for lost treasures and present discomforts. Now and again, however, he would realise that he was doing no work, and, before he relapsed into his age-long torpor, would weary his barren mind with efforts at creation. Afterwards, looking back at his life with its hundred thousand follies, he knew that these only were lost days.

The thirty-first day came and still there was no rain, so the artist abandoned his work and fled to the sea. As he sat in the train he saw that the fields were scorched brown by the sun and the trees were losing their withered leaves; but London was already very far away. Once the train ran past a burning heath and the carriage was filled with the acrid scent of a November bonfire. He saw children beating at the edges of the fire with uprooted bushes, and a pall of smoke borne up on the heavy air. But the train ran on and brought him to the sea.

Like most men who work with love, he had never thought of taking a holiday since he had been his own master; wherever he had gone in the world his work had gone with him, and the emotions bred of his resolution to do nothing for a month were new to him. Freed from its concern with words and phrases, his mind saw life in greater detail and he was curiously conscious of the shapes and colours of things. He had chosen a sophisticated little watering-place on the Belgian coast for his holiday, where, side by side with the row of tall hotels that stood like a great wall against the sea, the sand-dunes upheld the blue sky with their crests of pale gold like the hair of Flemish fisher-girls. The lemon-coloured beach was inlaid with bathing-machines of a hundred hues, and below the dunes the great black fishing-boats lay high and dry on the sands, the pennants of their weathercocks fluttering softly in the wind that blew from the sea. The shore was studded with the figures of men and women, and the children were trampling down the surf with their brown feet. Other children were flying kites, and the air was full of strange birds that plucked impatiently at the cord that bound them to earth, and, when they succeeded in breaking it, fell to the ground, too weak to make use of their freedom. Behind the little town lay the tranquil plains of Western Flanders, a fertile land of canals and farms and windmills, and far off on the horizon he could see the purple towers of Bruges.

In his new mood of holiday-maker he looked at his companions in the town with interest. They were gay and cosmopolitan, and seemed to have been making holiday for years. The grave faces of the fishermen contrasted oddly with this light-heartedness. Perhaps they were dreaming of the long winter months, when the town was their own and only good Flemish was heard in the reticent streets when the North Sea roared in Flemish against the break waters, that murmured now in conversational French to please the children of the visitors. The fishermen stood, apart in silent groups, waiting for the tide to release their boats. The artist would have liked to talk with them, but he knew no Flemish.

The red sun set into the sea, the laughing crowd split into families and went in to dinner, and the artist was moved by a sudden sense of loneliness. Every one in the place seemed to be gregarious. The visitors, the fishermen, even inanimate objects, the hotels, the boats, and the bathing-machines, formed themselves naturally into flocks. He shivered and climbed down to the beach to make friends with the sea.

The tide came in rapidly on the gently sloping sands, and when the tongue of a ninth wave licked his boots he thought of the trusting advances of a large and amiable dog. This sea was a tame beast that made the great sea-wall and the elaborate breakwaters appear ridiculous. It hardly had the force to overcome the sand-castles that the children had left behind them to guard the deserted beach, and in its gentle approach it brought him shy presents of fragile shells and bunches of seaweed like babies' nosegays. But it pressed him back foot by foot, and presently the swart fishing-boats hoisted their sails and crept out one by one under the sky, already faintly powdered with stars. An orchestra struck up a waltz above him on the digue, and he saw that the windows of the hotels were blazing with light, and that the guests were dancing with the shadows of the esplanade.

As yet he was content to taste the holiday spirit timidly, for it seemed to him strong drink for any one who was not accustomed to it. A man may not learn in a moment to talk aloud to strangers, to substitute laughter for thought, to dance under the stars, and to patronise the sea. So the artist kept himself on the fringe of the crowd, and smiled encouragingly to himself to prove that he was making holiday. It would be pleasant, he thought, after a month of unsuccessful struggle, to be merged in this universal unconsciousness. These people could express themselves efficiently by doing nothing at all; perhaps he could win the secret of their joyous self-satisfaction in a place where even the sea was only a blithely insignificant tourist. He felt the passionate longing of every artist to enjoy life for its own sake.

When the orchestra commenced the seventh waltz he left the dancers and turned inland along a dusty road that stretched, monotonously level, across uneventful fields. The night had not succeeded in enriching this dully prosperous plain with her mystery. The sparse trees did not bear themselves as giants, there were no mists to change the cropped pasture-lands into violet lakes. Every dusty twig, every sandy blade of grass stood revealed as by the light of a grey November day.

And then he came up to a great flock of sheep that was grazing its way along the wide grassy borders of the road. He heard their teeth tearing the tough grass, and the barking of the sheep-dogs on the skirts of the flock. Presently he overtook the three shepherds with their long poles and coats of undressed sheep-skin. They pointed aloft and cried something to him in Flemish, and following their gesture he saw a red light high up in the sky. The boys had sent up a fire-balloon from the beach below the town, and now it had dwindled to the size of a great red star.

The artist looked at the sheep, at the three shepherds, at the new star that shamed all the lesser lights of heaven. Then he hurried back to his hotel, and started writing. He realised that in a life so short, in a world that at every turn of the road could prove significant, there was no time to cease from effort. Below him on the esplanade the orchestra was tuning up for the fourteenth waltz, and the scrapings of their bows disturbed the whispering of the gentle sea. His holiday was over.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

REVIEWS

THE POET AND THE AGE—II.

Canzoni of Ezra Pound. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

Poems. By M. JOURDAIN. (Truslove and Hanson. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Blossomy Bough. By SHAEMAS O'SHEEL. (Shaemas O'Sheel, New York. $1 net.)

Sonnets and Songs. By LAWRENCE FORTH. (Lynwood and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Dream of Alfred. An Epic of the Navy. By W. B. NICHOLS. (David Nutt. 2s. net.)

Pluto and Proserpine. By JOHN SUMMERS. (Stanley Paul.)

THIS further selection of poetry and verse does not make for hopefulness with regard to the relationship between the poet and the age. As before, there is really fine achievement, but the direct speaking to the age for which we are listening is very little heard in them. No doubt it is in a measure wrong to apply such a standard to such works as these; but that standard is applied in the interests of the vitality of the art of poetry. We are willing—nay, anxious—to recognise all the good qualities to be found in these volumes, but we shall feel a measure of dissatisfaction until that poet arises who will speak immediately to his age. If he can succeed in making poetry of his environment, and in bearing a message that is vigorous and inspiring, he will be a master-singer indeed.

Let it be acknowledged at once, then, that Mr. Ezra Pound is of the true race of master-singers. There is in his "Canzoni" an intensely individual note, a power of forging new forms of beauty, along with a fresh lyrical freedom, that goes far to put him in the front rank of living poets. Mr. Pound refuses to be classified; his almost fierce individuality breaks down our critical boundaries. All this testifies unmistakably to his true vitality. The beauty is often of an exotic type; and his great technical powers, as shown in these difficult canzoni, to say nothing of a sestina, are employed on themes remote enough from our day. Let this "Sonnet," though it breaks the traditional rhyme-scheme, bear witness to his power:—

If on the tally-board of wasted days
They daily write me for proud idleness,
Let high Hell summons me, and I confess,
No overt act the preferred charge allays.
To-day I thought—what boots it what I thought!
Poppies and gold! Why should I blurt it out?
Or hawk the magic of her name about
Deaf doors and dungeons where no truth is bought?

Who calls me idle? I have thought of her.
Who calls me idle? By God's truth I've seen
The arrowy sunlight in her golden snares.
Let him among you all stand summoner
Who hath done better things! Let whoso hath been
With worthier works concerned, display his wares!

We wish we had room to quote one of these masterly "Canzoni" also, or an admirable translation, whether from Leopardi or Heine. It must not be supposed that Mr. Pound never touches the modern note. We find it in a powerful series of somewhat fragmentary lyrics which are suggestively headed "Und Drang." The first will stand as a representative of these, and also of another aspect of his art:—

I am worn faint,
The winds of good and evil
Blind me with dust
And burn me with the cold,
There is no comfort being over-man;
Yet are we come more near
The great oblivions and the labouring night,
Inchoate truth and the sepulchral forces.

This is scarcely hopeful or inspiring, but is, perhaps, as much as one can expect in these days of unrest. To say that Mr. Pound sustains in this volume the reputation he has won with earlier efforts is to give high praise indeed; perhaps he has even advanced that reputation.

To take up the "Poems" of Miss Jourdain is like passing from the vigorous first movement of a sonata to the quieter and graver andante or adagio. These verses are the work of true culture, and an air of distinction pervades the whole volume. The chief power of the author is seen in descriptions of Nature, which are admirably fresh and true. Note these few lines from "The Pool of Hylas":—

In such a pool, in such a hollow, set
With maidenhair, and clots of parsley wet,
And swallow-wort, and deer-grass spreading fair
With marsh flower on the reed-encrusted shore
The head of Hylas with the braided hair Sank in the water, like a meteor.

Emotion is always of a quiet and restrained type, and there is very little of the direct lyrical note to be found. Fine and conscientious, however, as the work of this little volume is, we are still unsatisfied in our main demand, for Miss Jourdain never comes into any closer touch with our time than in these descriptions of ageless Nature, and practically shuns the modern problem altogether. Still, lovers of poetry will be thankful for such work.

The next movement of our poetical sonata might well be called allegretto, for Mr. Shaemas O'Sheel hymns the ancient theme of love with quite surprising fervour and life. This volume ought to have come from Ireland rather than from America, and the only indication, apart from the title-page, that it has not come from the older country is to be found in its adoption of certain American spelling reforms, which appear very incongruous amid such subject-matter. Mr. O'Sheel, in a curiously naïve "Note," which should have been a preface, but which is put at the end of the book, acknowledges his indebtedness to Mr. W. B. Yeats, which is evident enough, but claims powers of his own also which we are quite willing to concede to him. There is true poetry in this book. Much of it seems to be written out of a sweet dream-world, which, nevertheless, has a basis of reality, as its sincerity witnesses. The chief distinction which Mr. O'Sheel imparts to the well-worn topic of love is that of mysticism; the point may be illustrated in the following lines from a poem quaintly headed "The Lover thinks of the Day when he met his Lady first":—

O day of Ordination, Holy Day!
The Spirit breathed upon me, and I felt Ardor invade my soul; and ancient wisdom Rested, a robe upon me; I became
A priest in the Temple of Life: the secret doors Opened before me, to the inmost shrine,
The sanctuary—and I stood before
God's Presence in a Woman! And I learned
The rite of worship, and the rite is Love.

This mysticism of human love, with its almost infinite phases, is an aspect of the topic that deserves fuller treatment at the hands of poets. There is something almost Dantesque in Mr. O'Sheel's devotion to his lady.

And what of the modern note? There are half a dozen poems entitled "Of City Flowers," but they are chiefly descriptions, poetical enough indeed, of a New York Bohemia, and thus are a little aside from the main stream of life. Mr. O'Sheel has, at any rate, the merit of individuality.

We have no rousing Finale to our poetical sonata, but instead a quieter strain, of much sincerity and charm. Mr. Lawrence Forth has apparently made the Elizabethan sonnet his special study, and has produced some beautiful poetry in this form. Although he has not the exoticism of Mr. Pound, nor the Celtic accessories of Mr. O'Sheel, Mr. Forth has yet his own individual characteristics, and these will probably be better appreciated than the curious and unusual qualities of these others. "Confessions" is a sonnet which will commend itself to all lovers of this form:—

Silence her golden casket has undone;
And I have heard the treasured soul of speech:
Love's own soul vibrating in unison
With lofty passion, each the crown of each.
Like him who stood beneath the mount of Law,
Awaiting the great word whereby God drew
The heart of a weak world, I heard and saw Love's word descend in blinding light from you.
And Love unveiling in surrender sweet
Bade me uplift my fearing eyes, and tread
The holy ground above me with bare feet,
To grasp the new commandment. All is said,
And all is won. O let my heart obey
What you have taught its daily prayer to say.

In the section headed "Songs" Mr. Forth is perhaps hardly as successful as with his sonnets, but through all we have a singer who, dealing mostly with moods and inner states, is contemporaneous with almost any age in which hearts can love and suffer.

The two remaining books belong rather to the realm of industry than to that of art. Mr. Nichols' "epic" is not without sonority, but we have an uncomfortable suspicion that he has written "to order," for the hand of the manufacturer is in evidence often. We fear we are scarcely able to appreciate lines of this calibre:—

The hands of Prophecy still wove the dream
With tireless fingers on the starry loom
Of that great night, the while the purple web
Of victory flung its folds in god-like pomp
Around the sleeping king; nor was the Voice
Yet mute of England's glories, and it told
Of Vernon, Leake, Hughes, Boscawen, sturdy Hood, Indomitable Keppel and the great
Rodney, whose iron-tongued cannon thrilled the world
And made kings tremble in their council halls
To hear of England's fleet!

Mr. Nichols is certainly a well-intentioned person.

One stanza, No. XXXVIII. (there are CCX. of them), is sufficient to indicate the powers of Mr. Summers in "Pluto and Proserpine":—

With voice discordant after screaming so,
She doth at last an effort make to speak;
"O let me go!" she says, "O let me go!"
Though now to bear herself she is too weak.
"O let me go!" says she, "I will! I must!"
Then she gives forth a groan of deep disgust.

We had almost echoed that groan!

Looking back over the ten volumes that have occupied us in these two articles we find very little in the way of direct speaking to the times. This provokes another reflection:

may not this very remoteness of poetry from our age be in itself a message? Perhaps it is the special function of poetry to-day to call us away from these complex and restless times to those which are simpler and fuller of beauty. And if poetry can help us to forget for a few blissful moments an age that is cursed with problems and groping in discontentment it will have served its chief end in the world.

MR. GEORGE MOORE'S PLAY

The Apostle. A Drama in Three Acts. By GEORGE MOORE.
(Maunsel and Co., Dublin. 3s. 6d. net.)

THERE have been some who have deprecated the writing of this as irreverent and even blasphemous. We are not, however, of that number. For there is no test so complete and difficult as the artistic. The appeal of creation is the final appeal of truth. It is for this reason that we value the fact that we have not one account of the life of the Man of Galilee, but four. The fact that in the writing of the four Gospels we have manifestly not four persons but One, and that in spite of the minor and necessary differences of four independent points of view, more than sufficiently attests the reality of the Person of Whom they treat. Moreover they all give a unity in their account of the life-claims and concluding tragedy, with the miracle entailed in it, of that Person. In contradistinction to this unity of account Mr. Moore has another story to tell us. It is true, as he says in his Prefatory Letter, that he is indebted to several sources, such as a thesis by a French doctor and the memory of an ancient legend, for this; and it is possibly academically probable that he may have wished to give these artistic form without committing himself to faith in them. But the manner of his Prefatory Letter precludes the chance of this: and the identification of his story with his creed is unavoidable. In any case the idea is that Christ did not die on the cross, but "that it was some cataleptic swoon that Christ had suffered." After His recovery from this swoon He had escaped to some remote Essene monastery. How He did this is, wisely perhaps, not entered upon; nor is the cause of the theory of resurrection hinted or explained. These things are accepted, and the play occupies itself with this same Essene monastery when Paul, a preacher of this same mysteriously awakened Gospel, halts there on his way to Rome. He has been preaching, and intends to continue preaching, a risen Christ, and he meets this Jesus at the Essene monastery. The upshot of it all is that he slays this Jesus as a tempter from the Devil, in a sudden access of anger that is partly righteous and partly that of a man whose chief bent of life has been exposed, and continues his way to Rome a triumphant man.

In such a play the only interest of importance is obviously centred in the characters of Jesus, the lay Brother at the monastery, and Paul the Apostle. The others matter little if at all. Manahem, Matthias, and Sadduc venture on a good deal of jargon as to the nature of God, which is probably the result of incompleteness of workmanship (for though this is called "A Drama in Three Acts," it is really but the scenario of such a drama), as well as inherent in the nature of the matter. But they are merely the framework for the canvas which contains the two main protagonists. And it is with regard to these two that we said that the final test of truth would necessarily lie in the artistry of creation. It may be put this way. Were one to accept the central idea of the play as a thesis, that thesis would be advanced considerably towards our acceptance if it could be said that the leading two characters were the obvious lineaments of the men of whom we have records elsewhere. This Paul and this Jesus, are they the same as the Paul who has painted his portrait for us in his various Epistles, and the Christ of Whom we possess a quadruple account that agrees in central unity?

First, then, as to Paul. With regard to him, however, it is more difficult to speak; for Mr. Moore has given him scarcely a speech in his play that is not carefully derived from actual words of his culled from the Epistles. Yet in one or two cases Mr. Moore has given us some recorded saying of Paul, and has continued the saying with a further sentence or two of his own; and it is here that we should be able to discover if Mr. Moore's conception of the Apostle anyway resembles his authentic personage. Take, for example, the following speech: "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I but Christ liveth in me. Christ is risen in me. I am the resurrection." The first portion of the speech is, of course, well known; the portion italicised is Mr. Moore's addition. But is it conceivable to think of Paul having given vent to such a sentiment? It is only necessary to read the fifteenth chapter of his first letter to his friends at Corinth to discover its utter incongruity. Yet Mr. Moore evidently thinks it possible for Paul to have spoken it—which is as much as to say that Mr. Moore's conception of the Apostle is by no means the same as that of the original. This is obvious in other ways, however. The readers of Paul's various letters cannot but be impressed with a personality of an extraordinary mental alertness and agility, keen for argument, and of very fine dialectic skill and logic. But Mr. Moore's Paul is an asseverator: Matthias, for instance, says of him that "against thy stern and zealous affirmation logic breaks like arrows against a cliff." Now an asseverator is not mentally agile: he is rather a mental dullard. And, again, it is evident that Mr. Moore has failed to catch the authentic Paul.

Yet how about the figure of the Jesus he represents? Here Mr. Moore clearly cannot fall back upon recorded words, since they would be manifestly out of place. Therefore, his characterisation is open to challenge at every point, and it must be said that it is at best a very emasculated figure he portrays. Mr. Moore in his Prefatory Letter tells us of his admiration for the Gospel of Mark, as being the sincerest and clearest. Good. How then does the Christ of the Gospel of Mark compare with the Jesus of Mr. Moore? These are some of the points of comparison. Mark gives the idea of a man who was prompt to action, forceful of speech and ready of wit, stinging, if need be, in satire, to whom the instinct of command was a natural assumption, so natural that it had the gesture of gracefulness and loving-kindness. But Mr. Moore's Jesus seeks out-of-the-way and lonely tasks, deprecates speech, plays prettily with birds, is patronised by His superiors at the monastery, giving up all leadership to them—which was very wise, since He is very obviously unfitted for any kind of responsibility or power. When Christ was kind it was the kindness of natural power and authority; but when Mr. Moore's Jesus is kind it is rather the prettiness of weakness and emasculation. Fancy Mr. Moore's Jesus fixing a class of people with the stinging and everlasting metaphor of "whited sepulchres;" or apostrophising buyers in the highest market and sellers in the lowest as "thieves;" or scourging money-changers with a whip of thongs! It is simply unthinkable. Fancy the Christ of the Gospel of Mark accepting the leadership, not to speak of taking the patronage, of monastic scholars who spend their days discussing the being of God in ratiocinative and hair-splitting jargon! It is inconceivable. There are many other points that cannot be discussed in the cold print of review, since they deal with the sufferings of Christ in prospect of His death. Such matters are, perhaps, best left alone in such a place, though they tend, too, to widen the difference between the Christ of Mark and the Jesus of Mr. Moore.

In other words, we may be never so interested in this play (the author of "Esther Waters" is always assured of that), but the interest has nothing to do with the Christ and the Paul of the New Testament. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the situation demanded by the play would not be possible for a moment if the authentic personages once took life in it. And that is to say that the situation is unreal by the nature of the case, which again postulates that the theme is unthinkable, the characters being who and what they were. Partly the reason for this is to be discovered in the Introduction, which is entitled, "A Prefatory Letter on Reading the Bible for the First Time." There is an attempt at a bland ingenuousness that is quite impossible at this time of day. It is only necessary for the reader to read a few pages of this "letter" to discover that Mr. Moore is mistaking, as the first impressions of his mind, critical, and in some cases outworn, saws that a life of somewhat extensive reading had made him very well acquainted with. But if Mr. Moore cannot be ingenuous, he at least cannot help but be full of charm. For urbane wit and the most delicate irony it would be difficult to match some portions of "The Apostle."

REMINISCENCES

Friendly Faces of Three Nationalities. By MISS M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. (Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

READERS of Miss Betham-Edwards' earlier works will close this book with feelings of great regret. The grace and charm and human feeling which one associates with Miss Betham-Edwards are here, but the construction of the volume is of the slightest character. We catch transitory glimpses of the "friendly faces;" we are introduced to Charles Dickens, Owen Meredith, Coventry Patmore, Lord John Russell, William Allingham, General Booth, and others; but instead of being presented with a real portrait, we feel instead the effect of the cinematograph. The vision was so quickly over that the author saw the clothes rather than the man; there was not the intimacy and close friendship which is so necessary to the writing of successful and valuable memoirs. We observe great men at uninteresting moments of their lives; the incidents described are usually of a trivial nature. We read of the late Amelia Blandford Edwards, the Egyptologist, and Miss Betham-Edwards' cousin, that—"Upon one occasion she turned the tap of a cask of old harvest beer, and when the trick was discovered half the contents had run out. At another time she locked up a somewhat precise, elderly aunt for hours in a pantry. A child who had gained the prize for a story at nine years of age could hardly be expected to behave as others!" The exploits of the youthful story-teller seem to have been no better and no worse than those of children of less literary tendencies.

Scattered among these ordinary details of an ordinary individual are some gems of topographical description. Then, again, the acknowledgment of the qualities of Amelia Blandford Edwards would create an ache in the heart of many an editor and would produce a blush on the cheeks of many a contributor. It is from the pen of a past editor of THE ACADEMY:—"Miss Edwards was in truth a model contributor—never declining a request, punctual to her promises, writing in a clear, bold hand, and considerate of the convenience of printer as well as editor." This cutting, shorn from its context in THE ACADEMY, and without any explanation in the volume, illustrates the trivial character of the contents and the laborious nature of the construction. Coventry Patmore is described under the autocratic influence of his wife at Hastings; the essay on Madame Bodichon, of Girton fame, serves as a vehicle for the quotation of that lady's sayings; Lord John Russell is seen on a visit to an industrial school; and William Booth is in his element at a Salvationist demonstration at the Crystal Palace. A letter from Charles Lamb to Mary Betham gives an amusing picture of the sensitive and vacillating temperament of that distinguished writer. It concerns a small legacy, and is quoted from THE ACADEMY:—

Dear Mary Betham—I remember you all, and tears come out when I think on the years that have separated us. That dear Anne should so long have remember'd us affects me. My dear Mary, my poor sister is not, nor will be for two months perhaps, capable of appreciating the kind old long memory of dear Anne.

But not a penny will I take, and I can answer for my Mary when she recovers, if the sum left can contribute in any way to the comfort of Matilda.

We will halve it, or we will take a bit of it, as a token, rather than wrong her. So pray consider it as an amicable arrangement. I write in great haste, or you won't get it before you go.

We do not want the money; but if dear Matilda does not much want it, why, we will take our thirds. God bless you.

C. LAMB.

We are told that the letter occupies the first page of a sheet of foolscap. What would have been the contents of a postscript?

SHORTER REVIEWS

Epidemic Dropsy in Calcutta. By MAJOR E. D. W. GREIG, M.D. (Superintendent Government Printing, Calcutta. 2s.)

WE have here an interesting report of an outbreak of epidemic dropsy, or beri-beri, which occurred in Calcutta in 1907-9, and formed the subject of special inquiry. The results are given in one of the series of Scientific Memoirs of the Medical and Sanitary Officers of the Government of India, and a final report will follow. The name beri-beri is said to come from the Singhalese word beri, meaning debility. The prominent features of the disease, which approximates to ship beri-beri, are swelling of the feet and breathlessness; sudden death often ensues from acute paralysis of the heart; it is non-infectious; it is a nutritional disease, and is caused by a dietary of "polished" rice, which is the staple food of Bengalis. This "polishing" is the process carried out in steam and other mills whereby the husk of the paddy containing the phosphated compounds, substances essential for the maintenance of the normal nutrition of nervous tissue, is removed, and the white, or cleaned, rice is produced. The Calcutta Marwaris, who live upon ata or wheat flour and consume very little rice, entirely escaped the disease, though surrounded by the population affected by the outbreak. Experiments showed that pigeons, when fed on polished rice, both boiled and unboiled, suffered progressive loss of weight with characteristic polyneuritis, but when fed on a mixture of wheat and pulses remained for months in good health.

The two last severe outbreaks of epidemic dropsy in Calcutta and Bengal—namely, in 1877-9 and 1907-9, have been concomitant with a sustained high price of food grains during the period, and have ceased concurrently with the fall in the price of food. Fortunately a remedial treatment is easily available in the alteration of the dietary. A liberal diet free from rice expedites recovery. The disease never affects Europeans or East Indians, or native gentlemen who live generously: the want of phosphorus and nitrogenous ingredients in the polished rice, and the underfeeding when prices rise abnormally, account for its prevalence among the poorer classes. The lesson to be learnt is that extensive outbreaks of epidemic dropsy may always recur among consumers of an exclusive rice diet, when the increased prices of food grains reach the point at which even this poor diet cannot be sufficiently procured by the consumers. The inquiry was evidently conducted with great care: it has added another to the list of excellent Memoirs which do credit to the Government and its officers, and have laid bare the secrets of tropical diseases, snake poisons, plague, rabies, parasites, and other special evils of Oriental countries.

Solar Life: The Desire of All; or, How to Live Happy for Ever. By THOMAS MAY. (A. H. Stockwell. 1s. net.)

It is only necessary to spend a few hours of any evening listening to the orators at the Marble Arch to hear strange and extraordinary thoughts and ideas fall from many a speaker's lips. But nothing stranger or more extraordinary could surely be heard anywhere than is contained within the pages of the present book. The author starts with a greeting, "To all Peoples, Friends, and Lovers of Truth and Good Health," and then proceeds to ask questions similar to those usually associated with the advertisements of patent medicines. "Do you suffer from weakness or nervousness; are you pale and worried, thin and grumpy?" he inquires. If so, "the Sun will help you if you will help yourself . . . you must shine, radiate and dispense. . . . Sun and Son are the same thing . . . you are a child of light, and thus a Sun of good and Son of God." To be healthy it is necessary "to practise the exercises of the Sun," which consist of several remarkable contortions indulged in by a "Sun-body" on a bed, in front of a mirror and in "some retired spot"—surely the retired spot for preference. Mr. May is an advocate of the Daylight Saving Bill, and from some of the earlier passages it would appear that he was also a believer in faith-healing, and disdained any material aid whatsoever; but these ideas are dispelled, for at the end of the book various remedies are put forward, such as "The Rest Cure," "The Anti-Crank Cure," and "The Royal Solar Rejuvenator." "Water artistically applied will cure all complaints," he says, while taking various texts, usually associated with spiritual meanings, to illustrate his eccentric ideas:—

"I will send the Comforter, even the Spirit of Truth, which shall guide you into all truth, for it shall testify of Me, and teach you all things." And this Spirit is light, or sunshine, which, like an ethereal glass or mirror, reflects truth and wisdom. Its rays and radiations are Health, Strength, Peace, and Power; and your heart, like a dewdrop of this Sun's Light, is comforted by the Comforter.

The dewdrop heart is a very fine touch; so is our author's idea of the extension of the cup of cold water of Biblical fame to "about half a pint."

We will not weary our readers with any further quotations. Probably they will call to mind a book entitled "Every Man a King," dealt with in THE ACADEMY some two years ago, which claimed to have found some new and original methods for the healing of the nations. Such books cannot be cited as types of the little learning which is said to be a dangerous thing, as any small ripple of unrest that might be caused in the minds of those who are always in search of something "new" would easily be stilled by the utter drollery of it all.

The Little Village. By EMERY POTTLE. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE first chapter of "The Little Village" is taken up by the remonstrance of a New York editor with a young man of his acquaintance who has the idea of leaving his own country "to live practically alone in a God-forsaken Italian village." In Chapter II. we are introduced to a garden of the village, and the book then goes on to deal with the things which are usually associated with poetic prose. But somehow or other the author does not seem to have the grip of his subject necessary to the unfolding of beautiful ideas or inspiring thoughts. Words are well and carefully chosen, but the conception is thin, and carries no weight. After rhapsodising over the "incomparable chants and prayers, fashioned by men of simple, majestic souls," the expression "Alas! there are to-day no like souls, and in consequence our tongue has well-nigh lost its high calling" is put forward without any rhyme or reason for its pronouncement. And following close upon this we have the following:—

If ever God laughs, with a tear in His eye, it is when He sees His children setting out with the aid of a doctor, a diet, a trained nurse, and a German band, to find rest unto their poor little souls.

'Lighten our darkness, we beseech Thee, O Lord.'

Also:—

The day was unlovely, even to my eyes accustomed, eyes rather blind to defects, or seeing them prone to palliate, as those who love are prone.

This will not do at all. We must have the real thing, or a book of this kind becomes ludicrous.

More Letters to My Son. (Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE author, who, under the title of "Letters to My Son," issued a collection of epistles purporting to be written by a young married woman to her unborn child, now continues the series in "More Letters to My Son." It requires a very delicate touch to handle subjects of this kind without trespassing upon the ground of good taste, but our anonymous writer has succeeded admirably in her pleasant task, with the result that a charming glimpse is given of an ideal home where every preparation is being made for the comfort and amusement of the Prince. The true woman speaks from every page with sympathy, love, and kindness, and her "beloved" is escorted in the letters through his babyhood, boyhood, and youth right on to the time when the mother must give place to another woman. "Unless you think greatly you cannot live greatly" she tells him in her earnest desire for him always to be true and just, never to trifle with the things that matter. "Child, whatever life gives or denies you, you must give it a song," she goes on to say. "Not the song of your own prowess, nor of your own woes, but the song of fellowship and kinship with the world; such a song as when they hear it will remind men of the joys and sorrows and loves and hopes and passions of their own lives; such a song as when they are desolate will put a hand upon their shoulder, and when they have given up will make them go on again." A son must be greatly blessed to possess a mother of this sort.

FICTION

Margaret Harding. By PERCEVAL GIBBON. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

If this novel is intended as a piece of special pleading for the equal rights of the negro with the white man in South Africa, we must look upon it indulgently and remark that if all negroes were as accomplished, courteous, and chivalrous as "Kamis" of this story, the problem of the colour line would soon solve itself. If, however, the book be merely a novel written for purposes of entertainment, we admit that it is a great success, since it holds unfaltering attention and interest from the first few pages to the finish. It has not the humour of, let us say, "Salvator," but it has much more distinction.

Kamis is a London M.D. who has returned to the land of his birth only to find himself rejected by his fellows. Foolishly and defiantly—the more so as she is contemptuous of the unwritten law that blacks and whites must not associate—Margaret Harding, an English girl who is staying at a sanatorium in the Karoo, allows her friendship with him to continue in spite of repeated warnings. Through this imprudence trouble comes to them both. Kamis in sheer gratitude one day raises her hand to his lips; the act, harmless enough, was witnessed by an old reprobate who spread the story that they had been caught kissing; and everyone conspires to hound down the detested negro. This sounds rather thin; as a matter of fact there is not much more in the plot; but the admirable part of the book lies in Mr. Gibbon's picture of the sanatorium and its inmates, its proprietor and his wife. Dr. Jakes is an incurable inebriate, yet a clever fellow at his special task, the diseases of the lung and chest. His wife, banished far from the suburban amenities which at one time constituted her sole interest, is a pathetic figure throughout. When she scrutinises Margaret's dresses, and listens to their betraying "rustle;" when she peers over her letters and talks impressively of "the Penfolds of Putney," and the lost world for which she longs; when she listens at the closed door and calls her husband from his stupor; when she bravely and continually informs the undeceived "guests" that "Eustace" has been "ill"—all the time she is pathetic. Margaret's calm sparring with Mrs. Jakes is very amusing; so, too, is Mr. Samson, who retains the Piccadilly clubman air even though so far estranged from London's gaieties; young Ford, the only other guest of the establishment, is another finely-drawn character. He falls in love with Margaret, and the story ends with the hope that they will meet at Home, whither the girl goes after her escapade with Kamis. We hope to meet them too, in the pages of another story by Mr. Gibbon; for he has a clarity of touch and a delightful frequency of humorous metaphor that give pleasure to the literary critic as well as to the reader who only wants a good story.

The Woman-Haters. By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN. Illustrated (D. Appleton and Co. 6s.)

MR. LINCOLN is essentially the delineator of the homely life of the Cape Cod folk, and he delights in giving humorous accounts of the everyday happenings amongst them. In this connection he has already scored with "Keziah Coffin," "The Depot Master," and other novels of Yankee humour, pathos, and love. In "The Woman-Haters" these diverse feelings are very much in evidence, especially the last-named, paradoxical as it may seem. The longshoreman yarn has been evolved out of a magazine short story, and now appears in book form, with over three hundred pages of entertaining reading matter to its credit. The author, however, modestly disclaims any pretension to its being a novel, and labels it a mere "summer farce-comedy." The farce is there, and so is the comedy, and as it all takes place in the summer season, we presume he is right.

For a specimen of Mr. Lincoln's farce the reader should turn to the chapters "The Coming of Job" and "The Going of Joshua"—Job being a pup who "looked like a scrawny young lion," and "seemed to be always sufferin' and fillin' the land with roarin's like Job in the Bible," while Joshua was a decrepit old gee-gee who miraculously leaped a fence and galloped away, to the amazement of his owner. These incidents and the account of the cooking of the lobster will quickly dispel any ordinary fit of the blues; and the most inveterate case of the latter is sure to yield to a perusal of the chapter headed "The Picnic," in which the elder of the two woman-haters has to swallow an abominable concoction called, "Stomach Balm," containing, amongst other ingredients, molasses, soft-soap, lamp-oil, and pepper. The younger woman-hater, temporary assistant at the East-boro Twin-Lights, has a decidedly pleasanter experience:—

His first thought, upon opening his eyes, was that he must close them again as quickly as possible because he wanted the dream to continue. To lie with one's head in the lap of an angel, while that angel strokes your forehead and cries over you and begs you for her sake not to die, is too precious a delusion to lose.

After that it became a case of "two hearts that beat as one," and woman-hating went by the board. The light vein of comedy running through the book and the occasional touches of pathos, serving as a foil to the capital farce, will, we feel sure, secure a wide circle of readers for "The Woman-Haters."

The Overflowing Scourge. By STEPHEN FOREMAN. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

THE most emphatic impression which Mr. Stephen Foreman's book gives us is one of wasted cleverness. "The Overflowing Scourge" is a good deal like a hard and relentless melodrama, performed by unnecessarily good actors. We admire the neatness and vigour of the author's style, and we like the clear and precise drawing of his lesser characters; but he does not succeed in making any of his protagonists human. They are merely bundles of virtues and vices, without charm, and sadly tainted by the atmosphere of crime which prevails throughout the story. Blanco Hamilton, the rascally judge, leaves us without indignation, black villain as he is. One feels that some sentiment of wrath should be aroused against a man capable of plotting the conviction of his innocent son for murder, and sentencing him gleefully to the utmost rigour of the law under the circumstances—a living entombment of fifteen years. But somehow, clever as certain passages in the trial are, the result leaves us cold. When the son comes out of prison, changed to an utter brute, he proceeds to live a life of profligacy and cunning, until killed in an encounter with his own offspring. He dies unmourned. Those characters who give most promise of being interesting—Porter, the rector of four souls, and his sister—drop early out of the story, and are then only met at intervals. Murphy, the publican, makes an excellent first appearance, but falls off afterwards, and the rest, with the exception of Porter's German brother-in-law, a person with a grotesque name which we have not space to write down, are quite uninteresting. It is Mr. Foreman's misfortune that with gifts far above the serial story he manages to give his work much the same sort of touch.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

IN the short preface he has written for his interesting book "Les Anglais à Paris" (Plon), M. Roger Boutet de Monvel notes that, although during many centuries a strongly marked antipathy existed between France and England, it is nevertheless with Great Britain that France has always had the most agreeable social intercourse. He also observes that, if during the seventeenth century "the artistic and mundane" domination of France predominated in England, the latter nation soon took her revenge from the eighteenth century onwards. And it is to the Anglo-French relations from 1800 to 1850, when British influence in France reached its culminating point, that M. Boutet de Monvel has consecrated his piquant and entertaining study.

He narrates how, after the rupture of the Treaty of Amiens, all British subjects who were, unfortunately for themselves, on French territory were suddenly arrested and incarcerated as prisoners of war by Bonaparte. He gives a vivid description of the aspect presented at that epoch by Verdun, one of the principal centres where the English prisoners under suspicion were confined. If we are to believe M. de Monvel—and there is every reason to do so seeing that his statements are based on reliable contemporary documents—the unlucky captives did not for an instant lose the stoicism and calmness which are generally supposed to be the special attributes of the Anglo-Saxon race. They did not even allow their enforced captivity to disturb their habits or customs, but continued to live as if they had been in their own good English homes, and Verdun thus soon assumed the picturesque aspect of an anglicised French city. Their detention threatening, however, to be unduly prolonged, it is hardly to be wondered at that, in spite of their practicalness and sang-froid, many of the English prisoners should have welcomed with real joy the news of the entry of the Allies into Paris. Amongst them some had, nevertheless, taken into affection the land where they had been detained so long—such as, for example, Lord Blayney, who, on the eve of returning to his native country, acquired a property in the neighbourhood of Verdun, where he had been a prisoner during four years, and declared his hope that France would often offer him an agreeable retreat for the summer months.

M. Boutet de Monvel next sketches the "Invasion of the Allies after Waterloo," and if, following the assertions of notable memoirs of the time, he attacks the conduct of the Prussian army then occupying Paris, we are happy to note that he renders all due homage to the behaviour of Wellington's soldiers during their sojourn in the French capital. Speaking of the aspect Paris presented at the time of its occupation by the Allies, M. Boutet de Monvel says:—

Cependant, aux yeux des étrangers, jamais Paris n'offrit de tableau plus imprévu, plus vivant, plus pittoresque; jamais la ville entière ne leur parut si pleine d'animation et de gaieté. Cela ne se conçoit que trop: sans doute après la campagne de Belgique n'avaient-ils pas les mêmes raisons que nous pour envisager les événements sous leur aspect mélancolique. Les Anglais surtout semblaient se complaire chez leurs ennemis de la veille. Touristes méthodiques, avides d'observer en détail le pays qu'ils visitaient, curieux d'amusements divers, chacun d'eux y pouvait à loisir satisfaire ses goûts de nouveautés. Mais ce qui les divertissait plus encore, était de s'y retrouver en pays de connaissance, de rencontrer au passage amis et parents qui tous instinctivement se donnaient alors rendez-vous en France.

And, in order to well prove how deep was their appreciation of the French nation in general, and of French women in particular, several notable English gentlemen, such as Ball Hughes, Lyne Stephens, &c., married irresistible dancers of the Opera!

In the chapter dealing with Lady Morgan (Miss Owen-son), who was then one of the features of the English colony in Paris, M. Boutet de Monvel quotes the following passage from the Journal de Paris, which throws an interesting side-light on the character of the authoress of "The Wild Irish Girl":—

Lady de Morgan a été reçue, connue et presque idolâtrée dans presque tous nos cercles à la mode. Elle nous a étudiés de la tête jusqu'aux pieds, de la cour jusqu'au village, du boudoir à la cuisine. Elle a tout vu, tout observé, tout analysé, tout décrit, les hommes et les choses, les propos et les caractères.

After a most entertaining chapter on the English colony in Paris, and the Anglomania which then reigned in the French capital, the author of "Les Anglais à Paris" devotes several pages to "Thackeray in Paris," which present a warm appreciation of the great writer on the part of a Frenchman. M. de Monvel says:—

En France, que sait-on de Thackeray? L'on sait qu'il vécut sous le règne de la Reine Victoria, et figure au nombre des grands romanciers de l'Angleterre. L'on sait en outre qu'il écrivit un livre intitulé le "Livre des Snobs," peut-être a-t-on lu "Vanity Fair." Là néanmoins s'arrête invariablement pour nos compatriotes la liste de ses œuvres, et quant à son existence, il va de soi que nul ne s'en fait la moindre idée. Pourtant Thackeray laissa bien d'autres ouvrages qui, toute valeur mise à part, et pour cette seule raison qu'il y traite de nos mœurs et de notre histoire, mériteraient d'être mieux connus chez nous. Effectivement, peu d'auteurs étrangers ont plus souvent mis en cause la France et les Français, et peu, sur ce chapitre, ont fait preuve de plus d'expérience ou d'exactitude. Car, ce que l'on ne sait pas davantage, c'est que Thackeray vécut à Paris de longues années, qu'à Paris il acheva son éducation, qu'il apprit à juger de ses propres moyens, et que finalement, après avoir débuté comme élève de Gros, il y écrivit son premier livre.

Thus does M. Boutet de Monvel, in his interesting study, endeavour to make his compatriots appreciate and understand the author of "The Newcomes," who professed such a deep affection for Paris, his "dear city."

"Les Anglais à Paris" forms both recreative and instructive reading, and, after having carefully perused it, we are inclined to think that the principal lesson which it teaches is that the enmity which existed for so long between England and France was especially the work of politicians and diplomats, for at heart both nations, though absolutely different, had many points in common. The "entente cordiale" always existed between them, unsuspected but latent, for does not the old adage say very truly, "Les extrêmes se touchent"?

There has been a rich harvest of novels, and we mention a few before again turning our attention to more serious works. "Le Journal de Cloud Barbant, Neurasthénique," by M. Paul Adrien Shayé (Ollendorf, 3f. 50c.), is particularly worthy of mention. The theme is original, there are curious psychological deductions, and often a form of esprit which greatly reminds one of English humour, a quality both rare and appreciable in a French author. The general tone of the work is synthesised by the opening phrase, "Je m'embête"—"I feel bored"—which forms also the conclusive sentence of Cloud Barbant's odd diary. "Josun Meunier," by Emile Moselly (Ollendorf, 3f. 50c.), is a remarkable representation of French rural life and thought, and reveals strikingly the mentality of French peasants, and that of the workmen of provincial towns. E. Nolly, in "La Barque Annamite" (Fasquelle, 3f. 50c.), gives a picturesque vision of the life of the poorer classes of Annamites. In these pure and symbolical pages the heart of ancient Annam seems still to throb, though its pulsations are very faint and irregular under the ever-growing pressure of French domination.

MM. Cario and Regismanset have undertaken in their new work "L'Exotisme, la Littérature Coloniale" (Mercure de France, 3f. 50c.), to determine the influence which the exotic has had on our civilisation, and especially on French literature. For, thanks to the unquenchable thirst for the unknown which torments nearly all human beings, the life of humanity—both as masses and individuals—has been greatly enlarged and enriched. In order to impress upon their readers the necessity of movement for both body and mind, the authors of "Exotisme" quote Nietzsche's "Ecce Homo" as follows:—

Être assis le moins possible ; ne pas ajouter foi à aucune idée qui ne serait venue en plein air, alors que l'on se meut librement. Il faut que les muscles, eux aussi, célèbrent une fête.

With the passing of ages exoticism has exercised an always more powerful attraction on the imaginations of the different races ; and what must have been in primitive times a mere search for warmer climes has gradually evolved, in our highly developed civilisation, into one of the most refined of pleasures. The authors glance through the literary works of antiquity, which best reveal the influence of exoticism, and amongst their choice we notice specially the "Periplus" due to Hanno, the Carthaginian, who undertook to visit the regions situated beyond the Pillars of Hercules. In the Byzantine epoch of Greek literature a certain Antonius Diogenes wrote a romance entitled "The Incredible Things in Thule ;" whilst the "Ethiopica," by Herodotus, provoked in later days many imitations, amongst which may be mentioned the works of Mlle. de Seudéry, Urfé's "Astrée," and Guarini's "Pastor Fido." After having summarily enumerated the different works inspired by exoticism until the thirteenth century, MM. Cario and Régismanset make the following declaration concerning the writers of the fourteenth century and onwards:—

Beaucoup (des écrivains du XIV^e siècle à la Révolution) semblent possédés d'une extrême agitation, qui, en dépit de la difficulté réelle des communications les pousse aux déplacements fréquents. Rabelais passa une partie de sa vie en voyages ; de même Baïf, de même Ronsard, et nous verrons Scarron, peu de jours avant sa mort, projeter un grand voyage en Orient. Mais il faut arriver à Montaigne pour rencontrer un auteur à qui ses manifestations de tourisme inspirent véritablement une œuvre. Montaigne participe d'ailleurs du même esprit que des poètes comme Ronsard ou Baïf. L'intense curiosité de la Renaissance l'a touché de sa grâce. Il semble qu'à cette époque l'on assiste à un élargissement subit de la sphère des connaissances humaines. Le "désir de voir," s'accroît d'autant.

Indeed the love of the exotic attained to such a degree in the eighteenth century that French art in all its branches became orientalised at that period. And this fact, stated by MM. Cario and Regismanset, was corroborated by a most interesting exposition which took place last winter in one of the sections of the Louvre Museum, and which was exclusively devoted to the Chinese influence on French Art during the eighteenth century.

After studying carefully Bernardin de St. Pierre's rôle in the exotic division of French literature as well as that of his most famous disciples, amongst whom we must place Châteaubriand, the authors turn their attention to the exotic movement in modern literature, and they observe therein a prodigious activity. They ask this question: "Does there really exist a colonial literature?" And, after having weighed the opinion of some of the most competent contemporary writers, they come to the conclusion that, though French literature has not produced, as yet, a real colonial literature, and though until now "exotisme" has meant simply an artificial continuance of romanticism, a reaction seems to be dawning, and it is to be hoped that soon an authentic colonial literature will form itself, and thus rejuvenate by new sensations, new thoughts, and new themes the actual French novel.

MARC LOGÉ.

ACROSS THE SOLENT

At first glance little connection may be apparent between the Solent and Dr. Watts. The doctor's poetical powers have been largely eclipsed by the doggerel bearing his name which is to be dug out of ancient popular hymnals. By reason of his lack of critical literary continence he gave many hostages to fortune. His redundant verbiage has mostly been scrapped. There remains a residuum of high merit, familiar household words which seem destined to last as long as the English language. The hymn commencing "There is a land of pure delight" is one of the well-tuned sacred songs which appeal to the universal instinct of mankind. The spectacle of ranks of men ever marching onward into oblivion affords a subject which arrests the thoughtless. The savage in the roll-call of his tribe has brought home to him the mutability of earthly things. As a counterpoise to deadening fact, he weaves sagas of the future about the chief who has travelled beyond the border of the known. True the parted guest has cast aside his body, but, save in tribes the most depraved and brutelike, primitive man regards the lost companion as the companion still. The ancient Egyptian built a temple, wherein he placed a duplicate of the lost friend's body in stone. This counterfeit body he believed the soul of the dead man could inhabit, as he willed. One step farther carried a race to ancestor worship. The Egyptian was wont to be more provident still. He insured the life of a national hero against the shocks of chance. A prince or great one must be guarded from the risk of having no tangible shelter for his spirit, if death were to strike him down unexpectedly. Even in respect of post-mortem security the rich man could thus get the best of it, for he could afford to pay an artificer to make him duplicate soul-shelters. In some of the temples may be found presentments of the child, the youth, the mature man, the decrepit man, of him whose temple it is. Such an one was surely safe from the blows of fate. His other self stored in its special temple would give his wandering ghost shelter, whenever the dagger of chance gave him quietus, and clearly the grown man's ghost could not take possession of the child's image. So the great one's risk was narrowed to the possibility that an enemy might break in and smash his images. If the enemy did so, and also destroyed the temple that contained them, it was indeed a case of "alas! poor ghost!"

In Dr. Watts' hymn above referred to is enshrined a pervading faith in the Providence that shapes our end. It is said to have been suggested by the view from Southampton Water across the dancing waves of the Solent. That little passage to the opposite shore was to its writer an image of the journey of peace-parted souls:—

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dress'd in living green ;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

There is one strip of pine-crowned sea-marge on the mainland which is plainly visible from Cowes. Here the ordnance geological map makes this alluring note: "Palæolithic implements at the base of the gravel." A few days ago we sailed for this spot, like argonauts on quest. The Solent was sparkling with millions of jewels. Every ripple and wavelet was faceted with diamonds that came and went with each dimple of the surface. We had to dodge the tide, which runs with great force down the fairway of the channel. That meant a pull to hug the shore round Egypt Point; then up with our tiny sail and away, like a Portuguese man-o'-war, but not, like that timid and gorgeous mariner, ready to scuttle our craft and disappear at the winking of the eyelid of danger. A North German liner was heading for New York, carrying a cargo of strike-bound American tourists. We were warned that we were running into the jaws of a trap, that the inhabitants of the spot we sought were about as hospitable to those who landed as the ancient Cornish wrecker. We had not taken a special policy at Lloyds, and in a foolhardy frame of mind sailed on. Murray somewhat reassured us. He distinctly advises picnicing on this foreshore. He says that the house hard by was once owned by Count Batthyany, that it used to be known as "Luttrell's Folly." In what respect Luttrell was foolish history said not. Murray further stated that Lord Irnham, when back from military duty in India, had pitched his tents there, and then built a house on lines similar to the spaces occupied by the tents. It reminded us of a friend who bought a billiard-table and then built a room to fit it.

Like the babes in the wood, in spite of our impending doom, we sped on undownhearted. It neither affected our appetites nor our spirits. The towers of Osborne, silhouetted against the skyline, grew small by degrees and beautifully less; the pine trees stood out in grand simplicity. Soon our Viking craft stranded on the terra incognita and we sprang ashore. Had we followed precedent, we ought to have tumbled on our noses and then declared that we but embraced the land we had come to conquer. Out of respect for other possible claimants we refrained.

"At the base of the gravel." There was the gravel sure enough, and we proceeded "to rifle, rob, and plunder," but not without protest. A stout protestant stood, according to prediction, on the low cliff and harangued us on the rights and wrongs of the situation. We had no right there. "Nobody hadn't no right there." He resembled the honest if unintelligent watchdog. We replied with gibes and babbled of statutes. He didn't know nothing about no statutes, but nobody hadn't no right to land nowhere. We politely pointed out that possession was nine points. We had in fact landed. That could not be controverted. The construction of groyning had resulted in a big accumulation of shingle. Surely, we hinted, he didn't suggest that a foreign raid could not be made below high-water level. Then, with a view of ingratiating ourselves, we asked where the best blackberries were to be found. Our polite query added fuel to the flame. He announced his intention of going to the agent of the property and reporting all the damning facts of the case. He scouted, as a base subterfuge, the plea that the object of our visit was to pick up stones. Thus was our visit to "the base of the gravel" accompanied by human barks from aloft. Our pockets bulged with nefarious stones. Evidently we were dangerous rioters, and the next step would be to mobilise the Boy Scouts and their broomsticks.

We may record the fact that the Coast Erosion Royal Commissioners have just reported in favour of establishing a public right of way along all foreshores. Does not this right now exist below high-water level? We do not believe that the possession of manorial rights carries with it power to stop the passage of pedestrians below high-water level, except in those instances in which, by encroachment of the sea, the actual soil of the marge between high and low water levels can be demonstrated to have been part of the area conveyed.

Another glance at the geological map brings us to the following tempting inscription, about a mile away from our battleground—"Peaty mud with bones of elephant, acorns, and estuarine shells." "Estuarine shells." There we have it. Cast back the searchlight of imagination, and in the mind's eye we may repeople a shadowy shore with colossal Tertiary brutes. The mammoth and the hippo and the giant turtle once basked out their existence on these waters, then bounded by a mud-flanked estuary under a tropical sun. A vast sluggish stream flowed across what is now the English Channel, to leave a huge basin where the city of Paris stands to-day, and thence to wind in a stagnant torrent to the ocean. The fossil river in its time was a European Orinoco, and everything that lived and moved upon its banks, rejoicing in the sun, spent its little span of life, unheeding the slow-moving drama, as æon by æon an increasing purpose ran. Thus the mudlark creatures tore each other and died out. They left their bones embedded in the slime which was their habitat, and a drama truly marvellous to him who has eyes to see was rung down act by act.

SIR RICHARD BURTON—I.

BY FRANK HARRIS

RALEIGH, Sir Walter of that ilk, has always seemed to me the best representative of Elizabethan England; for he could speak and act with equal inspiration. He was a gentleman and adventurer, a courtier and explorer, a captain by sea and land, equally at home in Indian wigwam or English throne-room. A man of letters, too, master of a dignified, courtly English, who could write on universal history to while away the tedium of prison. Raleigh touched life at many points, and always with a certain mastery; his advice to his son is that of a timorous prudence. "Save money," he says; never "part with a man's best friend," and yet he himself as a courtier could squander thousands of pounds on new footgear. One of the best all-round men in English history was Raleigh, though troubled with much serving which, however, one feels came naturally to him; for he was always absolutely sceptical as to any after-life, and so won a concentrated and uncanny understanding of this life and his fellow-men. And yet Raleigh perished untimely on a scaffold, as if to show that no worldly wisdom can be exhaustive, falling to ruin because he could not divine the perverse impulses of a sensual pedant.

But in spite of the vile ingratitude of James and his base betrayal, aristocratic England managed to use Walter Raleigh and rewarded him, on the whole, handsomely. He played a great part even in those spacious days; was a leader of men in Ireland in his youth, a Captain of the Queen's Guard in manhood; and, ennobled and enriched, had his place always among the greatest, and at last died as an enemy of kings.

But what would the England of to-day, the England of the smug, uneducated Philistine tradesmen, make of a Raleigh if they had one? The question and its answer may throw some light on our boasted "progress" and the very noble and self-satisfied present-day civilisation of till-and-pill.

Richard Burton I met for the first time in a London drawing-room after his return from the Gold Coast in the early 'eighties. His reputation was already world-wide—the greatest of African explorers, the only European who had mastered Arabic and Eastern customs so completely that he had passed muster as a Mohamedan pilgrim and had preached in Mecca as a Mollah. He knew a dozen Indian languages too, it was said, and as many more European, besides the chief African dialects; was, in fine, an extraordinary scholar and a master of English to boot, a great writer.

I was exceedingly curious, and very glad indeed to meet this legendary hero. Burton was in conventional evening dress, and yet, as he swung round to the introduction, there was an untamed air about him. He was tall, about six feet in height, with broad, square shoulders; he carried himself like a young man, in spite of his sixty years; very abrupt in movement. His face was bronzed and scarred, and when he wore a heavy moustache and no beard he looked like a prize-fighter; the naked, dark eyes—imperious, seeing eyes, not over friendly; the heavy jaws and prominent hard chin gave him a desperate air; but the long beard which he wore in later life, concealing the chin and pursed-out lips, lent his face a fine, patriarchal expression, subduing the fierce provocation of it to a sort of regal pride and courage. "Untamed"—that is the word which always recurs when I think of Burton.

I was curious about so many things in regard to him that I hesitated and fumbled, and made a bad impression on him; we soon drifted apart—I vexed with myself, he loftily indifferent.

It was Lovett-Cameron who brought us closer together; a typical sailor and good fellow, he had been Burton's companion in Africa and had sucked an idolatrous admiration out of the intimacy. Burton was his hero; wiser than any one else, stronger, braver, more masterful, adroit; he could learn a new language in a week and so forth and so on—hero-worship lyrical.

"A Bayard and an Admirable Crichton in one," I remarked scoffingly. "Human, too," he replied seriously, "human and brave as Henry of Navarre."

"Proofs, proofs," I cried.

"Proofs of courage!" he exclaimed, "every African explorer lives by courage: every day war-parties of hostile tribes have to be charmed or awed to friendliness; rebellious servants brought to obedience; wild animals killed, food provided—all vicissitudes Burton handled as a master, and the more difficult and dangerous the situation the more certain he was to carry it off triumphantly. A great man, I tell you, with all sorts of qualities and powers, and, if you followed his lead, the best of 'pals.'"

"No one would believe how good he is; he nursed me for six weeks through African fever—took care of me like a brother. You must know Dick: you'll love him. . . ."

Thanks to Cameron, Burton and I met again and dined together, and afterwards had a long palaver. Burton unbuttoned himself, and talked as only Burton could talk of Damascus and that immemorial East; of India and its super-subtle peoples; of Africa and human life in the raw to-day as it was twenty-thousand years ago; of Brazil, too, and the dirty smear of Portuguese civilisation polluting her silvery waterways and defiling even the immaculate wild.

I can still see his piercing eyes, thrill to his vivid, pictured speech; he was irresistible; as Cameron had said, "utterly unconventional." Being very young, I thought him too "bitter," almost as contemptuous of his fellows as Carlyle; I did not then realise how tragic-cruel life could be to extraordinary men.

He was of encyclopædic reading; knew English poetry and prose astonishingly; had a curious liking for "sabre-cuts of Saxon speech"—all such words as come hot from life's mint. Describing something, I used the phrase, "Frighted out of fear." "Fine that," he cried; "is it yours? Where did you get it?"

His ethnological appetite for curious customs and crimes for everything singular and savage in humanity was insatiable. A Western American lynching yarn held him spell-bound; a crime passionnel in Paris intoxicated him, started him talking, transfigured him into a magnificent storyteller, with intermingled appeals of pathos and rollicking fun, camp-fire effects, jets of flame against the night.

His intellectual curiosity was astonishingly broad and deep rather than high. He would tell stories of Indian philosophy or of perverse negro habits of lust and cannibalism, or would listen to descriptions of Chinese cruelty and Russian self-mutilation till the stars paled out. Catholic in his admiration and liking for all greatness, it was the abnormalities and not the divinities of men that fascinated him.

Deep down in him lay the despairing gloom of utter disbelief. "Unaffected pessimism and constitutional melancholy" he notices "strike deepest root under the brightest skies," and this pessimistic melancholy was as native to Burton as to any Arab of them all. He was thinking of himself when he wrote of the Moslem, "he cannot but sigh when contemplating the sin and sorrow, the pathos and bathos of the world; and feel the pity of it, with its shifts and changes ending in nothingness, its scanty happiness, its copious misery." Burton's laughter, even, deep-chested as it was, had in it something of sadness.

At heart he was very English; there was a large humanity in him, an unbounded charity for the poor and helpless; a natural magnanimity, too; "an unconditional forgiveness of the direst injuries" he calls "the note of the noble."

His love of freedom was insular and perhaps extravagant, showing itself in every smallest detail. "My wife makes me wear these wretched dress-clothes," he cried one evening. "I hate 'em—a livery of shame, shame of being yourself. Broad arrows would improve 'em," and the mocking revolt danced in his eyes.

Like most able, yet fanatical, lovers of liberty, he preferred the tyranny of one to the anarchical misrule of the many. "Eastern despotisms," he asserts, "have arrived nearer the ideal of equality and fraternity than any republic yet invented."

"A master of life and books," I said of him afterwards to Cameron, "but at bottom as despotic and tameless as an Arab shaykh."

Two extracts from his wonderful "Arabian Nights" are needed to give colour to my sketch. I make no excuse for quoting them, for they are superexcellent English, and in themselves worthy of memory. Here is a picture of the desert which will rank with Fromentin's best:—

Again I stood under the diaphanous skies, in air glorious as ether, whose every breath raises men's spirits like sparkling wine. Once more I saw the evening star hanging like a solitaire from the pure front of the western firmament; and the after-glow transfiguring and transforming, as by magic, the homely and rugged features of the scene into a fairy-land lit with a light which never shines on other soils or seas. Then would appear the woollen tents, low and black, of the true Badawin, mere dots in the boundless waste of lion-tawny clays and gazelle-brown gravels, and the camp-fire dotting like a glow-worm the village centre. Presently, sweetened by distance, would be heard the wild, weird song of lads and lasses, driving, or rather pelting, through the gloaming their sheep and goats; and the measured chant of the spearsmen gravely stalking behind their charge, the camels; mingled with the bleating of the flocks and the bellowing of the humpy herds; while the rermouse flittered overhead with his tiny shriek, and the rave of the jackal resounded through deepening glooms, and—most musical of music—the palm-trees answered the whispers of the night breeze with the softest tones of falling water.

And here a Rembrandt-etching of Burton story-telling to Arabs in the desert:—

The Shaykhs and "white-beards" of the tribe gravely take their places, sitting with outspread skirts like hillocks on the plain, as the Arabs say, around the camp-fire, whilst I reward their hospitality and secure its continuance by reading or reciting a few pages of their favourite tales. The women and children stand motionless as silhouettes outside the ring; and all are breathless with attention; they seem to drink in the words with eyes and mouth as well as with ears. The most fantastic flights of fancy, the wildest improbabilities, the most impossible of impossibilities appear to them utterly natural, mere matters of everyday occurrence. They enter thoroughly into each phase of feeling touched upon by the author; they take a personal pride in the chivalrous nature and knightly prowess of Tajal-Muluk; they are touched with tenderness by the self-sacrificing love of Azizah; their mouths water as they hear of heaps of untold gold given away in largesse like clay; they chuckle with delight every time a Kazi or a Fakir—a judge or a reverend—is scurvily entreated by some Pantagrueist of the wilderness; and, despite their normal solemnity and impassibility, all roar with laughter, sometimes rolling upon the ground till the reader's gravity is sorely tried, at the tales of the garrulous Barber and of Ali and the Kurdish sharper. To this magnetising mood the sole exception is when a Badawi of superior accomplishments, who sometimes says his prayers, ejaculates a startling "Astaghfaru'llah"—I pray Allah's pardon—for listening to light mention of the sex whose name is never heard amongst the nobility of the desert.

Even when I only knew him thus as a great writer I touched the tragedy of his life unwittingly more than once. I had heard that he had come to grief as Consul in Damascus—Jews there claiming to be British subjects in order to escape Mohamedan justice, and when thwarted stirring up their powerful compatriots in London to petition for his recall; his superior, too, at Beyrout dead against him—he was recalled, some said dismissed. I felt sure he had been in the right. "Won't you tell me about it?" I asked.

"The story's too long, too intricate," he cried. "Besides, the Foreign Office admitted I was right. . . ."

When I pressed for details, he replied:—

"Do you remember the cage at Loches, in which an ordinary man could not stand upright or lie at ease, and so was done to death slowly by constraint. Places under our Government to-day are cages like that to all men above the average size."

THE MAGAZINES

ONE of the most noteworthy articles in the magazines this month is "The Labour Revolt and its Meaning," in the Nineteenth Century, by Mr. Ellis Barker. Seen dispassionately, it is not only noteworthy, but extremely significant. The name of the writer, to say nothing of the manner of its writing, protect it from any charge of demagoguery, and therefore its deliberate weighing-up of the causes that went to the making of the late strike, together with what we may confidently expect in the future as a result of it, is the more important, altogether apart from the highly valuable mass of statistics brought together. For instance, Mr. Barker takes the Board of Trade statistics that seem to declare that

"British wages range from 35s. to 45s. per week." Against this statement he analyses the "Report of an Inquiry by the Board of Trade into the Earnings and Hours of Labour," with the result that he discovers that "the earnings of almost six million of British workers engaged in some of our large industries 'ranged from 9s. 3d. to 27s. 3d. per week, not allowing for short time and unemployment, and if we allow for these, the foregoing wages will be reduced by 10 per cent., or by from 1s. to 3s. per week.'" Against this he estimates "the minimum cost of living," which "allows nothing at all for luxuries such as beer and tobacco, amusements, recreation, newspapers, railway and tram fares, postage-stamps, &c." He examines in turn the conclusions come to, and the investigations followed, by Mr. B. S. Rowntree, the Right Hon. Charles Booth, and Lady Bell, and arrives at the amazing fact that some 30 per cent. of the population, or, in other words, nearly 50 per cent. of wage-earners, "live in actual poverty"—an estimate which, as Mr. Barker indicates, does not include paupers, "casuals," or "the vast number of poor people who live partly or wholly on private charity. Such a weighty and impartial summing-up of the facts of the case gives Mr. Barker a considerable authority in examining the pettifogging methods of the present Government in dealing with the situation. As we have frequently declared in these columns, we have every desire for a full recognition of the facts of the case, and it is a grave thing when we find a man like Mr. Ellis Barker concluding, as he does, that 'we must prepare for the possibility of a revolution.'"

An article of gentler purport, though not of less importance, in the same magazine, is by the author of "Thysia" (who now emerges as Mr. Morton Luce), entitled "The Hybrid Art." Mr. Morton Luce has not in prose that sense of form he displayed so well in "Thysia," but his matter commands our fullest sympathy. His article is a protest against that form of spurious criticism that would seek to obliterate the essential distinction between poetry and prose. As he remarks, the plea that there is no such distinction, but that rather both are different forms of the one thing, is chiefly advanced by those who are prose-writers. One can very well understand coppersmiths vaunting themselves as goldsmiths; but that does not advance the matter. Indeed, it is only a form of special pleading. A good deal of the argument is concerned with an examination of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's drama "The Agonists," which has already been criticised in these columns somewhat on the same lines. We very heartily agree with him that the distinction between poetry and prose is a wellnigh impassable one, and that it therefore behoves poets especially to maintain it. Sir Harry H. Johnston has a weighty and responsible article on "Alcohol in Africa" that should be widely and carefully read. Its importance may be gauged by one of the remarks he makes in passing to the effect that, however much the white man may wax indignant at the question of indecent assault by black men in Africa, it is nevertheless mainly due to the drink that he himself has introduced into the continent. Miss Gertrude Kingston writes on psychic phenomena under the heading of "Some Ordinary Observations on Extraordinary Occurrences."

The Fortnightly has chiefly been noticeable of late by reason of the number of anonymous and pseudonymous articles on political questions. There is an instinct that causes one to set a lighter value on such articles than on the franker type; nevertheless there is not much doubt as to the authorship of the contribution with which the magazine opens, entitled "Democracy Arrives." In view of the "conversations" now prevailing between France and Germany the further anonymous article entitled "The German Plan of Campaign against France" makes interesting reading. On the literary side (and perhaps on the far more interesting and readable side) the two chief articles are "Some Writers of the Celtic Renaissance," by K. L. Montgomery, and "Remy de Gourmont," by Arthur Ransome. The first of these writers treats an exceedingly interesting subject in an all-embracing yet rather discursive way. There is, of course, little or no criticism in the article; the space did not allow of that. There are, however, but few names of note in the movement of which she treats whom she fails to notice. Mr. Ransome draws attention to a choice and all too little-known writer of the generation of Villiers de L'Isle Adam.

In the Cornhill there is an admirable article by Andrew Lang on the Baconian hypothesis (for it has not even advanced to the rank of a theory) which he calls "Shakespeare or X." It well repays reading, if only because it exposes some of the many argumentative devices which Mr. Greenwood employs in his portly book on the Baconian idea. Another and equally admirable paper is by Mr. Edmund Gosse, entitled "A Danish Poet." It describes a visit paid by the writer to Frederik Paludan-Muller at Fredensborg so long ago as 1872. There is a somewhat extraordinary and perplexing article that calls itself "Something to be Forgotten," by Claude E. Benson, concerning which it is difficult to speak. It reads like the account of an authentic experience; yet it is framed in the fashion of fiction. Whether fiction or authentic narrative, it makes good, stirring (and also, be it said, instructive) reading.

Considerably the most interesting and readable article in Blackwood's is anonymous, entitled "Christmas at the Court of Menelik." Its subject is in itself sufficient to command interest; but this incidental matter is aided considerably by skilful telling. Two good stories are "Did We Eat Him?" being a yarn of the sea by Sir C. H. T. Crosthwaite, and "A Safety Match," by Ian Hay. A magazine that we have wished to mention for some time, but which, for some reason or another, has always seemed to arrive inopportunistly, is The Open Window. The present number is not so excellent as many we have seen, in quality or in quantity. The chief item of interest in it is the frontispiece by Norman Wilkinson. In delicacy of drawing and in earnest expressiveness it is a very fine piece of work. A strong and forceful story also is that which heads the magazine, entitled "Her Father and Mother," by William Shirlaw.

M. JULES FERRY AND WAR

BY ONE WHO KNEW HIM

As the dispute between Germany and France becomes acute two factors are certain to show themselves more and more prominently which at the beginning very few persons took into account. One is the lust of the Germans for riches, the other the French fear of war. Both factors make, of course, for peace. The daily papers tell us now that the first factor is already operating; Berlin has had a black Saturday; securities have fallen heavily; there is a run here and there and everywhere on savings-banks, and widespread ruin among small investors all over Germany. Already the losses on the German Bourses amount to many millions. The Russians are withdrawing their deposits from German banks, and Frenchmen are calling in their loans. The German middle-classes are being taught that war with France would be ruin to three out of every ten tradesmen. This fact alone, this object-lesson in the seriousness of modern war, and in the part played in modern war by wealth will give Germany pause. Such a lesson of course could not prevent war if war commended itself to the Emperor, for he will always be backed up in any aggression by the landowners and nobles, the officers and Junkers.

The French fear of war is to me bound up with the name of Jules Ferry; it was Ferry and his fall which first showed me how strong was the French love of peace. Every one will remember that for something like a year Ferry was the first man in France. He was supposed to have brought about the war in Tonkin, and I went across to see him when his enemies, and especially the journalist Rochefort, were making it hot for him. Because of the Tonkin war Rochefort had nicknamed him in derision "Le Tonkinois."

The first impression Ferry made on me was that he was half a lawyer and half a butler—he looked like a butler and talked like a lawyer. He was a man of medium height, broad and stout, with long whiskers. The features were not bad, the forehead high and broad, the nose long but rather fleshy, the chin and jaws ditto, the bony structure submerged in fat. The pale blue eyes were inexpressive, helpless, vague eyes, which accentuated a certain sheepish expression. The lips had character of a sort; they were rather thin and flexible; the man a talker born, like a swimmer, energetic and oily, made for the surface. I supposed he was still a power in France, but soon found that he himself had no illusions on the matter.

"The attack on me," he cried, "is disgraceful, quite immoral. 'Tis backed up even by my own colleagues, who were as responsible as I for the Tonkin Expedition. They all leave me in the lurch, and Rochefort attacks, attacks, attacks with that devilish persistence of the mosquito mind. Even he had nothing to say against the Tonkin Expedition at the beginning. . . ."

"Of course the adventure has not turned out well. It was longer than one thought, and cost infinitely more than any one imagined, and France does not see that she has got any benefit by it. But, after all, if one does not go forward in this world one is sure to go back. If we are not aggressors we shall be robbed. It is very difficult." (Truly it is difficult for the elderly swimmer when the wind rises and the waves beat, and darkness covers the waters.)

"But these attacks, after all," I said, "don't affect you, do they? Surely Rochefort is not taken seriously?" "You have no idea how seriously," he replied. "I had no idea till the other day, when I went down to visit my own department, how strong he is. The French peasant proprietors hate war; they are against me even in my own place. I had no idea that there was such a love of peace in France—peace at any price. Don't you believe all this talk of war and revenge. It is impossible in France. The moment any one attempted to preach it he would be ruined irretrievably, even in his own constituency."

"The old French spirit of daring, the old French love of glory will not be seen again till the generation who knew '70 and its horrors has utterly died out and been forgotten. War won't be possible in France for another twenty years, and even then the first Minister who preaches it will probably have a bad time."

It is twenty years since those words were spoken, and M. Delcassé has had a hard time, as M. Ferry predicted; but Delcassé is coming again to the front, and I believe that the mourning emblems on the memorial of the two lost Provinces in the Place de la Concorde in Paris are withering. I cannot conceal my conviction that one of these days I shall see the memorial flowerclad, rejoicing in white and rose petals. For Germany to-day is weaker than even M. Delcassé imagines, and France is stronger. France even to-day would make something better than a drawn battle of it with Germany, and with the British Fleet to help and 200,000 British soldiers moving towards Metz from Calais the contest would not be long.

AUTUMN NOVELS

WITH the lengthening evenings and the quickly approaching end of the holiday months publishers set to work to provide the novel-reading public with new bills of fare. Sometimes they are more appetising than others. Last autumn one of them may have had an alluring dish concocted by one of the great "sellers"—Mr. Hall Caine perhaps, or Mr. Rudyard Kipling. This autumn, at any rate, there are at least three such dishes. They bear the names of such old and well-cried chefs as Miss Marie Corelli, Mr. H. G. Wells, and Mr. J. M. Barrie. Mr. Barrie, who has been silent for far too long a time, has written a new story round two of his characters who have found a place in the hearts of all genuine children, whether young or old—"Peter and Wendy." Mr. H. G. Wells has made a collection of his curiously interesting short stories, and has put them together under the title of "The Country of the Blind." Miss Corelli's new novel is, we are told, selling well.

Already, too, we have had new novels—some of them quite excellent—from Mr. W. J. Locke—"The Glory of Clementina Wing," which is distinctly his best work—Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, detective stories, of all things, Mr. Bernard Capes, Mr. Warwick Deeping, Miss Maxwell Gray, Mr. Robert Barr, Miss E. S. Stevens, Mrs. B. M. Croker, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, Mr. Alfred Tennyson—"A Portentous History," which is very good reading—Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick, Mr. Robert Machray, Mr. L. G. Moberley, Mrs. Baillie Reynolds, Mr. Rider Haggard, and Madame Albanesi, whose new book, "Poppies in the Corn," is, she tells us, not a new book at all, but a very old one reissued.

Of new and interesting novels yet to come there are many. Of these Lucas Malet's "Adrian Savage," in which we are to be taken from London to Paris and back again, Mrs. Humphry Ward's "The Case of Richard Meynell," Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole's "The Order of Release," and Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's "An Accidental Daughter," will inevitably find many readers. So also will Mr. Anthony Hope's "Mrs. Maxon Protests," Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "The Song of Renny," Mr. R. H. Benson's "The Coward," Mr. Robert Hichen's "The Truthful Vine," and Mr. Arnold Bennett's "Hilda Lessways." These do not, however, by any means exhaust a very plethora of forthcoming novels. Library shelves are soon to contain contributions from Mr. H. M. Munro, the satirist, who calls himself "Jaki"—his book is called "The Chronicles of Clovis"—Mr. A. E. W. Mason with a novelised version of his play "The Witness for the Defence," Mr. W. W. Jacobs with "Ship's Company," Miss M. E. Braddon with "The Green Curtain," Mr. Henry James with "The Outcry," Miss Dolf Wyllarde with "The Unofficial Honeymoon," Mr. Oliver Onions, with "Good Boy Seldom," and Mr. Algernon Blackwood with "The Centaur."

And yet there are others which are likely to render less monotonous the long evenings this side of Christmas, and, possibly, with luck and advertising, the other side of it as well. For instance, there are "The Inside of the Cup," by the American, Mr. Winston Churchill; "For Henri and Navarre," by Miss Dorothea Conyers; "Etham Frome," by Miss Edith Wharton; "The Dewpond," by Mr. Charles Marriott (who was supposed to have deserted novel-writing for journalism); "The Satanist," by Mrs. Hugh Fraser; "A Weaver of Dreams," by Miss Myrtle Reed; "Hurdcott," by Mr. John Ayscough; "The Common Law," by Mr. Robert Chambers; "Lalage's Lovers," by Mr. G. A. Birmingham; "The Courtier Stoops," by Sir James Yoxall; "The House of Robershay," by Miss Emma F. Brooke; and "Penny Monypenny," by Mary and Jane Findlater.

In this long list there are not included the novels of the "new writers," any one of whom may turn out to be an embryo star, or the ephemeral work of that large and rather pathetic class which writes, is not accepted, and finally publishes with a third-rate publisher at his, or mostly her, own expense—living always to repent the deed at leisure. There are, too, a few novels which, although brought out in the spring, have lived to jostle elbows with books cut from the press. Not many—perhaps at the most half a dozen. "The New Machiavelli" is one, and another, certainly, is Miss Netta Syrett's "Drender's Daughter." It is not too much to say of the latter that if it had been written sixty years ago it would have placed its author among those whose books are evergreen. It is worthy of George Eliot. It is a novel of immense power, much wit and satire, and a delicacy of portrait-painting very rare in these days of hurry and bustle. Nothing more true and moving has been written in memory than the poignant description of the child-mind suffering under the loss of her mother. "The Dop Doctor," now becoming, as things go, an old book, is still being read, and "Queed" makes new friends daily. "When the Red Gods Call," by Miss Beatrice Grimshaw, is a discovery of Messrs. Mills and Boon on which they are to be congratulated. It has many editions yet to run.

ART EXHIBITIONS

THE LONDON SALON OF PHOTOGRAPHY

THAT there exists an Art of the Camera as well as an Art of the Pencil or Brush is amply proved by the interesting Autumn Exhibition of the London Salon of Photography at 5A, Pall-Mall East. Unyielding and uncompromising as the process of exposing and developing a negative may seem, the sun proves himself the finest artist of us all; there is plenty of room, however, for the human touch, by which his pictures are softened and presented in a manner acceptable to eyes which have been trained by generations of brush-work. Four years ago we wrote in THE ACADEMY, "A photograph can contain, if we wish, almost as much personality and individual charm as a painting;" in other words, it may be something more than a mere record of fact—it must be more, if it is to have any artistic quality.

The couple of hundred photographs tastefully displayed at the Gallery of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours should not be neglected by any one who is desirous of seeing the latest phase of good work with the camera. Venturesome, startling, and even irritating—at first glimpse—some of them may be; but the undeniable fact remains that they mean something. With admirable wisdom the Committee of Selection have realised that a photograph with an idea behind it, not necessarily beautiful, but of certainty suggestive, is worth a score of the ordinary meaningless pictures of strange scenes or quaint incidents. Thus the excellent study entitled "A Shower," by H. Wild, conveys much more than the mere curve of Regent Street which it depicts: it holds the spirit and motion of the city. Thus, again, two "Portraits" signed D'Ora, one of a woman with exquisite, lightly-veiled arms, the other of a girl nested in furs, with a beautifully expressive face, convey infinitely more than the customary exhibit of the photographer's window: they suggest femininity in its most delicate and spiritual quality. "Speed," a mere smudge of grey at a casual glance, develops by a closer inspection to the bonnet of a motor-car with two shadowy figures behind it, all reeling at a dangerous angle; it is not, however, one of the most successful exhibits.

It is, of course, out of the question to notice even a quarter of the items in the space at our disposal, but a few more may be alluded to as exceptionally worthy. One of the best things in landscape is "The Dyke Bridge," by H. E. Franzmann, which has a distant view beneath the single span of an old bridge, cleverly chosen for position. "Cannon Street Station" is finely impressive, by J. H. Anderson, and the two best studies of interiors are "Rose" and "Leçon de Musique," by Guido Rey. Among flower studies, though there are very few to compete, the daintiest is "Paönieu," by Otto Ehrhardt, and in the same category we may place "Pomegranates," by Mrs. Minna Keene, a South African exhibitor. Her picture of a flock of geese is full of quiet humour. A delightful nude is entitled "A Study in Light Tones," by Bertram Park, and we must not omit to mention some specimens of Mr. and Mrs. Cadby's well-known work. There are also some very fine examples of the multiple gum process, the subtle colourings of which show to great advantage.

The Exhibition will be open until October 21st, from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., and we are asked to state that on Tuesday and Friday evenings, beginning with September 15th, lectures on themes of interest will be held in the Salon; on these dates the Exhibition will be open specially from 7 to 9.30 p.m., the charge for admission remaining unaltered. This pleasant innovation should be of great use, for discussion will be invited, and the points raised will be illustrated by the plentiful examples of almost all phases of the art of the camera which grace the surrounding walls, and, occasionally, by lantern views.

MR. GORDON CRAIG'S DRAWINGS AND MODELS

IMMEDIATELY after having witnessed Sir Herbert Tree's magnificent staging of "Macbeth" I visited with pleasure the exhibition at the Leicester Galleries of Mr. Gordon Craig's drawings and models for "Macbeth" and other plays. The drawings are highly impressionist, and it is indisputable that those dealing with incidents in "Macbeth" and "Hamlet" are intensely suggestive of the sombre grandeur of the plays. Sir Herbert Tree may possibly have owed some of the inspiration of his scenic effects to a knowledge of Mr. Gordon Craig's suggestions.

Whether this be so or no, both interpretations proceed on majestic and noble lines. Mr. Craig is possibly a disciple of Whistler—at any rate, he is quite successful in suggesting more than he depicts, and this, we take it, is a high artistic achievement. Minute notice of the forty sketches on view at the Leicester Galleries would be out of place; it would be as rational to apply the microscope of twentieth-century criticism to the intangible charm of the whimsies of a "Midsummer Night's Dream," or the picturesque vagaries of the witches around the cauldron. In these days, when it is the habit to seek to dispel what may be illusion by cross-examination or criticism, it is refreshing to discover that which defies either, and I offer my thanks to Mr. Gordon Craig. No. 34 in the catalogue, the comparatively finished sketch of "Wapping Old Stairs," is humorous and also fearsome. I have heard of Sisyphus, and have glanced at the Inferno, but to look at "Wapping Old Stairs" makes one's legs and back ache. Mr. Gordon Craig says of it in the catalogue, "I wanted to know for once what it felt like to be mounting up impossible ladders and beckoning to people to come up too."

"Me miserable which way shall I fly" immediately occurred to my mind, and after a fleeting glance at the models illustrating the sketches, which were quite clever, especially that of Lady Macbeth reading the letter, I betook me to a taxi, and enjoyed some much-needed refreshment.

C. C.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE GROUPING OF THE POWERS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON, ST. PETERSBURG

It has been known for nearly twelve months that Russia and Germany had aimed at an agreement in principle concerning the Middle East. Some time necessarily elapsed while details were in process of arrangement, but the text of the Treaty has now been published, and consequently we are for the first time justified in offering an extended criticism of its provisions. In the columns of THE ACADEMY I have lost no single opportunity of combating the mischievous suggestion put forward again and again in certain quarters that a Russo-German understanding in the Middle East could not be otherwise than detrimental to the interests of Great Britain. An attempt was deliberately made, the purpose of which remains obscure, to convince the world that Russia had broken faith and friendship with her partners in the Triple Entente; that the balance of power in Europe had changed with amazing suddenness; and that, in consequence of the all-conquering diplomatic skill of the Kaiser in diplomacy, there had at last been established the League of the Three Emperors—the monarchs of Germany, Austria, and Russia—as against a somewhat frail entente between France and Great Britain.

Yet these statements were founded upon nothing more substantial than the publication of the alleged text of an agreement, said to have been arrived at between the Governments of St. Petersburg and Berlin, in the course of which it was represented that Russia promised to abstain from any combination of Powers hostile towards Germany. In the genuine document now forthcoming no such clause is to be found. Moreover, it may without hesitation be said that at no time was it ever contemplated that the agreement should extend beyond the questions relating strictly to the Middle East. A moment's consideration of the international situation as it existed when the two countries entered upon the negotiations ought surely to have persuaded the most superficial observers of the trend of world policy that it was not in the interests of Russia for her to consent to link her destiny with that of Germany; and in any case there stood the unalterable truth that the alliance with France imposed an insuperable obstacle to a Russo-German understanding of a comprehensive nature.

It may be urged, however, that treaties between nations are to-day worthless, or, at least, only of value in so far as they provide some basis from which wrangling in the future may start. Doubtless this cynical view applies to what might be termed ordinary agreements relating to any particular part of the world, as, for instance, the Act of Algeciras, the Treaty of Berlin, and the numerous conventions in existence concerning China; but, dishonest as may be the ways of modern diplomacy, the world of our time has yet to witness the destruction of a solemn alliance between two Powers. To the cynics I am perfectly willing to concede that it is not altogether the recognition of moral obligations that has spared us such a spectacle. Alliances are, of course, founded upon the solid rock of mutual interests, but it is possible to conceive the coming of a time when they cease entirely to fulfil the purposes for which they were originally designed, or, because of changed conditions, prove positively irksome to one or, perhaps, even to both parties to the contract. In this event allies find themselves very much in the position of a man who, while finding it necessary to elbow an undesirable partner out of his prosperous business, wishes at the same time to retain him as a friend. Invariably such a man, although he may act with generosity, finds that he has added one more — and the bitterest of all — to the number of his enemies.

To a large extent I have described the position of Great Britain in regard to the alliance with Japan. Our aims in the Far East are no longer closely identified with those of Japan, and hence we have revised the Treaty so as to reduce our risks proportionately. The Japanese now consider themselves grievously wronged, and are coquetting with Germany. But, in the case of Russia and France, mutual interests are to-day, if anything, stronger than they were when the alliance was first concluded. A casual glance at the map is sufficient to show that to either of these Powers German domination in Europe would spell disaster, if not ruin. Hence the maintenance of cordial relations between Russia and France is rightly regarded by both nations as a matter of life and death. It is not forgotten that the Triple Entente which preserves the balance, and therefore the peace, of Europe was the outcome of the alliance. Had it not been for the fact that Russia was the partner of France, many years must have elapsed before she could have brought herself to a settlement of all outstanding issues with Great Britain. The Triple Entente was the corollary of the Entente Cordiale, and it was made possible by the existence of the Franco-Russian Alliance. The suggestion that international relations have undergone the slightest change as a result of agreement between Berlin and St. Petersburg over Middle Eastern questions is clearly untenable. Russia certainly has no reason to be dissatisfied with the concrete results of her association with France and England. For example, she has strengthened her position both in Persia and in Northern Manchuria, and an enormous amount of French and English money has been invested in the country. It is estimated that the British capital in Russian State loans and undertakings generally is equal to no less than thirty-eight millions sterling. On the other hand, Russia's previous experiences of the Wilhelmstrasse diplomacy have brought her nothing but loss of prestige. Having herself no interests worth considering in Manchuria, Germany readily accorded sympathy to Russia in the campaign against the Japanese. For a time Germany was hailed as a friend in need, but so soon as the war was over, and Russia's military activity was temporarily paralysed, came the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and with it humiliation for Russia. Then the agreement in regard to the Middle East has simply and solely been rendered necessary because without it Germany refused to recognise the special position occupied by Russia in the northern sphere of Persia. Russia realised that Germany was determined to establish a railway connection between the proposed Baghdad system and Teheran. To prevent the growth of German interests in Persia some such arrangement as that just concluded was therefore absolutely essential; the only alternative was resort to war. Russia has already had experience of the cost and trouble involved by reason of the existence of a frontier in Europe conterminous with that of an aggressive Germany, and naturally she was anxious to avoid the creation of a similar situation in the region of the Middle East. It is sufficiently disquieting to realise that Germans will one day be established along the Baghdad route, but their exclusion from Northern Persia will to a large extent place this territory in the position of a buffer state.

For the moment there is no serious cause for friction between the two Empires. Russia may pursue undisturbed her policy of peaceful penetration in Persia. Germany has on her side ensured that the Baghdad system shall not be left without a link with the Persian railways. She regarded this question as constituting the only serious issue between herself and Russia. It is due not alone to her persistency, but also, to no small extent, to her pliability in the negotiations that an agreement was concluded. For several reasons the Wilhelmstrasse is anxious to avoid unpleasantness with Russia. At present Germany enjoys an enormous lead over other countries in trading with Russia. As the population of the Empire is increasing at a remarkable rate, and the exploration of the vast resources of its soil has now begun in earnest, premier position in the Russian market is a prize well worth striving for among the nations. Then Germany has not been slow to realise that in the event of a European war an invasion from two sides would tax to the utmost her military capacity. But her statesmen imagine that unless Russia were directly concerned in the issue she would not be prepared to join Great Britain and France in taking the field; and it is here that they seem to be singularly misinformed as to the real feeling entertained towards their aims in foreign countries. They delude themselves with the belief that the abrupt developments of their policy have no lasting consequences. For example, they will doubtless be surprised to learn that in Russia the Bosnia-Herzegovinian incident is still fresh in the memory. When the Agadir affair is at an end they will expect the French people to forget immediately that it ever happened.

The world is weary of the insecurity caused by constantly recurring false alarms for which Germany is solely responsible. The utter insincerity and the brutally abrupt aggressiveness that distinguish her diplomacy, mingled as it is with Imperial utterances the bombast of which is positively nauseating, have rendered her the object of just suspicion among all the nations of the earth. The one moment she is righteously solicitous for the hapless lot of the Moroccan people; the next she is exploiting their misfortunes as a means to driving a territorial bargain with France; or, again, she is posing at Constantinople as the friend, and incidentally as the financier, of Islam, and at the same time drawing up an agreement with Russia in which she recognises the superior position of that country in the neighbouring land of Persia upon which Turkey has some designs. After acquiescing, with a flourish of the sabre, in the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina as compensation to Austria for her enforced loyalty to a "big brother," she endeavours, a few months later, to soothe the ruffled feelings of Russia by requiring that she shall build a railway to feed the Baghdad system. But in Russia the agreement has not been received with the least evidence of enthusiasm. I repeat, there has been nothing in the way of a rapprochement with Germany. On the contrary, the occasion has been used for a reaffirmation of unswerving adherence to the Triple Entente and reiteration of loyal sentiments towards France.

In regard to the present crisis it is understood that should all other methods fail, Russia may perhaps attempt mediation. This mediation could, after all, only take the form of persuading Germany to moderate her demands; but its significance would certainly not be lost on the Wilhelmstrasse, where the hope is still entertained that the Triple Entente is divided against itself. No greater error of judgment could ever cloud the mental vision of statesmen responsible for guiding the destinies of a nation. It cannot be too clearly emphasised that Great Britain, France, and Russia are in perfect accord as to the policy to be pursued during the present negotiations over Morocco, and, what is of still more importance, are agreed upon a common policy in the event of the failure of those negotiations. Germany must not count upon the least support from Russia. She must not even rely upon that nation assuming a neutral attitude. Her policy and her people are frankly disliked by the intelligent masses in Russia. To-day, Russia is a far greater factor in the situation than she was at the time of the Balkan coup d'état. Her financial position has been enormously strengthened, and her army reformed and concentrated in European Russia. All the military officers with whom I have spoken (I mention the circumstance solely because of its significance) are keen for a war—a war in which Great Britain would be their country's ally, and Germany and Austria her enemies.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

IN reading of such a performance as that accomplished the other day on the Brooklands track by a 25-30h.p. six-cylinder Sunbeam, one wonders which ought to excite the greater astonishment and admiration—the perfection of the car's mechanism, or the nerve, skill, and endurance of the drivers—Mr. Coatalen and his assistant. Nine hundred and eight miles (within a few yards) covered in twelve consecutive hours' running! Figures frequently convey little to the imagination, but when one reflects that this represents a speed of seventy-five miles an hour maintained for twelve hours the wonderful nature of the performance must be apparent to the most unimaginative. Much has been written about the phenomenally rapid development of the motor industry, but perhaps nothing furnishes a more striking illustration of this than a comparison of the speed and reliability of the modern car, as exemplified by the Sunbeam with the snail-like progress and continuous breakdowns of the cars which took part in the memorable "race" from London to Brighton some fifteen years ago. In those days even the most enthusiastic could not have anticipated such a marvellous advance in so short a time.

Writing of the Sunbeam performance, one is reminded of the fact that it removes from the list of records one that has stood since 1907. We refer to that put up by Mr. S. F. Edge for twelve hours' running in the course of his stupendous feat in driving a six-cylinder Napier for twenty-four consecutive hours at the average speed of sixty-one miles an hour. This has always appeared to the writer to be the most wonderful performance in the history of automobilism, and, risky though it is to prophecy about anything in connection with motor records, it does not seem likely that it will ever be beaten.

Among the 1,748 motorists who joined the ranks of the Automobile Association and Motor Union last month were H.R.H. Prince Maurice of Battenberg, the Duc d'Orléans, the Nawab of Mandot, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Egmont, Sir Edward Grey, Mr. H. W. Carr Comm, M.P., Mr. D. Dalziel, M.P., and Mr. Justice Bucknill. The list of newly-elected members also includes nearly one hundred lady motorists, among whose names one notices those of many distinguished members of society—H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, the Countess of Selborne, the Countess Dowager of Radnor, Lady Dewar, Lady Maud Lyon, and others. It is interesting to note also that the Association, in addition to being by far the largest body of motorists in the world, now contains more motor-cyclist members than any motor-cycling organisation in the country.

The Rolls-Royce polished chassis, which has attracted visitors from all over the world to the Company's stand at Olympia and to their dépôt in Conduit Street, has now a home worthy of its reputation. When, some months ago, it became necessary to consider the question of redecorating the present showrooms and remaining there, or of taking new premises which had been offered to them in Pall Mall, the directors decided upon the former course, rightly assuming that everybody who is in a position to purchase a Rolls-Royce car knows where it is to be found. Having arrived at this decision, they determined that the work of redecoration should be done regardless of expense, and in a style befitting the car which so many experts have pronounced to be the finest in the world. The scheme ultimately decided upon, after consultation with Mr. E. K. Purchase, F.R.I.B.A., one of the architects of the new premises of the R.A.C., is seventeenth-century English, and distinctly characteristic of Sir Christopher Wren. The most notable features are the richly and elaborately ornamented ceilings, from which are suspended dish-lights of alabaster; the carved English oak panelling, with gilded cornice and oak pilasters, and carved bases of the Ionic order; and the floor, which is set out in grey-and white squares of Sicilian marble. The general effect is most imposing, and numerous visitors who have already inspected the premises since the renovation have expressed the opinion that they are the finest motor showrooms in London.

As a striking illustration of the excellence of the A.A. and M.U.'s organisation and the extent of its ramifications, the following incident is worth recording. During a recent tour in France a member of the Association had his car stolen by means of a trick which indicated considerable ingenuity upon the part of the thief. Directly the owner discovered his loss he communicated the facts to the police, and also advertised in the local papers offering a reward for the recovery of the car. Four days having passed without result, he returned to London and consulted Scotland Yard, but was informed by the officials there that the matter was outside their jurisdiction. He then applied to the A.A. and M.U. for assistance, and within a few hours the Association had sent a description of the missing car to every hotel and garage within 200 miles of Nice (where the loss was discovered), and also informed every Custom-house on the French frontier. Telegrams giving information as to the movements of the car on different occasions began to come in at once from various parts of France, and within three days of the first notification of the loss to the A.A. one was received stating that the car had been abandoned by the thief at l'Argentière, near Briançon. The owner at once proceeded there, and, after having duly complied with the formalities imposed by the French police authorities, regained possession of his car.

Progress in aviation continues apace. During the past week the altitude record has been beaten by Garros, who has attained a height of nearly $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles, Mlle. Dutrieu has established a fresh record for lady-aviators by accomplishing a non-stop flight of 143 miles, and the first aerial postal-service has been inaugurated with as much success as could have been anticipated. In the meantime there has been rather more than the usual crop of fatalities, at least half a dozen having unfortunately to be added to the list of martyrs to the new science of locomotion.

R. B. H.

THE NEW MICHELIN AVIATION PRIZE.—The Michelin Tyre Company of London wish us to state that the above prize is not being offered by them, as stated in our issue of September 2nd, but by Michelin et Cie. of France.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THESE are glorious days for the bear, which means that they are peculiarly disagreeable for the average person. It is only the professional who goes short of stocks. The amateur never thinks of selling. Yet more money is made by selling than by buying. A man who buys shares hangs on. If he sold the moment the market went against him he would, in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, be able to buy back lower down. The tenacity with which people hang on to shares for years is one reason why no one makes money out of speculation. Jews always cut their loss, but the Christian seldom does—he thinks it shows funk. But courage in money matters is out of place. The French Banks are showing a wise discretion in withdrawing their loans to Germany. The Deutsche, the Dresdner, and the Disconto are examples of misplaced courage. They have foreseen the present crisis for some years. Yet they have gone on over-lending, and to-day they wonder what will happen if war actually does occur. There are two ways of looking at the financial pressure now being put upon Germany by France. The man in the street says, "A jolly good thing;" the more nervous and perhaps more long-sighted person wonders whether it may not force Germany to say, "We will fight rather than pay." The threat held over Germany by Paris, that unless the German Foreign Office behaves itself all the millions will be recalled, might bring about the very crisis it is expected to avert. The matter has been discussed in diplomatic circles for some years past, and the Germans are credited with having said that war would be inevitable once the Great Paris "Five" decided to call in loans. We shall see. I see no signs at the moment of any big loans having been called in. The small Paris Banks are hard hit over the 14 millions Argentine Loan failure, and they got all the cash they could. But the Bank of France, the Crédit Lyonnais, the Comptoir d'Escompte, and the Banque de Paris et des Pays-Bas were not concerned in the Argentine business, and they do not appear to have moved.

The Berlin panic was the result of wild gambling in Germany, and had to come, war scare or no war scare. It was one of those things we all know must come. The President of the Reichsbank has told us plainly that the situation was dangerous—not once or twice, but repeatedly. As a result of his warnings there has been steady liquidation by cautious people for many months. But none of us thought there were so many bulls as turned out to be the case. It was a distinct shock. I believe that if the Paris banks keep cool and help Berlin, the Morocco question will be settled in a few weeks, but I fear that severe pressure may end in war. The diplomats do not want war. They are merely haggling; but if they find the screw applied they may be forced to fight in order to save the credit of the nation.

MONEY.—The Government has made a successful issue of Treasuries, and the price is but little better than the open market. This does not look like war. Cash and cash alone counts when nations are fighting, and not even Treasuries could be placed to yield £3 3s. 2d. per cent. if the big financiers thought that we were on the eve of battle. The cash position of our leading banks is very strong indeed. It has never been stronger. The Bank of England is also in a splendid position. But if the panic continues, and the Reichsbank raises its rate, we must expect a rise to 3½ here.

CONSOLS.—The silly Government circular about the purchase of Consols has done no good. What we want, and what we must have, is a Consol to bearer with coupons attached which may be purchased at any Post Office at the market price of the day. Everybody should be an investor in Consols. In France this is the case. In England the rich alone hold Consols. Irish land stock gives a good yield and is cheap to-day. India Three-and-a-half is also cheap, though in the present disturbed state of the market possibly we shall see lower quotations.

FOREIGNERS.—The newspapers talk war; but the great Banks of Paris do not sell any of their securities. Russian stocks are as steady as a rock. It is only the gambling counters that are affected. German Threes are at 82, which is hardly a war price. It would seem that the big financiers are having a complete clearance of non-dividend paying stocks and forcing all gamblers to stay their hands. But there is no panic amongst the solid shares.

HOME RAILS.—One is not surprised at low prices here, for it is evident that trade is dull. The Trade Returns for August were not good, and with labour troubles everywhere the gambler in Home Rails has a poor time. But the investor now has a great chance, for he can buy at almost the bottom. The man who expects to get in right down below the rest is a fool. No one can play "tops and bottoms." No one can always count upon always being able to buy gilt-edge securities like our leading Home Railways to pay him 5 per cent. We shall one day regret our tardiness.

YANKEES.—It is useless to suggest a purchase of Yankees, for the bankers are busy in collecting money for their German friends and they will not find money for the Wall Street speculator. Morgans, Kuhn Loeb, Hallgarten, Bleichroder, the Dresdner, Spyers, and the rest are so closely connected that no one can hope for good markets in New York when Berlin needs cash. Yet the investor can buy Unions, New York Centrals, Pennsylvanias with absolute confidence. Even Steel Preferred are cheap to-day, and Atchisons are not over-valued.

RUBBER.—The dealers think it fairly safe to bang rubber shares, and no one comes in to support the market. The only people who could do this are the trusts, and they have no funds. Most of them are already heavily committed, and dare not spend any more money. Mincing Lane speculators cannot get the banks to lend money on rubber shares in these dangerous days, and, indeed, the Lane in all its skirmishes with the Stock Exchange has invariably come off second best. The amateur has no chance against the "pro."

OIL.—The news that the Gates Company, the Texas Oil Company, intended to reduce its dividend did not improve Mexican Eagles. Lobitos have, however, been bought. The Balfour-Williamson crowd are evidently hoping to get big supplies of oil at depth, and the news is good. The Premier Oil and Pipe, which has been puffed more than any other oil company this past six months, is now very weak. The support has been withdrawn from the market, and no one wants to buy the shares.

KAFFIRS.—The shops pick up a few shares now and again, and bargain-hunters calculate lives and dividends and buy what they consider cheap. But the Kaffir market has had far too many disagreeable surprises to recover. The last Rand fiasco will not be forgotten for a long time, and there is therefore no hurry to buy Kaffirs.

RHODESIANS.—It would be foolish to gamble in Rhodesians with the chance of a European war. The stuff might be unsaleable for twelve months. Mines are amusing gambles when markets are good. To buy them in days like these is rank foolishness.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Until a week or two back this market had been the only one to keep its tone. But last Saturday's slump scared out the holders, and since then the tone has been weak. There are many cheap investments. But with declining trade and war scares I cannot but think that people should keep their money in their pockets.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- The Dempsey Diamonds.* By Allen Arnot. John Lane. 6s.
Mrs. Maxon Protests. By Anthony Hope. Methuen and Co. 6s.
The Better Man. With Some Account of What he Struggled for and What he Won. By Cyrus Townsend Brady. Greening and Co. 6s.
The Gallant Graham. By May Wynne. Greening and Co. 6s.
Hodson's Voyage. By W. H. Koebel. Illustrated by Fred Pegram. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Imperishable Wing. By Mrs. Havelock Ellis. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
"Ruffles." By L. T. Meade. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
A Woman's Error. By Charlotte Brame. Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.
The First Born. By R. Murray Gilchrist. T. Werner Laurie, 6s.
All Atory. By Maude Annesley. Mills and Boon. 6s.
A Weaver of Dreams. By Myrtle Reed. Coloured Frontispiece. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.
Hurdcott. By John Ayscough. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
The Miller of Old Church. By Ellen Glasgow. John Murray. 6s.
Can Man Put Asunder? By Lady Napier of Magdala. John Murray. 6s.
The Protector. By Harold Bindloss. Coloured Frontispiece. Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.
A Sentimental Cynic. By Will Westrup. Alston Rivers. 6s.
The Unofficial Honeymoon. By Dolf Wyllarde. Methuen and Co. 6s.
Lulage's Lovers. By George A. Birmingham. Methuen and Co. 6s.
Peter and Jane, or the Missing Heir. By S. Macnaughtan. Methuen and Co. 6s.
A Blood-Moon, the Buhl Cabinet, and Storics from Algiers. By Irene Osgood. Portrait Frontispiece. Everett and Co. 2s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

- The Motor Routes of England.—Western Section.* By Gordon Home (assisted by Charles H. Ashdown). With 16 Illustrations in Colour, 16 Town Plans, and 26 Route Maps. A. and C. Black. 5s. net.
The Stone Age and Lake Lothing. By J. Chambers. Norfolk News Co., Norwich.
What Will the Weather Be? The Amateur Forecaster's Vade Mecum. By H. G. Busk, F.R.Met.Soc. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Illustrated. W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge. 6d. net.
The Little Village. By Emery Pottle. Arthur L. Humphreys. 3s. 6d. net.
Early Etruscan Inscriptions. (Fabretti 2343-2346.) By George Hemphill. The University Press, Stanford University, California.
The Story of Pierrot. (World-Stories Illustrated.) By S. R. Littlewood. Herbert and Daniel. 1s. net.
In the Guiana Forest, Studies of Nature in Relation to the Struggle for Life. By James Rodway, F.L.S. New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.
More Letters to My Son. Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d. net.
Les Expériences d'Asthénia au Jardin de la Connaissance. By Alice Berthet. Frontispiece by A. Lorient. Gastein-Serge, Paris. 2fr.
Stalks in the Himalaya. Jottings of a Sportsman-Naturalist. By E. P. Stebbing, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S. Illustrated. John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.
Home Life in Holland. By D. S. Meldrum. Illustrated. Methuen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.
Malaria in the Punjab. By Major S. R. Christophers, M.B., I.M.S. (Scientific Memoirs, New Series, No. 46.) Superintendent Government Printing, Calcutta. 3s.
Dysentery and Liver Abscess in Bombay. The Report of an Enquiry carried out by Major E. D. W. Greig, M.D., D.Sc., I.M.S., and Captain R. T. Wells, M.A., M.B., I.M.S. (Scientific Memoirs, New Series, No. 47.) Superintendent Government Printing, Calcutta. 3s.
Syndicalism and Labour: Notes upon Some Aspects of Social and Industrial Questions of the Day. By Sir Arthur Clay, Bart. John Murray. 6s. net.

Cathedrals of Spain. By John Allyn Gade. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 15s. net.

VERSE

- The Blossomy Bough.* Poems by Shaemas O. Sheel. The Franklin Press, New York. $1.
St. John in the Isle of Patmos. By Alfred L. Woodard. H. R. Allen. 1s. net.
The Poetical Works of George MacDonald. Fine-paper Edition in Two Volumes. Chatto and Windus. 2s. net.
Verses. By Dolf Wyllarde. Photogravure Frontispiece. Stanley Paul and Co. 1s. 6d. net.
The Green Knight, A Vision. By Porter Garnett. Music by Edward G. Stricklen. Illustrated. Privately printed for the Bohemian Club. John Kitchen, Jr., Company, San Francisco.
A Legend of the Rose, and Other Poems. By Leyland Huckfield. The Author, 4120 Queen Avenue South, Minneapolis, Minn., U.S.A.

EDUCATIONAL

- A History of England for Schools. With Documents, Problems, and Exercises. Part I. (55 B.C. to 1603 A.D.).* By M. W. Keatinge, M.A., and N. L. Frazer, M.A. With Maps. A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d.
Les Dames Vertes. By George Sand. Adapted and edited by Eugène Pellissier, (Siepmann's Advanced French Series.) Macmillan and Co. 2s. 6d.
Elementary French Composition according to the New or Direct Method. By F. Victor Massard. Rivingtons. 2s. 6d.
Easy Parsing and Analysis for the Lower Classes in Secondary Schools. By J. C. Nesfield, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 1s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

- The Story of Korea.* By Joseph H. Longford. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.
An Imperial Victim: Marie Louise, Archduchess of Austria, Empress of the French, Duchess of Parma. By Mrs. Edith E. Cuthell. Two Volumes. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 24s. net.
Missionary Adventures: A Simple History of the S.P.G. By Georgiana M. Forde. With a Preface by Edward Talbot, D.D. Skeffington and Son. 2s. 6d. net.
The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson. By Graham Balfour. Methuen and Co. 1s. net.
The Dutch Republic and the American Revolution. By Friedrich Edler, Ph.D. The Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore. $1.
Twelve Bad Men. Original Studies of Eminent Scoundrels by Various Hands. Edited by Thomas Seccombe. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.
Twelve Bad Women. Illustrations and Reviews of Feminine Turpitude set forth by Impartial Hands. Edited by Arthur Vincent. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.
The Life and the Poetry of Charles Cotton. By Charles Jacob Semblower, Professor of English, Indiana University. D. Appleton and Co., New York.
Our Fighting Sea Men. By Lionel Yexley. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.
The France of Joan of Arc. By Lieut.-Colonel Andrew C. P. Haggard, D.S.O. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.
The Romantic Past. By Ralph Nevill. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 12s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

- Die Religion Babylonien und Assyrien. 17 Lieferung.* By Morris Jastrow, jun. Alfred Töpelmann, Giessen. 1 mark 50pf.
The Gospel for Both Worlds. Ten Sermons Preached in Our Father's House (Memorial Church), Worcester. By Edward Eells. Sherman, French, and Co., Boston, U.S.A. 60 cents.
The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue: An Introduction to the Study of Judaism from the New Testament Period. By W. O. E. Oesterley, D.D., and G. H. Box, M.A. Second and Revised Edition. Illustrated. Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.
Buried Pictures in our English Version of the Bible. By Walter B. Daddow. A. H. Stockwell. 2s. net.

PERIODICALS

- The Bookseller; Printers' Ink; Revue Bleue; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The Wednesday Review; Trichinopoly; The Publishers' Circular; M.A.B.*

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND
. . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

62-68, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON.
B.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
VIA the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA.

JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BREMEN.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,
NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
25 Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C.2, LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1839).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

To	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 21.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17½.	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

COORDITE RIFLES, .400, .500, .600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 375	Fiction 385
The Passing of Summer 376	The Theatre..... 387
An Expedient 376	Music 388
Plymouth: Past 376	Sir Richard Burton—II. 389
The Place of the Illus- trator 378	"Treasure Island" as a Book for Boys 391
Golf and the Sabbath in Scotland 379	"Red Ruin and the 'Making' of the Laws" —II. 392
Irish Legislative Assem- blies: a Retrospect—I. 380	New Zealand Sketches ... 393
Reviews:—	Autumn Books: General 394
Talleyrand-Périgord ... 382	Photography..... 395
The Land of the Morn- ing Calm 383	Imperial and Foreign Affairs 395
Ancient International Law 384	Motoring and Aviation ... 396
Shorter Reviews 385	In the Temple of Mammon 398
	Books Received 399

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference, to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE world of Russian politics has been shaken during the past week by the brutal assassination of M. Stolypin, Prime Minister of the Czar's dominions. Our correspondent at St. Petersburg will probably deal more fully with the causes and effects of this dastardly action in a later issue; meanwhile we wish to enter our protest against the exaggerated language used by a certain halfpenny paper in its comments upon the deceased statesman and what it is pleased to term "Stolypinism." Ignorance breeds intolerance, and to say that M. Stolypin "represents the evil genius of humanity," to say it under the cloak of a sanctimonious profession that "it is well to tell the truth even in the midst of a tragedy," is futile indeed. Such absurdities do no harm among people whose thoughts go below the surface of things; but since the paper in question probably circulates chiefly among those who are unwilling or unable to think deeply or logically, the words should not be passed over without reprimand. M. Stolypin was a man and a politician with definite views on the subject of what was best for his country, and it is in the worst possible taste, to say the least, to allow such statements as those to which we allude to attain the authority of print. We can only at the present moment express sympathy with the Russian Government in its loss, and reproduce the sensible words of another writer to the effect that "to the man who enabled the existing Russia to work during these essential years of recuperation, posterity may very well assign a high place in the world's gratitude."

B

The title of an article in the Literary Digest of New York for September 9th is "Scientific Management for Churches," and its text is the pronouncement of a Chicago Dean that the "philosophy of efficiency" can at least be tentatively applied to the working of religious bodies. Whether business methods—especially the business methods of the modern American—will lend themselves smoothly to operations which cannot well be governed by rule and measure is a debatable point. A man who is inefficient in his work can in ordinary commercial life be discharged; but how is the amount of good which a preacher or teacher does to be recognised? The efficient Church is not always the most popular one, and the man who does the most good is not the one who makes the most noise. In this connection it seems as though our friends across the Atlantic are waking up, for Mr. Pierpont Morgan and some of his colleagues have financed a new movement with the object of remedying the "deep general corruption" which, according to certain authorities, has gripped the United States during the last ten years. Five hundred "ministers of the new religion" were given a farewell banquet last Monday night.

These enthusiasts are to be divided into "teams of ten men, who will hold eight-day revivals in seventy-six cities of the United States." We have our doubts of these sudden spurts of fervour, but we shall look forward with interest to the proposed regeneration of New York, which begins on October 2nd. The weak point in the scheme appears to be the absence of the feminine element—the influence of the woman is to be entirely eliminated, the chief revivalist remarking that "there is no truth in this sentimental gush about woman's influence on man." That is precisely where he makes a mistake. From the very earliest times women have played notable parts in the history of great movements, and they show no inclination to sit down and fold their hands at the present day; but, apart from any question of "sentimental gush," women are specially suited for success in matters where suggestion rather than domination is the driving force. And, in religious affairs particularly, the principal note is not that of harsh compulsion, but rather the gentler one of unobtrusive persuasion.

Mr. Wells has republished the best of his short stories in a cheap edition with Messrs. Nelson, and has written an introduction to the book dealing with the short stories which began to flourish in England in the 'nineties. He talks of Kipling, Barrie, Stevenson, and Frank Harris, and the list seems right enough, except that perhaps Stevenson has hardly any right to be reckoned among masters of the short story. But this is not the view of the Athenæum. The Athenæum critic falls foul of the inclusion of Mr. Frank Harris's name, and has the bad taste to talk of "vulgarisation" and "popular taste," as if Mr. Frank Harris's stories were on a lower level than those of Mr. Kipling. Now, "Montes" and "The Modern Idyll," two of his stories, were translated when they first appeared, and were published in the Revue des Deux Mondes, under the editorship of M. Brunetière. This alone should have taught the critic of the Athenæum that, whether he likes them or not, the stories are in the front rank of literary craftsmanship. Mr. Arnold Bennett, who is among the ablest story-writers of this time, has declared that "Montes" is the best short story in English, and George Meredith held the same view. Under these circumstances Mr. Frank Harris can treat the condemnation of the Athenæum critic with the same cheerful disdain which he showed recently to the puritanical condemnation of the Spectator.

THE PASSING OF SUMMER

So it is done, thy reign of golden hours,
 The transient dream of thy enchanted sway !
 We stand regretful 'mid the drooping flowers,
 And watch thee fade along the sapphire way.
 Does it avail us now that well we knew
 Time must for thy sweet government grow late ?
 Sadly thy irised robes melt from our view
 Where white cloud-pylons guard the Western Gate.
 Yet in thy passing bind about thy brow
 One fragrant chaplet as remembrancer :
 For our leal tribute, lo ! the laurel bough,
 And for our grateful memories, lavender.
 So in thine exile thy dominion keep ;
 We, who awhile must grace the usurper's train,
 Have store of golden dreams to lighten sleep.
 We but await thee. Thou wilt come again ?

PHIL. J. FISHER.

AN EXPEDIENT

WE note with chastened pleasure that the Home Office has issued a circular launching a new measure of extreme importance on lines which, in the main, we see no reason to quarrel with. The Duke of Bedford and following him others have foreshadowed the necessity of such a movement as that to which the Home Secretary now lends his sanction. There can be no doubt that a force such as that which Mr. Churchill advocates would be a real safeguard in certain eventualities in piping days of domestic peace, which it seems we are to know no longer.

We might continue work in our industries, in time of external war, with confidence and complacency if we knew that we had a Territorial Army equal to the function of adequately protecting our shores against possible misfeasance or defeasance on the part of our fleets. We shall deal in a few weeks authoritatively on that subject. However far the Territorial system—good in outline—may fall short of military necessities, it is obvious that it is immensely strengthened by the voluntary movement, the Veteran—now called the National—Reserve. The Boy-Scouts who are so devoted to Lord Kitchener, and to whom he is so devoted, are another undoubted element of strength when the trouble is from without, and the same may be said of the Church Lads' Brigade and the Boys' Brigade.

Purely patriotic movements such as these are the breath of modern life, and supply the stimulus of hope when many features of the times are distinctly depressing—if not revolting.

The Home Secretary's scheme is the apex of much which voluntary effort has suggested, and—in so far as it is not a concession to panic—it is wholly to be commended.

The formation and objects of the contemplated special police force as set forth in the Home Office memorandum, which we do not hesitate to say in lucidity and directness is masterly, must appeal to all loyal and patriotic men. It recognises a change in the view of social problems the cause of which wise men do not waste their time in seeking to discover, but which they frankly admit exists.

To find a remedy suitable to the times is the task of a statesman, and Mr. Churchill, whom we have previously blamed not a little and have also sometimes praised, deserves, on this occasion, full recognition of a well-considered and statesmanlike proposal.

The danger of course which suggests itself is that the proposal is prompted by the desire of running away from the necessity for the employment of military force in phenomenal civil commotion. If that is the underlying motive a departure otherwise entirely commendable, should be condemned. The measures shadowed forth in the Home Office Circular would undoubtedly in many cases nip disorder in the bud, and in many other cases effectually deal with it in early and momentous stages. They would also be of the highest value in the time of war.

We own we do not like the passage :

In Mr. Churchill's opinion it is the duty of all police authorities to make arrangements in advance whereby the force under their control can on occasion be rapidly supplemented so as to be able to cope with sudden calls for extra police duty without dependence on military aid or assistance from neighbouring forces, which in certain instances it may not be possible to obtain.

It is impossible to quarrel with the wording, but with numerous unedifying examples of weakness at the Home Office fresh in memory, it is easy to observe that an invertebrate Secretary of State might view them as creating an agapemone of sloth and dereliction.

It must be clearly understood that measures which may, and we think will, be useful in often obviating the necessity of calling in the military arm, must not be allowed for one moment to interfere with recourse to such action when and where it is seen to be necessary. So long as human nature remains what it is, force and force alone is the ultimate remedy for vicious and unbridled violence.

CECIL COWPER.

PLYMOUTH: PAST

By WILFRID L. RANDELL

Upon the British coast, what ship yet ever came
 That not of Plymouth heares ? where those brave Navies lie
 From cannons' thund'ring throats that all the world defie ?

—DRAYTON.

It is not given to all towns to play a memorable part in the history of their country, however much they may become celebrated in the annals of county or provincial affairs. The exploits of local magnates and heroes may be as fine as you please, may be even worthy of immortality gained by song or epic ; but unless they bear some demonstrable relation to the fortunes of the land, they are often doomed to a fame-radius of perhaps fifty or sixty miles.

From very early times the port of Plymouth, or "Sutton," as it was named in the Domesday Book, was acquainted with wars and rumours of wars, though no specifically national event dowered it then with laurels. It was "well known to the Armorican Britons as the Hamoaze in the troublous times that followed the departure of the Romans," writes Mr. R. N. Worth, the author of the finest extant history of the borough, and the names of Sutton and the Hamoaze still distinguish its commercial and naval side at the present day. In the year 1287 Plymouth was the gathering-place of a fleet of over three hundred ships, and in 1377 it ranked as the fourth town of the kingdom. Little items of very human significance are on record which bring the men of those days vividly before our eyes ; here is one concerning Mr. John Facey, an excitable gentleman who was Mayor of the town in 1446. He lost his temper most regrettably while sitting in judgment upon others, and "struck the Town Clerk, as he sat upon the Bench, for addressing him without giving him his title of 'Worship,' for which he was fain to compound with a good round sum ; and he was called 'Worship Facey' ever after." He seems to have been rather a quaint character in his way, for it is recorded that he was "remarkably cholerick, and would run the whole length of a street after the whorson boys, as he called them, who took delight in flouting him as he passed." And when in 1448 he was elected to the high office for the second time he ungraciously remarked to his friends that "they might as well have continued him the whole three years, and that would have saved the trouble of choosing him again."

Plymouth has memories that are well-nigh inexhaustible. In the days of Breton skirmishes and escapades—of which there were many—it must have presented a tempting morsel to the marauders from the French coast. Once, at any rate, the women of the town bravely joined in its defence: "Like Amazons, by hurling of flints and pebbles, and such-like artillery, [they] did greatly advance their husbands' and kinsfolks' victory." It has stories of Katharine of Arragon, of Edward the Black Prince, and of innumerable maritime adventurers. But for all time the name of the "Metropolis of the West" will be associated chiefly with two events inseparably bound up with the history of England and the history of the United States of America—the defeat of the Spanish Armada, and the sailing of the Mayflower.

Every schoolboy knows, thanks to the prose of history-books and the poetry of Macaulay, the principal facts relating to the wars with Spain and the sailing of "that great fleet invincible." According to one account, the Armada consisted of "132 sail of large ships, twenty caravels for conveying their artillery and stores, and ten small vessels of six oars each, having on board 8,766 sailors, 2,088 galley-slaves, 21,855 soldiers, and 3,165 pieces of cannon." Old tradition has it—and it were wise not to cast doubt on this story in the presence of a Plymouth man, lest evil befall you—that one Francis Drake and his merry comrades were enjoying a game of bowls on or near Plymouth Hoe, when news of the approach of this huge crescent-shaped fleet was brought by an alarmed merchantman. In the true manner of the hero—and heaven forbid that we should discount his heroism, whether this particular item be truth or fancy—the sailor replied that there was plenty of time to finish the game and thrash the Spaniards too. In song and story the battle has been commemorated, and once for all "bonnie Devon" took her place as the home of the sea kings and the county of gallant fighters. "The gentlemen of Devonshire," says the chronicler, "greatly exerted themselves by fitting out all the ships they could procure, and hastening to join the English fleet, where they behaved themselves with the greatest intrepidity;" and here we may briefly record once more that "among the Devon worthies who distinguished themselves on this glorious occasion were Sir Francis Drake, Sir Martin Frobisher, Sir John Hawkins, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Robert Carey, Knight, and Edward Fulford, Esquire, then Sheriff for the County of Devon." Names with a fine flavour of the sea about them—names that ring in the ears and make the blood of a Devon man run more swiftly! For over two hundred years Plymouth celebrated the anniversary of the memorable day by ringing a peal of bells from the parish church; the custom, however, is now discontinued. The custom of playing bowls on Plymouth Hoe, on the other hand, seems likely to be perpetuated. In 1630 Westcote records that "the townsmen pass their time of leisure in walking, bowling, and other pleasant pastimes;" and at the present time the townsmen may be seen on any fine day philosophically watching the run of the balls on the level green which was opened a year or two ago.

In a much more peaceful manner did Plymouth link herself to English history on the other occasion to which we have alluded. During the early years of the seventeenth century "the severities used against the Nonconformists had continued to increase," and many good people sought to transfer their energies to some clime less harsh upon personal convictions. This is no place to discuss the ethical aspect of a persecution for which in many cases Nonconformists had only themselves to thank; suffice it to say that in this particular instance the flight to Holland, the sailing thence, and the final departure from Plymouth made history, and moulded the destinies of at least one nation; vicariously, of course, of many.

On September 6th, 1620, the devoted band sailed from Plymouth Barbican in the Mayflower, a little vessel of 180 tons, not so large as some of the dockyard tugs which nowadays thrash up and down the wide Hamoaze. She carried on board 101 passengers, men, women, and children, and "after a voyage of sixty-three days" (compare this with the present five-day trip on a spacious liner) "they landed at that part of the American coast on which they founded the towns of Plymouth and Boston. Such was the foundation of the United States of America," says the old writer. Mr. Worth—alas, that faithful historians so often must shatter the crystal of romance!—coldly remarks that the place is called Plymouth in Smith's First Account of New England, 1616—four years before the arrival of the Pilgrims. Who was "Smith"? and why should he interfere with our settled conviction that our beloved English Plymouth stood godmother to the new Plymouth of the "American Coast"? Let him be treated with the ignominy so unpoetic a creature deserves. At any rate, he cannot destroy the fact that the Pilgrim Fathers of the Mayflower actually landed there; and as a day or two ago I stood upon the granite stone let into the causeway of Plymouth Barbican, whereon is cut the simple inscription, "MAYFLOWER, 1620," I thought of the manifold troubles of sickness and death, of hostile Indians and scanty food, which those brave settlers suffered in the New Plymouth over the seas. I thought, too, of the homeward sailing of the gallant Mayflower, so beautifully told by Longfellow in his solemn hexameters:—

Just in the gray of the dawn, as the mists uprose from the meadows,
There was a stir and a sound in the slumbering village of Plymouth;
Clanging and clicking of arms, and the order imperative,
"Forward!"
Given in tone suppressed, a tramp of feet, and then silence.
Figures, ten, in the mist, marched slowly out of the village.
Standish the stalwart it was, with eight of his valorous army. . .
Over them gleamed far off the crimson banners of morning;
Under them loud on the sands, the serried billows, advancing,
Fired along the line, and in regular order retreated.
Many a mile had they marched, when at length the village of Plymouth Woke from its sleep, and arose, intent on its manifold labours. . . .
Out of the sea rose the sun, and the billows rejoiced at its coming;
Beautiful were his feet on the purple tops of the mountains!
Beautiful on the sails of the Mayflower riding at anchor,
Battered and blackened and worn by all the storms of the winter.
Suddenly from her side, as the sun rose over the ocean,
Darted a puff of smoke, and floated seaward; anon rang
Loud over field and forest the cannon's roar, and the echoes Heard and repeated the sound, the signal-gun of departure.
Then from their houses in haste came forth the Pilgrims of Plymouth,
Men and women and children, all hurrying down to the seashore,
Eager, with tearful eyes, to say farewell to the Mayflower,
Homeward bound o'er the sea, and leaving them here in the desert. . . .
Soon were heard on board the shouts and songs of the sailors.
Then the yards were braced, and all sails set to the west wind.
Blowing steady and strong; and the Mayflower sailed from the harbour.
Took the wind on her quarter, and stood for the open Atlantic, Borne on the sand of the sea, and the swelling hearts of the Pilgrims.

September 23, 1911

THE ACADEMY

is the English Plymouth bound ntry. Of other expeditions, Grenville, Lord Howard is no space to tell;
mouth of to-day,
the wide

"Ply-

an official position and must be accepted. In many such ways as this is the sensitive reader tried by the intrusive-ness of the illustrator.

Nor is this the only complaint we may make. Book illustrators are stepping further and further out of their proper province. They no longer make any pretence of serving their authors, but have set up in business for themselves, and dispose of other people's ideas. There is no monopoly in subjects. A man may give us a picture allegory of the French Revolution even though Carlyle has given us a poetic allegory. But let us have his own ideas upon the subject. If he illustrates Carlyle he is a mere purloiner of Carlyle's ideas. Let the book-illustrator come forth boldly as an original artist, and do his thinking for himself, or let him retire definitely to the humble position of commentator, which a draughtsman may fill as well as a writer. For if the illustrator has any moral right to step into a book at all is as commentator. His illustrations are "notes" upon the text, and like notes should be put in their proper place at end of the volume, where the reader may turn to them not, as he requires. They may inform us to advantage on many points of historical matters, such as costume; they may help us on many points of ignorance. For there are authors whose writing is sometimes a little heavy with technical who revel in their out of sheer delight in their of their subject. Here the illustrator may come to He may do all this without intruding upon the reader's own impressions.
ambitions go beyond that he may set up as a no reason in the world why we should not works in pictures as well as in words.
might be made, too, and of must be kept apart from the with it is as unwarranta portions me

the most precise imaginative writing there is a latitude of interpretation.

The imaginative work which is not purely satirical, but has touches of satire in it, is the most dangerous to lay open to the invasion of the illustrator. The pen has a great superiority over the pencil as an instrument of satire. For upon what is superficially ridiculous, the little tricks of appearance and dress, the pen can touch gently and humorously, but the pencil seizes upon them, exposes them brutally, and exaggerates them out of all importance. Yet, as, for example, in Thackeray's sketches, it is in satirical work of the lighter order, which does not strike very deep and is designed only to raise a jolly laugh, that the artist, if anywhere, may have a free hand.

When we come to the case of the artist who has turned author we are posed with a more delicate problem. It may seem overbold to suggest that "Trilby" is no exception to the rule. Yet to do this is no slight upon an indubitably fine artist. In the earlier chapters, where he touches real greatness, Du Maurier is for the moment finer as author than as artist. Trilby herself may well outlive, indeed already she has outlived, the Du Maurier woman. Her history may be studied and her character admired by generations which will see no beauty in the stern figure and heavy features of the women Du Maurier loved to draw, and which will find themselves hindered in understanding her charm when they have to associate it with such physical qualities. When that generation comes the illustrations will keep only an historical value, and their place will be the appendix.

Trilby, then, is no exception, but there is one class of book which must be excepted. Children's books present an entirely different problem, and must have their own rules. The imagination of the child is of quite different quality from the imagination of the man. It is stimulated by things, not words. A child can make a Spanish galleon out of a horsehair sofa, or a well-equipped, fast-moving locomotive out of a sewing-machine, with an ease which his elders may well envy. But he enjoys his fairy-story all the more if he has the princess and the dragon before him in black and white. There is a single rule—consistently ignored, as it seems to me, by most modern illustrators—which should direct the pictures in children's books. It rests upon quite a simple psychological fact. The child does not admit the word "unnatural" to its vocabulary at all; he hardly understands the meaning even of the word "strange." He is setting out upon the adventure of life with a tranquil and open mind. He is still untrammelled by experience; he does not, after the conceited fashion of men and women, try every new discovery upon that fragile touchstone. Sometimes in dreams you may recapture this glorious equanimity in the presence of strange adventures.

To the child there is nothing strange, nothing "unrabbit-like," as it were, in the behaviour of the White Rabbit in "Alice." It does not occur to the child—unless indeed his imagination has been limited and his tranquillity destroyed by the study of the "natural history" of rabbits—that rabbits do not, as a rule, do and say such things. His instinctive belief in their naturalness is in no way shaken by the fact that they lie beyond his own experience. But the modern illustrator—an unhappy man who has studied natural history—is oppressed by a certain strangeness in the White Rabbit's conduct. The White Rabbit is not as other rabbits are; and so he draws him grotesquely to mark the distinction, forgetting that it is a distinction which no child would make. It was the great achievement of Tenniel, with his understanding mind, that he made the White Rabbit exactly like any other white rabbit. And he made Alice like any other little girl, because he knew that every little girl would read those epic adventures with the knowledge that they might happen to herself any day of the week.

GOLF AND THE SABBATH IN SCOTLAND

GOLF

ALL real lovers of the royal and ancient game should play it at North Berwick. The air is the most perfect in Great Britain, the surroundings are lovely, and on that narrow strip of common which man's ingenuity has made into a golf-course are to be found the most noted in the world of fashion, politics, and sport. To stay at North Berwick in the month of September is just like being in London during the height of the season, for many who have never handled a golf-club in their lives drift up there and meander over the links or walk round with their friends, thus adding to the outrageous crush which already exists. The marvel is that many are not killed or injured by the golf-balls which, like round shot in the battles of one hundred years ago, are plunging everywhere, from front and behind, from north, south, east, and east, whilst all too frequent slices and pulls render even those spots which are supposed to be out of the line of fire absolutely unsafe. But no one seems to care, and no one ever seems to get killed; the course is fashionable, every one meets friends there, they all have a good time in the evenings, no one is hopelessly bored, and for these reasons the North Berwick links are regarded by many as the most perfect in the world. As a matter of sober fact, it would be difficult to find worse. They merely consist of a narrow strip of turf running along the seashore, and on this a Scotsman's frugal ingenuity has managed to lay out eighteen holes, a few of which are excellent, some moderate, and the majority distinctly bad. So many couples play on the course, that you are lucky if you get off inside an hour. You make your initial shot, and then there is a long interregnum before you can make your next, for the couple ahead of you are occupying the tee and laboriously trying to wriggle the ball in the hole. Now they are off, and your caddie informs you that you can play, when a couple cross your line of fire and take not the slightest notice of your frantic shouts of "Fore."

It must be understood that North Berwick, in addition to its other disappointments, is a public common, and all the townspeople have a right to stroll over it at will. Having passed out of range, you again settle to make your deadly approach, when a ball whistles by your head and falls plump on the ground within a few yards just as a little reminder that you are delaying the couple behind. By this time your nerve is somewhat shattered, and your approach is hopelessly awry. Whilst putting on the greens, balls are flying all around you—for the first green and the eighteen are situated on the same plateau, and all ill-aimed shots seem to come in your direction. But of all the nerve-trying experiences, driving off at the second hole is the worst. Here those who are approaching from the first hole have to land their balls directly over your head; while those who are approaching the eighteen green have also to land their balls over your head in front of you. You can take your choice whether you prefer to be hit on the back of the head or in the face, because there are countless couples who will accommodate you either way. Meanwhile, with the cannons blazing forth, and the air alive with hoarse cries of "Fore," you are expected to drive your own ball down a narrow strip of turf, with the sea-shore waiting for you on one side, and many perambulators full of ruddy-faced, healthy children on the other. If you slice your ball, you go into the sea; if you pull it, you enter a perambulator; and in either case you will probably intercept an approach-shot coming from before or behind.

The third hole is even more dangerous than the second, for here the strip of turf is at its narrowest, and the outgoers have to pass the home-comers. It is terrible work standing there to make a drive and seeing an obvious amateur on the green opposite about to do the same. If he drives perfectly straight, why then his ball will just pass you on one side; but that deadly slice! You know it is coming, and sure enough up goes his club—swish!—it has hit the ball, and a frantic shriek of "Fore" sets every one in the neighbourhood dancing round. The ball whistles by you like a pompom-shell, and lands just behind you, and you thank your lucky stars that you are still alive. From the fourth hole the course opens out, and you are safer; but coming home in the dusk, when the common is crowded, the real fun commences. You drive your ball in the semi-darkness through crowds of men, women, and children; you see them scatter like soldiers at the explosion of a shell, terrified, but determined to press forward to preserve their right of way over the common, or to die in the attempt. When you get in, you find you have taken just four hours to do eighteen holes, so frequent are the delays. But for all that, it is a grand game, golf, at North Berwick. It is fashionable, and if you are killed by a golf-ball it will probably be the misdirected shot of a Prime Minister, a Duchess, or a Prima Donna; so what does it matter?

THE SABBATH

Mr. Punch, when he wished to exemplify the characteristics of Scotland on a Sunday, drew a picture of a narrow street with the blinds down in all the cottages, not a pedestrian abroad, and in the centre, walking melancholy down the road, a single stranded cat, with its tail in the air and its back arched in sheer disgust. Now that is a very accurate picture of Scotland on the Sabbath. Everything is closed; every one goes about with a sanctimonious air in black clothes and white cravats. What a farce it is to attempt to keep up this colossal bluff of superior virtues over their sacrilegious neighbours across the Border. There ought to be a law passed to compel the Scots to come out of doors and show themselves on Sunday and to indulge in some healthy pursuit. The Seventh Day was designed according to the Scripture as a day of rest. What was meant was a day including harmless recreation and amusement; but Scotland resolutely refuses to adopt this correct construction, and prefers the rigid interpretation of John Knox. In this respect Scotland stands almost alone. In France Sunday is the day above all others devoted to amusement and recreation. The petit bourgeois takes his wife and family out to Versailles or Fontainebleau, or to the Louvre, or in the Bois. There they forget the toils of the week in the enjoyment of this one day of peace and pleasure, in pleasant intercourse with their friends. In Spain Sunday is also devoted to recreation and amusement, including bull-fights; in Germany the same, and so on throughout Europe.

The Sunday of England up to ten years ago was almost as painful as that of Scotland, but in this respect there has been a radical and wholesome change in recent years. There are so many more amusements open to the masses—so many concerts, so many excursions, so many municipal bands—that they have been dragged into enjoying themselves, with immense benefits to their health, both physically and mentally. In England Sunday is the day above all others devoted to golf—the one day in the week on which the weary City man and Government official can get away and spend a pleasant time on the links. Now golf is a Scottish game: it originated centuries ago in the Lowlands, and there are records showing that James I. played it. Therefore throughout the week the game flourishes in Scotland as it flourishes nowhere else, but on a Sunday the links are closed. You cannot have a game for love or money. The professional locks up on Saturday night and disappears till Monday morning; the caddies disappear, and the players dare not even set foot on the links to knock the ball about and indulge in a little practice. I know of one links where you can play on a Sunday if you pay a sovereign green fee, and if you carry your own clubs, for to employ a caddie is against the law. In this instance the Scot's commercial instincts have triumphed over his religious prejudices, and by paying a liberal toll to the local kirk the violation of the Sabbath is forgiven him. To have no healthy amusements in which to indulge must necessarily be very bad for the nation, more especially for the masses who toil during the week and who are in need of open air to revive their drooping energies.

How do they pass their time? On Saturday night a proportion of the population are inebriated, and carry home with them a supply of their favourite beverage to consume quietly on Sunday. Thus some of the significance of Mr. Punch's picture lay less in what one saw on the outside of the street—namely, deserted houses and the meandering cat—than on what was taking place within those closed blinds. And if we could lift the roofs of some of the pious cottages of Scotland at any time after kirk on the Sabbath, those who expect to find the head of the family reading the family Bible and giving interpretations of the Scriptures to his bairns would be grievously disappointed. The head of the family would be found absolutely "fou the noo," as Harry Lauder has it; and the bairns, instead of enjoying themselves under the blue sky in the fresh air, would be sitting round gazing on this unwholesome spectacle of the paterfamilias trying to drive away that terrible legacy of ennui left him by John Knox by too frequent libations in the natural beverage of his country.

AN ENGLISH VISITOR.

[We invite other views.—ED. THE ACADEMY.]

IRISH LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES: A RETROSPECT—I.

BY SIR CHARLES WALPOLE

WITH a Home Rule Bill on the horizon the old Irish Parliament becomes a matter of some historical interest. It signed its own death warrant after the Rebellion of 1798, when a Bill was passed through both Houses embodying certain resolutions, the first of which was "that a legislative union of the two kingdoms was desirable." This was the last Irish statute: the 40th of Geo. III., c. 38. It has been loosely stated that this legislation was accomplished by the creation of Peers, and has a bearing on the recent crisis.

There were eighteen additions made to the Upper House, but this was not done in order to carry the Bill, as there was never any doubt as to its passing the Lords. These peerages were given, together with six English peerages, and nineteen promotions in the Irish peerages, and two given to women with remainder to their heirs male, in order to secure the support of the Members for eighty-five pocket-boroughs, fifty-six of which were possessed by members of the Upper House. When the proprietors were compensated the sitting Members, if unwilling to vote as desired, were invited to accept the escheatorship of Munster, in order that they might be replaced by Members pledged to support the Bill. The strenuous efforts of the Viceroy and Lord Castle-reagh were rewarded by the acquisition of a majority of about sixty in the House of Commons, which consisted of 300 Members.

This Parliament, which extinguished itself more than a century ago, was, with one exception, a Home Rule Parliament as defined by Mr. Redmond—viz., "a Parliament freely elected with an executive responsible thereto." The exception was that Protestants only were eligible to sit therein, and vote at elections—every Roman Catholic having been absolutely disfranchised by the Act of 1 George II., c. 9.*

Home Rule had, in fact, been enjoyed for eighteen years—viz., since 1782—in which year the English Parliament repealed the Act of 6 Geo. I. and the Irish Parliament repealed Poynings' Act and the Act of 3 and 4 Philip and Mary, thereby converting a Parliament in shackles into a free and independent one.

After eighteen years of Home Rule came the rebellion of 1798, the massacres, the French landing at Killala Bay and Lough Swilly, and the reconquest of the island by General Lake and Lord Cornwallis with an army of 138,000 men. As a consequence of which the Treaty of Union followed.

The earlier history of the Irish Parliament is particularly interesting, as its growth was coincident with the gradual extension of the English influence over the country, and contracted and expanded as the power of the Crown or of the Irish chieftains waxed or waned. In the early days of the Norman Settlement it was a great Council of the Barons, the Prelates, and "the faithful," and towards the end of the thirteenth century Knights of the Shire and Burgesses from the Corporations were summoned by writ.

The Shireland consisted of the settled portions of Leinster and Munster only. The corporations were the walled cities and towns, such as Dublin, Wexford, Cork, and Drogheda. As the area controlled by the English of the Pale receded small towns were incorporated in the counties of Dublin, Louth, Kildare, and Meath in order to fill the places of the distant corporations, which were unable or unwilling to send up burgesses when summoned.

The sessions of the Parliament were few and far between and at the commencement of Henry VII.'s reign the Lord-Deputy, Sir Edward Poynings, muzzled it by compelling it to pass a statute which enacted that all legislation should be initiated by the King and the Irish Privy Council, approved by the Privy Council in England, and then presented to Parliament for registration. It was seldom summoned, unless it was required to pass Bills of attainder against rebels or Bills for the raising of revenue.

The old Shireland consisted of but twelve counties, constituted by King John—Dublin (including Wicklow), Meath (including Westmeath), Kildare, Louth, Carlow, Kilkenny, Wexford, Waterford, Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and Tipperary.

When the fortunes of the Crown were at their lowest ebb the first four were the only ones in which the King's writ ran, but as the reconquest under the Tudors was effected, King's County and Queen's County were planted, and added to the shireland; Meath was divided into Meath and Westmeath, and Wicklow was created out of County Dublin. By the eleventh of Elizabeth Longford was defined, and from the nebulous County of Roscommon were carved the counties of Sligo and Leitrim. Connaught was divided into the counties of Mayo and Galway, and the Irish territory of Thomond was transferred from Munster to Connaught under the name of County Clare. The Ulster counties, though projected by the Lord-Deputy, Sir John Perrot, were not defined until measures for the plantation of Ulster were well advanced.

At the death of Elizabeth there were five ancient cities—viz., Dublin, Kilkenny, Waterford, Limerick, and Cork. Three county boroughs—Drogheda, Carrickfergus, and Galway—and twenty-eight boroughs, which from time to time, and when circumstances permitted, had sent representatives to Parliament. Thus the then existing constituencies were composed of twenty-four counties (including "the Crosse," which was afterwards incorporated with Tipperary), and twenty-eight cities and boroughs, each returning two Knights of the Shire and two burgesses respectively.

The accession of James I. marks a new departure in the history of the Irish Parliament. During her long reign Elizabeth, at the cost of much life and treasure, had completely subjugated the chieftains of the North, the South, and the West. Munster had been "planted" after the crushing of the Desmond Rebellion. The great confederation engineered by the Northern Earls, Tyrconnel and Tyrone, had collapsed with the decisive victory at Kinsale. The whole country had been devastated by fire and sword, and the starving native Irish had been driven into the pathless bogs and mountains. The ceaseless warfare of one hundred years had ended in the complete conquest of the island. One curious feature of the struggle had been that what had commenced as a racial war had gradually assumed the character of a religious war. The Reformation in England had been applied to Ireland by its rulers, but had made no impression on the inhabitants. The abbey had been suppressed, and much of the Church property had been confiscated by Henry, and the Bishops compelled to accept the Act of Supremacy. Elizabeth summoned a carefully selected Parliament, composed of representatives from ten counties only, and such boroughs as were under the influence of the Crown, and passed an Act of Uniformity. Those Bishops who refused to conform were superseded by Englishmen of the reformed faith, but the majority of the parish clergy remained in ignorance of what had taken place; while the Bible and Liturgy in English were unintelligible to the bulk of the people, who only spoke Irish. During the Desmond Rebellion the chieftains had obtained help, both in money and military contingents, from the King of Spain; the begging friars preached war upon the hillsides; a Papal nuncio and bands of Jesuits appeared in Munster and protested that the Papal Bull of excommunication against Elizabeth absolved the people from their allegiance—and so the Privy Council in Dublin gradually associated recusancy with rebellion, or at any rate with opposition to the Government.

On the death of Elizabeth the Recusants had great hopes that the old forms of religion would be restored, but James proceeded to enforce the penal clauses of the Act of Uniformity, and ordered all Jesuits and Romish priests to quit the country. The taking of the Oath of Supremacy was enforced on all officers, civil and military, and the penalty of twelve pence was exacted for not attending church on Sunday.

James next proceeded to establish English law in Ulster and to convert it into Shireland. The Ulster counties were formally constituted in accordance with Perrot's scheme, and the Ulster Earls, Tyrone and Tyrconnel, fearing that their ruin was intended, fled to the Continent and died in exile.

Everything was now ready for the thorough plantation of Ulster by English and Scottish "undertakers," which was effectually carried out in the most systematic fashion; and the next step was to summon a Parliament for the purpose of passing an Act of Attainder against Tyrone and Tyrconnel and of confirming the confiscation of the Northern Province. No Parliament had sat since 1586.

* It should not, however be forgotten that in this respect the Irish Parliament did not differ from the English Parliament, and was, in fact, somewhat more in advance, as an Emancipation Act was passed by the Irish Parliament in 1793, giving to Roman Catholics the franchise, whereas their co-religionists in England had to wait for thirty years before they were given either the franchise or the right to sit in Parliament.

REVIEWS

TALLEYRAND-PÉRIGORD

Talleyrand the Man. By BERNARD DE LACOMBE. Translated by A. D'ALBERTI. Illustrated. (Herbert and Daniel. 15s. net.)

IN many ways this is a most unsatisfactory book. There certainly seems room for an adequate biography of Talleyrand in English—a biography, that is, as distinct from a book run up for the libraries—and we hoped at first, on seeing the title of it, that this was even such a book. In that we were disappointed not a little. Partly this is the fault of the translator rather than that of the author. The title "Talleyrand the Man" indicates an effort that aims highly, whereas M. de Lacombe's title, "La Vie Privée de Talleyrand," suggests its scope far more truly. Even here the volume fails of the true intimacy of Talleyrand's life.

The only value in learning "la vie privée" of any man is, surely, that we may discover thereby his personality, and unravel any perplexity that may attach to it. Now a very real perplexity attaches to Talleyrand. Carlyle was a man with a faculty for expressing perplexities aptly, and he failed not to give an ensample of his true quality when he came to Talleyrand. It was he who said that the great French diplomatist was "a man living in falsehood and on falsehood, yet not what you can call a false man." It is this phase of Talleyrand that we would like to see attacked in a way that it has not yet been to our knowledge. Such a solution would find its problem centred in three or four crises of his life. For instance, one would like to get behind Talleyrand's thoughts, at the Collège D'Harcourt, and prior to the Collège D'Harcourt, when he actually came to the moment driving his own career, and saw his younger brother pass him on his way to the hereditament that should have been his save for an unhappy accident. Particularly we should like to have had some inner details of his private life in the momentous days of 1789, when the States-General came to be called. That, we imagine, was the time which, if properly understood, would give the clue to the psychology of the man. What exactly were the mental happenings, as evidenced in his letters and intimacy of life, that led finally to his famous speech before that assembly? It was not the thing that was to be expected of the Bishop of Autun, nor do there seem indications of it to be found in the previous psychology of the man who held that post. Of course it is easy to explain all by a reference to his prophetic perspicuity in political affairs; but this is in a way worse than no answer, inasmuch as it assumes matters that demand elucidation. Similarly we would like a sight into the private life of Talleyrand at that other important moment of his career: after his return to Paris in 1796, and prior to his appointment to the position as Foreign Minister under the Directory; to say nothing of his mental processes at hearing of Napoleon's return from Elba; and subsequently during the Hundred Days.

In other words, it is impossible to know anything of authentic interest concerning "la vie privée" of such a man as Charles Maurice Talleyrand de Périgord if his outer life at moments of public crisis be deleted from a biography, however fragmentary that biography be. And it is just such deletions that mar this present work. For instance, the first portion of this book begins at the moment of his danger at the hands of the Mountain, and his consequent flight from the country, with the result that his name in the end came to be included in the list of émigrés. That is, his life is taken up subsequent to all those mental decisions and cogitations that gave it its final shape and destiny; and we are regaled with his friendships and hardships in London, first, and afterwards in America. Surely it should be evident that Talleyrand in London matters little, and that Talleyrand in America matters even less; whereas the Talleyrand of the years 1789-92 matters very considerably indeed. Talleyrand the Man is the Talleyrand of the States-General; while the Talleyrand of the years 1793-6 is the Talleyrand who wished chiefly to be a man. Similarly it is the astute politician of the years that lay between his arrival in Paris, 1795, and the announcement of Napoleon as First Consul for life, 1802, and as Emperor, 1804, of whose private life we are anxious to learn. But the first portion of the present narrative arrests itself at the very brink of these momentous years; and the second portion takes up the thread of interest from the year 1802, occupying itself with the episode with Madame Catherine Grand that led the First Consul in a sudden accession of diplomatic prudery to insist on her dismissal from Talleyrand's household or her final deposition there as Talleyrand's legal spouse. Not that it is uninteresting to read of this; it is certainly piquant. Yet even the piquancy does not avoid the mental irritation that comes from a constant thought that the interest arises not at all from the interest aroused by any aspect of Talleyrand the Man, or of "la vraie vie privée" of a great man, but only from a somewhat unholy pleasure in the interest of an intrigue. This is very clearly felt when the later stages are reached. For there Talleyrand is to be discovered not a little bored with the outworn fascinations of a lady whose charms had erstwhile been her livelihood, and who now bears his name as one more furnished with avoirdupois than with charm, "whom Bonaparte had tied to her husband like a placard," as Châteaubriand declared.

Now it might happen to be very delightful to have these matters set out for our delectation or it might not. But, at any rate, in the interests of candour it is desirable that we should know where we are. Such details most emphatically do not reveal to us Talleyrand the Man, nor do they open to us his private life, except in a very subsidiary sense. Yet there is even a deeper fault in the volume. Those who have had occasion to read Pichot's "Souvenirs Intimes sur M. De Talleyrand" will know to what we refer. Monsieur de Lacombe is certainly profoundly convinced of the virtue of his subject (or, at least, he is so within the pages of this book, for there are hints not a few that his is, or seems to be, the zeal of the ready penman); and so the book is permeated with an unhappy unction. Indeed, there is much in it that turns the mind away from acceptance of its pleading inasmuch as there is always more than a suspicion that that pleading is of an especial nature. Now if the author were occupied with a full-length portrait of its subject, if the fullest of details were afforded as to that portion of his life that the reader must needs account as of the first moment, then pleading, however "special" it be, would fall into its place and function. That is to say, if the man be seen as one who is filling a considerable part in the history of his country, enthusiasms become a proper part of the scheme. But a zealous defence of a man who never once in the volume is to be discovered as participating in greatness wears not a little of that incongruity that lies so near to humour.

Miss D'Alberti's translation, apart from some strange infelicities, whose origin can be seen to arise in the course of the necessary transference of idiom, is on the whole very happy and pellucid. Moreover, as a book of chatty, inconsequential memoirs and irrelevancies that chance to lie around the life of a distinguished and perplexing personality, there is much in this volume that is entertaining and amusing.

Only it certainly does not complete its title, either in English or in the original, which hints a far more adequate (and, may we say, necessary?) study than either the scheme or the text supplies.

THE LAND OF THE MORNING CALM

The Story of Korea. By JOSEPH H. LONGFORD. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

PROFESSOR JOSEPH LONGFORD, in "The Story of Old Japan," has written the very best book on the subject. In his latest work he has attempted to tell the story of Korea. If he has given us a somewhat less fascinating book, it is because the Land of the Rising Sun is of far more vital interest to Westerners generally than the Land of the Morning Calm. But he has told the story of perhaps the saddest country in the East with wonderful vividness and charm. There is something whimsical in the idea of an Irishman writing about Korea, and now and again Professor Longford shows a good deal of feeling and deep sympathy for the Koreans that probably had their origin in his own country.

Chosen, the Land of the Morning Calm, was the old name for Korea, and however poetical the phrase may be, it was nevertheless totally inapplicable to actual fact. Korea had but little calm, either in the morning or any other part of the day. In its early history it was a country divided against itself, and later on it was troubled with the invading armies of China and Japan, to say nothing of minor skirmishes with other countries. There is certainly a pathetic calm in Korea to-day, but it is the calm of a long-vanquished and persecuted nation. It now rests with Japan whether or not the Koreans rise from serfdom and regain something of that old hardihood that was at one time so prominent a feature of her northern men. Korea has failed because she has always misgoverned and been a prey to paralysing party disputes. Korea has failed because she has believed in the pernicious idea of standing still through the ages. Long ago she came under the glamour of the Chinese civilisation, and it haunts her people to this day. Korea has stood out for a crabbed and effete conservatism, good enough in the days of Confucius, but utterly useless when it came in touch with more progressive people. Japan borrowed from Korea what Korea had borrowed from China. It was because Japan went on borrowing from the West when she had exhausted all Korea and China could teach her that she eventually became, with the progressive stream of thought and action flowing vigorously through her, a world-power, while Korea remained a forlorn example of an almost stagnant country.

The Korean King was regarded as sacred. Professor Longford writes:—"If, by accident, he touched any one, the place where he did so became sacred and had to be distinguished by a red ribbon for ever afterwards. His countenance was never engraved on the coins of the realm, where it could be soiled by the touch of vulgar hands." The King was regarded as a semi-divinity, and when Kings are either regarded as divinities or semi-divinities we always find them associated with the worst kind of vice—weaklings surrounded by women and flatterers bent on dangerous intrigue. The Korean half-gods were certainly not a success, either morally or in any other way.

Our author's description of Korean women is infinitely pathetic. He writes:—

In her childhood and girlhood the Korean woman was and is the abject slave of her parents, in wifehood of her husband, in widowhood a pariah; and throughout all her life a soul-destroying, monotonous imprisonment was only relieved by a very few hours' liberty in the streets when night had fallen and, as far as men were concerned, the pleasures and work of the day were over.

It seems incredible that people who profess to follow the gentle and humane teaching of the Lord Buddha should regard their women as of so little significance that they did not trouble to give them names, merely calling them the sister, daughter, or wife of the men in whose houses they lived. If a Korean woman had no male protector, she was regarded as a wandering dog, liable to be picked up by any man who had a momentary liking for her. On the wedding day the woman was not permitted to speak to her husband, "not even when both had retired to the nuptial chamber." Professor Longford writes:—

There, let the young husband be as gallant and amorous as he might, even heap compliments or questions on her, etiquette demanded that, seated in a corner of the room, she should remain dumb and immovable as a statue. The husband might disrobe her of her voluminous wedding garments: she could neither assist nor repel him, neither utter a word nor make a gesture.

Silence is certainly golden sometimes, but on such an occasion it is brutal and horrible. It was almost silence for the rest of the Korean woman's married life. All that was expected of her was to bring forth children, while her fickle husband had the utmost licence, and was in no way bound to conjugal fidelity. The Korean woman certainly did not deserve such contemptible treatment. The following historic incident shows that she had a sense of honour equal to that so frequently shown by the women of Japan:—

When the Silla Army approached the capital the King fled. . . . He left all the palace women behind him, and they, knowing what their fate would be at the hands of the Silla soldiery, went together to a beetling precipice . . . and cast themselves from the summit into the water beneath.

From that day to this the precipice was known as Nuk-whaam, the "Precipice of the Falling Flowers."

The most interesting chapters are those devoted to Hideyoshi's invasion of Korea. The thrilling campaign lives again in these virile pages. We see Konishi, the Christian, and Kato, the ardent Buddhist, leading their armies under the direction of Hideyoshi, who remained in Japan, and was unable to lead in person owing to illness. We get a vivid account of the long Japanese marches, of the storming of castles, and of the nerve-racking guerilla warfare that followed. The naval battles connected with this invasion are particularly interesting, for we come across the Korean tortoise-boat, with its curved deck of iron plates. It was evidently the first ironclad in history.

Much space, perhaps too much, is given to missionary enterprise in Korea. We admire the bravery and zeal of the first Roman Catholic missionaries in that country, who suffered unspeakable torture, and laid down their lives for the cause they so devoutly stood for. At the same time there was much wrongheadedness. Nothing can excuse the awful Korean atrocities; but nevertheless their cruelty might have been restrained had the missionaries not so ruthlessly insisted upon the total abolishment of ancestral worship. Had they known it this very worship might have formed a foundation on which to build a reverence and kindness towards the living. The missionaries unknowingly attempted to crush the Korean spirit of love, however elemental it may have been. The result was a persecution attended by horrors no whit less terrible than those perpetrated by Nero himself. Now there is no need for missionaries to go about disguised as native mourners. Korea abounds with representatives of every sect and schism of Christianity, each hammering out, to the confusion of the poor Korean, his particular religious note, always a strident note quite outside the harmony of the real essentials of religion. Some day, let us hope, the mission-field will be filled with reapers, broad enough and true enough to work for Christ without the weakening effect of sect and schism.

All through this book we watch China and Japan struggling to hold Korea. Japan had no sooner succeeded in convincing Korea that she alone could be her faithful guide, when Russia came like a thief in the night and established a military outpost at Wiju. It resulted in the Russo-Japanese War, and Korea became a Japanese experimental ground for social and political reform. The Japanese Government found so much hard and almost unworkable material that it pleaded that nothing short of annexation would enable it to deal successfully in course of time with a backward people, living in a country with excellent harbours and with possibly good agricultural and mineral prospects. In other words, Japan wanted interest on her money. How quietly the annexation took place! Japan has waited long for Korea. May she find it at last, not a turbulent and rebellious country, but in very deed the land of the Morning Calm. Korea in the past has contributed to the making of Japan's greatness in handing on the religion, art, and literature of China. Now it is Japan's turn to succour an impoverished country, and if the Morning Calm is united with the Rising Sun, there should be peace and prosperity in her new possession.

ANCIENT INTERNATIONAL LAW

The International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece and Rome. By COLMAN PHILLIPSON, LL.D., Litt.D. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

THIS comprehensive work is an elaborate and exhaustive study of the legal systems of Greece and Rome, with the special object of determining how far these States may be considered to have possessed any definitive codes, or body of international law at all approximating to our modern notions. This difficult theme is not altogether a new one, having already been treated chiefly by various French and German scholars, notably Laurent and Mommsen. But since their day "a larger mass of material, in the form of epigraphic and other historical documents, has become available; and, what is of cardinal importance, a more scientific method is, in consequence, demanded of investigators." Laurent's work was far from being scientific. Hitherto only two or three English writers have essayed this inquiry from a strictly juridical point of view and investigation. Dr. Phillipson has spared no labour in his deep researches into classical writings and inscriptions, as well as in the great field of modern writers. The bibliography of works referred to occupies no less than six-and-twenty pages. This does not mean, we need hardly say, that these volumes are lacking in original work. In such work, on the contrary, lies their conspicuous merit. As Sir John Macdonell justly says in his introductory note, "These volumes give that which is to be found nowhere else . . . and they will help to dispel the fiction . . . that in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries a group of writers, notably Albericus, Gentilis, and Grotius, 'founded' international law."

Dr. Phillipson begins with an examination of the Greek City-State system, pointing out that although we may apply the term intermunicipal law to the mutual relationships of the Greek States, such law still possesses a definitive international character. This position, we consider, he successfully maintains, in opposition to the earlier jurists. Also, there was a large body of law whose provisions were extended to the "barbarians" as well as to the Greeks, and, in the case of treaties the ἑκσπονδοὶ were often beneficiaries as well as the ἑνσπονδοὶ. Dr. Phillipson refutes the untenable views of Laurent, who did not consider established international usage as having the dignité d'une science; and of Guizot, who went so far as to say, "La force présidait seule à leurs rapports; le droit des gens n'existait pas." Dr. Phillipson brings an immense mass of overwhelming evidence to bear on the other side. It is not possible to praise too highly his critical scholarship in the examination of the great collections of Greek and Roman inscriptions from bronze or marble tablets, or his keen insight in the study of classical writers. To discuss or even to enumerate the questions investigated would be altogether beyond our limits, so wide is the field covered by Dr. Phillipson's patient industry. Diplomatic negotiations, treaties and alliances, questions of arbitration and intervention are recorded; also the position of aliens, of spies and hostages, the causes and declaration of war and points of neutrality. Nor are there wanting maritime provisions dealing with such matters as blockade, piracy, and treatment of the shipwrecked.

It would certainly seem impossible for great States or nations to have any relations or dealings with each other, whether in war or commerce, without some reference to their own peculiar law or custom. It would seem equally impossible that they could maintain any decent self-respect as civilised communities without recognising in some degree the existence of mutual rights. Such recognition would involve the development of the germ of international law. To trace this evolution into a definite body of established practice is the task which Dr. Phillipson has so admirably accomplished. He clearly demonstrates how unhistorical and unscientific is the view that the law of force was the only dispensation. This should be evident to any one who impartially studies the chapters on the jus gentium and Rome's foreign policy. While we cannot judge entirely and exclusively from the modern point of view nor expect a completely organised and scientific system, we are bound to admit that "Rome evolved and practised a large body of principles which have furnished the basis of international law for all time." Such matters as the institution of hospitium publicum, provisions for naturalisation, the practice of extradition, the immunity of Ambassadors, the regular procedure and formalities in the conclusion of treaties, the conception of protectorates, regulations as to asylum, safe-conducts, captured property, truces and armistices—all point to the development and recognition of a system of law for controlling international relationships without resort to force majeure. Here Dr. Phillipson directly controverts the dogmatic opinions of M. Revon, who said, "Le prétendu droit des gens des Romains n'est qu'une chimère."

There is an interesting chapter on the subject of envoys and ambassadors and the rise of diplomacy:—

From the earliest times the ambassador was looked upon as the personal representative of the king as well as of the people. Hence any offence against an envoy was an offence against the State, against the Sovereign Power . . . and injury to envoys or heralds was considered a deliberate infraction of the jus gentium . . . while punishment, for offences committed against foreign ambassadors was very severe.

It is in the working out of such important questions as this and of matters relating to extradition, hostages, negotiation, and treaties that Dr. Phillipson shows marked scientific method and critical power in the development of his thesis on ancient international law.

The chapters on war in the second volume, as well as on international arbitration in Greece and Rome, may be cited as particular instances of his careful and minute treatment. Not only is this great work valuable as a unique contribution to the elucidation of an obscure branch of ancient law, but it is also a treatise of great importance to all students of classical history as an indispensable book of reference. We can only hope that the talented author may be able to fulfil the promise which he holds out in his preface, of preparing "further volumes on the development of international law in the Middle Ages and in modern times."

SHORTER REVIEWS

A Traveller's Study of Health and Empire. By FRANCIS FREMANTLE, County Medical Officer of Health. (John Onseley. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE author has described a tour of many parts of the world, undertaken to study questions of public health; as he has expert knowledge of this subject, and has further admirable descriptive powers and a broad-minded grasp of what he has seen, the account of his journey is most entertaining. He has attempted to make the work interesting, both to the scientific and the lay mind, and in our opinion he has met with great success. There is laid before us, amongst other things, a comparison of the scientifically organised system of the Japanese for combating cholera, dog-bite, &c., and the somewhat haphazard organisation in India; in the latter country, however, the working of the Pasteur Institute in particular appeals to us, for a comparatively small building with not over many workers does an inestimable service to a vast country. The prevention of plague is discussed at length, and it is shown what great efforts have been made in India to induce the natives to make use of the prophylactic produced by virtue of Haffnine's researches; all, however, with practically no avail, and, as actual compulsion seems out of the question, the state of things is disastrous.

Housing and town-planning are excellently dealt with in connection with Kuala Lumpur in the Malay States and Hong Kong. The various garden cities in England, the schemes carried out by Cadbury at Bournville, and by Krupp at Essen, are taken as examples of what may be done when sufficient power and funds are forthcoming, and the use to be made in this connection in stamping out such diseases as plague is pointed out.

We were struck in particular with the account of the practice in vogue at Kasauli of giving printed cards to patients who had undergone treatment for the bites of mad dogs, to be sent back in three months with an account of their health; another card is then sent, and so on, as long as necessary. The author has attempted to get this system adopted in London hospitals; we are of one opinion with him as to its use, for the results would be of vast service to the human race throughout the world.

What Will the Weather Be? The Amateur Forecaster's "Vade Mecum." By H. G. BUSK, F.R.Met.Soc. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Illustrated with Photographs and Diagrams. (W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge. 6d. net.)

THE topic of the weather is a never-failing source of conversation amongst the inhabitants of these islands, and it has become the national idiosyncrasy which accompanies the Britisher into all climes. He may adapt himself more or less to the strange manners and customs of the most outlandish countries, but he will never relinquish what he considers his inalienable privilege—nay, right—to discuss the state of the weather, generally to rail against it. For this reason alone Mr. Busk's manual should become very popular as affording food for conversation when travelling either on sea or land, or refreshing the inner man. But it will naturally serve a far more useful purpose than this—that of enabling the non-scientific reader to forecast the weather by his own observations, assisted by the tables drawn up by the author, which are the result of some years' study of the climatic conditions prevailing simultaneously in various part of England. Mr. H. B. Stone's comprehensive Introduction fully explains the technical terms in use amongst meteorologists. Mr. Busk has evidently found the east wind as objectionable as most of us do, for he records—"Altogether forecasting during an easterly wind is unprofitable work." And it will probably be information to many to learn that "fine weather and bright sunshine do not always accompany a rising barometer and a north-east wind."

FICTION

REALITY AND FANTASY

The Early History of Jacob Stahl. By J. D. BERESFORD. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 6s.)

The Hampshire Wonder. By J. D. BERESFORD. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 6s.)

THE experienced novel-reader, taking up a book which purports to give the "early history" of a character, anticipates the usual story of calf-love, of slips into the waters of trouble due to immaturity and youthful reasoning, of wily women and crafty men. All these are to be found within the pages of "Jacob Stahl," but the manner of their presentation is so good and the hero is so very living a person that the general effect is far from conventional.

Stahl was lamed, and therefore handicapped in the race, when a child, and the account of the devoted labours of his aunt, by whose aid his wasted limbs were systematically exercised and finally restored to health, forms an interesting prelude to the wider activities of his business life. Architecture was decided upon for his profession—here we are reminded of one of Mr. Hardy's novels—and Jacob's first love-affair with that excitable little egotist, Madeline Felmersdale, occurs in the country town where he lives under his aunt's roof. It ends explosively when Madeline has done with him, and Jacob thinks his life is a wreck, of course. London, however, teaches him a great many things of which he had never dreamed, and from this point—his removal to the architect's office in Moorgate Street—the book, from being merely interesting, becomes enthralling. We need not recapitulate much more of the plot; Jacob, inflammable, sensitive, and nervous, blinded and thrilled, made a sad mess of his marriage with a scheming woman, and when he encounters his Madeline of the happy country days transformed into the wealthy and bewitching Lady Paignton, the inevitable happens. He loses his head, and Madeline, by no means in love with him, but eager for a new sensation, encourages him. We take leave of him, a sheer failure both in business and love, deserted by his wife, brooding and searching his heart for means to live. And as he determines to "learn to write" for a living we are particularly keen to know the later history of Jacob Stahl. If

Mr. Beresford will depict his career—for Stahl is still a young man—in the same illuminating way in a forthcoming volume, and will in addition make less use of the comma and more of the semi-colon, we shall number him among our chosen novelists whose work must on no account be missed.

By "The Hampdenshire Wonder" we are irresistibly reminded of Mr. H. G. Wells in one of his fantastic moods, although the idea of the story is decidedly original. The wise, grave child who is born into this world free from all inheritance of habit, and who is gifted with such extraordinary faculties that he learns a language as speedily as ordinary mortals might learn a page of history, evidently has possibilities. These possibilities are made the most of, up to a certain point, by the author. Young Victor Stott confutes all the learned men of the district, calmly ignores everybody, and is so uncanny that he drives his poor scared father from home. The ingenious turn of Mr. Beresford's art comes when the village idiot discovers a remarkable attraction for the freak child—almost an affinity. The sad part of the book is that the author shirks the further development of his problem and lets the child be drowned—apparently because he wearies of his theme. The whole notion is clever, and its working-out is at times amusing; but the book fails to convince the reader of any reality in the "Wonder." Other characters are excellently drawn. Thus we are forced to the conclusion that Mr. Beresford should avoid abnormalities in future, since a conviction of actuality is the first necessity of success in such themes; hence, for instance, comes the spell of horror which Mr. Wells can cast over us in some of his short stories.

We prefer Mr. Beresford in his masterly study of ordinary people, whom we may meet any day in the street or in an office, which he has given us in "Jacob Stahl." There are in that book at least a dozen characters finely conceived, and splendidly drawn, with a restraint that should be an example to hundreds of would-be novelists. If the novels of the present year are arranged in order of merit "Jacob Stahl" must be placed very near the top of the list.

The Dangerous Age: Letters and Fragments from a Woman's Diary. By KARIN MICHAËLIS. With an Introduction by MARCEL PRÉVOST. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

IN an impressive introduction of 150 pages M. Marcel Prévost endeavours to arouse the reader's interest and enthusiasm for the letters and fragments of which Karin Michaëlis' diary consists. "It is," he says, "the most widely-read novel at the present moment" in Central Europe. Doubtless, it is a book which is bound to provoke a great deal of controversy. Elsie Lindtner, after twenty-two years of married life, is so dissatisfied with everything and everybody, including her husband, with whom she has never had an angry word, that she obtains a divorce and goes to live by herself in a house in the country, solitude being her only desire. From this retreat she writes letters of sympathy and condolence to her married friends over forty, all of whom are in the same restless condition as she is herself. As was to be expected, the quietness and peace of a country life soon pall on a woman of Elsie's disposition, and longing again for men's society she sends for Joergen Malthe, a man several years younger than herself, who once had a liking for her. He comes, but shows plainly that he does not want her, and as a last resort she turns to her husband, only to find that he is about to instal a girl of nineteen in the home which once was hers. Forsaken by all—for even her favourite maid deserts her—we leave the unhappy woman seeking to hide her shame and humiliation by taking a lonely trip round the world.

It is not for us to state that Elsie's experiences are fictitious, or even exaggerated. Every woman, as many know to their cost, is possessed of "nerves," which may lead her to all kinds of excess if proper control is not exercised; but to take an individual case, and from that to assert that all women, as their years increase, either wish to abandon their homes or to embark upon one liaison after another, is to argue after the manner of a certain playwright with whom we had cause to remonstrate in these columns under the heading of "The Gospel of Exaggeration" not so many months ago. If what Karin Michaëlis says is true—namely, that "if men suspected what took place in a woman's life after forty they would avoid us like the plague, or knock us on the head like mad dogs"—we are forced to the conclusion that all women who outwardly appear happy and contented with their husbands and children are in reality no such thing, but all the time in a very great state of trepidation and misery. Even a mother's love is questioned. "Who has not," she says, "sometimes seen in the heart of mother . . . as by a lightning flash, an abyss which the profoundest love cannot bridge over." Very many, let us hope.

In most cases a healthy body produces a healthy mind, and with all due respect to the unhappy character of our story, and at the risk of being called callous as well as material-minded, we at the same time venture to suggest that the maladies of persons of Elsie's calibre are more physical than mental, and that probably by devoting a little less time to the thoughts of self and a little more activity to the comfort of those dependent on their services some slight degree of improvement might be noticeable. Besides, has our author no idea of the love between man and woman which many waters cannot quench nor the floods drown, which is not even enraged at "the trinkets on a husband's watch-chain" and which has existed and probably will continue to exist long after such books as "The Dangerous Age" have been read and forgotten?

Hodson's Voyage. By W. H. KOEBEL. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

STORIES of long sea-voyages, and of the fateful friendships which often result from the enforced intercourse of perfect strangers, have been many, and frequently their unreality results in boredom to the reader. Mr. Koebel, however, who is probably better known as a writer of volumes of travel than as a novelist, has given us in this book a most entertaining account of the complications which befell certain good people who were thrown together on board the liner Pegoric, en route to the Cape. Mindful of R. L. Stevenson's dictum that "the ground of a man's joy is often hard to hit," the author endows his hero, who is a commercial traveller, with the attributes of a dreamer; in his hours of reverie Hodson "performed deeds of military valour before which the world paled in ecstasy." Having thus the martial air and possessing a handbag with the name of "Lieutenant Powerly" painted on it (how it came into his hands we need not explain here), nothing is more natural than that a little group of persons who knew of the real Powerly should cultivate Hodson's acquaintance under the misapprehension. From this moment the fun grows fast and furious, for poor Hodson, ambitious and weak, gives himself up to fate and sets out to have a good time. Amelia, his wife, left at home, "represented a line of severe prose dumped in the midst of a strophe of lilting verse;" she was soon forgotten, or remembered only as a vague shadow, and Hodson "continued the poem unconscious of her absence."

Pure justice demands that so lax a hero should incur punishment; and Hodson has by no means a rosy fortnight.

To tell the whole plot would be unfair; but he discovers that, as Powerly, he is engaged to be married to a girl who will meet him at Cape Town; as Hodson, he is naturally somewhat perturbed at the prospect. As Powerly, he is adored by a merchant who, with his family, worships a title; as Hodson, his business instinct impels him to take an order from the merchant, since he has samples of suitable character in the bag which is the source of all his troubles. The secret of this bag's contents we will not disclose—Hodson, however, was forced to do so, and the account of the subsequent scene is exceedingly laughter-moving. In fact there is laughter on most of the pages of Mr. Koebel's story. The characters are not drawn in detail, but they are thoroughly consistent, and some of the events on board—the sports competition, and Hodson's famous song in the saloon, for example—are excellently described. We noticed two or three misprints, such as "Diogenese" and "denouement," but these are small things to set against a story which contains so much healthy amusement and clever observation.

THE THEATRE

"UNWISE HUSBANDS AND UNWORTHY WIVES"

THE London stage is always all the better for the work of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones and Mr. Alfred Sutro. Both dramatists have contributed interesting and even memorable pieces to the Theatre, and both have not been represented in London for a considerable time. It is curious and a little amusing that both should have broken silence this season with plays whose themes are identical. The marriage problem has furnished playwrights with plots since prehistoric persons discovered that money was to be made by providing entertainment to the members of their community during the long evenings. So long as there are men and women on earth the question of their relations must continue to give writers subjects for their pens, and during our own time it is inevitable that we shall find upon the stage many new variations of this perennial matter. In dealing with the marriage problem, it used to be the fashion to concoct plays round two men and a woman. Ibsen started the fashion of building up his plots round a man, a woman, and a cause, and both Mr. Jones and Mr. Sutro have contented themselves with making a variation of the Ibsen prescription.

While the London stage remains in the hands of persons who regard their supporters as the most unintelligent percentage of the population, it is quite impossible for a dramatist to contribute to the theatre a play dealing with one of the most serious of our problems seriously. Realising this, Mr. Jones and Mr. Sutro have been forced to tackle the problem from a farcical point of view. Both set out to show how tragic the lives of men can be rendered by the actions of their wives, and both suddenly pull themselves up, turn truth into mere theatricality, and leave the problem unsolved. The result is that Mr. Jones in "The Ogre" at the St. James's Theatre, and Mr. Sutro in "The Perplexed Husband" at Wyndham's, send us into the street filled with pity for the men who have kissed their wives again with tears, and both, in their eagerness to fulfil the mistaken desires of their managers and bring down the curtain upon a happy ending, have convinced us that their apparently reunited husbands and wives must be more unhappy after reconciliation than before. This curious and unintended result is brought about because both dramatists desired to be produced at any cost and not to write plays which were too good and too truthful for the present market. They started by creating men and women and ended by turning them into the lay figures of the theatre stockpot. Such is the tyranny of the actor-manager!

Nevertheless, there is much in these two pieces that is clever and entertaining. Mr. Jones is frankly farcical. Mr. Sutro is naturally a little portentous. Mr. Jones writes in his usual rapid, superficial, flashing style—Mr. Sutro as one who sits at the feet of Sir Arthur Pinero, and who is therefore unable to write even the "directions" in anything but words of two syllables. Mr. Jones throws his characters on the stage as impressionist sketches; Mr. Sutro overloads them with paint until they are as heavy as Royal Academy portraits. Both plays are, in a way, caricatures of their authors' work. One is unmistakably Jones, and the other inevitably Sutro. One is overdone Jones, and the other over-sententious Sutro. If Mr. Jones had handed the plot of "The Ogre" to Mr. Sutro, and Mr. Sutro had presented the outline of "The Perplexed Husband" to Mr. Jones, both plays would have gained much. In Mr. Sutro's hands "The Ogre" would have been more logical and less meticulous, while in Mr. Jones' "The Perplexed Husband" would have been free from its Spectator-like pomposity. A valuable ballast would have been added to "The Ogre," and a great deal of superfluous sail hauled down from "The Perplexed Husband."

Mr. Jones shows a hard-working City man of fifty or so with three extremely selfish and self-willed children, married to a second wife who, though a quiet outwardly attractive and feminine little lady, is inwardly an almost wholly worthless creature. A woman who has made an undisturbed orgy of self-indulgence during the years of her husband's prosperity, she is suddenly called upon to be plucky and helpful during a financial crisis. So well does Mr. Jones show her constitutional inability to give up any of her extravagant habits, so cruelly and relentlessly does he paint her emptiness, insincerity, dishonesty, and lack of responsibility, that he makes her husband out to be no ogre but a weak and hopeless fool ever to take the trouble to win her back to his arms. Mr. Sutro's business man is a much more practical, every-day sort of fellow. He is younger and more eager to put in a good time. His children are babies, and he considers it to be perfectly right and natural that he should devote most of his spare time to golf. He married because he fell in love, and, although he has never stopped to consider the matter, he goes about with the healthy, normal, fixed idea that no man could do more to make a woman blissfully happy than by giving her an airy house, several servants, adequate housekeeping money, a few babies, an annual sea-side holiday, occasional presents, as little of his time as possible, and all his socks to darn. He works well, plays well, asks frequently after his children, gives his wife a kiss whenever he remembers, and remains the best type of clean-minded, energetic, cheery undergraduate until, at thirty-five, he returns from a business expedition to find his wife under the baneful influence of Ibsen, the futile misconceptions of emancipation and personal direction of a charlatan and a fanatic. His hitherto contented, happy, and placid wife has had her rosy spectacles torn from her eyes in an accident and sees her husband no longer as a hero, an unsubstantial creature built of dreams and ladies' novels, but a man, a fine, ripe, selfish, business-man, a credit to his sex and his country.

Up to this point Mr. Sutro's play is wholly excellent. We like and respect and know both the husband and the wife. We recognise as human, too, the charlatan and the fanatic, and we look forward eagerly for the honest solution of an entirely conceivable thesis. But from the rise of the curtain on Act II. truth leaves the play and theatricality enters it. It is excellent and ingenious theatricality; we are much entertained and amused; but, all the same, it is very clear to us that we have been cheated. The men and women of Act I. have been twisted into dolls. They are all like nothing in life until an unexpected touch of Pinero realism makes the whole theatre reel and quiver, and puts very hot blood once more into the puppets from whom all blood had been purposely and shamelessly drawn. The husband suddenly flings his arms round the shoulders of the red-headed typist whom he has brought into his house to make his wife jealous and kisses her on the mouth. It is a wonderful moment. It is as though a wooden soldier had suddenly fired a real bullet from a wooden gun. It is a pure Pinero, and it kicks the wilfully insincere little play clean into the middle of life, and makes the end of it quite impossible to accept. The husband and not the charlatan would have gone off with the red-headed typist, and the wife, now convinced of her martyrdom, would have thrown in a discontented lot with the charlatan and the fanatic. As it is, the curtain goes down on a wife who no longer looks at her husband through rosy spectacles, in the arms of a husband whose passion is inflamed by another woman. What sort of life are these two people going to lead in the future? What sort of life are the husband and wife in Mr. Jones' play going to lead? Happy endings, forsooth!

Well, there it is. This is how plays are written to-day by two well-practised playwrights, because that is how they are required to be written by the men who run theatres. The only consolation lies in the acting of them. It can be said that both "The Ogre" and "The Perplexed Husband" are not only acted to perfection, but are produced to perfection. Sir George Alexander is charming. He plays his part with a grace and a likeableness which are beyond praise, and Miss Kate Cutler does not spare herself in realising a very vivid picture of the flighty, empty-headed, petulant, selfish, little woman. At the St. James's Theatre the actors are admirably chosen. Miss Gladys Cooper looks deliciously pretty and plays with the utmost naturalness, and Mr. Hallard, Mr. Owen Nares, Mr. Vivian Reynolds, and Mr. Valentine, especially Mr. Valentine, could not be bettered. At Wyndham's Mr. Gerald du Maurier brings all his best and surest art to bear on the average man. Every time we see Mr. du Maurier we see something more of his genius, his effortless expertness, his unstrained certainty of touch, the unique way in which he keeps things going. As the charlatan Mr. Lyall Swete gave a very ripe comedy performance and took enormous relish in his self-conscious pedantry. Miss Henrietta Watson made the fanatic almost too painfully sincere and true. She remained alive and real after all the other characters had dwindled into marionettes. Miss Athene Seyler was not quite happily placed. She is very intelligent, very much in earnest, but has not yet lived down the self-consciousness of the amateur and the mannerisms of the pet pupil of the Dramatic Academy. Miss Enid Bell, on the other hand, gave a remarkable performance and one that was valuably paradoxical; although she looked most sophisticated, she managed to create an effect of innocence that was very necessary. Miss Maude Millett gave a beautiful performance. She was the sensible, happy, unredeemed wife to the very life, the woman who while realising the imperfections of human nature made the best of it, and was more truly emancipated without recourse to ridiculous and painful extremes than the most advanced suffragist. "The Ogre" and "The Perplexed Husband" are, therefore, worth seeing. Although they hedge in what we must call a very weak manner with the marriage problem, they do contain much that is ingenious and entertaining. They are, in a word, good enough to make us wish that they were better.

MUSIC

WORCESTER FESTIVAL

APART from any question of artistic merit or otherwise, the Three Choirs Festivals are interesting because they are so largely local efforts. At each of them, Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, the Cathedral organist is by virtue of that office, conductor-in-chief. At one time singers from the Northern Counties were imported, but the choruses now consist entirely of local singers, and as far as possible—though this can be done to only a very small extent—local instrumentalists are engaged in the orchestra. Other players are engaged chiefly from the London Symphony and Hallé Orchestras. Except for the classics, the works included in the programmes are mainly by composers who have local, family or professional associations, and the district which has produced Parry and Elgar is not without other composers of merit and standing. Naturally such festivals suffer defects consequent upon their corresponding advantages. It would be almost impossible for the ordinary Cathedral organist to obtain the varied experience requisite for the making of a really great chorus master or conductor, even if he possessed the ability. Mr. Ivor Atkins, who conducted the festival which commenced at Worcester on September 10th, has neither the ability nor the opportunity to become this, and while some of his work rose to a very creditable height, it must be confessed other parts were commonplace, and even poor.

"Elijah" to open and "The Messiah" to close are inevitable at these festivals and proved the lowest depths of festival performance. No one, from conductor down to the humblest chorus-singer, appeared to find anything of interest in them. Very different was the really excellent performance of Bach's "The Passion according to St. Matthew." A new edition of this work had been prepared for the occasion by Mr. Atkins and Sir Edward Elgar, assisted by Professor C. S. Terry. Its principal features were the careful revision of the words, and slight and subtle changes of expression and phrasing. Also the chorales were accompanied simply on the organ and the recitatives on the pianoforte. With one exception the latter were excellently in keeping, though with a less discreet and able pianist than Dr. G. R. Sinclair it is possible that the effect would not be so satisfactory. For the chorale in the opening number the boys' voices from the three choirs were employed, and the whole effect of this number was remarkable for its unity, clarity, and expression. With the great dramatic cry of "Barabbas" this was the crowning point of the festival. Mr. Gervase Elwes as the "Evangelist" was not in his best voice, but sang with expression and reverence, as did also Mr. Campbell McInnes as "Christus." Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Kirkby Lunn, and Mr. Robert Radford filled the other principal parts, and minor solos were sung by Madame Le Mar, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. J. A. Smith, and Mr. E. W. Davies. Herr Fritz Kreisler played the solo violin parts which accompany the arias "Have mercy, Lord" and "Give, O give me back my Lord." This was on Thursday morning.

It is a sure sign of the tendency of public taste to turn from old favourites that the largest congregation (except on Sunday afternoon, when no charge was made for admission) assembled on Wednesday morning, when the programme comprised the Third Act of "Parsifal," Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," and Sir Edward Elgar's Second Symphony. Of these three works there is little doubt the last-named was the chief attraction. Its composer is a native of Worcester, and every one in that city is proud of the fact. Whether from its intrinsic nature or because Sir Edward Elgar had a more complete hold of his forces it is difficult to say; it was also the most effective musically. Off the stage "Parsifal" is always more or less tedious, and the Third Act is never very exciting. Palestrina's a capella work is a glorious one, but the chorus was not in a condition to do it justice. Elgar's symphony in E flat, well compounded and beautifully scored as it is, improves on further acquaintance, but will in no wise compare with the first. Much the same may be said of his violin concerto, which was well played, though not superlatively so, by Kreisler on Thursday evening. It is impossible to avoid the feeling that the composer has been too anxious to produce a large quantity of orchestral music within a certain period, and has consequently had recourse to manufacturing methods. As a conductor of his own works, however, he continues to improve, and often falls very little short of greatness.

Of the four actual novelties, two were produced at the secular concert given in the Public Hall on Wednesday evening. Professor Granville Bantock brought forward an "Overture to a Greek Tragedy—Œdipus at Colonus" (Sophocles), which showed him in a new light. He has seized the tragic character of the complete story, and has also suggested some of the details by his characteristic writing. Though he has not labelled his themes, it is difficult not to associate them with such ideas as the remorse of Œdipus, the flight to Colonus, and the consolation of Antigone. It is a fine and interesting work, though quite short, and will probably rank very highly among the works of Mr. Bantock. A set of Variations for Strings by W. H. Reed (the leader of the orchestra), played at the same concert, are well written and striking in many respects. They owe something to the composer's forebears, particularly to Brahms, Elgar, and Bantock, but are not without signs of individuality. They were excellently played under his direction and were very appreciatively received.

Since "Everyman" Dr. Walford Davies has not progressed far, and his latest work, "Five Sayings of Jesus," together with a reputed Saying of His and certain other Words chiefly derived from "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas à Kempis, has the same mystical character and the same methods of obtaining the effects as its predecessor. Had we not heard "Everyman" we should say this was as original as it is beautiful. It is written for tenor soloist (Mr. Gervase Elwes), chorus, and orchestra, and was well performed under the direction of the composer. "Five Mystical Songs," by Dr. Vaughan Williams, lean very much to the modern French school, while they nevertheless reproduce the sentiment of the poems by George Herbert. They did not appear to be great achievements. Other works included in the Festival programme were Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Mozart's Requiem Mass, Parry's Coronation Te Deum, and a number of smaller items, none of which calls for special comment. Six out of the seven concerts were given in the Cathedral. Of course, no sign of approval of works or artists was allowed, and everything was done with the greatest reverence. It was noticeable, however, that more people left before the close of "Elijah" and "The Messiah" than at the rendering of the other works. Slowly but surely these oratorios are losing their inordinate popularity.

SIR RICHARD BURTON—II.

By FRANK HARRIS

No one, I think, who knows men will deny that Richard Burton was a master of speech and action, like Walter Raleigh, though in every respect an incomparably greater man. He was a more daring and a more successful explorer; an infinitely better scholar, with intimate knowledge of a dozen worlds which Raleigh knew nothing about, a greater writer, too, and a more dominant, irresistible personality. Young Lord Pembroke once slapped Raleigh's face; no sane man would have thought of striking Burton. Aristocratic Elizabethan England, however, could honour Raleigh and put him to noble use, whereas Victorian, till-and-pill England could find no place for Richard Burton and could win no service from him. Think of it! Burton knew the Near East better than any Westerner has ever known it; he was a master of literary Arabic and of the dialects spoken in Egypt and the Soudan. Moreover, as he himself puts it modestly, "the accidents of my life, my long dealings with Arabs and other Mohammedans and my familiarity not only with their idiom but with their turn of thought and with that racial individuality which baffles description" made Burton an ideal ruler for a Mohammedan people. Besides, he was already under the Foreign Office. And yet when we took Egypt we sent Lord Dufferin to govern it, and tossed a small consular post to Richard Burton as a bone to a dog. Dufferin knew no Arabic, and nothing about Egypt. Burton knew more than any one else on earth about both, and was besides a thousand times abler than the chattering, charming Irish peer. Yet Dufferin was preferred before him. Deliberately, I say that all our mistakes in Egypt—and they are as numerous and as abominable as years of needless war have ever produced—came from this one blunder. This sin England is committing every day, the sin of treating the able and true man as the wrong and bad man, and therefore negligible; it is the sin against the Holy Spirit, the sin once thought unforgivable. No wonder Burton wrote that the "crass ignorance" (of England) "concerning the Oriental peoples which should most interest her, exposes her to the contempt of Europe as well as of the Eastern World." No wonder he condemned "the regrettable raids of '83-'84," and "the miserable attacks of Tokar, Teb, and Tamasi" upon the "gallant negroids who were battling for the holy cause of liberty and religion and for escape from Turkish taskmasters and Egyptian tax-gatherers," and he concludes thunderously there was "not an English official in camp . . . capable of speaking Arabic."

Gladstone appointed Dufferin; Gladstone sent Gordon to the Soudan at the dictation of a journalist as ignorant as himself! Gladstone, too, appointed Cromer, and after Tokar and Teb we had the atrocious, shameful revenge on the Mahdi's remains and the barbarous murders of Den-shawi; and a thousand thousand unknown tragedies besides, all because England's rulers are incapable of using her wisest sons and determined to pin their faith to mediocrities—like choosing like.

"England," says Burton, "has forgotten, apparently, that she is at present the greatest Mohammedan empire in the world, and in her Civil Service examinations she insists on a smattering of Greek and Latin rather than a knowledge of Arabic." Here is what Burton thought about the English Civil Service; every word of it is true, every word memorable:—

In our day, when we live under a despotism of the lower "middle-class" who can pardon anything but superiority, the prizes of competitive service are monopolised by certain "pets" of the Médiocratie, and prime favourites of that jealous and potent majority—the Mediocrities who know "no nonsense about merit." It is hard for an outsider to realise how perfect is the monopoly of commonplace, and to comprehend how fatal a stumbling-stone that man sets in the way of his own advancement who dares to think for himself, or who thinks more or who does more than the mob of gentlemen-employees who know very little and do even less. "He knows too much" is the direst obstacle to official advancement in England—it would be no objection in France; and in Germany, Russia and Italy, the three rising Powers of Europe, it would be a valid claim for promotion. But, unfortunately for England, the rule and government of the country have long been, and still are, in the hands of a corporation, a clique, which may be described as salaried permanent and irresponsible clerks, the power which administers behind the Minister. They rule and misrule; nor is there one man in a million who, like the late Mr. Fawcett, when taking Ministerial charge, dares to think and act for himself and to emancipate himself from the ignoble tyranny of "the office."

With all its faults the English Civil Service is better than our Parliamentary masters. Like fish a State first goes bad at the head. Burton used to tell how he came home and offered all East Africa to Lord Salisbury. He had concluded treaties with all the chiefs; no other Power was interested or would have objected. But Lord Salisbury refused the gift. "Is Zanzibar an island?" he wanted to know, and "Is East Africa worth anything?" So we allowed the Germans twenty years later to come in and cut "the wasp's waist" and bar our way from the Cape to Cairo.

England wasted Burton—wasted him shamefully, and has already paid millions of money, to say nothing of far more precious things (some of them beyond price), for her stupidity, and England's account with Egypt is still all on the wrong side—stands, indeed, worse than ever, I imagine; for Egypt, is now bitterly contemptuous of English rule. Egypt is a source of weakness to England therefore, and not a source and fount of strength, as she would have been from the beginning if the old Parliamentary rhetor had had eyes as well as tongue, and had set Burton to do the work of teaching, organising, and guiding which your Dufferins and Cromers and the rest are incapable even of imagining.

The worst of it is that Burton has left no successor. Had he been appointed he would have seen to this, one may be sure; would have established a great school of Arabic learning in Cairo, and trained a staff of Civil servants who would have gladly learned the elements at least of their work—men who would not only have known Arabic, but the ablest natives, and so have availed themselves of a little better knowledge than their own. But, alas! the chance has been lost, and unless something is done soon Egypt will be England's worst failure, worse even than India or Ireland.

But now I must return to Burton. I should like to tell of an evening I spent once with him when Lord Lytton was present. Lytton had been Viceroy of India, the first and only Viceroy who ever understood his own infinite unfitness for the post.

"I only stayed in India," he used to say, "to prevent them sending out an even worse man."

I asked him afterwards why he didn't recommend Burton for the post; for he knew something of Burton's quality.

"They'd never send him," he cried with unconscious snobbery. "He's not got the title or position; besides, he'd be too independent. My God, how he'd kick over the traces and upset the cart!"

The eternal dread of genius, and yet that very evening Burton had shown high qualities of prudence and wisdom quite beyond Lytton's comprehending.

But I must hasten. I found myself in Venice once with time on my hands, when I suddenly remembered that across the sea at Trieste was a man who would always make a meeting memorable. I took the next steamer and called on Burton. I found the desert lion dying of the cage; dying of disappointment and neglect; dying because there was no field for the exercise of his superlative abilities; dying because the soul in him could find nothing to live on in Trieste. In spite of his talent for literature, in spite of his extraordinary gift of speech, Burton was at bottom a man of action, a great leader, a still greater governor of men.

While out walking we stopped at a little café, and I had an object-lesson in Burton's mastery of life. His German was quite good, but nothing like his Italian. He seemed to know the people of the inn and everyone about by intuition, and in a few minutes had won their confidence and admiration. For half an hour he talked to a delighted audience in Dante's speech, jewelled with phrases from the great Florentine himself. As we walked back to his house he suddenly cried to me:—

"Make some excuse and take me out to-night; if I don't get out I shall go mad. . . ."

We had a great night—Burton on his own life: he told of his youth in the Indian Army when he wandered about among the natives disguised as a native (I have always thought of him as the original of Kipling's "Strickland"). His fellow-officers, of course, hated his superiority: called him in derision "the white nigger"; Burton laughed at it all, fully compensated, he said, for their hatred by the love and admiration of Sir Charles Napier (Peccavi, "I have Sinned," Napier), hero meeting hero. It was to Napier, and at Napier's request, that he sent the famous "report" which, falling into secretarial hands, put an end to any chance of Burton's advancement in India—the tragedy again and again repeated of a great life maimed and marred by envious, eyeless mediocrities. What might have been, what would have been—a new earth if not a new heaven—the theme of his inspired narration.

I got him to talk, too, about "The Scented Garden," which he had been working at for some time. Lady Burton afterwards burnt this book, together with his priceless diaries, for prudery's milky taste. He told me (what I had already guessed) that the freedom of speech he used, he used deliberately, not to shock England but to teach England that only by absolute freedom of speech and thought could she ever come to be worthy of her heritage.

"But I'm afraid it's too late," he added; "England's going to some great defeat; she's wedded to lies and mediocrities." . . . He got bitter again, and I wished to turn his thoughts.

"Which would you really have preferred to be," I probed, "Viceroy of India or Consul-General of Egypt?"

"Egypt, Egypt!" he cried, starting up, "Egypt! In India I should have had the English Civil servants to deal with—the Jangali, or savages, as their Hindu fellow-subjects call them—and English prejudices, English formalities, English stupidity, English ignorance. They would have killed me in India, thwarted me, fought me, intrigued against me, murdered me. But in Egypt I could have made my own Civil servants, picked them out, and trained them. I could have had natives, too, to help. Ah, what a chance!"

"I know Arabic better than I know Hindi. Arabic is my native tongue; I know it as well as I know English. I know the Arab nature. The Mahdi business could have been settled without striking a blow. If Gordon had known Arabic well, spoken it as a master, he would have won the Mahdi to friendship. To govern you must know a people—know their feelings, love their dreams and aspirations. What did Dufferin know of Egypt? Poor Dufferin, what did he even know of Dufferin? And Cromer's devoid of Dufferin's amiability!"

The cold words do him wrong, give no hint of the flame and force of his disappointment; but I can never forget the bitter-sadness of it: "England finds nothing for me to do, makes me an office-boy, exiles me here on a pittance." The caged lion!

I have always thought that these two men, Carlyle and Burton, were the two greatest governors ever given to England. The one for England herself, and as an example to the world of the way to turn a feudal, chivalrous State into a great modern, industrial State; the other the best possible governor of Mahomedan peoples—two more prophets whom England did not stone, but did not take the trouble to listen to. She is still paying, as I have said, somewhat dearly for her adders' ears, and must yet pay still more dearly.

I have found fault with Carlyle because he was a Puritan, deaf to music, blind to beauty. Burton was anything but a Puritan, but he was curiously sceptical and practical—his curiosity all limited to this world, which accounts to me for his infernal pedantry. He never seemed to realise that wisdom has nothing to do with knowledge, literature nothing to do with learning. Knowledge and learning—facts are but the raw food of experience, and literature is concerned only with human experience. A child of the mystical East, a master of that Semitic thought which has produced the greatest religions, Burton was astoundingly matter-of-fact. There was no touch of the visionary in him—the curious analogies of things disparate everywhere discoverable, the chemical reactions of passion, the astounding agreement between mathematical formulæ and the laws of love and hatred, the myriad provoking hints, like eyes glinting through a veil, that tempt the poet to dreaming, the artist to belief, were all lost on Burton. He was a master of this life and cared nothing for any other; his disbelief was curiously “emphatic.” He wrote:—

The shivered clock again shall strike, the broken reed shall pipe again,
But we, we die, and Death is one, the doom of Brutes, the doom of Men.

But, with all his limitations and all his shortcomings, Burton's place was an Eastern throne and not the ignoble routine of a petty Consular office.

“TREASURE ISLAND” AS A BOOK FOR BOYS

It is a pity that schoolmasters do not make a point of discovering the private literary tastes of their pupils, in order that we could form some general idea of what boys really like to read. Such an inquiry must be conducted tactfully; the only lists of the kind that we have seen were suspiciously priggish. It is true that there are boys who like Scott and Dickens, but it is safe to say that the average boy of twelve or thirteen cares neither for one nor the other, or at all events, given the opportunity, prefers Henty or Talbot Baines Reed. Yet, while we may acknowledge that boys do not accept our adult standards of criticism, it must not be inferred that they do not possess any of their own. A bookish boy will read anything if the supply of books is limited, but he will like some books better than others, and the most sophisticated of critics has no firmer ground for his judgments than that.

That the critical instinct of boys is sometimes subtle in its workings may be seen from the classic instance of “Treasure Island,” which entirely failed to capture the hearts of the juvenile readers of Young Folks when it appeared as a serial in that periodical. Indeed the editor had to defend it, in reply to criticisms of the earlier instalments. In revenge the “Black Arrow,” surely Stevenson's worst book, proved a great success with the same body of readers, a preference which should reveal to the thoughtful writer the enormous difficulty of estimating the probable popularity of books written for boys. The conscientious critic should be panic-stricken at Christmas-time, when he is faced with the usual deluge of juvenile literature, for he is about to adventure in an unknown land. A musical critic set down suddenly in Barnard's ring at Epsom to write an account of the Derby for the Newmarket touts would be in a position no more embarrassing.

What was it in “Treasure Island” that the readers of Young Folks did not like? If we could find a satisfactory answer to the question we should be nearer to an understanding of juvenile standards of criticism. Offhand, though we should not have thought of bracketing it with “Tom Sawyer” and the “Iliad,” like Mr. Andrew Lang, we should have said that “Treasure Island” was the best boys' book that had ever been written. Pirates, treasure, a desert island, some good fighting and a boy hero are the elements that we should seek in a model work of that description; and though we do not credit the young with any taste for style, they should surely appreciate the romantic spirit and unfailing energy with which Stevenson's tale is told. He avoided, too, the heavy-handed morality that proved the undoing of Dean Farrar, and even, from a boy's point of view, of Thomas Hughes. Virtue triumphs, but so, to a minor extent, does the principal villain—that very finished ruffian John Silver—whose character drew its inspiration, we are told, from the “maimed strength and masterfulness” of the poet Henley, and with whom Stevenson had clearly fallen in love himself. An omission in the story that the author lamented would not probably occur to the mind of a boy. “The trouble is,” he wrote, “to work it off without oaths. Buccaneers without oaths—bricks without straw. But youth and the fond parent have to be consulted.” Another omission, that of female characters, was in joyful obedience to the wishes of the boy on whom he tried the earlier chapters, and here he was undoubtedly right. Yet the readers of Young Folks, those bizarre and nameless critics, refused to hear the charmer's voice till he changed his pipe and gave them the “Black Arrow.”

Boys are ineloquent critics, and this heightens the difficulty of understanding their literary preferences; so that we are forced to fall back on theory to account for the failure of “Treasure Island” in serial form. Perhaps the most notable difference between that and the average book for boys lies in the fact that Stevenson's characterisation is more than skin deep. His hero, Jim Hawkins, is a real boy, and not one of the super-boys who lead armies and drive motor-cars across the pages of most boys' books. Admitting that Jim does heroic things, it is nevertheless true that Stevenson has robbed him of the normal heroic glamour. The grown-ups in the book do not turn to him for orders or acclaim him as a genius. We are made to feel—indeed we are told—that his splendid achievements are due to luck rather than judgment, and he emerges from his adventures without a halo. Now, doubtless, this study of a boy is faithful in terms of life, but this is not the kind of part that a boy would choose to play in his dreams. In the imaginary world of youth a boy triumphs over difficulties by superior skill and intellect, and not by luck, and his triumph is immediately recognised by old and young alike. Instead of adding a new kingdom to this world, “Treasure Island” is a shrewd blow at this fundamental law. It suggests that it is possible for a boy hero to be thoughtless and even foolish, and is a manifest denial of the truth that a boy can do no wrong in the world of adventure.

Again, though the adult mind finds John Silver a convincing and sufficient villain, it may be doubted whether he is acceptable to the young as a type of pirate captain. He is smooth-tongued and hypocritical, and he achieved by guile the ends that a proper pirate captain would have attained by force. It is a pity, for it cannot be denied that his ferocity is genuine when he doffs his ignoble mask. Flint or William Bones must have played the part with a better grace; in fact, from all we learn of Flint he must have been a model pirate, and all the lesser ruffians of "Treasure Island" fall to talking of him when they want to make our flesh creep. Their villainy is merely the shadow of Flint's, and tender youth, with a mind tuned for deeds of violence, may well imagine that the book begins too late. "Treasure Island" is well enough, but where is the tale of Flint's adventures? That is the book that a healthy-minded, blood-thirsty boy would wish to read.

Doubtless in humanising his characters, in making his boy-hero a mere lifelike boy, in sketching his pirates as the cowardly, clumsy ruffians they were in real life, Stevenson was at variance with juvenile conceptions of adventure; and yet the story is so good that the coldness of those early readers remains a mystery. "Treasure Island" was begun at Braemar in August, 1881, and at the same time Stevenson was writing some of those graceful notes of childhood that were afterwards gathered into the "Child's Garden of Verses." In our experience these never fail with young children, who find in them a straightforward expression of everyday emotions, where grown-up people find poignant echoes of the rapture and enchantment of their lost childhood. When a child in our hearing called them "sensible" we realised the measure of the poet's success. From the lips of children he would have desired no other praise.

Intellectually boys are hard to reckon with, for in most of them the child's imagination is giving place to the materialism of a healthy animal, so that side by side with the credulity of inexperience we find a scepticism founded on cheerful ignorance. A boy may dismiss the novels of Scott as "rot" and read a halfpenny legend of Deadwood Dick, the Dime Detective, with interest and pleasure. But we must not on this account deny him the possession of a critical faculty. He knows what he likes, and that is the beginning of all criticism. It would be interesting if readers of THE ACADEMY would reveal their experience of boys' tastes in literature.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

"RED RUIN AND THE 'MAKING' OF THE LAWS"—II.

INSTEAD of choosing new areas for the further application of the free principle wherein its benefaction could be widened and amplified, the leaders started to claim for this miniature Free Trade all the qualities of a kind of panacea. Its effects were not only over-estimated, but in many cases misinterpreted. It had caused an increase in the volume of industry and trade to an unprecedented extent, a decrease in unemployment, a rise in wages, and thousands among the workers became themselves employers of labour. But not content with the actual sum-total of the beneficial effects of their reform, these reformers led the world to believe that the benefactions flowing from utterly different sources were part of its miraculous handiwork. The discovery of steam and its manifold uses on land and water, the reform in the postal system, the abolition of stamp and paper duties, the curtailment of certain despotic restrictions imposed by Bank monopoly, and scores of other innovations—all these represented each their particular contribution to a phenomenal prosperity.

All this exaggeration of facts, confusion of phenomena, and misinterpretation of conditions, when the great falling-off set in some thirty years later, led to a marked change of front in both political parties. Political Economy became discredited, especially among the Conservatives, and the Individualists in the once great Liberal Party permitted themselves to be marched in the very opposite direction Cobden had inaugurated. State Socialism soon became the goal of both parties, and competition in pragmatism and predatory legislation became, as it ever must do, contagious and cumulative.

The usual deplorable results were soon manifest. Profits dwindled, taxes rose. Exasperating inspection, hampering prohibitions, fussy and tiresome regulations, weighed heavily upon our home trade, our industry, and our shipping, while foreign competitors were proportionately encouraged. The parental legislation called for heavy sacrifices, all of which, in default of profits, naturally fell on the wage-earning classes. The lowered consuming power of the masses, due to the lower wages, rendered more fierce the competition among the producers and so still further reduced profits and wages alike.

Such were the direct effects of this great legislative volte-face. Then came the indirect ones, quite as mischievous as the others. The politicians, in their vote-catching panderings to the popular cry, were sedulously preaching a grave and dangerous fallacy—namely, that Capital and Labour are naturally antagonistic. This being, or appearing to be, the conviction of the leaders, what wonder that the masses adopted their view? Being convinced that the masters were the enemies of the men, they proceeded to organise a fighting-machine—the Trades Unions. The huge capital accumulated during the fast vanishing Individualist era by these societies was now squandered, together with their own savings and often the contents of the working-men's homes, in visiting losses on the employers. The doctrine they had learned was that if the reduction of wages were not resisted, and if a rise in wages were not forced upon their masters by means of strikes, the employers would take advantage of their peaceful attitude, and lower wages, or at least keep them stationary.

These victims of fallacious teaching were not aware, and the agitators were incapable of telling them, that no combination or action on the part of the employers can keep wages down so long as trade is progressing, and that no number of strikes, be they however gigantic, can raise wages when trade is on the decline. Even now to-day this wrongful teaching is so deep-rooted among workers and agitators alike, despite the great suffering and losses sustained, that they do not realise the true and actual effects of strikes: reduced consumption, less available capital, prolonged depression, permanently lower wages, and more unemployed. If ever they should recover from the maleficent sophistries with which the politicians and agitators have impregnated them, they will perceive with all their eyes that uninterrupted work means augmented capital, increased consuming power, increased demand for manufactured goods, increased demand for labourers and higher wages—that they may put their trust in the well-founded selfishness of the employer, impelling him to expand his business as much as possible, and consequently to secure as many workers as his extended business demands, thereby keeping wages at the highest possible point compatible with the permanence of his trade. Instead of permitting so natural an evolution, they have been and are killing the goose with the golden eggs.

Thus the direct and indirect consequences and the return to antiquated and exploded fallacies have been compassing the ruin of our industry and trade, and plunging the country and with it the Empire—that veritable Paradise of wealth given rational organisation and sound rule—into a position of ever-growing difficulties and dangers. The workers are the wielders of power, and the more they are persuaded by the politicians to endorse and adopt a system of government which must inevitably undermine trade, industry, transport by land and shipping, and bring these finally to a standstill, the result can alone be misery and exasperation to the point that, by the aid of the State, they will use their power to appropriate all the wealth that has been accumulated.

The capital of the nation is not the property of Government, but of private individuals. Despite every law enacted to the contrary, these can, at a moment's notice, transfer all their capital abroad. Capital cannot be expected to submit to a process of annihilation. When it rebels and quits this country the event will be marked by the breaking down of credit. With an antiquated and irrational centralisation banking system such as ours, the next phase will be the stoppage of all our banks. When the system of clearing by credit and cheques breaks down, all that will remain will be a few millions of gold with which to meet thousands of millions of promises to pay, complete cessation of industry will result in a bank panic, and its probable sequel a gold famine, and the industrial centres will find themselves resourceless. Disorder and confusion will ensue. Local government or emergency committees will grab any stores of food wherever found. Urgent telegrams to foreign ports ordering the retention of all food consignments destined for these islands will be despatched, and the self-inflicted universal blockade would bring about an appalling famine in the country. The climax, involving a wolfish struggle for existence, with all the horrors of a beleaguered city or of a shipwreck, can easily be conceived.

But all such disasters could yet be averted. A return, on a truly amplified scale, to the free principles of Individualism, whereby Free Trade were conferred on Capital and Credit, on the Colonies, on land, as well as in other vital directions, would soon have its beneficial effects, and it can be easily shown that if the new policy were fearlessly approached and dealt with in a non-party spirit, bereft of all prejudice, such small examples of the great benefactions already inherited by us through the unmaking of laws, if broadly applied, would result in a prosperity exceeding that of the crumbled States, and would secure to us the welfare of all classes, as well as the firm consolidation of the Empire.

A. EGMONT HAKE.

NEW ZEALAND SKETCHES

By W. H. KOEBEL

I.

It is bad policy to start with a wailing note. A subtle host—there should be as much entertainment within book-covers as upon a tablecloth—will lay out his most sparkling wines first of all, awaiting the period when his guests' palates shall be clogged ere substituting less cheerful vintages. But how can I refrain from a grumble? The fact is that a very notable portion of the Empire has a genuine grievance. How does it happen that the Maoriland bush should never yet have found a singer? There are names in literature that are famous from their mere association with the men and forests, lakes and lands, of Canada, India, and Africa. Reflect, moreover, on the most marked feature of the anomaly! Australia drew the verse from Adam Lindsay Gordon in a full and clear stream, while a New Zealand poet who can hold the ear of the world still lacks existence.

Now this thing is far more curious than it may appear to those ignorant of both countries. Such folk may well consider it but natural—in view of the great disparity in size of the two lands—that from the blue gums of Australia should have emerged the work of such men as Adam Lindsay Gordon and "Rolf Boldrewood," while the song of the New Zealand mountains and forests should never have echoed beyond their own shores. In reality, since romance is not to be measured by the mile, no comparison is possible between the two fields. Without the slightest fear of being called to account for undue partisanship, it may be said that the glamour of New Zealand is infinitely greater than that of Australia. Who lived amongst the gum-trees of the latter ere the advent of the white man? Now that I have written it, the question is obviously couched in an unfortunate form. To the irreverent it will suggest the opossum; whereas I am referring to the tribes of rather unpoetic natives, the limitations of whose intelligence are narrower than those of the majority of such folk.

It is time to forsake such comparisons in romance and to turn to the topic of New Zealand alone. And when we arrive in New Zealand, let it be distinctly understood that no halt is to be made in such towns as Christchurch, Wellington, Auckland, or in any other centre of electric tramways, busy streets, and hot or cold water on tap. No; we will make directly for a small bush township that sits on the shores of a bay just at the spot where a river, coursing down from the mountains inland, enters the ocean.

It is a short ride from here to the bush. An hour's smart canter will gain the country that is so rich in natural effect and in Maori legend. And when you have once set eyes on it the impression will remain with you: have no doubt on that point! I have seen tropical forests where the flowers blazed in arrogant pride, and whose trees themselves were painted in bewildering hues of blossom, even down to their trunks, from which the orchids hung with all the spendthrift radiance of the parasite. An overwhelming scene this! As entrancing to the senses in the first instant as would be a draught of honey and maraschino—and as sickly. A purely gorgeous pot of the kind possesses something of the effrontery of the painted woman. Can nature be immoral? If so, the vice is to be met with in places such as this, where the monkeys chatter and the humming-birds flit in the clearings. At the first glimpse it is magnificent; but familiarity must inevitably breed a suggestion of rankness.

The wonder of the Maoriland bush is of another order. Immeasurably deeper, infinitely more subtle, it is very stately, very silent, breathing out its mystery from every one of its evergreen leafy pores. The very birds have attuned themselves to its mood; the silence is broken by little beyond the silvery chime of the bell-bird. There are no chatterers in the depths of the bush: only ghosts, so the Maori says, and wandering spirits of evil. If so, how can the dreaded things sustain their malice in such soft and dreamy surroundings, amidst the bush of evergreen, tree-fern, and palm, beneath which spreads the thick carpet of maidenhair?

But the life of the country does not begin and end with the leafage of the bush. There is its human population, and that of the township on the fringe of the ocean. There are its foolish sheep, its wise sheep-dogs, its horses, cattle, and the loves and hatreds of all, irrespective of breed or sex. It is astonishing how much a district holds, to say nothing of a country! It is impossible to dismiss the topic of humanity as curtly as that of the lower animals. What type of men are these that live among the forests, peaks, and grass-lands of the clearings? Of these I can give a broad and accurate description at the very outset. They are, in fact, very much like other men. It is but natural that in some respects they should differ from those who dwell in more populous and noisy centres. They have in a marked degree those qualities that go hand in hand with perfect physical health and a strenuous life that holds many moments where disaster can only be averted by instant decision and unshattered nerve.

It may be that the force of association has caused me to rate them too highly. For staunchness, reliability, and open-heartedness I would put the man of the bush in the same category as the sailor. The two professions have much in common. Each is dependent on a very limited society of his fellow-beings, each has to fend for himself in the hour of need, and neither has the opportunity of displaying his best qualities when arriving in town or port. But the man from the bush has more than these primary virtues, as I hope to prove later.

Of course there are all kinds, even in the bush and in the open pasture land. There are as many lawsuits, boundary disputes, and minor failings here as elsewhere. But were the bush docked of its frailties it would be a most uninteresting spot. And here the weakness of the universal types is wont to be drowned in an unusually prolific flow of the milk of human kindness. If you leave the country an embittered man, the fault lies entirely with yourself, and not in the least with the land or its people. The place, in fact, will be well rid of you, and I cannot conceive what other spot would be the gainer.

Since we are giving the ground a preliminary clearing for action, one point should be made clear at the start. A misconception may arise concerning the nature of him whom I have called the man from the bush. In the imagination of the exuberant-minded he may be pictured as a wild man from the woods, crude as a bush pig in costume and manners. A tremendous wide-awake hat will inevitably form part of his garb, and for preference a flaming red shirt. But it would be superfluous to enter into the various popular conceptions of the man who is vaguely imagined as hailing from the back of beyond. Frankly, it is no more possible to collect his numerous representatives into a single type than it would be to effect a similar feat in the case of the various grades and conditions of townsmen. He may be landowner, shepherd, or stockman. As any of the three he may bear the name of a well-known family—the prevalence of the younger sons of such is a marked feature in Maoriland—or his origin may be commonplace or quite humble. His manners will be in accordance with his birth rather than with his station in life; but it may be taken for granted that the behaviour of even the most lowly will bear a favourable comparison with that of the corresponding class at home, although in the first instance a newcomer may mistake a natural independence for something less admirable.

As to costume, the man from the back-blocks will wear exactly what suits him in the course of his daily work. In place of the conventional wideawake, his headgear may be a cloth cap, or even an ancient and battered bowler. The latter I have frequently seen—I admit not without a deep sense of injury to the poetical fitness of things—on the head of a rider galloping desperately amid the most romantic country in the world, while the cattle were charging blindly, and the crashes of the stockwhips echoed across the gullies. But one has no right to consider costume at such a juncture. The sole business of the hour is with the sheep, as the inattentive may find out to their cost. It is only when bound for the township that sartorial matters should occupy the mind. Then, indeed, you will see a transformation from dungaree trousers and worn flannel shirts to a far more brilliant apparel that in many cases is not to be distinguished from the smart apparel in which men are wont to hack at home. Let me assure you that we can be dressy on occasion, even in the back-blocks.

AUTUMN BOOKS : GENERAL

MR. EDMUND DULAC, who has beautified the glaring hoardings with a poster of "Macbeth," has illustrated "Tales from Hans Andersen." The book is now in the press, and will provide many a wondering circle of children with speechless hours. The art of Mr. Dulac is very delicate and imaginative, and has obviously been inspired by Andersen's evergreen tales. Mr. Arthur Rackham, whose work belongs to the same school, also has a new book in the press. He has provided "Siegfried and the Twilight of the Gods" with illustrations. There is another interesting illustrated book nearly ready. This is "Tannhäuser," by Willy Pogany.

Among forthcoming memoirs and biographies there are those of Bishop Ernest Wilberforce, by Mr. J. B. Atlay, the late editor of the Globe, and now a Special Commissioner of Income-tax; and Bishop King, by Mr. G. W. E. Russell. Father Tyrrell has written his Autobiography and Life, and Sir Henry Craik the Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon. Another very interesting volume, and one which is being read widely by the earnest student of the drama, is Mr. Charles Calvert's "Sixty-eight Years on the Stage." Admiral Sir Edward Seymour has also fallen a victim to the cacoethes scribendi, and is the author of a book called "My Naval Career and Travels." The autobiography of the ex-Crown Princess of Saxony has been out some days. Later in the month there will be added to these Mr. Lucien Wolf's "Life of the Marquess of Ripon," Mr. Bernard Holland's "Life of Spencer Compton, Eighth Duke of Devonshire," and the "Memoirs and Letters of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Morier, G.C.B.;" "Tennyson and his Friends," edited by Hallam, Lord Tennyson; Mr. Frederic Harrison's "Autobiographic Memoirs;" "The Early Youth of Marie Antoinette: a Study in Grisaille," by Lady Younghusband; Mr. H. M. Hyndman's "Record of an Adventurous Life," giving, of course, his connection with the early phases of the Socialist movement in England and his friendship with Mazzini and Marx, his journeys to Australia, India, and America, and his meetings with George Meredith, Disraeli, Clemenceau, William Morris, and Lord Randolph Churchill; "Forty Years of Friendship, as Recorded in the Correspondence of John Duke, Lord Coleridge," edited by Mr. Charlton Yarnall; the Biography of John Gibson, the sculptor; and Mr. and Mrs. Pennell's authorised "Life of James McNeill Whistler," which has long been expected. In addition to these Mr. Heinemann will publish the first volume of the Autobiography of Mr. George Moore; "My Vagabondage," by Mr. J. E. Patterson; the autobiographical revelation of an East-End man, by Mr. George Acorn, entitled "One of the Multitude;" and the "Life Story of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan."

Under the rather wide heading of History we are to have from Macmillan and Co. Mr. E. C. K. Gonner's "Common Law and Inclosure," Professor J. B. Bury's "The Eastern Roman Empire from the Fall of Irene to the Accession of Basil I. (A.D. 802-867)," Professor W. S. Ferguson's "Historical Essay on Hellenistic Athens," Dr. H. Belcher's "The First American Civil War," Mr. William Braithwaite's "The Beginnings of Quakerism," and "Florent Etona," by Mr. Ralph Nevill. Kegan Paul and Co. are preparing a book called "Rowlandson's Oxford," by Mr. A. Hamilton Gibbs, which is an estimate of Oxford two hundred years ago from an undergraduate point of view, illustrated by a set of hitherto unpublished drawings of Rowlandson, reproduced in colours. Mr. Heinemann announces the work upon which Dr. Nansen has been so long engaged, giving the history of his Arctic explorations. This is called "Through Northern Mists," and will be illustrated from old charts and engravings and from drawings by the author. The same publisher will send out Mr. Lovat Fraser's "India Under Curzon and After," and "Through Trackless Labrador," by Mr. Hesketh Pritchard.

To the already large number of books for the young there are shortly to be added E. Nesbit's "The Wonderful Garden," with illustrations by Mr. H. R. Millar; Lewis Carroll's "Phantasmagoria, and other Poems," illustrated by Mr. A. B. Frost; "Fairies Afield," by Mrs. Molesworth, illustrated by Miss G. Demain Hammond; "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, and Through the Looking-glass," with ninety-two illustrations, sixteen being in colour, by John Tenniel; "The Ingoldsby Legends," with sixteen full-page illustrations in colour by Mr. H. G. Theaker; and Gilbert White's "Selborne," with illustrations by Mr. G. E. Collins.

From various publishers many other interesting books may be looked for from time to time, such as Mr. Justin McCarthy's "Irish Reminiscences;" "The Sport of Shooting," by Mr. Owen Jones; "The Italian Year," by Mr. Richard Bagot, who thus deserts fiction for a change; "Undiscovered Russia," by Mr. Stephen Graham; "The Bargain Book," by Mr. C. E. Jerningham (the witty "Marmaduke" of Truth) and Mr. Lewis Bettany; "Nigeria: its Peoples and its Problems," by Mr. E. D. Morel; and "The Cheerful Day," by Mr. Reginald Lucas. To these we must add "Principles of Economics," by Professor F. W. Taussig; "Monopoly and Competition: a Study in English Industrial Organisation," by Hermann Levy, Professor in the University of Heidelberg; "Unemployment," by Messrs. B. S. Rowntree and Bruno Lasker; and "The Modern Prison Curriculum," by Dr. R. F. Quinton.

PHOTOGRAPHY

ON Friday evening, September 15th, an interesting lecture was given at the Pall Mall Galleries, in connection with the present exhibition of the London Salon of Photography, by Anthony Guest, Esq., on "The Search for Beauty." Mr. Guest, it will be remembered, is the author of "Art and the Camera," and in his discourse he brought to bear all the sympathy and enchantment of which readers of that most useful book on photography know him to be capable. He said that those who made search for and greatly appreciated beauty had no means of comparing their state with what it would have been had the desire for beauty been denied them. One artist saw more in the human form, another in landscape, a third in flowers, a fourth in the sea, and a fifth in architecture than his fellows, and consequently each was inclined to make a speciality of his particular subject in his work. Beauty can only be real when it fits in with the general scheme of things. Fitness in its turn produces harmony, harmony happiness, and happiness health. Love must be brought to the quest for beauty, for it was beyond material forms. Mr. Guest went on to point out what a very large amount is done with the oval shape, that the beauty of the female form was produced by oval curves, and that Nature had very little use for the circle. He referred to Charles Dickens as the discoverer of beauty where it had been previously suspected that none existed, and advocated that those interested in photography could not do better than continue this search for loveliness, at the same time not forgetting to keep their sympathies keenly alive.

A short and lively discussion followed on the beauty of line, the beauty of surface and texture, and many other subjects of interest to those who enter into the technical side of photography. The lecture was fairly well attended, and concluded about 9.45.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

M. STOLYPIN

IN an age when genius is usually associated with a superabundance of decadent attributes, the man who typifies plain virility is likely to be lost among the crowd. Certainly he will stand head and shoulders above his fellows; but of what profit to him, or to any one, if eyes are turned earthwards in search of mighty insects?

Stolypin has fallen—fallen at the hand of a "modern," of a thing that in more wholesome times would miraculously have ceased to exist on attaining the age of maturity, and mischief. And yet this creature, held to be vile by the sturdy common-sense of vast communities of Slavs, Teutons, Scandinavians, Latins, and Anglo-Saxons, is the product of an advanced movement in the direction of so-called intellectual emancipation. We confess to a feeling of some bitterness when we discover inferential, if partial, recognition of the movement expressed in the more reputable of our daily journals. The recognition may not be intentional, but nevertheless it is a surrender, and a craven surrender, to a trend of modern thought that knows only two categories—the traditional Napoleon calmly and deliberately moving the pawns of his day, and the modern leader pressing on to his ideal, but hampered by the brute force of an untutored and perverse proletariat. There is room in this country for the establishment of a tribunal whose duty it should be to take severely to task and to censure such scribes as are to be found in Fleet Street and its purlieus, who, smugly glossing over what they are pleased to term his excusable imperfections, would indite as the epitaph of the man who has so swiftly become merged in the shadows that "although possessing no genius, he meant well to his Sovereign and his fellow-subjects." It was Stolypin's misfortune that he should have lived in an age of pigmies, and that his intellect and achievements should have been measured by puny standards. But truth will triumph, and the great statesman, revered by his Sovereign, beloved by the Russian people, and honoured by the whole world, will go down to history as a giant among men.

THE REFORM MOVEMENT IN CHINA

To the student of nations there can be no more fascinating problem than that which is suggested by the existing situation in China. It is a problem fraught with possibilities so immense as to appal the imagination—a problem, moreover, possessed of world-wide significance no less than world-wide interest, and characterised by an ever-changing complexity which has again and again baffled serious investigation and falsified reasoned speculation. The dramatic entry of Japan into the comity of nations turned the eyes of the West towards the East. Men wondered whether or not China, stirred by the force of an example so close at hand, would arouse herself from the slumber of ages to claim a place among the enlightened Powers of the world. The inauguration of sweeping reforms throughout the Empire seemed to indicate that progressive forces had begun to move in earnest. People who paid brief visits to the country, and whose opportunities for observation were necessarily limited, did not hesitate to declare that China had actually awakened, and that within a few years she would attain to a degree of national efficiency that would equal, if it did not excel, that already achieved by Japan. On the other hand, serious students of the trend of events who had the advantage of long residence in China strongly deprecated any undue display of optimism in regard to the general situation. While not slow to recognise that there were abundant evidences of promising transition, they urged with considerable force that until the source of all the evil that withered the land—the deep-seated corruption and wilful maladministration of the Central Government at Peking—had been thoroughly cleansed, it could not truthfully be said that an era of genuine reform had dawned.

Thus in relation to existing conditions we have two distinct schools of publicists, one of which lends its authority to the final verdict that China is awake, while the other, better-informed, and in every way a more dependable guide, takes the cautious view that she has, as it were, opened her eyes, and is gazing in wonderment at the world of progress around her, but that she has not yet made up her mind to rise from her bed. Whichever opinion may be correct, the all-important fact remains that extreme optimism is not met with extreme pessimism; in other words, in no quarter is it denied that since the poignant lesson of the Russo-Japanese War was presented to China she has, solely of her own volition, made material advancement in many directions tending towards national efficiency. Foreigners who have dwelt long in the country, and who have come in close contact with the people and their customs, are, by reason of their experience of the past, disinclined to commit themselves hastily to anything in the nature of a definite judgment. China has shown signs of awakening before to-day, and she has fallen into deep slumber again.

But of the present movement towards reform it can be said, without the least fear of contradiction, that at no time in her modern history has she made a more determined effort to shake off once and for all that sickly lethargy which has so long sapped the vitality of her people and so frequently threatened her existence as an independent nation. Should the forces of progress gain, and, without serious interruption of any kind, continue to enjoy, complete ascendancy, then the present generation will undoubtedly see the rise of China to a place among the leading Powers. The magnitude of an evolution such as this would involve, and the far-reaching character of the influence it would exercise on world-politics, cannot be over-estimated. A strong and prosperous China would end for ever the aggressive domination of the white races. Sir Robert Hart recently related that years ago Wen Hsiang said to him, "You had better let us sleep on; if you will awaken us, we shall go further and faster than you will like!" "They are awake now," commented Sir Robert, "and the new learning is at work all over the country, but mistakes will be made, and the crop will not yield so much or so quickly as has been anticipated. It is no easy task to force four hundred millions of people into line, and yet time will see changes, and the apostles of the new learning will have disciples, and the end will be the product of evolution of work, and the fittest will survive."

When it is remembered that China is half as large again as the United States, excluding Alaska, and that, leaving out of consideration altogether the several dependencies that owe her tribute, the smallest of the eighteen provinces that lie south of the Great Wall contains a population of six or seven millions, while that of the largest reaches sixty or seventy millions, and that each province is sufficiently extensive to contain a kingdom, some faint idea may be derived of the importance to be attached to the present movement of the progressive forces throughout the length and breadth of the land. Should these progressive forces gather strength, and endure until they place China in the forefront of the nations, a task infinitely greater than that so successfully undertaken by the makers of modern Japan will have been accomplished. But it stands to reason that China cannot attain to national efficiency with the same rapid precision as that which was so remarkably characteristic of the transitional period in Japan. The vastness of her territory in itself presents serious obstacles to reform. It is related that until Western nations broke in upon their seclusion the Chinese only knew the world as China, fringed round by a few semi-barbarous States, all of which paid not unwilling homage to the Son of Heaven, and that in the Middle Ages the Japanese were looked upon by them merely as a race of sea-pirates who from time to time ravaged their coasts. Only sixteen years ago, when China was at war with Japan, the southern provinces regarded the conflict as an affair solely belonging to the northern provinces, and the authorities at Canton even went the length of demanding from the Japanese the return of some revenue-cutters on the ground that they had been captured by mistake! Considerable time elapsed before the inhabitants of Central China even heard the news that a war had been fought.

The extension of communications, and the stimulation of public opinion by means of the spread of education, are gradually creating a national sentiment, and to-day there are numbered among the people of the south some of the most ardent reformers to be found in any part of the Empire. The masses, however, are still fettered by ancient custom and are steeped in the conservatism of Confucian teachings—teachings which, as Sir Robert Hart has observed, have produced a singularly law-abiding people, intelligent, frugal, industrious, and contented, with a common-sense view of life; but teachings, nevertheless, which have the defect of their very qualities, inasmuch as, while excellent for domestic guidance, they do not supply what the present times of foreign intercourse demand—the strength that enables a people to hold its own against external aggression. It has at last been recognised that the requirements of a modern State call for educational methods on modern lines, and there are everywhere evidences to show that a real start has been made in the widespread dissemination of Western learning.

A nation can never permit itself to become old, for, like an individual, it is exposed to the risk of senility. Conscious of a history dating back five thousand years, and still living in the memory and adhering strictly to the customs of an ancient civilisation that at one time spread its light to all parts of Asia, China has been on the verge of a fatal dotage. At last, after a series of violent shocks to her system extending over many years, after her Empire has been shorn of vast territories, and after Japan, to whom in remote ages she imparted her early culture, has risen with upstart suddenness to a foremost place among the nations, China has reluctantly recognised that her ways are out of tune with the times.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

ALREADY the annual Motor Show at Olympia, which will open its doors to the public on Friday, November 3rd, and remain open until Saturday, the 11th idem, is becoming the principal topic of conversation in motoring circles, and, as usual, speculation is rife as to what novelties and surprises are in store for the motoring enthusiast at the Exhibition of 1911. That the Show will be at least as successful, from the point of view of the promoters, as any of its predecessors has been certain for a long time. Many months ago every inch of available space had been applied for and allocated to the exhibitors, and public interest in motoring was never keener than it is to-day, so that an amply satisfactory attendance is a foregone conclusion.

It would be premature at present to attempt anything like a comprehensive forecast of the exhibits, many of the manufacturers preferring to spring their surprises at the Show itself. But it is known that there will be many interesting and important departures from current standard design. According to the Motor, which is always well posted with advance information, several world-famous firms will have new engines embodying the principle of the sliding sleeve instead of the poppet valve. Some of these have a plain up-and-down motion, some a rotary, and others a part rotary; whilst one, embodying a combination of both the perpendicular and the rotary movements will also probably be seen. Whichever of these two different types of engines—the sleeve-valve or the conventional poppet-valve—is destined to predominate ultimately, the continued attempts to popularise the former in one shape or another indicate that many manufacturers and designers do not regard the present type of motor-engine as permanently fixed.

The feature of the forthcoming Show, however, which is likely to prove the most interesting from the popular point of view will be the exhibition for the first time of a number of new British light cars which have been specially designed as a counterblast to the American "invasion." The makers of several of these elect for the present to withhold details, but the Belsize Company—first in the field, as on previous occasions, with new departures—make no secret of their programme in this direction. Their new car, nominally of 10-12 h.p. but actually developing something between 25 and 30 h.p. on the brake, will be one of the sensations of Olympia. In due course we hope to give details of its specification, which is of the most up-to-date description. It will be priced at 200 guineas, complete and ready for the road, and will thus directly challenge the American makers on their own ground—low price combined with adequate power. Mr. J. H. Adams, the well-known and popular manager of the Company for London and the South of England, informs the writer that the demand for the new car has already been extraordinary, and that it has been necessary to arrange for a big extension of the Clayton works to cope with the anticipated requirements. If other important British firms attack the problem of American competition in the same spirited way the "invasion" will rapidly assume a less formidable aspect.

Mr. Graham Gilmour, the British aviator who entered for the Daily Mail £10,000 prize, but was unfortunately disqualified on the eve of the contest, on account of an alleged breach of the Royal Aero Club's regulations, speaks very highly of the ease of control and speed qualities of the new "Bristol" monoplane, which he piloted on its first long cross-country flight last week. In spite of a mist, which was at times so dense as to completely obscure his vision, he flew from Amesbury to Bristol in exactly fifty minutes, alighting safely in a field at the back of the works of the British and Colonial Aeroplane Company, Limited, the makers of the machine. Allowing for the deviations caused by the mist and an inaccurate compass, he is estimated to have covered a distance of seventy to eighty miles, which represents a speed of about ninety miles an hour.

A highly important advance in the direction of minimising the risks associated with flying has apparently been made by the introduction of the double-engined "Short" biplane, which underwent its first trials on Monday last in the Isle of Sheppey. The feeling that one's safety depends absolutely upon the perfect working under all conditions of a single engine is sufficient to deter most people from gratifying any "aerial" aspirations they might have; but with two engines working quite independently, and each

A NEW FACTOR IN MOTORING.

The best is generally good enough for most people; but generally most people are lamentably unsuccessful in getting the best. How, for example, may the motorist get the best tyre? It is the matter of moment to him; but only the costly experiment will answer the question satisfactorily.

If he could exhaustively test every tyre on the market until the best had been determined; if his years of experience and an expert knowledge of rubber and its preparation, had given him ideas for improvement which he could incorporate in that best tyre, and again exhaustively test until he was entirely satisfied with the results, he would be able to claim that he had the best. Is that not so?

Then we have the best tyre because that has been our method. With entire liberty of choice we made our selection, incorporated our ideas, entered into a binding contract with the manufacturers (a firm of the highest reputation and experience), and produced—the VICTOR TYRE. Indisputably the VICTOR TYRE is the best.

The VICTOR VEST continues its extraordinary successful career. The VICTOR VEST is a new foundation, and a new life, for any old cover. It prevents punctures and bursts, and enables the cover to be run to its last shred of tread. We give a written guarantee that it will save 50 per cent. on normal tyre cost—£5 on every £10 spent on tyres.

These two make a new factor in motoring. With the VICTOR RETREADS (sound covers for unsound free) they make the most effective trio available to the motorist to-day. We shall be glad to prove that.

THE CHALLENGE RUBBER MILLS, EAGLE WHARF ROAD, CITY ROAD, LONDON, N.

Telephone—3497 NORTH.

West End Showrooms: 218, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE, W.

Telephone—8317 CENTRAL.

Manufacturers to H.M. War Office, Scotland Yard, India Office, Crown Agent to Colonies, H.M. Office of Works, &c.

capable of maintaining the flight if the other should fail, the matter assumes a different aspect. The difference is analogous to that between cycling down a steep and dangerous hill with one brake and with two respectively. It is stated that the trial of the "Short" machine was quite successful, the machine flying both with the two engines half-throttled down and also with one engine working only.

Once again has the six-cylinder Rolls-Royce demonstrated its supreme excellence in engine flexibility, fuel economy, and speed. Messrs. Rolls-Royce recently entered one of these chassis, fitted with a four-seated touring-body for an R.A.C. trial on the road from London to Edinburgh and back, finishing with a speed-test at Brooklands, the object being to test its capabilities against those of the 65h.p. car, which, in a similar trial, was awarded the Dewar Trophy last year. The trial commenced on the 6th inst., and concluded on Wednesday, the 13th. The official certificate of performance has not yet been issued; but we are able to state that it resulted as follows:—Top gear was used throughout, not a single change being necessary on any occasion; the fuel consumption was 24.32 miles to the gallon, and a speed of over seventy-eight miles per hour was attained on the Brooklands track. Both in fuel economy and speed the Rolls-Royce surpassed the car which gained the Dewar Trophy under similar conditions, although the latter had an engine with a bore and stroke of 5in. by 5in. against the Rolls-Royce 4½in. by 4¼in., and only weighed 4,928lb. against 5,257lb. This is a very extraordinary performance, and furnishes an interesting illustration of the continuous advances being made in Rolls-Royce design and construction.

R. B. H.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

EVEN the most pessimistic bear on the Stock Exchange has made up his mind that the Morocco question is over. No one now talks about war. The two nations will probably continue to haggle for some weeks. But Germany has decided to give France a free hand which is a diplomatic euphemism for a protectorate, and France in return is to hand over to Germany a huge territory in the Congo. As Germany never had any foothold in Morocco at all she gets something for nothing, and she is hardly likely to quarrel with a nation that is so obliging.

Although every financial person is convinced that peace is assured, it is not so certain that the liquidation has completely ended. It was thought that last Friday had seen the last of the selling. But on Tuesday another big account was closed in Paris, and an attempt was made to close an account in Berlin. The latter did not come off, for the market was not strong enough to stand two big liquidations in one day, and the Berlin people consequently decided to wait for a more favourable moment. There is certainly no more selling to come from London. New York appears to have purged itself. If any further trouble occurs it will be at the end of the quarter, when there is always a stringency in Berlin. It is most unlikely that we shall have any further failures in London.

MONEY.—The raising of the German Bank-rate to 5 per cent. gave us very little anxiety, for it is well known that the Reichs Bank was in urgent need of gold. The end of the quarter always sees a huge increase in note circulation, and in order to keep this within reasonable limits the Reichs Bank must increase its stock of gold. Its loans and discounts have been mounting up, and its gold has been decreasing. I did not think that we should have any serious trouble, but our own Bank-rate must be raised if we are to protect the gold supply of this nation. Leaving all political considerations out of the question, it is important for our credit that we should have a strong bank. Egypt will be asking for about six millions, and although the United States will probably be able to finance a large portion of its grain crop somebody will have to find the money for the cotton. There is talk of a Franco-British Syndicate doing this. But nothing has been settled yet. The terms mentioned are 6 per cent. The cotton bills of lading question is not settled. It is probable that the Americans are trying to render themselves independent of the banks; but who can be independent of a bank? If the Franco-British Syndicate agree to finance the cotton crop they will have to borrow money to do it, and it is doubtful whether the banks will be inclined to lend, especially as if they refuse Yankees will have to come to terms over the bills of lading point. But whoever lends the money, it will tend to make things tight in the autumn. We are likely to get a 4 per cent. Rate right through to the end of the year.

CONSOLS.—With dear money all round, Consols continue to go weaker. It seems incredible that our Chancellor of the Exchequer should refuse to support the Consol market. The credit of England does not of course depend on the price of Consols, but it is one factor that goes to make our credit, and with many people it is a sort of index number. It would be a perfectly simple operation to issue Consols to bearer in £5 bonds. It would aid thrift, and it would send up Consols to 85. It would of course affect the Post Office Savings Bank deposits, but you cannot eat your cake and have it too. At the present time, although the Post Office Savings Bank is a useful institution, it is a distinct source of danger from a financial point of view. It would be much better if the Government could borrow money from the masses and pay them interest and abandon its present method of holding the money at call. The notion of issuing cheque-books to Post Office depositors is mere moonshine.

FOREIGNERS.—The liquidation in Tintos still goes on, and as there is no hope of copper improving in value, there is no inducement for the Paris speculator to buy Tintos, and those rich people who always come into the Tinto market when it is low, and are satisfied with the minute yield given at to-day's prices, now find that they can do much better with their money. Foreign stocks generally, however, are extremely steady, for they are bought by investors for their yield, and not by speculators. The strength of the Foreign market during the past three months should have shown the world that the war scare was confined exclusively to the newspapers and the gamblers.

HOME RAILS.—The scare that has set in is really very discreditable to our courage, for even supposing that the leading railways only pay the same dividends as they paid last year, the yield on all our best stocks is ridiculously high, and the prices at which they stand in most cases lower than they should be. Great Easterns at the time of writing are quoted 64¼, and in 1908, although the dividend for the year was only 2½, the lowest price touched was 61. In 1909, it is true, they went to 55, and now that an improvement has set in and the line doing better than it has ever done, everybody is anxious to get out. Great Western ordinary are back at the lowest price of 1909, with an increased dividend. London and North Westerns are only 3 points higher than the lowest price they have touched for ten years, and yet the dividend is everything that we could have hoped for. Midland deferred yield over 5 per cent. They have never been lower than 53½, and they have touched 76. North Easterns have been as high as 171½, and the lowest point they have ever reached was 123½. All these figures go to show how unreasonable is the speculator. It is quite possible that the strike has seriously affected the profits of most of our railways; but it is also unlikely that they have affected these profits so seriously as to jeopardise the chance of the dividend being reduced below that paid last year, and some of the railways will probably increase their distribution; it is too early yet to know exactly how far the lines will recover the lost good traffic. Passenger traffic has certainly been good, but unfortunately passenger traffic is the least remunerative.

YANKEES.—The American banking houses evidently think that the fall has gone quite far enough, for they are now advising their clients to buy. This would seem to show that they have laid in as much stock as they think wise. Trade in the Eastern States appears to be dull, but Western farmers report good crops and Western traders appear filled with optimism. Everything is done in an extravagant fashion in the United States, and we might almost say overdone. It appears to me that the selling of American Railways has been overdone. The big bankers pretend to be harassed by the Government. A great deal of this worry is assumed for political purposes. The Trust decision has cost an infinite amount of trouble to the Standard Oil people. But it has not done worse than this. No doubt Standard Oil subsidiary companies have been selling out large quantities of stock partly with the idea of providing cash and partly in order to show the political people how foolish they were to dissolve the great combine. We shall see the same sort of thing happen when the American Tobacco Company dissolves. There is a general feeling throughout the States that the silly persecution of these Trusts has been overdone. The United States citizen considers that the high price of living is entirely due to the operation of these Trusts. But there are no Trusts in France, and none in Spain, and practically very few in England. Yet we all suffer equally with the States. A reaction is sure to come.

RUBBER.—The Mount Austin people, finding themselves rather short of money, have taken a bull course, and decided to double their capital. In order to secure the support of their shareholders they are purchasing three large estates. Mount Austin promises us a gigantic output in 1923. It is impossible to say whether the estates are cheap or dear, for we are not given data upon which to calculate. We are only told that the deal will reduce the capitalisation from £91 to under £50. The total acreage of the combined properties will be 10,936, and the number of trees nearly a million and a half. But about a million and a quarter of these are quite young, and will not be producing for some years. If Mount Austin can get the money it wants it will be lucky. The rubber market generally is flat.

OIL.—Mr. Tweedy wants money for his Maikop propositions, and is going to make an issue of debentures. I hope he will succeed, but Maikop is quite out of the fashion to-day, and we are all disillusioned with regard to the value of the field. I hear good reports, however, of Ural Caspian. Lobitos does not tell us anything about the boring of the new wells. It is said that they have struck good oil at depth, and it is also suggested that an experimental well which was put down some twelve miles away has turned out satisfactorily. It would be a good thing if the shareholders could receive some information. There is evidently some one buying the shares, and the lack of news is not calculated to keep the shareholders in a good temper. The financial position of Lobitos is fairly sound, for they have stringently written down the cost of the shallow wells.

KAFFIRS.—Last week the shops supported Kaffirs in the hope that they would frighten bears to buy back. But the support was not strong enough, and although the leading stocks were marked up, the raising of the German Bank Rate soon brought in some fresh selling. It is quite clear that the public will not speculate in mines, and although here and there some bold person, tempted by the heavy fall, buys a few shares, quite as many sellers appear as there are buyers. The Kaffir optimist declares that the leading shares are cheap to-day. But when we take into consideration the general tendency in Kaffirs to lower yield and higher working costs the return on the investment is none too high. Perhaps if the mines had ample labour and improved methods of drilling working costs might be reduced. The amalgamations also ought to save money. But it must be admitted that up to the present we have seen no signs of this, only a proof that a great many of the properties amalgamated were put into the combines in order to save a fiasco.

RHODESIANS.—The Mayo report will be out in a day or two, and will show that this company has now only about 12,000 Shamvas left. It has been paying big dividends through the sale of these shares, which it got at par. It still holds a big lot of Jumbos on which there must be a heavy loss. But it has increased its number of claims, and I think we can trust Mr. Rowsell to get rid of some of them at a profit. Sir Abe Bailey is taking his bride to South Africa, but whether he intends to lift the Rhodesia market I do not know. It is said that he has got out of all his mining shares and does not propose to get in again.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Cement report should soon be out. It looks very much as though it would not be up to expectations for the shares are weak. However, there might be a surprise in store for us here. I cannot see any advantage in buying Cement ordinaries, but the preference shares have always paid their dividend and seem to me a reasonable investment. The speculation in Marconis has died down, and there is now nothing to go for in the miscellaneous market.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THAT ILK"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—In your last number Mr. Frank Harris (who ought to know better) begins his article on Sir Richard Burton with "Raleigh, Sir Walter of that ilk." I wonder if he knows what he means, or if he thinks he means anything? The phrase "of that ilk" is a Scottish one, and means that a laird possessed lands of his own name—e.g., Wemyss of Wemyss, or of that ilk, Moncreiffe of Moncreiffe, Fotheringham of Fotheringham, &c. It was translated into Latin as de eodem. In England it is apparently now held to signify something else, but what I know not.

Very truly yours,

A. FRANCIS STEUART.

University Club, Edinburgh.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS

- The Universal Strike. (A Forecast of Twenty Years Ago, now in Course of Fulfilment.)* By William Oakhurst. Odhams Ltd. 6d. net.
- University Extension, Oxford Summer Meeting, 1911. Report of Proceedings.* Illustrated. Oxford Chronicle Co. 1s. net.
- Twentieth Century Cookery Book.* By W. M. Godbold. London Vegetarian Association. 1d.
- The Welshman's Reputation: A Reply to a Recent Satire on the Welsh entitled "The Perfidious Welshman."* By "An Englishman." Stanley Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.
- Short Plays for Small Stages.* By Cosmo Hamilton. Skeffington and Son. 2s. net.

EDUCATIONAL

- A History of England for Schools. With Documents, Problems, and Exercises. Part II. (1603 A.D. to the Present Day.)* By M. W. Keatinge, M.A., and N. L. Frazer, M.A. With Maps and Plans. A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d.
- Poucinet, Conte Findlandais.* By E. de Laboulaye. Adapted and Edited by P. Shaw Jeffrey, M.A. (Siepmann's Primary French Series.) Macmillan and Co. 1s.
- Bataille de Dames, ou Un Duel en Amour.* By E. Scribe and E. Legouvé. (Siepmann's French Series for Rapid Reading.) Macmillan and Co. 1s.

PERIODICALS

- The Papyrus; United Empire; La Revue; Book Prices Current; The Bookseller; La Grande Revue; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The University Correspondent; The Idler; Constitution Papers; The Economic Journal; The Publishers' Circular; Mercure de France; The Literary Digest; The Wednesday Review; Trichinopoly; The Bodleian.*

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND
... THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-68, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON,
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Sailing at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,
JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRENDOL.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,
NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
25, Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C.2, LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1839).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £32.	Days 21.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£177.	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probates and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £5 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

ORDITE RIFLES, .400, .500, .600 Bore.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2225 GERRARD.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 403	Fiction 412
A Song in Old Plymouth 404	Pickwick Riddles—I. 413
"Codlin's the Friend, not Short" 404	New Zealand Sketches—II. 415
On Dropping Anchor..... 405	Foreign Reviews 416
Plymouth: Present..... 406	Ahmet Arabi 418
Irish Legislative Assem- blies: a Retrospect—II. 407	The Theatre..... 418
Reviews:—	Books in Preparation 421
Popes of the Reforma- tion Period 409	Imperial and Foreign Affairs 421
Thomas Love Peacock 410	Motoring and Aviation ... 423
Shorter Reviews 411	In the Temple of Mammon 423
	Correspondence 425
	Books Received 426

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazines rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE mass meeting in Ulster held during the past week goes to emphasise the enormous difficulties which attend any attempt to introduce Home Rule to Ireland, where a great portion of the wealth is concentrated in the North, and the population is composed of a number of extremely diverse elements. No Home Rule Bill, however carefully conceived, has as yet met the needs of an island which must often haunt the sleep of responsible legislators as a nightmare. The question of Home Rule, now once again to the front, will be treated in the columns of THE ACADEMY in a series of articles, the first, by Sir Charles Walpole, having already appeared. The next will be from the pen of Professor Kettle, a writer thoroughly equipped to deal with this complicated subject. The aim of these articles will be to discuss dispassionately and without heat the matter which is so vital to the interests of our neighbours, and we shall consider carefully any contributions from outside sources which may tend to throw light upon it.

The terrible catastrophe which has befallen the French Navy during the present week in the loss of a first-class battleship and over two hundred men has drawn forth on all sides that heartfelt sympathy which is so pleasant, and, alas! so impotent a corollary of all great disasters. "Peace hath her victories"—and her terrors, if we must interpret peace in the terms of preparedness for war; under the present relationship of countries and communities it is to be feared that we must so interpret the word. The most rigid inquiry will of course be made into the causes of the explosion, and we sincerely hope that the suggestion of sabotage which has been mentioned will prove to be unfounded—if, indeed, proof can possibly be obtained in such a chaos. We add our expressions of sympathy to those of our daily contemporaries, and trust that in some indirect way, obscure at the moment, good may result from the disaster. The handling of high-power modern explosives is always a precarious matter, and if this is perfected by reason of the event which we deplore, some little compensation may ensue.

A great deal of nonsense has been written about the Wells-Johnson encounter during the last few days, and many poor scribes must have rejoiced at the outcry which gave them an opportunity to earn an extra guinea or two by the "topical" article. One of the most sensible dissertations on the subject was from the pen of Mr. Hall Caine, and appeared in the Daily Telegraph of Monday last. Not that we include him among the "poor scribes"—heaven forbid! but we cannot refrain from a smile when we see the distinguished Manx author invited to give his opinions when any event threatens to become a matter of national interest. This time his contribution is well worth reading; he sees clearly the problem which confronts the Home Secretary; he also perceives how awkwardly the case is complicated by the fact that one of the combatants is of the negro race, and he concludes that "the proposed boxing-match is essentially a prize-fight, and as such it ought, by the most elementary law of civilised society, to be stopped." An aspect of the affair which seems to us regrettable is the enormous amount of attention being paid to it—an amount disproportionate, surely, to its intrinsic importance. True, we are a "sporting" nation; we like to shine in the eyes of the world as a people of brawn and muscle, to say nothing of brains; but, as with a football-match, where scores of thousands pay to watch a handful of salaried men play what is humorously known as a "game," there seems something wrongheaded in the notion of the crowd eagerly paying to watch two men fight to the knock-out. Boxing is one of the finest physical arts, but, despite the arbitrary and protective rules of the ring, the public "boxing-match" seems fated to become that ignominious and degrading thing, a fight for money.

Reports of a new comet or two are being vigorously circulated by amateur astronomers, and Brooks' comet, due every seven years or so within our ken, has made its bow. Gallant little Brooks is several months late, possibly having been dallying with a planet or two by the way, but he is welcome, though small, since he will probably bring interesting messages to industrious investigators. He cannot hope to rival Halley's comet, which was supposed to fill the heavens last year, but contented itself with filling innumerable columns in sensational newspapers. Comets are "uncertain, coy, and hard to please" as any woman, and even the elect never know whether their tails will be lengthy and brilliant, or the dullest, as it were, of short stories; whether the visitor will fire the length of Ophiuchus huge

In the arctic sky, and from his horrid hair
Shake pestilence and war, or will come and peep quietly at that strange planet Earth and steal off meekly into the lonely depths of space to ponder over what he has seen. Let us rejoice that little Brooks, who is now peering at us over the tail of the Great Bear, did not arrive a couple of months ago. His impressions might have been worth recording, but they would hardly have been very flattering.

A SONG IN OLD PLYMOUTH

Her name it was Florencia,
 Her sails they were of silk,
 The ladies of Valencia
 Have hands as white as milk.
 Hands as white as milk have they,
 And blue eyes like the sea;
 But I've a lass in Plymouth Bay
 That is more dear to me.
 The ladies of Castile, Castile,
 Have skins as fair as wax;
 The worth of many a goodly keel
 Is sewn upon their backs.
 O satin, silk, and velvet,
 The ladies wear in Spain,
 I would that through my helmet
 My love's eyes looked again.
 My love, she moves about her room
 In a gown of woven stuff;
 Upon her loom, her own loom,
 She wove it fair enough.
 My little love in Plymouth town,
 She has no gold to wear;
 She pulls the rowan berries down
 To twine among her hair.
 We sank the white Florencia
 Among the tides to sleep;
 The ladies of Valencia
 May wring their hands and weep.

ETHEL TALBOT.

"CODLIN'S THE FRIEND, NOT SHORT"

WHEN the recent General Election was in progress, Mr. Lloyd George, whilst praising the Labour members generally in a patronising sort of way, and his Socialist "friend Lansbury" in particular, was always impressing on his hungry audiences that he was "the friend."

The birth of Codlin's friendship for Little Nell was coincident with the discovery that there would very likely flow from it an advantage personal to himself. In order however to obtain the full value of that benefit it was necessary to discredit Short.

At Bow Mr. Lloyd George, ostentatiously proclaiming that Mr. Lansbury was in deed and in fact his one and only friend, adduced for his own credit astonishing figures, a great parade of insurance nostrums, and touching protestations of an almost divine sympathy with the woes and troubles of his hearers. By these means he discounted Mr. Lansbury's pretensions to be considered really the important person. "Short's very well as far as he goes, but the real friend is Codlin—not Short."

Mr. Lansbury was for a time very proud of the Chancellor's patronage, and presented an inflated chest when he took the oath and his seat for Bow and Bromley.

Only after the provisions of the Insurance Bill began to be realised, did ingenuous Mr. Lansbury begin to perceive that astute Mr. Lloyd George had been using him as a pawn, and that it was time to jettison his whilom friend in order to appear in his chosen character. Mr. Lansbury therefore spoke disparagingly of his former patron:—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer knew perfectly well the only manner by which he could hold the Liberal party together was by keeping rich men with him, and the only way to keep them was by forming some kind of scheme which would give the workers the minimum advantage, and at the same time do a minimum of harm to other people.

Bitter words about a former crony, but quite necessary to enable Mr. Lansbury to pose and exclaim "I'm the real open-hearted man. I mayn't look it, but I am indeed."

Exit Mr. Lansbury, and enter the Trades Union Congress Mr. Philip Snowden and Mr. Keir Hardie. The story is the same. The great panacea is not wanted. It is seen to be unsound in finance, and declared to be unjust to the aspirations of the insured.

In the days when over a course of months, we demonstrated that the Chancellor's People's Budget furnished conclusive evidence that he was ignorant of some of the elementary principles of finance, the Labour members who were then under the wand of the magician, waxed wroth that such injurious remarks should be made anent their idol. It is the irony of the lapse of time, that they are now echoing these very criticisms, as well as advancing others, against the Insurance Scheme.

Mr. Lloyd George writing for the edification of the electors of Kilmarnock stated that for every fourpence paid by the workman under the Insurance scheme, he will receive benefits worth ninepence. Mr. Keir Hardie's calculation is different. His computation is that for a benefit amounting to one penny per week, the workman is called on under the scheme to pay eightpence either directly or indirectly in contributions on the one hand and in deductions from wages and in taxes on the other. Mr. Snowden, a very practical, moderate, and logical thinker, wrote to Kilmarnock:—

Mr. Lloyd George either does not know the finances of his own Bill, or his letter to the Liberal candidate is a wilful misrepresentation of the facts. His statements are not true. It is a very painful thing that a Minister should attempt to force upon the public a Bill which they did not want, and to do it by unfounded promises.

The Unholy Alliance as regards the loyalty of one of its component parts is indeed in a parlous condition.

There can be little doubt that the Labour contention is the correct one. In a series of authoritative articles, very ably edited by Sir William Bull, which appeared in THE ACADEMY and which will shortly be republished in pamphlet form, the Insurance scheme was handled by writers of various political tendencies. It was shown that its machinery was unsound in essentials, inadequately elaborated, and unable to survive the test of reasoned and intelligent criticism.

We have before insisted that the various interests of this country demand that the Ministers entrusted with the task of legislation should be chosen from the ranks of those whose education, knowledge, and experience specially fit them for the posts to which they are appointed. In what branch of commerce could success be reasonably hoped for if the conduct of the business were entrusted to a man of parts and talent perhaps, but whose whole training and experience have been directed in other grooves? We renew our protest against the adoption in the realm of the science of Government of a system which if it were possible to conceive of its adoption in any other sphere would be bound to produce disaster.

The vicious system which has grown up of viewing the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer as the immediate avenue of access to the office of Prime Minister may well blur the vision of able and ambitious men, who are possessed of genius, but whose attributes have no relation to ability in finance.

CECIL COWPER.

ON DROPPING ANCHOR

BY H. BELLOC

THE best noise in all the world is the rattle of the anchor chain when one comes into harbour at last and lets it go over the bows.

You may say that one does nothing of the sort, that one picks up moorings, and that letting go so heavy a thing as an anchor is no business for you and me. If you say that you are wrong. Men go from inhabited place to inhabited place, and for pleasure from station to station, then pick up moorings as best they can, usually craning over the side and grabbing as they pass, and cursing the man astern for leaving such way on her and for passing so wide. Yes, I know that. You are not the only man who has picked up moorings. Not by many many thousands. Many moorings have I picked up in many places, none without some sort of misfortune; therefore do I still prefer the rattle of the anchor chain.

Once—to be accurate, seventeen years ago—I had been out all night by myself in a boat called the Silver Star. She was a very small boat. She had only one sail; she was black inside and out, and I think about one hundred years old. I had hired her of a poor man, and she was his only possession.

It was a rough night in the late summer when the rich are compelled in their detestable grind to go to the Solent. When I say it was night I mean it was the early morning, just late enough for the rich to be asleep aboard their boats, and the dawn was silent upon the sea. There was a strong tide running up the Medina. I was tired to death. I had passed the Royal Yacht Squadron grounds, and the first thing I saw was a very fine and noble buoy—new-painted, gay, lordly—moorings worthy of a man!

I let go the halyard very briskly, and I nipped forward and got my hand upon that great buoy—there was no hauling of it in-board; I took the little painter of my boat and made it fast to this noble buoy, and then immediately I fell asleep. In this sleep of mine I heard, as in a pleasant dream, the exact motion of many oars rowed by strong men, and very soon afterwards I heard a voice with a Colonial accent swearing in an abominable manner, and I woke up and looked—and there was a man of prodigious wealth, all dressed in white, and with an extremely new cap on his head. His whiskers also were white and his face bright red, and he was in a great passion. He was evidently the owner or master of the buoy, and on either side of the fine boat in which he rowed were the rowers, his slaves. He could not conceive why I had tied the Silver Star to his magnificent great imperial moorings, to which he had decided to tie his own expensive ship, on which, no doubt, a dozen as rich as himself were sailing the seas.

I told him that I was sorry I had picked up his moorings, but that, in this country, it was the common courtesy of the sea to pick up any spare moorings one could find. I also asked him the name of his expensive ship, but he only answered with curses. I told him the name of my ship was the Silver Star.

Then, when I had cast off, I put out the sweeps and I rowed gently, for it was now slack water at the top of the tide, and I stood by while he tied his magnificent yacht to the moorings. When he had done that I rowed under the stern of that ship and read her name. But I will not print it here, only let me tell you it was the name of a ship belonging to a fabulously rich man. Riches, I thought then and I think still, corrupt the heart.

Upon another occasion I came with one companion across the bar of Orford River, out of a very heavy wind outside and a very heavy sea. I just touched as I crossed that bar, though I was on the top of the highest tide of the year, for it was just this time in September, the highest springs of the hunter's moon.

My companion and I sailed up Orford River, and when we came to Orford Town we saw a buoy, and I said to my companion, "Let us pick up moorings."

Upon the bank of the river was a long line of men, all shouting and howling, and warning us not to touch that buoy. But we called out to them that we meant no harm. We only meant to pick up those moorings for a moment, so as to make everything snug on board, and that then we would take a line ashore and lie close to the wharf. Only the more did those numerous men (whom many others ran up to join as I called) forbid us with oaths to touch the buoy. Nevertheless, we picked up the little buoy (which was quite small and light) and we got it in-board, and held on, waiting for our boat to swing to it. But an astonishing thing happened! The boat paid no attention to the moorings, but went careering up river carrying the buoy with it, and apparently dragging the moorings along the bottom without the least difficulty. And this was no wonder, for we found out afterwards that the little buoy had only been set there to mark a racing point, and that the weights holding the line of it to the bottom were very light and few. So it was no wonder the men of Orford had been so angry. Soon it was dark, and we replaced the buoy stealthily, and when we came in to eat at the Inn we were not recognised.

It was on this occasion that was written the song:—

The men that lived in Orford stood
Upon the shore to meet me;
Their faces were like carven wood,
But they did not wish to greet me.
&c.

It has eighteen verses.

I say again, unless you have moorings of your own—an extravagant habit—picking up moorings is always a perilous and doubtful thing, fraught with accident and hatred and mischance. Give me the rattle of the anchor chain!

I love to consider a place which I have never yet seen, but which I shall reach at last, full of repose and marking the end of those voyages, and security from the tumble of the sea.

This place will be a cove set round with high hills on which there shall be no house or sign of men, and it shall be enfolded by quite deserted land; but the westering sun will shine pleasantly upon it under a warm air. It will be a proper place for sleep.

The fair-way into that haven shall lie behind a pleasant little beach of shingle, which shall run out aslant into the sea from the steep hillside, and shall be a breakwater made by God. The tide shall run up behind it smoothly, and in a silent way, filling the quiet hollow of the hills, brimming it all up like a cup—a cup of refreshment and of quiet, a cup of ending.

Then with what pleasure shall I put my small boat round, just round the point of that shingle beach, noting the shoal water by the eddies, and the deeps by the blue colour of it where it runs from the main into the fair-way. Up that fair-way shall I go, up into the cove, and the gates of it shall shut behind me, headland against headland, so that I shall not see the open sea any more, though I shall still hear its distant noise. But all around me, save for that distant echo of the surf from the high hills, will be silence, and the evening will already be gathering.

Under that falling light, all alone in such a place, I shall let go the anchor chain, and let it rattle for the last time. My anchor will go down into the clear salt water with a run, and when it touches I shall pay out four lengths or more so that she may swing easily and not drag, and then I shall tie up my canvas and fasten all for the night, and get me ready for sleep. And that will be the end of my sailing.

PLYMOUTH: PRESENT

BY WILFRID L. RANDELL

"The Liner she's a lady, an' she never looks nor 'eeds,—
The Man-o'-War's 'er 'usband, an' 'e gives 'er all she needs;
But, oh, the little cargo-boats, that sail the wet seas roun', They're just the same as you an' me a-plyin' up an' down!"
—KIPLING.

As I sit writing these words, on the low wall of the little watch-tower that has been a familiar feature of Plymouth Hoe for so many years, the battleship Orion, latest addition to our Navy, symbol of England's power, lies anchored within the Breakwater. A thin veil of smoke poised above one of her funnels is the only indication of life she gives; yet we know that this immense mass of iron and steel and complicated mechanism, the world's greatest warship, can thrash through the seas at 21 knots per hour or more, that her hull conceals engines of 27,000 horse-power, and that she is the first to mount that new deadly weapon, the 13·5in. gun, which throws a shell weighing 1,250lb., calculated to penetrate at a range of 3,000 yards the finest armour-plating ever constructed. Under the wooded heights of Mount Edgcumbe lies the Theseus cruiser, tender to the gunnery school; and in the Sound are two more cruisers, peaceful as the pleasure-steamers that hurry round the pier, and far less fussy.

Over the blue waters, bathed in sunshine, a broad, bluff-bowed Great Western steamer is wandering to and fro, apparently with no special business in hand; but a tiny cloud of vapour, miles away, signifies the liner homeward-bound from Australia, by whose deep flanks the red-funnelled tender will presently nestle, her pride gone, her importance overwhelmed by the towering decks of the visitor. Down harbour come a couple of destroyers, shearing green arches tipped with foam from their sharp bows; out from the estuary of the Plym a tramp-steamer labours, in ballast, her screw plainly visible, kicking flounces of white water that trail behind, beautifully clean, as though a dingy dress should disclose exquisite billowy laces; and a bevy of brown sails at the eastern entrance tells that some boats of the fishing-fleet are slowly forging into the haven. In an hour the heights of Stadden and Bovisand will be green and gold, flaming to the ardent eye of the setting sun, and long before the silver-grey afterglow has faded to dark the Eddystone (fourteen miles out) will be casting its watchful eye round the wide Channel. The Breakwater lighthouse will follow suit; the little pharos of Batten will wink persistently through the gathering gloom; half a dozen buoys, anxious not to be forgotten, will blink in a mute chorus of coloured rays throughout the night:—

From reef and rock and skerry—over headland, ness, and voe
The Coastwise Lights of England watch the ships of England go!

The great liner will glide up Channel with her blaze of brilliant portholes; the battleship and her smaller companions will exist merely as shadows tipped with quivering gleams; and the silence will be broken only by the impatient whistle of some belated tug, the shout of a sailor, or the quiet, intermittent ripple at the edge of the rocks.

Such is Plymouth Sound, and so, day after day, night after night, goes on its traffic and its beauty—for it is ever beautiful, even when seen through a shimmering veil of rain. Maritime, above everything, is the life of Plymouth to-day; her people seek the Hoe in their hours of leisure, love of the sea and its ways being in their blood. The boom of the big guns shakes the windows of the town; the sirens of the warships whoop and groan and howl, a curve of sound that it is difficult not to visualise, at any time of day or night; the low diapason of the liners' horns mutters dreamily of countries of spice and sandalwood on the other side of the world. The taste of salt spray is in the very air when the south-west wind is blowing.

When other winds prevail, from the north-west round to the east, Plymouth sometimes finds a mysterious fragrance borne over her hills and hollows, and knows that gorse or heather is blooming on the mighty moorlands behind—the tors of which can be seen clearly from the Hoe, frowning, sombre, and slightly sad, as though brooding at their eternal separation from the sea. I have walked across the moor from Exeter to Plymouth in a single day, and have marked my approach to the town I love by the fugitive gleam of the Eddystone as, towards night, I gained the shelter of a hostelry at Princetown, sixteen miles or so inland, perched on a spur of the moor. On the fringe of those hills, as all visitors to the West Country should know, is some of the loveliest scenery in Devon. No giant posters flaunt its praises on wall or hoarding; it hides in valleys, at the edge of brawling streams, far from any sound of locomotive or coach-horn; but, like all very beautiful things, it is well worth the seeking.

And of Plymouth itself, curious mixture of old and new, of modern shops and ancient byways, what shall we say? We have glanced at its history, and the stranger within its gates will do well to remember the names connected with its past glory, for they will often greet his eye, in spite of the undeniable fact that the town is rapidly becoming modernised by the relentless hand of the "improver." Progress has its penalties; many a delightful corner has fallen at the fiat of the housebreaker; but the old churches, the Citadel, and a few of the odd, crooked streets still remain. Of the churches, St. Andrew's, affectionately known in the district as the "Old Church," is the most famous. I came across an interesting note referring to this church quite by accident. In the year 1823, "the next presentation to the vicarage of St. Andrew, in this borough, was sold by auction for £5,050. Mr. Hatchard, the bookseller of Piccadilly, was the purchaser."

Plymouth, like London, is "a good place to get away from," but more because of its many rivers, and their attractions, than any objectionable attribute of the town. The Tamar, dividing Devon and Cornwall, is navigable for many miles, and Drayton hymned its waters gallantly:—

Proud Tamer swoopes along, with such a lustie traine
As fits so brave a flood, two Countries that divides.

Its "train" at the present day is half a fleet of battle craft, from the obsolete wooden vessels, now used as training-ships, to the latest floating gun-platform devised by modern science and skill. But above Brunel's magnificent bridge, spanning the river at Saltash, the arts of war give place to scenes of tranquil splendour to which no "guide to the West" ever yet did justice. Of the Plym, which gives the town its name, not very much can be said; it is rather muddy, rather odorous, and very "tricky" for boating, unless you understand its wily ways and winding channel. But the sea is Plymouth's speciality in a far more intimate sense than can be said of the fashionable watering-places. The sea, by giving her so immense a harbour, has made her famous; her future position depends on the sea, and of that future I shall have something to say in my concluding article.

IRISH LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES: A RETROSPECT—II.

BY SIR CHARLES WALPOLE

THE history of the summoning of this Parliament, the first in which the whole island was represented, is so interesting and instructive that I venture to quote somewhat fully from the original despatches to the King from the Lord-Deputy and the Presidents of the Provinces, which are to be found in the fifth volume of the Carew Calendar of State Papers.* It must be borne in mind that the King's purpose was to secure for the Government policy a working majority, on which he felt he could rely if the Protestant element exceeded the Roman Catholic element. It was morally certain that the existing constituencies would return a large majority of Roman Catholics, and the only way for the King and his advisers to carry their point was to create a sufficient number of new constituencies to swamp the old ones.

With a clean slate in Ulster and the garrison towns to work upon this was comparatively easy, but every care was taken to arrive at the probable result and to calculate the chances of success. The House of Lords was considered safe, as the nineteen Bishops were sufficient to turn the scale.

Despatch No. 86 is signed by Sir Arthur Chichester, the Lord-Deputy, and gives careful details of the composition of both Houses and discusses the method of balancing the two parties. He enumerates "The Nobility of Ireland being the Lords of Parliament in 1611," forty-four in all, and says:—"Of these Lords Spiritual and Temporal we may assure ourselves of the nineteen Bishops; of the Temporal Lords three are under age and five Protestant, so we shall sway the Upper House by seven voices." Coming to the Lower House, he sets out the counties in provincial groups, including the nine new Ulster counties, and continues: "Of these threescore and six knights we may expect thirty-three."

Of "the Ancient Cities and Boroughs" he says, "Out of these forty corporations we expect twenty-eight Protestants, and may hope for more, by reason many of them sent men of that religion the last time." And of the "boroughs to be erected and enabled to send Burgesses to Parliament if it pleases the King," he gives the names of twenty towns in Ulster, seven towns in Munster, three towns in Leinster, and five towns in Connaught, and the University of Dublin, and he adds, "From these corporations we may expect Protestant burgesses." "And so the Lower House, consisting of 218 knights and burgesses, we may expect 123 Protestants, and then we shall exceed them by twenty-eight voices."

No. 87 is from Sir Richard Moryson, the Lord President of Munster, addressed to the Lord-Deputy:—

According to your direction I have called to my assistance such of the Council of the Province as are now resident in this city, and have entered into consideration who are the Protestant knights and burgesses meetest to be chosen in each county to serve in Parliament, which I here certify. Being confident every county will make choice of one recusant, who will be at their own disposition, and although I return three for a county yet it will be hard to get one of them to be Knight of the Shire, except the other two join their strength and voices for the election of the third man, and that good care be had in choosing good sheriffs, and the powerful gentry of the county beforehand written to by you, and the Undertakers dealt with-all to make freeholders to increase voices at that election. For the old boroughs there is hope to get one burgess returned out of each of the towns of Youghall, Dungarvan, and Dinglecuish, and all the rest desperate.

For the new intended corporations, if they be enabled by charter to send burgesses to the Parliament, I am sure they will be wrought to return those I have named, and any other the State shall appoint, and the number of them will appear by this underwritten certificate. . . . And so out of the counties by this computation there may be ten knights—out of the old corporations three burgesses, and out of the eight new to be created sixteen. If it be so the Protestants will exceed them by six voices."

Despatch No. 92 is signed by Sir Oliver St. John, the President of Connaught, from which the following is worth quoting:—

Boroughs to be erected, Roscommon, Curra, Drummisk, Sligo, Castlebar, all these will send Protestants, unless some doubt be of Sligo, whereunto upon better advice may be added, to be newly erected Lougreagh. Being an ancient walled town and Corporation and the Earl's principal seat, they will send Papists, for it will gratify the opinion of partiality (sic) in erecting the new boroughs.

So I hope the Government of Connaught will send to the Parliament twenty-two Protestants and fourteen Papists.

Despatch No. 99, endorsed by Sir George Carew of the Privy Council, and noted by Sir John Davis, the Attorney-General, gives a complete analysis of both Houses:—

But as the state of Ireland now stands, or is like to stand in the new Parliament, let us examine who are like to be the members of both Houses, and thereupon see whether the number of Protestants or recusants will be the greater, and consequently what party will carry the greatest sway in the next Parliament.

The Lower House consists of knights, citizens, and burgesses. There are thirty-four shires, which will send sixty-eight knights.

The citizens and burgesses.—In 27 Elizabeth, when the last Parliament was held in Ireland, there were but twenty-six cities and boroughs which sent citizens and burgesses to Parliament, but in the next Parliament the number will be doubled, for his Majesty has erected some boroughs since his reign, and will be pleased to erect twenty-five corporate towns more in his escheated lands of Ulster, all which shall send burgesses to the Parliament, and be planted with Protestants and well-affected subjects.

He then proceeds to analyse the probable returns of the old boroughs, and, finally, gives the names of twenty-three boroughs to be erected in Ulster, all of which will return Protestants.

Turning to the Upper House, he writes:—

The Lords Spiritual are in number but eighteen. The Lords Temporal are in number twenty-five. . . . Of these twenty-five Lords there will not sit above fourteen obstinate recusants, the rest are Protestant Councillors of State or infants. So as the Bishops and the well-affected Lords will be far the greater number in that House, especially if any new barons be made, or some of the bishopricks be disunited. By this view of both Houses we make conjecture how things may be carried in the next Parliament.

* State Papers, Nos. 86-87, 92-99.

On the assembling of Parliament, Chichester's calculations proved to have been a pretty accurate forecast. The new House of Commons consisted of 226 members, of which 125 were Protestants and 101 were Roman Catholics, giving the Government a majority of 24.

The first trial of strength came on the election of a Speaker. Sir John Davies was the Government candidate—Sir John Everard of the Opposition. In the division lobby the supporters of the Government numbered 127, a clear majority of the whole House. The recusants had remained in the Chamber, and in the absence of the others placed their candidate in the Chair. On the return of the Government party a scene of indescribable uproar took place, and Sir John Davies was forcibly seated in Sir John Everard's lap. Finally, Sir John Everard was ejected from the Chair, and the recusants left the House in a body. After this disgraceful ebullition the House appears to have shamefacedly settled down to business, and, though a stubborn gathering, proceeded to pass the Bills which were laid before them.

During this and the following reign the Parliament was assembled on several occasions, but nothing of interest attaches to their doings. Then came the rebellion of 1641, with its massacres and internecine fighting, terminating with the second conquest of the country by Cromwell and his generals, the confiscation of the whole island, and its re-plantation under the Puritan Settlement.

During this upheaval the Irish Parliament was in abeyance, and the treaty of Union of 1800 was foreshadowed by the appearance at Westminster of thirty Members from Ireland, in Cromwell's short Parliament, and again on his death in that of his son Richard. On the Restoration two successive Parliaments were summoned by Charles II., the number of Members being increased to 260, when the Acts of Settlement were passed for the purpose, as far as possible, of restoring the confiscated land to its earlier proprietors. In the Lower House but one Roman Catholic was returned.

After a short respite of thirty years the shifting scene again changes. James II.'s Roman proclivities had flooded the Council, the Bench, the Corporations, and the Shrievalty with Roman Catholics. The Protestants had fled in thousands to England and Scotland and the Isle of Man, and only Londonderry, Ballyshannon, and Inniskillen were despairingly held for King William. James had abdicated and fled to France, and having obtained assistance from Louis in money, ships, and equipment, landed with 10,000 men at Kinsale, marched to Dublin, and issued writs for the summoning of a Parliament. It was, of course, impossible to conform to the procedure enjoined by Poynings' Act and the Act of Philip and Mary, which provided that no Parliament should be assembled but by the issue of writs under the direction of the King of England, of which James was no longer King, nor could the heads of Bills be sanctioned by the English Privy Council before being presented to the Irish Parliament. Nevertheless, though summoned irregularly, it must be taken into consideration in any view of Irish legislative proceedings. Most of the sixty-nine Protestant peers and twenty-two Bishops had fled to England—only seven of the former and five of the latter remained; nine of the Roman Catholic peers took their seats, two being minors; and James reversed the outlawry of fifteen of the old peers, who had been attainted after the Rebellion, and created six new ones, so that the Upper House numbered forty-nine.

At the election the Roman Catholics swept the board, only six Protestants being returned, for the freeholders of the counties were either besieged in the walled towns, or had fled the country, and the recently-purged boroughs were under the control of the recusants. Two hundred and thirty-two Members were returned, chiefly the descendants of those who had been dispossessed by the Cromwellians.

The first step taken by the new Parliament was to repeal Poynings' Act, the next to repeal the Acts of Settlement, and the next to pass an Act of Attainder which contained no fewer than 2,415 names, and included two Archbishops, seven Bishops, sixty-four temporal peers, eighty-three clergymen, and 2,289 ladies, knights, gentlemen, yeomen, and tradesmen. The Parliament sat from May 7th to July 20th. Twelve months later the Battle of the Boyne was fought, and James absconded to France.

And now we come to the last stage of Irish Parliamentary life to which specific reference need be made. After the flight of James the country was again torn by a fierce civil war. The Irish and their French allies fell back on the line of the Shannon and made a stubborn resistance. Their last hope was destroyed at the Battle of Aughrim, and Limerick, where their final stand was made, capitulated after two sieges upon terms of surrender entitled "The Articles of Limerick," and twenty thousand men and officers left their country for ever to serve in the armies of France and Spain. Thus ended the third conquest of the island.

In 1692 writs were issued for an Election, and again in 1697—an English Act, 3 and 4 William and Mary, cap. 2, had made the taking of the oaths of allegiance and abjuration and the subscribing of the declaration against Transubstantiation conditions precedent to the taking of a seat in Parliament, which effectually excluded the Roman Catholic element, and the "new" or Protestant "interest" was in complete control. From this time forth, there being no limit to the life of the Parliament, except a dissolution or the demise of the Crown, a session was held sometimes yearly, and sometimes every two years. That which was elected on the accession of George II. sat for thirty-three years and expired at his death, and it was not till 1767 that the English Government agreed to the passing of an Octennial Act.

During the reigns of William and Anne the Irish Parliament passed the series of savage penal statutes against the Roman Catholics, the so-called Penal Code, which practically deprived them of all their civil liberties and spiritual privileges, and reduced them to a state of beggary and outlawry.

The Parliament continued throughout the first five decades of the eighteenth century to be the helpless instrument of the English Government, its recalcitrant members being kept quiet by a system of intrigue and corruption. Gradually a small group of determined men formed a persistent Opposition, which year by year grew in numbers and in vehemence, and carried on a strenuous agitation for the repeal of the laws which crippled Irish trade, for the repeal of Poynings' Act, and finally for Roman Catholic Emancipation.

The Government bought their leaders from time to time with honours, places, pensions, and sinecures, until they were led by Henry Grattan, one of the few Irish statesmen who was not for sale; and at length when France and Spain declared war against England in support of the revolted American Colonies, and England was fighting for her existence with her back to the wall, the great concession was made which gave to Ireland the Home Rule Parliament of 1782. Thus again exemplifying the ancient saying that "England's adversity is Ireland's opportunity." How this concession ended in a third rebellion, a fourth conquest, and the Treaty of Union we have already taken note. All that need now be said is Absit omen.

REVIEWS

POPE OF THE REFORMATION PERIOD

The History of the Popes, from the Close of the Middle Ages.
From the German of DR. LUDWIG PASTOR. Edited by RALPH FRANCIS KERR. Vols IX. and X. (Kegan Paul and Co. 12s. net each Vol.)

THESE two volumes bring Dr. Pastor's well-known and able work down to the close of the Pontificate of Clement VII., A.D. 1534. They deal with an important and highly controversial period of history, the struggle of the Reformation in Europe. Even after four hundred years it would be almost an Olympian feat for any ecclesiastical historian to discuss without bias the religious events of the sixteenth century. It is true that Dr. Pastor possessed the immense advantage of access to "the secret archives of the Vatican and other original sources," and that he is able to produce in his valuable appendices quite a formidable array of hitherto unpublished documents. But access to "original sources" is far from being an infallible remedy against bias, where religious history is concerned. Even so learned a scholar as Dr. Pastor finds it difficult, if not impossible, to maintain an attitude of complete detachment from his personal religious outlook.

The first half of Volume IX. is occupied with a detailed and most interesting study of the Pontificate of Adrian VI., who, in his short reign of two years, essayed the difficult task of ecclesiastical reform, as an autocratic and absolute ruler. He began at the head, directing his first attack on the Curia. He was ably seconded by Cardinal Campeggio, who forwarded to the Pope in Spain his famous "Promemoria" (discovered and published by Hüfler), in which he gave "advice so uncompromising that it must be distinguished as the most radical programme of reform put forward at this most critical time." But these laudable attempts produced, first, consternation at Rome, and then such determined opposition from the courtiers as frustrated every effort. Adrian's enthusiasm and sincerity are unquestioned. Yet he found no credit in Germany, partly owing to his elaborate brief to the estates of the German realm, summoning them to fight against the poison of heresy, partly owing to the narrow and uncompromising attitude of Luther, whose short-sighted and contemptuous depreciation had greater and more lasting weight. Adrian was a splendid failure, beaten by the insuperable force of evil, too deeply rooted in high places to be overcome in so short a rule. He was detested for his piety and high moral standard, becoming, as Bückhardt said, "the burnt-offering of Roman scorn." Benrath's view is, that "to a judgment unaffected either by his scanty successes or his overt concessions, Adrian VI. will appear as one of the noblest occupants of the chair of St. Peter." One thing he did accomplish. He exposed the awful iniquities of the Curia, and pointed out for a future generation the principles of internal reform.

The Pontificate of his successor, Clement VII., is mainly interesting to Englishmen from his relations with Henry VIII. The controversy surrounding the great divorce question seems interminable. Here the penetrative acumen of Dr. Pastor occasionally appears to miss the mark. Like many other historians, he is inclined to over-emphasise the sensual side of Henry's motives, and to give too little prominence to other factors, local and political. Incidentally we notice a curious, if common, mistake. Dr. Pastor says that "the English King, in recompense for his book against Luther, had received from Leo X. the title of 'Defensor Fidei.'" As a matter of fact he bore this title before Luther was heard of. Julius II., in depriving Louis XII. of his designation of the "Most Christian King," had conferred it upon Henry, whose book against Luther did not appear till 1521; and when Leo X. convoked the Cardinals the title suggested by the Consistory was "the Angelic King." So far back as May 22nd, 1517, Wolsey had written "Regia etiam Majestas aegre fert quod de titulo defensoris sanctæ Fidei nihil adhuc acceperit, quasi ejus sanctitas ea re timuerit Gallos offendere" (vide Martene, "Amplissima Collectio," iii. 1274).

Dr. Pastor writes:—"Only this one circumstance, only the desire to discard his lawful wife in order to marry a wanton, was the cause that led Henry to rend asunder the links that for nearly a thousand years had bound his kingdom to the See of Peter."

This unguarded, if not prejudiced, statement is worth examining. In the first place, the investigator in history, as in the more exact sciences, must always beware of assigning any given effect to one sole cause. Henry, as Häusser pointed out long ago, "hated the Reformer and the Reformation with passionate hatred." For eighteen years he had shown the strongest attachment and fidelity to the Pope and Church. He alone of European monarchs had repressed heresy. Pole, his enemy, said that no one had done so much for Rome. Henry was troubled by no moral scruples which would have prevented him from gratifying his passion for Anne Boleyn without marriage. In fact he did so. He was far too astute a politician, too keen a Churchman, to break with the Pope for the sake of "a wanton," quâ wanton.

The most powerful motive that weighed with the King was his desire to have a legitimate male heir. The succession was in danger. No queen had hitherto reigned in England. Mary's right would probably be challenged. Already people were predicting that Henry's marriage would not hold good. Already there were pretenders to the succession, one of whom was the Duke of Buckingham, who was executed for treason on this count, though, curiously enough, he had been heard to say that the death of Katharine's sons was a judgment on the King and Queen for their improper and invalid marriage. But the whole question of this male succession and its importance are matters barely touched by Dr. Pastor in the elaboration of his "sole circumstance"—Henry's "outburst of despotic caprice and adulterous passion," which "dragged down the English Church to a state of schism."

As events went on, the King's passion for Anne doubtless became a stronger incentive, but it was neither the first nor the only motive. He had already satisfied his passion. When she became pregnant he hurried on a secret marriage, in the hope of securing a legitimate male heir.

Dr. Pastor is inclined to gloss over the attitude of Clement towards the annulment of Katharine's marriage. As the prisoner of her nephew Charles V., he was prevented from pronouncing any decree. But from April to July, 1528, when the French ascendancy seemed to be established, Wolsey was able to wring from the wavering Pope almost any concession he required. Hence there was intrusted to Campeggio a secret Decretal similar to that which Clement had formerly refused. Then when he saw ruin at the hands of the Emperor, he managed to get this Bull destroyed, and eventually effected a reconciliation with Spain. There can be little doubt that Clement temporised. Yet Dr. Pastor has the hardihood to allege that "there was one thing which he would not sacrifice at any cost—namely, the sanctity of the marriage bond. Even at the risk of losing England to the Church he withstood the tyrannical King on this point from the consciousness of a higher duty."

But Clement's conscience was equally sensitive to the importance of his Spanish alliance and the terms of his reconciliation with the Emperor. Nor had the Curia forgotten the awful siege of Rome and the sack of the city. It was not till March, 1534, nearly a year after Henry's marriage with Anne, that Clement in secret Consistory pronounced his final sentence declaring Katharine's marriage lawful and valid.

Dr. Pastor maintains the unusual view that Anne Boleyn's uncles, the Duke of Norfolk and the Duke of Suffolk, in their jealousy of Wolsey, originated the idea of the divorce in a subtly-contrived plan to overthrow the all-powerful Chancellor. On the other hand, so weighty an authority as Lord Acton is convinced of the evidence that Wolsey first moved the idea of divorce. The Cardinal himself admitted it to Du Bellay. Katharine wrote to Charles that Wolsey was the author of all her sorrows, and the Emperor never ceased to proclaim the fact. In short, the weight of contemporary history is overwhelming against Wolsey. But Dr. Pastor is biassed throughout by his prejudiced conviction that the Reformation in England sprung from the evil passion of Henry VIII., abetted by the unconscientious obsequiousness of Wolsey. It is this attitude which somewhat obscures his political vision.

The remainder of this volume has some valuable chapters on Clement's efforts for internal reform in the Roman Catholic Church, and also a very interesting account of his position towards Literature and Art. "True to the traditions of his family, the Pope, during his Cardinalate, had already gathered round him a throng of poets and men of letters. To this day the Vatican Library preserves an imposing series of works dedicated to him." The house of Medici was always the patron of learning and art. In 1525 Machiavelli presented Clement with the five books of his Florentine history.

Benvenuto Cellini, afterwards made engraver in the Roman Mint by the Pope, graphically describes the enthusiastic joy of painters, sculptors, and goldsmiths at the election of Clement. The restoration of the fearful losses caused during the sack of Rome ultimately gave work to numerous artists—greatest of all to Michael Angelo, whose remarkable genius the Pope fully valued and appreciated.

The last days of Clement saw the origination of the Society of Jesus, when Ignatius Loyola unfolded to six trusted friends his plan of a great spiritual army "destined," writes Dr. Pastor, "to attain to a world-wide importance in the history of the Church as the most powerful bulwark of the Papacy during the catastrophe of the sixteenth century." It will be interesting to see in future volumes what estimate is formed of the development, growth, and work of this famous Order. Dr. Pastor is a writer whose learning, research, and scholarship must always command attention. It is important, too, to study controversial religious history from every possible position.

THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK

The Life of Thomas Love Peacock. By CARL VAN DOREN.
Illustrated. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

THERE are some men in history who seem to link up in the mind the artificial strata into which it divides the passage and progress of Time. Among others, such a man was Peacock. For example, we get into the habit of thinking that Keats and Shelley make an epoch in themselves, and that this epoch has nothing to do with the wholly different period of Dickens and Thackeray, forgetting altogether that Keats and Carlyle were born in the same year. Similarly the mind, having grasped the chronological unity of Dickens and Thackeray, dismisses it and erects another new and separate unity for Meredith and Hardy. In this way three different literary strata are imagined, in the first of which Shelley is to be found, and in the third of which Meredith resides, with a distinct and complete literary epoch abrupt between them. Then the thought of the author of "Headlong Hall" and "Melincourt" comes along, and we remember that he was a friend of the first, and that Meredith dedicated his 1851 volume of "Poems" to him, "with the profound admiration and affectionate respect of his son-in-law," and that "The Shaving of Shagpat" was written in Peacock's house. In this way (to continue the geological expression) Peacock appears as a "fault," with the result that we are compelled to take new stock of our nineteenth-century literary history.

This is not all, nor the chief part of, the interest of Peacock, however, though it would often seem so were one to consider only the making of modern books. For some time now references to Peacock have been confined to books written on Shelley and Meredith. A critic might perhaps be forgiven the thought that the best thing that Peacock did was to write his "Four Ages of Poetry," inasmuch as it evoked the more famous reply, the "Defence of Poetry." Nevertheless, Peacock's fame is planted on a far securer foundation than such derivative interest. Exactly what injustice has been his may be seen from a small but not unimportant incident. Specialists in literary indebtedness have not been slow to point out that Dr. Middleton, in "The Egoist," has his very obvious antetype in Dr. Folliott, of "Crochet Castle." He has had his alterations in the process of mental transmigration, of course; he has acquired more of "body" and sleekness, corporeally and mentally; yet the fact remains. Dr. Folliott is certainly as worthy of attention as Dr. Middleton, but among the many who know Dr. Middleton, how few there are who have even a passing acquaintance with his antetype!

In spite of this, as the most penetrating critic since Coleridge, Mr. Arthur Symonds, has said, "Peacock's novels are unique in English, and are among the most scholarly, original, and entertaining prose-writings of the century." And yet he is not read. To what an extent the neglect of him has prevailed may be gathered from the fact that Professor Van Doren can open his book with the remark that "There has been no previous biography of Peacock." He might have said more: he might have proceeded to say that his is the first book of any kind on Peacock. Dr. Gannett's various articles have hitherto been virtually the only means of knowing anything about the man outside his work apart from the incidental references in the various books on Shelley. Professor Van Doren has therefore an open field to work in, and he has taken full advantage of it. We should have liked to see more of a critical analysis of Peacock's achievement. There are certain aspects that are not easy to grasp. He has, for instance, a delicacy of mind that nevertheless is both robust and shrewish. Shelley sang well of him:—

His fine wit

Makes such a wound, the knife is lost in it,
A strain too learned for a shallow age,
Too wise for selfish bigots; let his page,
Which charms the chosen spirits of the time,
Fold itself up for the serener clime
Of years to come, and find its recompense
In that just expectation.

We have already seen how just that expectation was; but apart from that, when we read such lines as these it can be forgiven us if we wish that Professor Van Doren had occupied some portion of his book with analysis and criticism.

Still he has done something almost as valuable, and possibly more reliable, in explaining the work from the standpoint of the man who wrought it. It is no mere mass of biographical detail that he has put before us. A definite personality emerges out of the story, and as we see and take note of this personality it is easy to conceive of Peacock doing the work that lies to his credit. Even in his days of gravity and maturity there is a quality in his work that is hard to describe by any other word than "precocity." We may call it whimsical at one moment, or pedantic at another, but the word "precocious" seems at all times to express the thing we mean. Some of the strained translations from the Latin suggest it directly. Now it is illuminating to turn to the life of the man and see this characteristic exemplified repeatedly. Even at the ripe and mature age of eleven full years we find him writing an extraordinary letter which Professor Van Doren gives in full, beginning, "The present alarming state of the country points out the subject of a letter from me to you." The progress from this to the "Four Ages of Poetry" is not so strange as may at first sight be imagined.

To deal with Professor Van Doren's book in detail would be to repeat it. It reads over and over again—as Shelley himself said of the letter Peacock wrote to the lady who became his wife when offering her his hand in marriage—like another one of Peacock's novels. This is only to say that the author has both caught and rendered the spirit of the man of whom he has treated. In addition to this faithfulness to his subject, he has made it a work of exceeding interest. There are few pages in it that are not vividly interesting on strict biographic grounds.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Les Expériences d'Asthénéia au Jardin de la Connaissance.

By ALICE BERTHET. (Gastein-Serge, Paris. 2f.)

ASTHÉNÉIA is a young person whose soul is troubled by the desire of attaining Wisdom, and she resolutely starts in quest of it. It is, however, a dangerous journey for a girl to undertake, even when, as in Asthénéia's case, she is endowed with remarkable perspicacity and perseverance. But Asthénéia was evidently the ancestress of our modern feminists, and possessed both the tenacity and determination which characterise the Suffragettes of to-day. Nothing daunts her; she starts bravely in search of Wisdom, and has the good fortune to meet Athene herself, with whom she has an intimate conversation. Athene is even kind enough to give her some precious advice, such as the following:—

Respecte la vie partout, adore-la dans tous les êtres, et sache que tu dois l'augmenter, et l'embellir en toi, et autour de toi.

Aime les heureux qui rayonnent leur bonheur: ils sont les forts.

Et si tu sais voir la beauté et la faire grandir en toi, tout ce que tu verras et expérimenteras, fut-ce de la douleur, contribuera à embellir et à intensifier ta vie.

Asthénéia tries to follow these counsels, and she, in truth, intensifies her life! She continues her way, and strives to reach Wisdom by the Path of Beauty, where she learns to her sorrow and horror that "Nature is not divine, and that she is not better than humanity," and that it is "man who lends beauty to Nature." After having made these discoveries, Asthénéia engages her never-faltering steps on the Road of Truth, only to find the followers of the different truths struggling furiously one with another. But by her naïvely profound reflections and deep intuition (for Asthénéia would be the joy of the hearts of "school-ma'ams" and tutors!) this superior damsel puzzles occasionally these Pharisees of science, surrounded by prejudices. After having nearly reached the Wall which limits human thought—we are thankful the sagacious heroine of Mme. Berthet's book does not push her temerity so far as to leap it—Asthénéia finds at length that it is only in "stoical individualism" that she will find the possibility of realising her "interior harmony," and of regulating the rhythm of her life.

"Les Expériences d'Asthénéia" summarise, in fact, many of the disillusiones which must unfailingly beset those whose imaginations crave to tear down the veil which Fate and Nature have benevolently drawn before our gaze, so that we may not be dazzled or blinded by the revelation of the Incomprehensible and Unattainable. And we should say that modern Asthénéias would be much wiser not to dabble in philosophy, but to try and obtain a more useful and practical knowledge of life and duty.

The Motor Routes of England, Western Section. By GORDON HOME. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black. 5s. net.)

MANY guide-books issued for the assistance and edification of the motorist, by reason of the inclusion of unnecessary detail and the lack of scientific arrangement, have tended to confuse and weary rather than to assist and inform, and could very well be dispensed with. But in this category one certainly cannot include the charming series of Motor Route Books by Mr. Gordon Home, the third volume of which is to hand from the publishers, Messrs. Adam and Charles Black. In this, as in the two previous volumes—one of which dealt with the Southern part of England and the other with France—the plan has been to arrange a trunk route from London through the district covered, which in the present instance includes Wales and the Western Midland Counties. This route is divided into sections and subdivided into "loops." The sections are:—London to Shrewsbury viâ Dunstable and Atherstone, Shrewsbury to Bangor viâ Llandudno, Bangor to Dolgelley, Dolgelley to Llangurig, Llangurig to Gloucester viâ Abergavenny, Gloucester to Oxford, and Oxford to London; between each section are the loop routes, commencing from and finishing at the last centre indicated in the section, and covering the places of most interest in the vicinity. At the beginning of each section of the route described the salient facts are given under the following headings:—(1) Distances along the road; (2) Notes for drivers, embracing succinct information as to the nature of the roads, speed-limits, &c.; and (3) Names and brief particulars of the places and objects of interest on and off the road. Then comes the text relating to that portion of the tour which is being traversed, concisely and clearly written, and replete with information of historical and antiquarian interest. It is really not too much to say that the book, like its predecessors, is almost indispensable to the motorist whose main objective is, not to commit infractions of the speed-limit with impunity, but to avail himself to the full of the educative facilities afforded by the car. It should be mentioned that the work is in no sense a compilation of previously-published information, the author and his assistant, Mr. Charles H. Ashdown, having motored over the whole route for the express purpose of writing the book. It should also be mentioned that, interspersed with the text, there are seventeen specially-drawn plans of the larger towns through which the tourist passes, twenty-six route-maps, and sixteen beautiful full-page illustrations in colour of the principal places of interest. The volume can be cordially commended to every motorist.

Modern Commercial Practice with Correspondence. Part II. By F. HEELIS. (Macmillan and Co. 2s. 6d.)

MR. HEELIS has now compiled the companion volume to Part I. of "Modern Commercial Practice and Correspondence."

dence," which, it will be remembered, dealt with the Home Trade. The present issue treats of the Export and Import Trade, and, as in Part I., the student is taken through a series of transactions between business houses. Each letter or document is introduced in its proper sequence, thus showing the exact relation which one item bears to another, and the place of each in the completed whole. The book will be found most useful to those who wish to enter for the higher commercial examinations.

A School Algebra. Part II. By H. S. HALL. (Macmillan and Co. 1s. 6d.)

IN accordance with repeated suggestions Mr. Hall has begun his second book on school algebra with Progressions. Each chapter, however, is complete in itself, and contains a varied number of examples. Together with Part I. the volume is intended as a suitable text-book for students who wish to enter for the Oxford and Cambridge, the London University, and various other examinations.

FICTION

THREE DISAPPOINTMENTS

In Search of Egeria: Episodes in the Life of Maurice Westerton. By W. L. COURTNEY. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

The Love-letters of a Faithless Wife. By LUCAS CLEEVE. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

Bermadu: a Tale of Modern Malaya. By MRS. R. M. CONNOLLY. (Greening and Co. 3s. 6d.)

NONE of these books should ever have been printed, and therefore, perhaps, they do not deserve to be reviewed. They are all samples, each in its own way, of bookmaking as a trade, and because the trade is rising and spreading, and threatens now to overwhelm the few who take writing seriously, it is necessary to say a word or two in condemnation of such manufactured articles. Mock jewellery, even if the imitation is good, should not be allowed to pass itself off as real jewellery, and in these instances the imitation is anything but good. Mr. Courtney's book rejoices in huge characters that dwarf the page, and large margins and spaces that water the little rivulet of type; it is about one-third the length of an ordinary six-shilling book, and yet tedious with the dreadful tediousness of inanity. The secondary title is "Episodes in the Life of Maurice Westerton," but the episodes are few, insignificant, and unreal; the book is merely the bookish chatter of "a middle-aged amorist" who is very proud of his "First Class in 'Mods'" at Oxford, a scholarly distinction which does not prevent him from misspelling Nietzsche and misquoting the "Rubáiyát." Carelessness in such petty details is easily forgiven to large purpose and broad achievement; but when there is no aim beyond the desire to talk at random about well-known books and shop-soiled emotions, casual mistakes become characteristic and irritating. There is nothing in the book from cover to cover worth remembering, except the fairly well-known criticism of Sappho—"The nosegay is small but all roses"—the translations from Sappho herself being cursory and inadequate—the wooden rendering of the ordinary undergraduate.

"The Love-letters of a Faithless Wife" are just as irritating as Mr. Courtney's aimless talk; Lucas Cleeve knows about as much French as Mr. Courtney knows Greek, and is just as eager to display her ignorance; she calls Baudelaire's masterpiece Fleurs de Mal, and uses French tags when the English equivalent would be distinctly better.

She seems even to drag in phrases without other purpose than to misquote them. She writes: "Ce qui ne vaut pas le peine de dire, en (!) bien on le chante." And her English is just as slipshod: "You know what you said the other day that there was only one way of (!) a woman of (!) proving that she really cares, and trusts a man." Mrs. Cleeve can even write worse than this: "I only want you to know how foolish you are being." After this no wonder she says: "One never reads a modern novel with anything of value in it." We think that remark somewhat sweeping, but as applied to Lucas Cleeve's own work it is absolutely true.

It would perhaps be unfair to leave the book without some description of it. It is told in a series of letters. There is a very slight attempt at characterisation, and we could not manage to get up any interest in either the faithless wife or the strangely taciturn husband. It came as a shock at the end to find that the faithless wife had been in love with her husband all through the piece in spite of her philanderings.

"Bermadu," the third book on the list, is by a writer whose name we notice for the first time. It is the story of some English residents in the Malay States. There is a certain amount of local colour in the book, but the story is of the very slightest. Yet there are indications, if nothing more, in it that Mrs. Connolly might teach herself to write a fairly good book if she took a little trouble to think out a good story. There is a native servant in the book, one Peter, who is really human and amusing; his peculiarities are not exaggerated to caricature, and yet the humour in him is fully brought out. Judging by Peter, Mrs. Connolly may yet do much better than this book, which is the best we can say for "Bermadu."

Mrs. Maxon Protests. By ANTHONY HOPE. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

IN Anthony Hope's latest novel, "Mrs. Maxon Protests," we have the much-vexed marriage problem yet again set before our eyes. Winnie, otherwise Mrs. Maxon, is the pretty, young, precocious wife of a handsome dull, decorous, religious barrister. He is self-centred and egotistical, his temperament the very antithesis of his wife's. Mrs. Maxon after enduring for some years a dual life of incompatibility, which she defines tersely as "inkpat," determines to endure it no longer. Her child, a boy, having died soon after birth, she feels there is no bond left to hold her to her marriage vows. (Mr. Hope does not tell us this in so many words, but he implies it.) She therefore determines to leave her husband and to live her own life; and she does. Unlike most unconventional women, she possesses friends whose views are broad, who therefore, instead of nipping her unconventionality in the bud, encourage it, for whilst on a visit to them she meets Godfrey Ledstone, a man who immediately attracts her. The attraction proves to be mutual. She mistakes passion for love, and, carrying her unconventionality to its limit, she sets up housekeeping quite openly, in West Kensington with him, content to subsist on glamour, bread and kisses. After a while the inevitable happens, as a natural sequence to all that has gone before. Godfrey Ledstone, owing to the continual pressure which is brought to bear upon him by his relations, leaves Winnie in the lurch, and marries a girl of his parents' choice. Mrs. Maxon is by no means heartbroken; a gallant soldier crosses her path, but, upon learning of her past, he hesitates to make her his wife. After pondering, he determines that "the honour of his regiment" demands of him that he should not take the risk!

Fate now intervenes for Mrs. Maxon in the person of an Irish journalist, who for long has been her friend, and who, now realising that his friendship has merged into love, determines to marry Winnie against his own principles, and notwithstanding that his religion forbids remarriage between a Catholic and a divorcée. Thus Mr. Hope reaches his finale, and we leave the lovers happy in the anticipation of their approaching union.

The characterisation of the book is beyond reproach—or praise; for all the characters live and move and have their being throughout the whole of the three hundred odd pages. The plot is very old, very worn, very frayed; but treated by the mature and skilful hands of Mr. Hope it becomes at once both originally conceived and interestingly executed.

Desmond Rourke—Irishman. By JOHN HASLETTE. (Sampson Low and Co. 6s.)

Most readers who take up Mr. Haslette's latest novel will, we feel sure, be disposed to finish it at a sitting, for the story is so engrossing, the interest so well sustained, that one is carried along from chapter to chapter in spite of oneself, so to say, until the end is reached. The scene is laid in South America, presumably in Uruguay, with just a sufficiency of local colour, and the characters are drawn to the life. These include, in addition to natives and half-breeds and the Irish hero, a cute Yankee speculator and a scheming Frenchman from Martinique with his supposed daughter—a somewhat coy young person, who, nevertheless, boldly expresses the opinion that love should take precedence of duty. As she exclaims to Desmond in the course of a tête-à-tête—"There is always the good married soldier, and the so impossibly good wife who urges her husband to the war. Vive la Gloire! Vive le Guerre! Ah, it is a good cry, but it is nonsense all the same. Would you love a wife who would send you to your duty?" To which the amorous Celt replies—"Faith! I wouldn't, Jeanne dear, but only one who would want me more than glory. I should go all the same." Which is only a witty Irish way of saying—

I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Lov'd I not honour more.

There is a particularly thrilling chapter in which a staunch disbeliever in ghosts imagines a phantom dog is after him, and it impressed us even more than the tragic dénouement of the story which occurs a little later. Without giving away the author's plot, we may say that Desmond's native wit proves more than a match for the Yankee's cuteness and the Frenchman's cunning.

Lalage's Lovers. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

MISS LALAGE BERESFORD is one of the happiest and most amusing scapegraces that ever romped through the pages of a novel. We are introduced to her as she edits and publishes a paper with a circulation of one, solely directed against her worthy governess, Miss Cattersby. The name of this sheet is "The Anti-Cat," and the samples of the contents are an indication of what we may expect when Miss Beresford is let loose on the world. The story of her escapades is told in Mr. Birmingham's favourite way—in the first person—and by excellent whimsicalities and pretences he conveys to the reader something of the terror which Lalage's cold-blooded, relentless truthfulness and perseverance must have inspired in her victims. She forms societies, drops on people for subscriptions, starts vigorous propagandist papers which bring consternation to the minds of her canonical relatives, and ruins the chances of various candidates in an election by a rousing anti-lying campaign in which she proves conclusively that each candidate is a prevaricator of the deepest dye. And an attack of influenza is described so vividly that we almost caught it from the pages of the book. In fact our temperature went up—but that was with laughing. Never have we come across such humorous election-agents in real life; but we are not going to cavil at that. Titherington is a creation, a grimly determined, pertinacious creature, whose wily ways contain about as many hearty laughs as can be packed into the scenes of his appearance. We suggest that "Lalage's Larks" would have been a better title, since there is apparently only one lover—the teller of the story; but, at any rate, we are exceedingly grateful to Mr. Birmingham for giving us her breathless career.

PICKWICK RIDDLES—I.

By PERCY FITZGERALD

JUST fifty years ago I was driving with "Boz" on an outside car through Sackville-street, Dublin—how well I recall it!—when I was inspired to quote his own Pickwick to him. He had asked, "Did you know So-and-so?" When I promptly said, with Winkle, "I don't know him, but I've seen him," how he laughed—with an enjoying laugh! But no one would have laughed so loudly as he over the quaint oddities of his immortal book that I am about to set forth. They are really a feather in his cap, and a portion of his delightfully exuberant humour. For so inspiring and ebullient is the work that even its lapses, oversights, and errors are not to be counted as common errata or "noddings," but contribute to the general boisterous hilarity. They are sui generis and Pickwickian all over. They are not ordinary "slips," they are born of the tumultuous feeling with which the gifted author rushed at his task. Writing as he did from month to month, from hand to mouth as it were, and racing along, it was natural that he should not find a moment to pause and look back and see that, say, No. 10 was consistent with Nos. 2, 3, 4, &c. So he had to "chance it."

Thus our agreeable, if boisterous, chronicle starts on the very first page, at line 9, with its rare chronological confusion. A passage is quoted from the Club transactions (which ought to be accurate) to the effect that the Club met on May 12th, 1817. So far so good. Four pages follow; on the fifth we find Mr. Pickwick's setting forth from Goswell-street solemnly described as being on "the thirteenth of May, eighteen hundred and twenty-seven." We rub our eyes. Here was a leap of ten years. But the leading confusion, as to Jingle's share in the French Revolution, is a Pickwickian incident in itself and truly racy. He related his achievements during the "three glorious days" of 1830, but related them in the year 1827! This was printed, published, and read. The work went on from number to number, but new readers came by the thousand, and wrote to point out the blunder; so at last something must be done to cure it. After deliberation it was thus settled. When Mr. Pickwick was served with a writ, here was an opportunity for altering the date, and accordingly Dodson and Fogg wrote on August 28th, 1830. This was thought to make all straight, and straight it now seemed to be. For here was Jingle's Munchausen tale set in its proper year, 1830, and people would forget to turn back to Jingle's yarn where the fatal 1827 stared them in the face. It is a curious thing in the case of a novel that every step and stage in this book is marked out day by day, as it were, leading on from the date of the Club's first meeting in May, 1827.

But presently our author was to find out that he had not bettered the matter. The departure of the Pickwickians from town and their meeting with Jingle was now on May 13th, 1830, on which day Jingle told his Revolution adventure, which, alas! must have taken place some weeks later than the Revolution in July, 1830. So things were as bad or worse than before. What was to be done?

"Boz" waited till his story was done and the book issued in a volume with Preface, title-page, &c., and errata! It was clear to him that the only thing left was to go back to his original state—to revert to 1827. And this was done. Was there ever such an amusing concatenation? We are told: P. 1, line 9, for 1817 read 1827; p. 185, line 25, for 1830 read 1827.

Our author issued the first collected edition of his books, and, we may presume, revised them. Turning to these doubtful dates, we are dumbfounded to find all in fresh confusion. It is 1827 at the beginning, but now the 1827 of the writ is advanced three years and changed back again to 1830, though only a few months had elapsed since the first Club meeting. The thing was now hopeless, and so it has remained. All that he could do was to scoff at poor Jingle, and throw the whole fault on him!

We find a jocular note to Jingle's story, laying it all to that hero's swagger—"A remarkable instance of the prophetic force of Mr. Jingle's imagination. This dialogue occurring in the year 1827 and the Revolution in 1830." Now here we have the thing officially fixed, and are on firm ground at last. It was in 1827, and the writ also in 1827.

Nothing can exceed the bewildering and most delightful state of the chronology connected with the Fleet Prison. How long was the illustrious prisoner there? When did he go in? When come out?—not very momentous questions save for the hopeless confusion. He was given some four months or so of grace after his trial and taken to the Fleet in July, where he was detained three months, which would bring us to October. But we read—with hearty enjoyment—that he was released "within a week of the close of July!" More wonderful still, we are told of a "fine October morning."

The hero on one occasion lit his candle, "so that it might burn up well," but, being attracted, read through a long MS. tale, when it is recorded that "he lit his candle" and went off to bed! These little matters have caused many a smile, even in the case of the genial writer himself, to whom this last was pointed out by Charles. "Boz" comically made as though he would hurl not the inkstand, but the book itself at him.

After the wedding-lunch at Manor Farm, say at about two or three o'clock, we are seriously told that the guests started off for "a five-and-twenty mile walk" to get an appetite. To perform this exploit would have taken nearly eight hours, besides being impossible for a number of elderly folk. What then did "Boz" mean? He was all exuberance and high spirits. He being a champion walker, and capable of doing the feat in a comparatively short time, did not pause a second to think of obstacles. But it is difficult not to smile as we read. How droll was it when he came to tell of Mr. Pickwick's imprisonment in the boarding-school closet, "where the day boarders hung their bonnets and sandwich-bags," to his inconvenience: I suppose by brushing his cheeks, eyes, &c.! He sat down "under a grove of sandwich-bags"—this was plausible and natural if any were there. For the bags and bonnets were brought by the day boarders and could not be there in their absence. How "Boz's" friends must have roared as they pointed this out. Strange, too, is the unvarying use of the words "mother-in-law" instead of "stepmother," the mistake found in his other works.

We are assured that the only occasion on which Mr. Pickwick was seen in public without his gaiters was at the Manor Farm Ball, of which festival a capital picture is given. But there Mr. Pickwick is seen with the immortal gaiters on! Neither the jovial "Boz" nor the versatile "Phiz" had time to notice the matter. It was a comic and most original mistake; yet Mr. Pickwick at the Bath Assembly Rooms, so strict in etiquette, appeared in his gaiters.

No one could enter Dodson and Fogg's without passing through the clerks' office, where Mr. Pickwick was waiting. He was told that Dodson was out and Fogg particularly engaged. After a time one clerk went up to see if Fogg was disengaged—this, we are told, was Mr. Wicks—but "Mr. Jackson departed on his errand"—marvellous certainly. But that was not all. The next moment, having heard that Wicks and Jackson had both gone upstairs, yet both were still below: ("What did he say his name was?" whispered Wicks. "Pickwick," said Jackson.)

But the wonders were not to cease. As soon as Mr. Pickwick reached Fogg's room the latter asked, "Was Mr. Dodson in?" (though he must have been in the next room). "Just come in, sir," said Jackson, now upstairs. But, as we have seen, Dodson could not have "come in" without passing by the clerks and being seen by the visitors. I do think all this makes the raciest, most comical, and most Pickwickian imbroglio to be found in the book.

The poor Chancery prisoner in his pathetic complaint spoke of his "being tight screwed down and soldered in his coffin." A poor pauper—no—no—this is a distinction reserved for those who "enjoy" lying in leaden coffins in vaults. But that heartbreaking story of the Chancery prisoner, which no sensitive person can read aloud with dry eyes, may have brought to the feeling "Boz" that the poor wretch well deserved such an honour.

The book is full of the most improbable, impossible, and Munchausen-like things, yet all made possible, probable, and convincing even, by the exquisite and earnest spirit of the author. He does with us as he pleases: like a platform hypnotist who can make us believe that the salad-oil we are tasting is champagne. We are in a dream with him, and it is all true. What if Wardle and the great man—after the overturn in pursuit of Jingle—had to walk a whole stage, and reached London somewhere between break of day and eight or nine o'clock—a stretch of many miles? It mattered not—they found Perker. Perker by a miracle found out that the pair were at an inn in the Borough, and arrived there with his friends—all before eleven o'clock. But this was not all the miracle. Jingle at half-past nine had gone for a licence to Doctors' Commons, and "was still on his way back," as we are carefully told, when the pursuers were being conducted upstairs to the sitting-room. Yet there they found Jingle! Again we must laugh, heartily enjoying the reckless carelessness of our author. We find him, when describing how hospitably the Pickwickians were received at Manor Farm after their prodigious walk from Rochester, totally forgetting that the poor men had had no dinner. None was offered to them, only a glass of cherry-brandy in the hall. They had to wait for supper. Before, at Rochester, when Winkle and Snodgrass were out about the duel, which was at sundown, they returned to find that the party had dined, but they had to sit down to tumblers, &c., and not a word was said about their dinner. En revanche the Pickwickians on another occasion enjoyed two dinners within a couple of hours, one at the great White Horse, the other at Nupkins'.

But a prodigy in the way of fasting was Mr. Pickwick's day when he and Sam were in search of Dodson and Fogg. He found them early in the day, as we are told, then went to a tavern with Sam for a drink; after that we learn, to our astonishment, that as the clock struck eight he arrived at Gray's Inn! Hence he was referred to Perker's clerk, who was "keeping it up" at a nightly orgy at the Magpie and Stump. Thus this elderly gentleman went walking for a whole long day apparently without a morsel. But he sat on with the revellers drinking his brandy, listening to long yarns—"The Queer Client," &c.—until it was time to break up and go home. Wonderful man! There is no end to these prodigies. A mystery again—when the great man was taken to the Fleet he oddly never thought of bringing his clothes, but just put a night-cap in his pocket, so as to furnish the author with some comic business later; Sam, however, brought his portmanteau next day.

NEW ZEALAND SKETCHES

By W. H. KOEBEL

II.—UP-COUNTRY

THERE is a certain delight in thudding along the powdered summer roads that never fails, although custom may render its appreciation a subconscious one. Given a good mount beneath, fresh from a rest and an unwonted spell of corn-feeding in the stables of the township, there is music in every creak of the saddle-leather. It is a pleasant song, this of the saddle, with its accompanying beat of hoofs. So compelling is its rhythm that it could not fail to produce utter drowsiness in less exhilarating circumstances. As it is, the sentiment is purely joyous. What else could emanate from the rapid springings of the great frame beneath the saddle, the scent of the grasses, the odour of the powdered earth, and the brilliant sunshine streaming down from the blue sky? You may let your horse carry you as fast as he will over this first stage of the flat-lands. Once within the blue semicircle of the mountains that hem in the plain, his gait will of necessity be varied, and the opportunities limited for this smooth, unbroken progress. For the present the landscape is essentially peaceful and smiling, the rich grasses shaded by willows, eucalyptus, and the curious palm-like tufts that bunch themselves at the extremities of the branches of the cabbage-trees.

The district is fairly populous. Here is, for instance, a bungalow par excellence, the abode of a prosperous sheep-farmer. The building is wide and deep, toned to the softest shade of terra-cotta. Its spacious verandahs are smothered in festoons of passion-flower, rose, and honeysuckle. Imposing and luxurious, it stands as the headquarters of the station whose lands spread far and wide in all directions. All has been brought into being with a view to genuine comfort here. The outhouses surround the principal dwelling-place at a very respectful distance; the baaing of the penned sheep and the shrill barking of the dogs reach the favoured spot in subdued and chastened tones. The haunts of work and rest are widely separated on this fortunate station. Between the two extend gardens such as only a sun-bathed climate can produce. In between the varied trees and flowering shrubs the geranium glows in brilliant banks and hedges; the arum lilies scatter their broad blossoms in weed-like profusion, and the verbena spreads itself in prodigal lakes of colour. But, were we to halt in an attempt to enumerate all the blossoms here, we should find ourselves belated in the bush far beyond.

Beyond the garden lies the orchard, where peach, nectarine, and fig lend their fruit as freely for plucking as do the more homely apple, pear, and quince. In the home paddocks the private hacks, more favoured than their harder-worked station brethren, roam contentedly, berugged and at their ease. To the rear of the homestead a semicircle of tall pines and blue-gums forms a sheltering screen for the whole. It is an enviable spot. But the enjoyment of a home such as this is restricted, of course, to the favoured minority of really opulent sheep-farmers. Nevertheless there are a number like it in the neighbourhood, for even the most confirmed agricultural grumbler will confess that the times are not so bad, which means that he is very well content indeed. The owner of this particular place, for one, could not fail to be that. There are hundreds of acres of rye-grass that rises tall and dense, and all but ready for the cutting and for the harvesting of its seed. In the paddocks set apart for grazing the sheep are frequent and fat. What more could the soul of a sheep-farmer long for?

A mile or so farther along the road is a homestead of another kind. Compared with the former, it is humble to the point of insignificance; yet it is by no means without its fair share of homely comfort and modest beauty. The bungalow is small, certainly; the verandah is narrow; the boards throughout the house are roughly set, and the paint with which the walls are smeared is of a useful rather than an ornamental tint. Yet it is evident even from the highway that there is no lack either of kitchen appliances or of general furniture. And if no rose or passion-flower shower their blossoms over the walls, it is probably because a spreading vine, that a little later on will strain its branches beneath the weight of the grape-bunches, leaves no place vacant for the more showy but less useful creepers. Indeed, the immediate setting of the small building is as delightful as could be imagined. For, although the fencing draws its rigid line in close proximity, there yet remains ample room for shade-trees, vegetables, flowers, and fruit. This is the dwelling of a cockatoo-farmer, the humble agriculturist who makes the most of his thirty or forty acres of land, and who employs his spare time in working for pay on the neighbouring large stations. He too has remarkably little cause for dissatisfaction with his lot. In England his home would be a two-roomed cottage, and his wages a pound a week. Here he is his own master for the most part of his time, and the servant of another only when he chooses, and the financial profit is at least thrice that of what he might expect at home.

We are taking a long time to get to the bush, I must admit; yet it is best to notice what lies by the roadside as we go. There are many bungalow homesteads on these plains. One or two are as imposing as the first that was passed; others are on a smaller scale, lacking some of the more elaborate finishing touches; while yet others are the property of cockatoo-farmers with the characteristic appearance of the type. Here and there, though, are homesteads that are notable for certain peculiarities of their own. They are of no greater size or pretensions than those of the lesser agriculturists, yet they are surrounded by a spread and glow of bloom striking enough to provoke the envious desire of many a far wealthier neighbour. But these gay blossoms possess a deeper significance than that of mere æsthetic luxury. Strictly speaking, they are not tended for the pleasure of the eye at all. They have their commercial, everyday use, for their owner is a bee-farmer, and this glorious blaze a portion of his stock-in-trade.

And now, at last, we have done with the plains, with their homesteads, pastures, and people. Directly to the front rises the barrier of foothills, like cliffs from a green sea, with the mountains dimly seen at their back. We have arrived at a notable spot, for to the front extends Bray's Hill. Judged by the mere ethics of landscape, there is very little in the appearance of Bray's Hill that would lead the stranger to suspect that any peculiar interest were centred in its slopes. Indeed, a new-comer would be hard put to it to distinguish the spot, from many of its fellow hills that make a wide and lofty ring about the semicircle of plain. Nevertheless Bray's Hill, both geographically and sentimentally, is an important place. Its bold green flank is pierced by the road—the highway that starts where the distant houses of the township prick out from their green surroundings at the edge of the blue ocean, and that has cut its thin white line across the level plain, until it comes to clamber its winding way up the side of the hill, and to be lost to view amidst the valleys and peaks of the bush country that stretches to the rear. But this particular spot represents more than the point where the plains end and the mountains begin. Bray's Hill is a vital place in a world of comings and goings; it is, in fact, a haunt of psychological moments.

It is here that the incoming man from the back-blocks catches his first glimpse of human habitations in clusters. The change of scene has been effected with an astonishing rapidity. One moment his horse has been bearing him upwards through a land hemmed in on all sides by bush, and peaks, and great slopes; the next, he has passed through the natural gateway that crowns the last hill, and beneath him is spread the panorama of the plain. It seems as though one might fling a stone, and reach with it those tiny dwellings below, were it not for fear that the pebble might crush in a roof or two of the toy-like structures. It is the brilliant air that is responsible for delusions such as these. In reality the horse's hoofs will have to thud over nearly a score of fathoms ere those doll's-houses will have grown to normal size, and ere the few ant-like specks crawling over the flat surface of the ground far beneath will have become riders mounted on cantering horses. If the rider be alone, he will not fail to drink in the panorama to the tune of a quickening pulse. It is possible, though, that he may be journeying in company, the exigencies of which forbid any leisurely appreciation of landscape. He may be riding at the tail of a flock of sheep or of a mob of cattle, in which case his eye will be warily fixed on the moving fleeces, or on the waving horns and the red, white, and dun backs. For the vagaries of driven sheep and cattle are inexplicable and not to be foreseen, and the results of a successful "break-back" are wont to be lamentable in loss of both time and temper. Even here Bray's Hill remains a landmark of the fullest significance. The end of the journey is in sight. Only a few hours more will see the live-stock safely at their destination and a larger balance at the bank to the credit of their present owner.

FOREIGN REVIEWS

"DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU"

DR. KARL BINDING contributes to the September number a very judicious exposé of the position of the old Prussian party at the time of the Erfurt Parliament. Special prominence is given to the attitude of Bismarck. Great statesmen always develop on paradoxical lines, but the founder of the German Empire may claim a place by himself as a swallower of earlier principles. At this perplexing moment none of the Prussian leaders had the courage or insight to take Time by the forelock, and the utterance of Stahl seems to have had no ironical basis—"The two Eagles (Austrian and Prussian) must stretch their protecting wings over Germany, like the two Cherubim over the Ark of the Covenant." The article forms an excellent supplement to last month's correspondence of the Empress Augusta. Dr. H. Schoen discusses the Thiers Institute at Paris for the accommodation and training of unfledged professors, and its adaptability for German purposes. Herr Wilhelm Alter defends the strategy of Benedek, and his tactics at Sadowa. Herr Federico Hermanin describes very fully the Rome Exhibition. Frau Mela Escherich introduces Konrad Witz, a forgotten Swiss-German painter of the fifteenth century. Herr Reinhard Buchwald gives some notes on the literary wife of Gottsched, the eighteenth-century critic, and Dr. Otto Binswanger gives an amplified version of a lecture at Jena University on the suicide of minors and precautions against juvenile degeneration. The article is full of good sense and optimism, and avoids hasty conclusions.

"LA GRANDE REVUE"

The number for August 25th contains an article by Senator Charles Humbert on "Le Problème du Haut Commandement," a question which has been lately prominent. Though he seems to regard the matter as mainly one of definition, he concludes against the specific creation of a Commander-in-Chief. A special military Government in time of war he regards as inevitable. M. Jules Bertaut gives a pleasing portrait of "Théophile Gautier, voyageur," and his dictum that the French are the best travellers is well exemplified in Madame Claire Géniaux's sketch "Chez les Femmes Tunisiennes." Mr. Edward Legge's forthcoming "Comedy and Tragedy of the Second Empire" is unsympathetically discussed by M. Gérard Harry. The first few lines of "L'Incendie," translated from the Russian of Alexis Rémisov, made our blood run cold; later we got used to it. M. Gustave Aron starts dealing with the question "Peut-on limiter le Pouvoir Législatif?" He is very inconclusive, beyond rejecting the American solution of a Supreme Court. M. Bolz discusses East-European Yiddish literature, and M. Yves Scantrel has some sparkling aphorisms on Napoleon. M. Challaye "exposes" the behaviour of the N'Goko Sangka Company.

For September 10th, M. Aulard, the historian, traces the relations of Corsica and France. He accuses the Governments of the latter country of having been false to their promises and of having starved Corsican enterprise. M. Clemenceau is the first statesman who has tried to rectify matters. MM. Aron, Bolz, and Scantrel continue their articles from the last number. "Enquêtes" forms a feature of the number; one fruitful in paradoxes and platitudes is that on the merits of the "Monna Lisa;" another concludes the discussion on barrack-life, the general verdict being hostile to the institution; a third is concerned with the educational qualities of the Pathégraph. M. Ernest Charles' appreciation of Brunetière on Voltaire is good to read: it is a picture of an honest man being just to what he does not like. M. André Tibal, à propos of the Austrian novelist, Rudolf Bartsch, is very illuminating about Austria, old and new. M. Armand Charpentier deplores the prevalence of the pot-boiler in romance.

"LE MERCURE DE FRANCE"

For September 1st there is a correspondence between Mistral, the Grand Old Man of "Félibrisme," and Reboul, a predecessor in the same genre, and the protector of the younger man, presenting him to Lamartine and Dumas. The letters, many of them in Provençal, are full of kindness and Southern gaiety, enlivened with snatches of song. M. Paul Louis sketches the history of the Roman corporations, contrasting them with modern Trades Unions. M. Jules de Gaultier contributes a brilliant but rather exasperating article entitled "Comment naissent les Dogmes," devoted mainly to an examination of "La Critique du Darwinisme" of M. Novicow. We will content ourselves with one quotation: "Le juste n'est donc, dans la pratique, qu'un cas de l'injuste." Space forbids us to show how M. de Gaultier arrives at this dictum.

Théophile Gautier and Arthur Rimbaud are by no means done with. They loom large in the number for September 16th. The last-named is represented by "Vers Inédits," the frequent occurrence in which of the verb "baver" is the only remark we need offer. Gautier has been already celebrated in the Mercur for July 1st by M. Henriot; now it is the turn of M. André Fontainas. He has little to say that is new, but his article is interesting and well-written. M. Léon Séché writes on Henri de Latouche, a snarling free-lance of Romanticism, and on Gustave Planche, a bully put up to abolish him. M. Emile Bernard offers a powerful and well-reasoned indictment of Impressionism. Among the books reviewed are three that have been recently noticed in THE ACADEMY—the two theses of Dr. Hedgcock on Thomas Hardy and Garrick, and the "Adventure" of two English ladies at Versailles. This last has made so powerful an impression on M. Davray, the reviewer, that, though sceptical himself, he has waited to speak of it till he had the verdicts of several of his friends.

"LA REVUE"

The most important feature of the two September numbers is a series of unpublished letters of Victor Cousin and a Madame Angebert, a lady whose imagination was stirred by the lectures of the philosopher at the Sorbonne into a progressive criticism, to which Cousin replied more and more seriously. A certain degree of personal intimacy was also engendered, and the lady rates her correspondent soundly for deserting his professorial chair and taking office under the July Monarchy. M. Léon Séché is the sponsor of the letters.

The acquaintance of Cousin and Mme. Angebert began through a supposed disparagement by the former of the female intellect. M. Ernest Tissot opens his appreciation, in the number for September 1st, of Mme. Daniel Lesueur with another attack by another professor on the feminine sex. Without explicitly corroborating or denying the impeachment, M. Tissot claims an exception for his subject. In the same number "Brada" has an agreeable, gossipy article on Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson among "Voyageuses et Voyageurs Anglais." Dr. A. Gottschalk resumes the story of the madness and tragic end of Lewis II. of Bavaria. M. Faguet is in his best vein, writing on "Le Pragmatisme de Nietzsche." He makes fun of the method of including among intellectual influences "what Nietzsche might have read." We are a little surprised that he makes no reference to Mme. Richter's work, recently noticed in THE ACADEMY, where it is very clearly indicated what the apostle of the superman probably did read. An interesting article on Lourdes is from the pen of Dr. A. Grillière, who deplores the present arrangements for medical supervision.

In the number for September 15th Dr. Max Nordau enjoys his favourite pastime of crucifying butterflies in a short article called "Les Demi-Talents." M. Victor Dave introduces the poet Eugène Vermersch, a friend of Verlaine's, and gives striking specimens of his work. M. Charles Becker analyzes the national spirit of Luxemburg, and finds it to be essentially French. M. J. Gringoire writes with delightful crispness on the uses of French capital; he denounces the national thrift as the root of all evil, leading to distrust of French concerns, and childish confidence in gambling foreign stock. He sees plenty of work at home for French capital, and he throws out the clearest of challenges to Socialism. M. de Tarlé publishes letters of Murat to Napoleon, in which the former, as King of Naples, is seen in a permanent state of apology to his exacting over-lord. Fawning! protestations of affection and theatrical indignation ill conceal a constitutional faithlessness.

"LA REVUE BLEUE"

The number for August 26th concludes the letters of the Marquis de Custine. M. de Visan gives an account of Count A. de Gobineau, who in 1848 founded the Revue Provinciale to combat the increasing centralisation of France and the ascendancy of Paris. M. A. Bossert gives a synopsis of Mme. Bianquis's "Caroline de Gunderode," a sentimental and tragic figure of the "Werther" time. "Les Amitiés Françaises," a society extolled by M. Jacques Lux, is so characteristic of the nation whence it sprang that we shall be curious to watch its developments. M. L. Charlanne, in this and the following number, is very interesting on Pierre Antoine Motteux, a Huguenot refugee of the seventeenth century, who founded the Gentleman's Journal, and gave a lead to Addison and Defoe. He practically introduced Rabelais and Don Quixote, and was a partisan of Shakespeare during the dark ages.

In the number for September 2nd Lord Winterton replies to the questions of M. François Maury, on "Les Ministres Anglais et Leur Liberté d'Action." Mr. George Lloyd continues the answer in the following number. Naturally there is not much that would be new to English readers; it is interesting as a résumé. MM. Ribot and Léon Bourgeois, among others, have previously discussed the question as it presents itself in France. M. Lucien Maury is good on Balzac in recent studies. M. Gabriel Mourey places M. Maurice Barrès, who has just written a book on "Il Greco," among the few valuable critics of art.

For September 9th M. Léon Bocquet tells the story of the "Polyphème" of Albert Samain, a poetical drama of rare beauty, often given as a pastoral play. M. de Romain discusses the customary literature of French Switzerland, and M. Lux has very high praise for "L'Angleterre Moderne, son Évolution," by M. Louis Cazamian.

"LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE AND DE LITTÉRATURE"

The principal articles for September 2nd bear the weighty signature of G. Maspero. Sir Gaston, as he is in England, devotes several pages of high appreciation to Professor Max Müller's "Egyptological Researches, Vol. II.: Results of a Journey in 1906." The journey and the work were both financed by the Carnegie Institution. Another review from the same hand is of Herr Borchardt's work on the pyramid of King Sahourîya. M. de Labriolle notices a very complete German commentary on St. Augustin's "De Civitate Dei," by Herr Heinrich Scholz. A new volume of Bossuet's Correspondence, edited by MM. Urbain and Levesque, is also discussed. For September 9th M. Labande combats the thesis of M. Marius Vachon, in "La Renaissance Française," that the Italians counted for little in the architectural revolution. M. André Paulian's "Reconnaissance dans le Droit Anglais" is approved by M. Bastide. For September 16th M. Maspero reviews M. Chassinat's "Quatrième Livre des Entretiens et Épitres de Shenouti," Herr Erman's "Aegyptische Grammatik," and Messrs. Woolley and McIver's "Karanog, the Romano-Nubian Cemetery," the last of which deals with some very newly-broken ground. For September 23rd we again have M. Maspero on M. Chassinat, this time in association with M. Palanque. The book is, "Une Campagne de Fouilles dans la Nécropole d'Assiout." "La fouille est une des plus fructueuses . . . depuis un quart de siècle." Mr. Budge's publication of British Museum papyri is noticed by the same authority—"à quand les autres?"

AHMET ARABI

By "SUDANI"

NEWS of the death of Ahmet Arabi Pasha—for a brief space Dictator of Egypt—reached this country last week too late for any adequate record of his career to be printed in these columns. It would, however, be almost unseemly that a man whose vaunted animosity towards this country has proved so unexpectedly far-reaching in its results should pass finally into the oblivion in which he has long been merged without some short notice of his personality.

In the accounts of Arabi Pasha that have appeared in the Press since his death he has been frequently spoken of as "the Cromwell of Egypt." For what reason this style has been granted to him I am at a loss to understand; surely no man's character less resembled that of England's only President.

Ahmet Arabi was a Fellah of the Fellaheen. That is to say he was a man of no birth, no education, no intellectuality, and no ability. His only assets were religious fanaticism, and as a complement an exaggerated hatred of everything that was European, and therefore not comprehensible to his narrow peasant mind. There was at no time within his limited purview any true idea of patriotism, nor was there at any moment in his mind any thought of redeeming Egypt, his country, either from the insufferable dominion of the "Turk" or from the growing obsessions of the Europeans who had already the grip hand on Egypt.

In a way Arabi might well be compared with the Mahdi. Like him he was stupid; like him he was inordinately vain; like him he was used by stronger wills than his own to mark a situation and advance a supposed cause. To a formidable physique he added no leaven of courage, and his heavy, if handsome, features were ill lighted by his large, vacant and staring grey eyes.

I well recall a visit to him, paid at a moment when on him, or on those greater folk who put him forward, unwitting, as a figure-head, the immediate destinies of Egypt, and perhaps of England and France, appeared to hang.

Arabi was seated in a verandah in the courtyard of his house in the Shoubrah Avenue. Around him was a mob of officers of the lower grades, and of mollahs from the mosques, and of sheikhs of villages from the Delta of the Lower Nile. The great man himself was orating, and it took me some few minutes to discover the fact that he was merely vociferating whole chapters from the Kuran, which he had learned by rote. He made no attempt to speak on mundane affairs, and certainly did not touch on Egypt's immediate emergencies, in which his hearers might have been interested, but merely sung out his verses from the "wise book" in a suave, musical monotone that appeared to charm his audience—all, be it said, men of his own class.

It was to this class indeed that he appealed when he was put up to fight the lost cause of Mahmoud Sami and Abd-el All. And it was by these two brighter and more ably intriguing minds that he was thrust into the prominent position that he held up to the date of Tel-el-Kebir. Of course there were contributory agencies that served to waft poor Arabi to his bladder-lifted prominence. The virulent antagonism of France, the subtle machinations of Italy and Austria, the general irruptive irritation that agitated Europe with regard to Tunis, Sfax, Bizerta and Tripoli in Barbary—all helped to suggest to Arabi's prompters that the moment was propitious for a stand by Islam in Egypt, backed, as the movement undoubtedly was, by the great overlord in Yildiz Kiosk.

A greater man than Arabi, given his opportunities, might have changed the destinies of his country, and in a measure of Europe. When Tewfik Pasha (Khedive) bade him sheath his sword, in Abdin Square, Arabi, had he possessed physical courage, might well have become ruler of the land from which he was so soon to be an exile.

But the man was a coward. He had the moral pluck—or some would call it infamy—to organise and consummate the massacre at Alexandria, when he refused to stay the hands of his assassins until he was reappointed Minister of War, and his also was the feeble spite that authorised the wreckage and loot of Alexandria after his easy defeat in the bombardment of that town.

But at Tel-el-Kebir, where his vast and splendidly built entrenchments might well have given pause to a greater force than Sir Garnet Wolseley had at command, Arabi was the first man to take flight, leaving his followers in disarray. A sorry patriot and leader, he bolted at the first warning of the British onslaught. And he who first sought his quarters on that morning of our victory found his flag still waving—his horses still in their shelter—his rich furniture still adorning his sumptuous tents, and were informed by his gaping orderlies that "the Pasha had gone long ago, on an engine to Massr."

That was the end. Of Arabi's subsequent trial and of its sudden collapse more might perhaps now be said than while Abdul Hamid still held the throne of Turkey. But to what avail? The conditions that governed the relations of the great European nations thirty years ago have been for some time wholly altered, and it would ill betide to discount those further great changes that seem to loom in the immediate future.

Ahmet Arabi was of himself of but small account; yet we of this country owe him no small tribute for that by his shallow and obstinate fanaticism, coupled with his gross and foolish vanity, he hastened, if he did not impel the change in the destinies of his country that gave to Great Britain the control of Egypt at the one moment when circumstances made it possible for her to assume that great responsibility.

THE THEATRE

THE PEOPLE'S MIXTURE AS BEFORE

HAROLD, Earl of Norchester, had two striking characteristics. He always wore the clothes of a traveller in nail-brushes and he never had his hair cut. He was, for all that, an officer in the Rifle Brigade and a typical member of the House of Lords according to William Le Queux. He lived at a curious place called The Park, Carysford Chase, where, although a poor, proud, attitudinising man, he kept a racing stable somewhere near the kitchen garden. The Park, designed by Mr. Cecil Raleigh and decorated by Mr. Henry Hamilton, the great experts in aristocratic homes, had a garden that was in exact imitation of the Earl's Court Exhibition as seen from the lawn of the Welcome Club. A collection of thoroughbreds which had apparently been picked up for a mere song from a dealer at Barnet Fair strayed about from time to time, making havoc of the Marcus Stone herbaceous borders and tropical plants. One or two of them were very tame and loved to turn up about tea-time in order that Harold might deliver recitations to them—a trick which is generally practised by the best Earls. Here also there were Harold's mother, a keen business woman who ran the estates and saw personally to the mortgages and paid the usual periodical visits to her pet moneylender, and the Lady Barbara Mowbray, her only and charming daughter—a young woman who had broken away from the manners of her class and become a member of Somerville College, Oxford. But all these things do not matter yet.

Somerville College, Oxford, was determined to go one better than any other College either at Oxford or anywhere else. A Mrs. Bendemeer, for instance, was Principal, because her knowledge of life and humanity was incontestably large. She was the emancipated wife of a man who had walked the tight-rope in the circus, but had risen even higher in the world and become a bookmaker. She had a son who must have been at Ruskin College, but who did not desire to be a Labour Member, and so took advantage of the present shortage of officers and joined the Rifle Brigade. In order that he might play polo and employ his leisure time as an officer and a gentleman, his unique mother employed the services of the moneylender who was kind enough to keep Lady Norchester in continual pocket-money in return for a note of hand only. Mr. Michael Whitburn, who lived in a house in Mayfair which was exactly like the Automobile Club—his drawing-room was modelled on the swimming-bath—evidently did very well on notes of hand. He also sent his pretty but rather careless daughter to Somerville, which was not only a College, but a sort of Metropole Hotel. Harold and most of his brother-officers, including Captain Hector Grant, stayed there for boating and tennis, Mr. Michael Whitburn was a constant and vibrating visitor, and Ben Netherby, the bookmaker, ex-tight-rope-walker, turned up whenever he needed a little ready money from the Principal. It has to be added that the exterior of Somerville College looked exactly like the Traitors' Gate of the Tower of London. But all these things do not matter yet.

Then there was a Miss Brenda Carlyon, who, although she had no father and mother, stood at least six foot high in very smart shoes, and so was asked everywhere by everybody. At any rate, she was seen everywhere, and was on the same intimate terms of smiling and naturally condescending friendship with the moneylender's girl as with Herbert, "Babs," and Lady Norchester. In fact, Bertie aspired to lead her to the altar, but, being poor as well as proud, he hid his love like an officer and a gentleman, and only permitted himself to bend over her and whisper quotations from crackers, or to stand in picturesque attitudes, as he had seen his fellow-Peers do on the covers of William Le Queux's sixpenny novels, and utter piercing sighs while he shot his cuffs. Whatever he did, however, he never forgot that he was a Peer, and made a point of whisking off his hat the moment he spoke to her, both indoors and out. Thus it will be seen at a glance that, although he frequently wore his hair like an actor and obtained his clothes ready-made from the Crystal Palace caterer, Bertie was a credit to the Peerage. For all that—and it was a good deal—Brenda did not help him to keep really silent. Very likely she had money of her own. She dressed particularly well, and changed every hour. Her hats spelt money. Or very likely she preferred to be poor where love was, accompanied by a coronet. No man can say. The fact remains that she looked at Bertie meltingly on all available occasions, lingered at his side, and finally gave him as pointed a hint as a young and elegant woman of six foot dare give by calling one of his yearlings "The Hope." She was not successful, and showed most natural irritation. She kicked her train quite violently. There was no accident. It continued to run smoothly. At that moment, however, Lord Haldane, strongly ignoring precedent and red tape, dispatched a messenger to Bertie at Carysford Chase telling him that he must really tear himself away from his immediate pastimes and go to the front. It appeared that there was trouble in India. The Indian Army was on leave, or had been sent to Birmingham or Belfast, and Bertie must go. And go he did, dressed as he was, but not before he had wept in his brave mother's arms, won a tremendously delicate admission of love from Brenda, and asked "The Hope," who happened to be passing, to win the Derby some day soon, in order that he—Bertie—should be able to take a flat in Artillery Mansions. But all these things do not matter yet.

It turned out, however, that the regiment had been ordered to India for nothing more tiresome than to put in an appearance in the Mall, Simla, and later to dance in the Dewan-i-Khas, Delhi. The dance was very well worth the journey and the expense of transport. Its promoters had most kindly invited the tall, svelte Brenda, Olive Whitburn (the moneylender's careless daughter), Mrs. Bendemeer, and the bookmaking Ben, who, of course, wore Court kit, and looked exactly like a Liberal knight. In fact, everybody was there except Bertie's trainer; and among others who were noticed were Lady "Babs," looking sweet in watered silk, and Captain Hector Grant, who, amidst universal congratulations, had succeeded to a Scots baronetcy owing to the well-timed death of a dozen cousins. His friends were most delighted. He, however, was naturally somewhat pre-occupied, because he had just drawn the favourite for the Calcutta sweep, and stood to win a very fair sum of money—forty thousand pounds or so; enough, at any rate, to ensure his smoking a very decent cigar for several months. He was a little annoyed to hear that Bertie's horse, "The Hope," was entered. Somehow there seemed to be more in that horse than met the eye. Then, too, Brenda had christened it and wished it luck, and he loved Brenda in his hectoring way. But all this does not matter yet.

Odd as it may seem to those who have never met the egregious Grant, he was the cause of Olive Whitburn's carelessness, and when she came to him, as women always do, in the ante-room of the officers' mess, and made a scene, he threatened to tell all the world that her father was a moneylender if she did not hold her tongue. Olive was so appalled at the disclosure of her father's business—she had always believed that he was either a successful music-hall artist or a millionaire in his own right (she judged by the family house in Mayfair)—that she resolved then and there to fly to the Hotel Umberto, Massiglia, in order, presumably, to receive one shock after another. This she did; but not before she had written several letters, beginning in the middle and having no ending—except just Olive. In the one to Grant she told him all the things that he already knew—"You have been all in all," and so on—remember that she was only a girl—and Grant, becoming possessed of them, saw his way to making things hot for Bertie, so he gave Olive's letter written to himself to Brenda, who loved Bertie so much that she immediately uttered enough noise to stop the dancing and make a splendid group so that she might not only denounce her lover publicly in no measured terms, but fall full stretch upon a convenient lion's skin to boot. But all these things do not matter yet.

The moneylender had a big voice, as well as an astounding mansion with as many pillars as go to support a pier. So he was given a splendid opportunity to use it in his office when Grant and Mrs. Bendemeer paid him a visit to talk shop. He wanted his daughter, who was still living on roses and splendour at the Umberto, and would willingly give half his hard-earned fortune to find her. Grant knew, and told him of the everyday occurrence at Delhi, and, of course, mentioned Bertie's name. That did it. The enraged father and noble man immediately went down to the Park. Bertie was there as it happened—the dancing season in India being over—and so was Brenda, still loving but still denouncing, and "The Hope," now a very hot thing for the Derby. So the angry man announced his intention of foreclosing on the entire estate, which included the probable Derby winner. The horse was put up to auction at the sale-ring, Newmarket, and the whole of smart London in reach-me-downs attended. But all this does not matter at all. The thing was that Bertie, still blind to Brenda's great love, determined to wring an explanation from Olive. He had not the faintest idea where she was hiding, so he went to Massiglia, just to see if by any chance she was there. Oddly enough Brenda arrived just after him with no less a person than Olive's father. And now we come to the only thing that does matter—namely, the earthquake. But first of all some one set fire to the hotel. We gravely suspect Bertie, who was, after all, much upset because Olive would not confess. At any rate, smoke and flames appeared, panic ensued; Olive, hemmed in on every side, and having no faith in the Italian fire brigade, blurted out the truth, whereupon Bertie, in his shirt-sleeves, did Gargantuan things, threw doors about, and rushed away with the whole lot of Brenda in his manly arms. And then great pieces of cardboard were let down very gently, the crowd fell in heaps, a red glare came, thunder joined in the orgy of street noises, and "Mr. Arthur Collins outdid himself." After which not the deluge, but the Derby. Two horses trotted on a revolving circle of stage, eight hundred yards of the population went past on a wheel, and the curtain fell on the most hopeless production it has ever fallen to the lot of man to sit out.

And yet with one voice the Press has offered its breathless admiration, its humble and enthusiastic congratulation to the authors and producer of a hotch-potch such as might easily have been written by two housemaids after a brief course of William Le Queux, and produced with equally "stupendous effect" at the Theatre Royal, Little Diddlecum. Why is it? What is the particular exemptitude of the Drury Lane autumn drama from criticism? There is no reason on earth why the annual Drury Lane drama should not be a genuinely exciting human thing, devised and carried out on big lines. Mr. Hall Caine very nearly succeeded there once some years ago. At any rate, he steered clear of area claptrap and potman's jokes and stale situations, which are the only ingredients of "The Hope." It is all very well for Messrs. Raleigh, Hamilton, and Collins to say, as we presume from results that they did, "Oh, anything's good enough for the B.P." It was perfectly clear on the first production that anything is not good enough. Boredom and disappointment lay heavily upon the auditorium, and people in the stalls were scoffing. Nevertheless, the Press poured eulogy upon the thing, and reduced criticism to meaninglessness. And then managers fling up their hands and complain of the badness of their business. The day is over for such things. If Mr. Arthur Collins does not wake up to a realisation of the views of that small section of the population which can still afford to pay the much too high prices of theatre tickets and provide a steadily dwindling public with a genuine piece of melodrama in which there are recognisable human beings and situations which spring from the story and not from the carpenter's room, the hand of doom will press down upon the old theatre in Drury Lane. There are a dozen, two dozen, novelists—Mr. Oppenheim, Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Conrad, Mr. Blackwood, Mr. Wells, yes, even Mr. Wells—who, if given a free hand, could put something on that huge stage which would amuse, stir, interest, grip, and even shock; who, with the best available actors, might even teach us something, or send out a great patriotic appeal to a lethargic nation. The days of hack-writing are over. Anything is not good enough for the British public, and "The Hope" has thrust the theatre several pegs lower than it is already in its estimation. It is inadvisable to say anything about the acting.

"BONITA:" A NEW COMIC OPERA

FOR a long while now the need has been felt for something fresh in the way of comic opera—something, in fact, which should lift the trend of such productions out of the inadequately narrow groove in which its lines have lain for some years. "Bonita" goes a long way towards satisfying this want; it is new in many respects. Mr. Wadham Peacock, the author of the libretto, although he is responsible for much excellent work, appears in it for the first time as the creator of comic opera parts: Mr. Fraser-Simson until the overture on Saturday was unknown as a composer. But the innovations extend further than this. Portugal has now enjoyed a double promotion. Within a month its Republic has been officially recognised, and its national status has been raised to that of the other countries upon which the seal of comic opera has been set. Neither of these things has ever happened before. The curtain rises, moreover, for the purpose of a prologue which opens, and ends, in black night on the trenches beyond Bussaco in the Peninsula War. We have, moreover, a fresh species of villain, who confesses openly that he is merely villainous because he thinks he ought to be. There is sufficient novelty here to satisfy even the most inveterate of first-nighters.

The prologue, as we have said, reveals one of the crests of Bussaco, on which an outpost of British soldiers are blazing their rifles into the night. Presently the officer in command, shot by the enemy, dies in the arms of his young Portuguese wife. The tragedy concluded, we slide along time for a rapid century, and arrive at a Portuguese fishing village of the present day. The setting here is quite unusually charming, with its rising tiers of dazzling white houses and its deep blue sea and sky. The inevitable peasants and local worthies are present, of course, in full force, and the local colour and groupings are strikingly successful. Presently appears a blaze of vermilion lancers, under command of a British officer. The latter has come out to Portugal in quest of a relative, the descendant of the British officer and of his wife of the prologue. This quest he undertakes in full uniform, accompanied by a number of his scarlet-clad troopers. It is a thousand pities that this thing does not happen more often away from the limelight, for the æsthetic gain to ordinary life would be incalculable. Having explained in song that a subaltern's heart is a thing apart, the vermilion Lancer discovers in Bonita his lost relative, and the tide of love is set flowing on the spot—a tide that is much disturbed by the energetic splashes of the villain Frederico.

The setting of the next Act is a ruined cloister, almost as delightful in its effect as the first. Here the loves of the rivals are put to the ordeal of the fire of Saint Antony. Previous to the ceremony Frederico steals in to cheat the saint, and a most stupendous and realistic thunderstorm ensues, during the continuance of which apparitions enter which bear a resemblance to Mephistopheles, accompanied by demons. We are not quite certain on the point. It was a bad thunderstorm; it was very dark. In the end, of course, virtue triumphs, and the vermilion Lancer secures his bride.

So much for a general sketch of the play. The libretto is in parts excellent, although it cannot be termed quite even throughout, and, like the music, fails towards the end to sustain to the full the promise of the earlier stages. As the play progresses no doubt the minor defects will be remedied, in which case the opera may be assured of a lengthy run. The venture is much to be commended, and Messrs. Wadham Peacock and Fraser-Simson are to be congratulated upon having to a considerable extent struck out upon their own lines. In order to appreciate Mr. Lionel Mackinder's comic and volatile villainy he must be seen in the flesh, while Miss Clara Evelyn as Bonita scored a distinct success. Miss Edith Clegg, as the lady whose romance grew with her years, gave a most sympathetic rendering of her part. Mr. Walker Wheatley as the Dragoon officer was rather inclined to stiffness, and obviously suffered beneath the weight of his uniform. From the spectacular point of view nothing more telling than the setting of each Act could be conceived; the Portuguese fishing village in especial represents a master work in scenic craft that is haunting in its charm.

BOOKS IN PREPARATION

STILL they come. "Books generally do little else," wrote Goethe, "than give our errors names." Mrs. Clayton Glyn's (Elinor Glyn) do more. They give our pleasures names, and frequently make us open our eyes rather widely. In her new novel "The Reason Why," which Duckworth and Co. will fling upon an expectant Bayswater very shortly, Mrs. Glyn will solve yet another problem, and prove once more, to her own satisfaction, not that men must work and women must weep, but that men must love and women must reap, whether the harbour bar moans or not. It is interesting to speculate as to whether we are to be introduced to a mere Prince and whether our old friend the tiger's skin plays its usual prominent part. Mrs. Glyn is the Ouida of the day, and sees her heroes and heroines through a telescope. In Duckworth's list there is another novel which may possibly rival "The Reason Why" at the libraries. It is a romance of Indo-Burman life, by Mr. Shivay Dinga, and is called "Wholly Without Morals." These publishers appear to have specialised in Claytons, for they have "The Breath of the Desert," by Mr. Clayton East, and "The Dance of Love," by Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop. The Modern Play Series, which is extremely pleasant and charming, contains two new plays by Mr. John Galsworthy—"The Little Dream" and "The Eldest Son;" "Passers-by," by Mr. Haddon Chambers, which was delightfully produced by Mr. du Maurier, and is now being played in America by Mr. John Drew and Miss Toller; and two plays by Mr. Sturge Moore, "Mariamne" and "A Sicilian Idyle." "Short Plays for Small Stages," by Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, is not, as has been stated, in this library, but has just been published by Skeffington and Co.

Stanley Paul and Co., although comparatively new publishers, can boast of an autumn catalogue which contains a long list of very popular names. There is "Dolf Wyllarde," for instance, with a novel; the evergreen Rhoda Broughton; Violet Hunt, with a story called "The Doll: a Happy Story," although it will deal with all the intimate peculiarities of divorce; Mr. Rafael Sabatini, with yet another Renaissance story, in which he places Cesare Borgia in a series of imaginary adventures; Mrs. Maud Stepney Rawson, with "The Three Anarchists," as she calls Love, Death, and Birth, having been greatly struck by one of the omniscient utterances of young Mr. Masterman; Mr. Archibald H. Marshall, with "The Mystery of Redmarsh Farm," in which the talented author of "Exton Manor" has permitted himself more movement and ventured upon a larger canvas than hitherto; Sir William Magnay, who, having written many exciting stories which relied mainly upon the long arm of coincidence, has now perpetrated a novel called "The Long Hand;" "Jane Wardle," as young Mr. Oliver Hueffer still calls himself; Mr. Charles McEvoy, the advanced dramatist and Master-Tramp, whose last play was passionately produced by Mr. Trench at the Haymarket, and who now makes his story-telling début with "Brass Faces;" Mrs. Henry Dudeney, Mr. Armiger Barclay, Mr. Clifton Bingham, Mr. J. Keighley Snowden, René Bazin, Mr. Douglas Sladen, and Arabella Kenealy.

Early in January Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons will publish a new biographical record of the contemporary stage called "Who's Who in the Theatre." It is compiled by Mr. John Parker, who was responsible for "The Green-Room Book," and will not only contain useful information for that large army of persons who are connected in one way or another with the histrionic profession, but for that almost equally large section of the population who greedily devour the smallest morsels of information as to the ways, habits, ages, hobbies, and so forth of their footlight favourites. Mr. J. M. Bullock, the dramatic critic and cynic, will give genealogical tables of famous theatrical families, and there will be many pages devoted to the full details of the new productions of the year in England, America, France, and Germany. Other books which will bear the Pitman impress are "The New Art of Flying," by Mr. Waldemach Kaempffert, with numerous illustrations, "Modern Italian Literature," by Mr. Lacy Collison-Morley, in which the author sets out to trace the history of the literary revival in Italy during the eighteenth century, and deals optimistically with the poems of Parini, Affieri, Foscolo, Manzoni, and Carducci, and with the novels of living Italian writers, and a new revised and cheap edition of "A Hundred Years of Irish History," by Mr. Barry O'Brien, who wrote the well-remembered Life of Parnell. This volume has the advantage, or not, of a long introduction by Mr. John Redmond, and will be of interest to those people who desire to obtain a patriot's interpretation of politics as applied to the Ould Counthry. To these there must be added Mr. John Lawrence Lambe's "Experiments in Play-writing," being six plays in prose and verse, with an introductory essay. Mr. Lambe is an enthusiast who runs counter to the views of most critics in that he is profoundly convinced that the English higher drama must be written in verse. He believes, although obviously he has forgotten to make himself acquainted with the work of our popular actors, that the highest success would be achieved if it were possible to enshrine the ideas which underlay the Elizabethan drama, developed and brought up to date, in plays brimful of contemporary interest and feeling. It will be vastly interesting to see how Mr. Lambe tackles modern problems and life in verse. Mr. Zangwill, by the way, has carried out Mr. Lambe's theories in the play which is shortly to be seen at special matinées at His Majesty's Theatre.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE REFORM MOVEMENT IN CHINA.—II.

THE individual possessing no knowledge of Chinese affairs has doubtless grown weary of vague expressions of opinion in regard to the progress of the reform movement, and is desirous of ascertaining, as far as possible, the concrete evidence upon which students of the situation base their belief that an awakening has begun in earnest. The state of China to-day is one rather of turmoil than of transition. It presents a mass of contradictory elements that require careful sifting before their relative value can be estimated with anything approaching accuracy. As yet the forces of enlightenment are still battling with the forces of reaction, and these latter, it should be remembered, are strongly entrenched behind the usages of centuries. The immediate result of so stupendous and so violent a conflict is to be found in the widespread existence of chaos. The picture presented has two distinctly coloured sides—a dark side and a light side.

The dark side is to be found in the corruption and incompetence that exist in high quarters in Peking, in the bartering of Government posts, in the banishment from office of prominent reformers like Yuan Shih-kai and his immediate friends and colleagues, in the lack of control exercised by the Central administration over the provincial authorities, and its inability to keep the progressive movement free from anti-foreign sentiment, and finally in the continued and aggressive ascendancy of Manchu officialdom. In no department of the State are the evils of this mal-administration so transparent as in that which has charge of the national finances. The need for drastic reorganisation in this quarter was admirably summarised by Dr. Morrison, who stated that:—

There is certainly room for financial reform in China . . . where nineteen different kinds of dollars of different exchange value are current, besides newly-coined taels, Chinese rupees, and an infinite variety of copper coins and brass cash; where debased subsidiary coinage is issued and not accepted at its face value by the Government issuing it; where unlimited provincial note issue, without a bullion reserve, and other irregularities exist which makes China a paradise of the money-changers, and its currency confusion greater than any country under heaven.

Since the Times correspondent made this statement a loan has been contracted, one of the primary objects of which is to place the currency on a proper footing; but sufficient time has not yet passed to enable foreign critics to pass a definite judgment upon the efficacy of its operation. At present sixty million taels must be devoted annually to the service of the national debt. Little more than this total is received from the Provincial Government, and were it not for the revenue from the Customs and the railways, China, under her existing financial system, would be hopelessly insolvent. As it is, her position invariably borders upon the precarious. Between the Central Government and the provincial authorities there is a constant tug-of-war, and in the end the millions of patient toilers are the sufferers. So long as its demands are complied with, Peking cares little for the methods of exaction employed for the purpose. The only class to benefit directly are the officials, who take good care that a large proportion of all money passing through their hands is transferred into their spacious pockets.

Then there is the bright side of the picture. Signs are not wanting that the gathering force of a healthy public opinion will eventually succeed in dislodging the reactionary influences from the Central Administration. In spite of the fact that the incompetence and corruption of Chinese officialdom finds its inspiration in Peking, nowhere in the land are there more evidences of the changing times than in the metropolitan province, and particularly in the capital itself. Within the last few years the whole life and aspect of Peking has been completely transformed. It is now a city thoroughly well equipped with all the facilities that make for municipal and educational efficiency. The abolition of Manchu garrisons throughout the Empire, and the provision made for their absorption in the general community were regarded as a sign that the Government was slowly yielding to national sentiment, which is, of course, opposed to enjoyment of exclusive privileges by the ruling race. So long, however, as high Manchu dignitaries arrogate to themselves the principal offices of State, and so long as classical erudition is placed before statesmanship, progress will be hindered at every turn; that under no circumstances can it be altogether arrested is already manifest. The spirit of patriotism, kindled as a consequence of the Russo-Japanese War, has spread like wildfire throughout the length and breadth of the land. Students returning from Japan have gone among the masses telling them that intellectually they must equip themselves equally as well as Western peoples if they are to safeguard their liberty and their homes from outside aggression. With a rapidity almost magical, schools and seminaries have risen in all parts of the country. Where no suitable building could be obtained, idols have been taken down from altars and temples converted into educational establishments. Not only children, but their elders, of both sexes, have eagerly flocked to the seats of learning. Serious attention is being paid to industrial training, and the study of Western languages finds encouragement in responsible quarters. Newspapers are published in all important centres, and are allowed some measure of latitude in criticising Government officials and their policy. Shanghai boasts of no fewer than sixteen daily journals, the circulations of which in some instances exceed ten thousand. Peking and Tientsin each have three daily publications. At public meetings and gatherings of various kinds the state of the Empire is criticised with a candour that but a decade ago would have brought down upon its authors the punishment of nothing short of decapitation.

In the sphere of social reform the most important movement is undoubtedly that directed against the use of opium. According to an official estimate, which is probably under the mark, there are nearly fourteen million smokers of this pernicious drug in China. Imperial Edict has decreed that the habit shall be totally suppressed by the year 1916; but authorities differ as to the possibility of complete success being achieved within so short a period. In China, where, apart from the Customs, no reliable statistics are kept, and where, in consequence of the laxity of the control exercised by the Central Government over the Provincial Administrations, Imperial Edicts are frequently ignored or only partially carried out, it is difficult to ascertain the exact measure of progress made with any particular reform. That there has been a wholesome revolt of public opinion against opium-smoking and opium-smokers cannot be denied. From time to time accounts have been published describing the voluntary and wholesale destruction of the paraphernalia used by those addicted to the habit. I take the following extract from an article which appeared in the North China Daily News, about the time of the issue of the memorable edict prohibiting the smoking of opium:—

The much-advertised immolation of opium utensils (said this journal) took place at Chang Su-ho's Gardens yesterday afternoon, and had it not been for the obvious earnestness of many of the native spectators the proceedings might have been mistaken for a farce. The roof, balcony, and verandah of the main hall were seething with sightseers, while a thousand or so more were scattered round the site of the coming bonfire and of various points of vantage in the grounds. At 4 p.m., the hour appointed for the bonfire, arrangements had not been concluded, and several tables of opium-smoking utensils still remained untouched. A couple of coolies were engaged in stripping the pipes of their metal work, while others were splitting up the small metal boxes used for holding the drug by means of a hammer and chisel. Yet another man, armed with a sledge-hammer, was showing his prowess on the delicately fashioned brass lamps. Some of the ivory pipes were sawn up into small pieces, but those intended for the bonfire, which were mostly made of wood, were dipped in a kerosene-can and then stacked in two square heaps on a couple of large stones. On one of the tables were two small trays, each containing a complete opium-smoking outfit. A written sheet of paper accompanying them stated that they were the respective offerings of Mr. Lien Yue-ming, manager of the East Asiatic Dispensary, and Kua Kuei-yen, a singing girl. Both these quondam opium-smokers sent in their apparatus to be burnt, with a pledge that henceforward they would abstain from using the drug. To add to the animation of the scene that has been described, a native gentleman, with a reckless disregard for the spectators' headgear, was letting off bombs at intervals, and as the fragments hurtled through the air and landed on the heads of the crowd there was great amusement among the more fortunate onlookers.

Substantial proof of the determination of the authorities to suppress opium-smoking is to be found in the fact that a number of officials, unable to give up the habit, have been summarily sent into retirement. In one province at least, Shansi, where the poppy at one time flourished, there is now not the least evidence of its existence. Only the complete disappearance of this harmful plant from all provinces will finally rid China of a habit that for centuries has enslaved her hapless people.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

AMONG the 776 members of the A.A. and M.U. who were elected at the Committee meeting on the 19th inst. were the Duchess of Hamilton, the Prince of Monaco, Lord Francis Hill, Lord Sudeley, Lord Hillsborough, Lord Wrottesley, Sir Harold B. Harmsworth, the Right Hon. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P., and many other notabilities. The total membership now exceeds 38,000.

The Association continues to do good service to motorists generally by prosecuting in cases of wilful obstruction of cars by obstreperous drivers of heavy horse-drawn vehicles. At Highgate the other day a brewer's drayman was charged with wilfully obstructing a member's car on the main road through Whetstone, Mr. Taylor Parkes appearing for the Association. It was proved that, in spite of the repeated use of the horn by the motorist, the drayman, proceeding at the usual snail's pace of his fraternity, refused to give way for a distance of 250 yards, and a conviction resulted. This is the fourth case recently in which the A.A. has found it necessary to prosecute for wilful obstruction of motorists.

What does it cost to keep a motor-car? This is a question often put to everyone who is known to be in any way associated with the motor industry by those who hunger for the joys of motoring, but whose limited financial resources make them hesitate to incur unknown expense. The question, of course, is inherently absurd, unless the enquirer is prepared to furnish information on a number of points, such as the nature of the work the car will be required to do, the hilliness or otherwise of the roads over which it will have to run, and, more especially, the amount of use to which it will be put; one of the chief virtues of the car, as compared with the horse, being that it costs nothing for upkeep when not in actual use. But most people who contemplate joining the ever-increasing army of motorists know approximately under what conditions they will want to use the car, how many passengers it will be usually required to carry, and what opportunities of using it they can look forward to. Given this information, it is not a difficult matter to indicate, roughly speaking, what the cost of motoring will be.

As an instance of what can be done in the way of economical motoring, a case cited in the current issue of the "Motor" is both interesting and instructive to the would-be motorist whose means or leisure is limited. The car in question, a 1906 model of British make (6h.p.), was bought second-hand in 1907, after it had already done about one thousand miles, for £80. Its original price would be about £130. Like the majority of motorists, or prospective motorists, the owner was only able to use it on occasional evenings during the week, for week-ends, and for the annual holiday. But it has been consistently used on all such occasions, and it has not had a single breakdown of any consequence. Since 1907 up to date, it has averaged about 1,700 miles per annum, and the total cost of upkeep has been about £70, which works out at about £17 per annum, or seven shillings per week. Of course the owner both drove and looked after the car himself, and no doubt drove on all occasions with a due regard to economy in tyres and petrol. Probably, also, he had the advantage of previous experience in motoring, and was able, therefore, to get more out of the car than a novice could expect to do. But in any case these figures cited, which come from an authentic source, show conclusively that a very fair amount of motoring can be indulged in at a much lower cost than is generally supposed.

The latest development in connection with the aeroplane is the aerophone, an apparatus embodying a new system of wireless telephony, invented by Mr. H. Grindell-Mathews. According to a published report, a completely successful demonstration of the new invention was given on Saturday last at Cardiff by the inventor, in conjunction with Mr. B. C. Hucks, the well-known monoplaneist. Ascending with one of the Mathews receivers to a height of 700ft., Mr. Hucks easily succeeded in hearing Mr. Mathews' verbal message, although a strong breeze was blowing and he was travelling at the rate of fifty miles an hour. It is said that the apparatus is small and portable, that it needs no skilled interpretation, and that the distance over which it can operate is practically unlimited. The result of further and official trials of the invention will be awaited with great interest, more especially in military quarters.

We hear that the fine and spacious premises of the Continental Tyre Company in Thurloe Place, South Kensington, which were only opened a few months ago, have already been found quite inadequate to deal with the constantly increasing demand for "Continental" tyres, and that another four-storey building, providing another 2,000 square feet of storing accommodation, is now in course of erection. No doubt the extension of the already magnificent premises is largely due to the remarkable series of successes achieved this year by "Continentials" in important racing competitions.

R. B. H.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

No sooner had the newspapers decided that the Morocco question was at an end than it was announced that Italy had determined to seize Tripoli. This makes one further trouble to be faced. It is much more serious than people imagine, for it is almost certain that the Turk will not surrender Tripoli without a fight. The Near East question is so complicated that the Turk feels that he has only to begin war to drag in Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro, not to speak of Greece, Albania, and Macedonia. It will require the greatest self-restraint on the part of the Powers to prevent the squabble becoming a European conflict. There was never any danger that Morocco would end in a war, because both nations had agreed to make it a question of bargaining. But there is no question of bargaining about Tripoli. The Young Turk appeals to the patriotism of the nation, and as the Turk does not lack courage a fight seems almost a certainty. The immediate effect of the Tripoli question was seen in a fall in both Turkish and Italian stocks—a fall that is likely to make still further progress. The Bank of Egypt has for a long time past been in a very precarious position, but all hopes of saving a crash were put an end to by a run which took place in Egypt as soon as the Tripoli question was mooted in Cairo. The Egyptians realised that there might be trouble in Egypt, and certain of the more nervous took the precaution of withdrawing their funds from the banks. As the Bank of Egypt was not in a position to stand any run at all, and as the £750,000 that was on its way to Egypt had not arrived, the unfortunate directors had to issue a notice on Tuesday to the effect that they were compelled to suspend payment. It is impossible to say what the position of this bank is at the present moment. At the end of December it had only about £300,000 cash in hand, and owed about two millions to depositors and about a million and three-quarters on acceptances. But the end of December is always a bad period at which to take the position of an Egyptian Bank, for it is right in the middle of the cotton movement. A statement will, therefore, be eagerly looked for.

It is said that the National Bank is ready to take over the depositors, and it is also stated by the officials of the Bank of Egypt that the assets are more than sufficient to pay the shareholders 20s. in the pound, and the creditors in full. It is sincerely to be hoped that such is the case. But whether this good fortune will come to pass, or whether there will be a heavy loss, the shock to banking credit is severe. The bank has never recovered from the muddle its late manager, Luzatto, succeeded in dragging it into. For some years past the officials have had infinite trouble in straightening out the affairs of the bank, and only last February £200,000 was taken from the reserve to write off depreciations. Strong feeling is exhibited in the City at the action of the directors in paying a dividend. The bank directors are, of course, in a very awkward position. If the directors of the Bank of Egypt had passed the dividend there would probably have been an immediate run on the bank, and they no doubt hoped that they would be enabled to keep up the credit of the bank and escape from their difficulties. This is now proved impossible. All Egyptian banks trade upon far too little cash, and all of them have to borrow largely from England in order to finance the cotton crop. English banks are chary of lending money to Egypt, and when the Bank of Egypt wanted help it found it quite impossible to obtain it. It is very difficult at the moment to know how the failure will affect other banking institutions. It is to be hoped that there will be no more nervousness on the part of the Egyptians, otherwise we may see other Egyptian banking institutions in difficulties.

MONEY.—The autumn squeeze has set in early, and almost every bank on the Continent has raised its rate. With the exception of London, where the stock of gold in the banks is, if anything, a little above the average, the Continental banks are all of them very short. Even the great Bank of France itself has lost large sums during the past year, whilst the other French banks are certainly trading on far too small a supply of coin. Both the Crédit Lyonnais and the Société Générale are satisfied with between 7 and 8 per cent., which is a third less than our London banks consider safe. The German banks get along with a little under 10 per cent., and this is also too small except in days of peace. The credit of all these great banks is, however, very strong. The only thing is that they somewhat overstrain it. The failure of Hellings, the money broker, is now announced. He was a very popular and well-known figure in the City, and everybody will sympathise with him.

FOREIGNERS.—The Foreign market was upset over the Tripoli incident, but, taken all round, it soon recovered, and on Tuesday there was actually some buying of both Tintos and Perus. It is very doubtful, however, whether we shall see any revival here until foreign affairs have quietened down.

HOME RAILS.—The ridiculously over-sold position in the Home Railway market caused a considerable amount of buying back, and this, combined with a certain amount of investment buying, sent up prices with a bound. There has been a very substantial rise during the week, which was more than justified by the remarkable progress made by the railways. The Stock Exchange still sneers at Home Railways, but it is evident that the complete failure of the A.S.R.S. to control the Irish has damaged that Society very seriously, and now the general feeling is that there will be no more trouble with the railway men in England. No body of men can set themselves against public opinion, and public opinion is distinctly in favour of legislation which makes a railway strike both illegal and impossible. It looks more than likely that railway quotations will go back to the old figures, although it is doubtful whether the dividends for the current half-year will be as good as we expected. Indeed it will be almost impossible for the companies to make any increase on last year.

YANKEES.—The rot in American Rails continues. Every now and then the market is steadied, but the steadiness of one day is always followed by a slump on another. Investors and speculators alike appear to be completely scared at the idea of further trust legislation. It would seem almost impossible to split up some of the trusts, so complicated are their finances. The American Tobacco Company finds it hopeless, and even the United States Attorney has given up the task. The liquidation will therefore take place under the sanction of the Court. There are a dozen trusts in the United States, most of them prosperous and well-managed trading concerns, and if all of them are attacked in the way the Standard Oil was attacked it will be hopeless to expect any revival in the American Market. Trade in the United States is also falling off, and as the big bankers wish to show the politician in the worst possible light, a small slump every now and then just suits their book.

RUBBER.—The Rubber reports that have appeared during the past week have all been quite good. The Rubana is excellent, and although the shares are rather high and the return not good enough for a tropical plantation, those who got in at par are not likely to sell. There has been a great deal of fuss made about the Mabira Forest, which most unfortunately paid a dividend some time ago, and has been unable to continue a distribution. The circular just issued tells us that the Mabira plantations now contain nearly 236,000 trees, of which nearly half are Hevea. But the circular does not tell us whether the output of rubber is obtained from the wild Funtumia or from the cultivated growth. Mabira is an interesting proposition, but highly speculative. Rotterdam-Deli Hevea, which was highly praised on its flotation, has now held its statutory meeting. The chairman was enabled to state that the company had been over-subscribed and had over one thousand shareholders. He also stated that the Rotterdam-Deli Maatschappij had deposited £20,000 in joint names in order to pay a dividend of 5 per cent. for four years. The Rotterdam Vendor Company is now planting at the rate of 50,000 trees a year, and will continue to do so for the next four years. Therefore, the future prospects of this company are extremely good. Sungei Matang is offering £20,000 7½ per cent. debentures. It has 730 acres planted and 237 acres felled and ready for planting. But it will not begin tapping until 1912. Its output is estimated at £17,500. Sungei Matang belongs to the Cattenach group. The debentures have been underwritten so that the company is now secure of a much-wanted working capital. The rubber-market still remains very dull.

OIL.—Nothing further has been published about Lobitos, but the shares remain firm. Spies are also inquired for, notwithstanding the fact that the output has lately shown signs of falling off. It is expected that the next few months will bring in some fresh wells, and at the end of the six months there will be almost as much oil sold as was sold last half-year. The price is now 28 copecks, at which there is a magnificent profit. I think, therefore, that Spies will have no difficulty in maintaining its dividend. Shells are on the whole weak, and Maikop shares are most of them unsaleable. The companies have no money, and many of them now find that their ground is sterile.

KAFFIRS.—Kaffirs have had quite a little jump, and some Kaffir shares have been a fairly strong market. City Deeps, Rand Mines, and Modders appear to be the favourites. There is no doubt that there was a large bear account in Kaffirs, and that the shops came in and supported most of their specialities. It is difficult to say whether the public is in or not, but on the whole I should think that most of the dealings have been professional.

RHODESIANS.—Rhodesians have been steadily purchased, and the option dealers in Chartered who have been buying options and then selling a bear against them now appear to have become frightened. It looks very much as though we should see a rise throughout this market. There is a great deal of talk, and it is said that the big Rhodesian houses have been distributing calls on shares to their various friends in the Press. As all the Rhodesian houses have hundreds of thousands of shares to sell, they can do this without hurting themselves very much. The dealers, who know quite well that every big company has a stack full of shares to dispose of, have been rash enough to sell short, and it is probably principally due to the buying back of the bears that the rise has come about. However, the improvement in the mining market has given a much better tone to the whole Stock Exchange, which, of course, subsists mainly upon gambling.

MISCELLANEOUS.—London General Omnibus shares have jumped to 114 on very definite statements as to the dividend. No doubt the ordinary shareholders will at last receive a distribution, for the directors are much more keen on paying dividends than on writing down for depreciation. Hudson Bays have also recovered, and the Miscellaneous Market has improved all round. The Liebig shareholders are to be offered a 5 per cent. debenture in one of the Liebig South American subsidiaries. There will be no difficulty in placing the issue, for the Liebig firm is one of the best-managed industrials in England, and is strongly supported by the very wealthy people who hold its shares. Quite apart from this, the issue would appear to be thoroughly sound.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

SCOTTISH SUNDAYS AND GOLF

SIR,—The views held as to a Scottish Sunday by "An English Visitor" are not peculiar to himself, but they show a regrettable degree of ignorance of his subject. He approaches the topic apparently without any intention of trying to find a bright side to the picture. Indeed, the want of sympathy he displays is the chief characteristic of his remarks. He does not state if his experience of Scotland has extended beyond the golf-links at North Berwick, about which he writes with considerable humour, and there are not wanting indications that they formed, if not the furthest limits of his travels, at any rate their principal object, and that for the rest he has made use, to some extent, of his imagination. The picture that he draws of a Scottish village plunged in solitude and drink certainly does not represent North Berwick, which, as he admits, becomes at this season of the year the favoured haunt of Prime Ministers and duchesses; but neither does it represent anywhere else in Scotland to-day. The general accusation he makes is quite unwarranted. The modern Scottish village Sunday is probably very much like that of any English village of the same kind. There are certainly plenty of people about on Sunday afternoon; in fact the difficulty is frequently to find any solitude, and the suggestion that Scots men and women shut themselves in their houses on Sunday is without foundation except in so far as it refers to those who dedicate their Sunday afternoon to slumber, a class which is very far from being extinct in England, though apparently the "English Visitor" has no sympathy with it.

His other charge, that of the prevalence of secret Sunday drinking as a marked Scottish characteristic, is not only false, but mischievous. No one denies that some does take place, but it is mostly among those who would indulge in it even if they were offered every possible counter-attraction. It would be interesting to know from what data he has drawn his conclusions on this matter, as it is allowable to presume that it is not from ocular evidence. Perhaps, since he is no doubt aware that no public-houses are open on Sunday for ordinary purposes, he has performed the experiment he speaks of, and "lifted the roofs of some of the pious cottages"! If he has done so, it is not unlikely that he has come across some members of that class, for which Scotland is no less famous than for its golf, who give their leisure hours (and frequently these are few during the week-days) to the study of noble literature and the cultivation of their intellectual life.

If our "English Visitor's" facts are distorted his history is positively shocking. It is to be feared that it is a case of pure ignorance. If he glances at any Life of John Knox, he will discover to his amazement that the features of the Scottish Sabbath which he deplores are not in any sense a "legacy from John Knox," but are a product of a much later date. He will even find strong evidence that John Knox did what he himself is so anxious to do, and played golf on Sunday!

It is possible to believe that this is his real trouble, that he could not get his game of golf on Sunday. Here he has indeed a genuine grievance, though not to such an extent as he would have us believe. He has apparently not made friends with the "city men and Government officials" of Edinburgh, or they would have taken him to golf at Muirfield, three miles from North Berwick, on Sunday, or, if he was staying in Edinburgh, to Barnton. It is true that he would not have been able to hire a caddie at either of these places, but it is surely not a bad principle in regulating a man's Sunday amusements to see that they shall enforce labour on as few others as possible. Surely he would not deny the caddie the right to spend his Sunday in amusement too! Again, when he pleads for Sunday play on North Berwick links, he takes the worst example conceivable, for there, if anywhere, the treatment the course receives throughout the week warrants the reproof of old Tom Morris to some Southerners wishing to play at St. Andrews: "If you dinna wish a rest on the Sawbath, the links dae." Apart from these criticisms, most educated people in Scotland will agree with "English Visitor" that it would be a good thing if there was more opportunity for reasonable amusement on Sunday, not so much for men like him, who have presumably been spending the whole of the preceding week on the golf-links, but for the workers of all classes, whose hours of labour and the shortness of the light on autumn evenings will not allow to spend in healthy pleasure at other times. This is often called a pleasure-loving age, and to those (and they are not few) who consider this tendency by no means wholly an evil one, some further extension in imitation, though not slavish imitation, of English and Continental models would be very welcome.

"English Visitor" and other English visitors may be inclined to look upon these criticisms as the outcome of an inherent Scottish self-esteem. There are many in Scotland, however, among whom the writer would like to number himself, who are proud of their country and of Scottish characteristics and yet strive not to be, what the delightful Christina McNab was called with considerable truth, "damned Scotch." They welcome criticism, and do not "keep up the colossal bluff of superior virtues over their sacrilegious neighbours across the Border," but they are apt to pay more attention to such criticism when it is applied with a little more sympathy and experience than "English Visitor" has brought to the task.—I am, yours, &c.,

ONE OF THE NATIVES.

"UNWISE HUSBANDS AND UNWORTHY WIVES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—What an interesting article! And so true! These plays do begin seriously and then go off in farce. It is disappointing, but inevitable. The theme cannot be dealt with on the stage, nor off it either, it seems to me.

The mastery of the wife by her husband—it has engaged many minds in many ages. As a woman, it is, of course, of especial interest to me. In my opinion men are too weak and lax altogether nowadays, and that is why women are becoming so rebellious and discontented. The ogre's wife ought, I think, to have had a good whipping; her husband was far too lenient. I am not joking; I seriously mean this. Why should the higher life of a good, sensible man be ruined by a worthless woman, when a simple remedy lies in the application of a birch rod? There were no perplexed husbands in the days of our ancestors, for they knew how to deal with woman.

Our nature is not changed; we may kick and struggle and try to get the upper hand, but we love to be ruled. This instinct may be begotten of centuries of slavery, but there it is, and we cannot get rid of it. I think that we have gone too far in our total abolition of physical punishment for an unruly wife. Truly in olden days chastisement was often too severe, although sanctioned and encouraged by law and religion. Literature is full of cruel instances—see Boccaccio, and the "Mare's Skin" play on which Shakespeare founded his "Taming of the Shrew," where an unruly wife is dragged into a cellar, stripped and whipped severely all over her body, salt rubbed into her wounds, and then tied up in a mare's skin and left there. Yet this met with public approval—not condemnation.

The swing of the pendulum has brought us to a state of affairs in which the mildest caning of a perverse woman would be regarded as almost a crime! Now this is absurd. Moderation is a higher and nobler thing than Abolition. We get at truth in the happy mean (as Aristotle says), and I hold with chastisement in moderation.

I know perfectly well that to the modern man any form of wife-beating is the Crime of Crimes. With poor arguments and sham chivalry he bolsters up his views, thus making a rod for his own back. He will break his wife's heart with cruelty and neglect, but he will not give her a few minutes' smarting for her own good! Open and honourable punishment he shrinks from; but he does not forget to indulge in spite and revenge and sulkiness. No wonder we have grown to have contempt for men. They have ceased to be masters since they abandoned the cane, and they will never be our masters again until they resume chastisement.

I decline to believe that all the good and just men of the past were misguided. Why even Sir Thomas More advocates the chastisement of perverse wives. Aristotle—the wisest of men—said "The husband governs his wife because it is his due"! And women, he tells us, are "natural" slaves among those who do not "obey reason," and therefore must be "corrected by pain, like beasts of burden." This is forcible enough. Can he have been quite mistaken? No! facts are with him.

A friend of mine made her husband wretched for five years, until he could stand it no longer, and then he whipped her as one whips an unruly child. He thought she would leave him; but no! she has begged his pardon, and promised better behaviour. What a fool he has been! He knows better now. I fear you are quite horrified; but these are a woman's views.—Yours truly,

CLARA BEESLEY.

8, Pembroke-road, Bristol, September 23rd, 1911.

P.S.—The man who flirts with his typist ("A Perplexed Husband") in order to bring his wife into proper subjection is a cowardly brute, full of petty revenge. If this is the modern man's mode of punishing his wife I call it most insulting and unworthy of the lords of creation! One can but have contempt for such a coward. Good heavens!—excuse me—we would rather be whipped ten times over than insulted like this. But the modern man is full of all this. Not a real ruler with the power of punishment, he seeks to get the better of us by contemptible means. A wife asks him to get tickets for the theatre; he replies he can't get any; and when he has retired to his club she remembers that she showed some temper yesterday, and said some nasty things—alas! we can do it!—and this is revenge!

She goes to a party, and all the evening he flirts with another woman. She cannot understand it until she recalls a recent act of disobedience. So this is spite!

He will take a walk in dogged silence to revenge an offence. He gives a favourite kitten to a neighbour. "Oh! I didn't know you wanted it." And so on. Yes, he will break his wife's heart with refined and subtle cruelty, but that does not matter, because no one can see it!

Such a man shrinks in horror from the punishment that would make his wife respect him. Oh, inconsistent man! Your methods are quite past my understanding—and your own too.

That a wife should be under the physical control of her husband awakens in me (an educated woman) no horror at all. It is part of our sex instinct. I am sorry if it is wrong, but I cannot get rid of it.

AUTHORS OR LITERARY REPRESENTATIVES WANTED

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am engaged on a new edition of my father's book "Sappho," and desire to trace the address of certain authors whose permission to quote from their works I seek, and therefore subjoin this first list to see if any one can tell me their addresses, and thank you for your courtesy and remain, yours faithfully,

LEONARD C. WHARTON.

31, Greville Road, London, N.W., September 23rd, 1911.

E. G. Harman, "Poems from Horace," &c. Dent, 1897.

W. G. Headlam, "Book of Greek Verse." Camba, 1907.

A. Dickison, "Tychiades." T. F. Unwin, 1903.

BOXING IN THE OLDEN TIME

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Now that the sporting world is so profoundly interested in the forthcoming pugilistic combat between the chosen champions of the white and black races, it is somewhat curious that I have lately unearthed a document among the Chapter muniments here of the reign of Henry III. which shows that boxing was then a well-recognised and public pastime. I append my précis of the deed:—

Grant from Roger Pille, of Westminster, to William de Aulton, Cook, and Cecily his wife, daughter of Duley Perkyns, of Westminster, of one messuage in Westminster at Tothill ("ex opposito places in qua Campiones solent pugnare"), at a yearly rent of one clove of garlic. Witnesses: John de Karliolo, John de La Chersyng, Cisson, John de Eya, and others. Temp. Henr. III. White Seal.

A few years ago I published another document of the Commonwealth period, which stated that golf was the usual sport of Westminster gentlefolk in Tothill Fields at that time.—Yours faithfully,

EDWARD J. L. SCOTT, D.Litt., M.A. Oxon, Keeper of the Muniments, Westminster Abbey.

Muniments Room, Westminster Abbey, S.W.

September 19, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- A King of Vagabonds.* By Beth Ellis. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
- The Twymans: a Tale of Youth.* By Henry Newbolt. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
- Agnes of Edinburgh.* By Margaret Armour. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
- The Yacht of Dreams.* By Frank Morton. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
- The Song of Renny.* By Maurice Hewlett. Macmillan and Co. 6s.
- The Bride of Dutton Market.* By Marie C. Leighton. With Frontispiece. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
- Delphine Carfrey.* By Mrs. George Norman. Methuen and Co. 6s.
- Wandering of Desire.* By E. Charles Vivian. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
- Hilda Leasways.* By Arnold Bennett. Methuen and Co. 6s.
- Good Boy Seldom: A Romance of Advertisement.* By Oliver Onions. Methuen and Co. 6s.
- Dormant.* By E. Nesbit. Methuen and Co. 6s.
- The Danger Zone.* By Fannie Heaslip Lea. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
- Taken from the Enemy.* By Henry Newbolt. New Edition. Illustrated by Gerald Leake. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d. net.
- The Position of Peggy Harper.* By Leonard Merrick. With Coloured Frontispiece. Thomas Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.
- Miss Rovel.* By Victor Cherbuliez. With Coloured Frontispiece. Thomas Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.
- Une Nichée de Gentilhommes, Mœurs de la Vie de Province en Russie.* By Ivan Tourguéneff. With Coloured Frontispiece. Thomas Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.
- The Fruitful Vine.* By Robert Hichens. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.
- The Shaping of Lavinia.* By F. Britten Austin. Constable and Co. 6s.
- The Missing Millionaire.* By Christopher Wilson. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
- Richard Somers.* By H. Grahame Richards. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
- Life.* By W. B. Trites. Wyman and Sons. 6s.
- Wind on the Heath.* By Essex Smith. John Lane. 6s.
- Vagabond City.* By Winifred Boggs. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.
- The Story of Quamin. A Tale of the Tropics.* By May Harvey Drummond. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.
- The Young Idea: A Neighbourhood Chronicle.* By Parker H. Fillmore. Illustrated by Rose C. O'Neill. John Lane. 6s.

- The Lifted Latch.* By George Vane. John Lane. 6s.
God and the King. By Marjorie Bowen. Methuen and Co. 6s.
Thanks to Sanderson. By W. Pett Ridge. Methuen and Co. 6s.
The Taming of John Blunt. By Alfred Ollivant. Methuen and Co. 6s.
Desmond Rourke, Irishman. By John Haslette. S. Low and Co. 6s.
Every Dog his Day. By Harold Avery. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

- The Compleat Oxford Man.* By A. Hamilton Gibbs. With Preface by Cosmo Hamilton. Skeffington and Son. 3s. 6d. net.
On the Wallaby Through Victoria. By E. M. Clowes. Illustrated. Wm. Heinemann. 6s. net.
Zionist Work in Palestine by Various Authorities. Edited by Israel Cohen. With a Foreword by David Wolffsohn. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 1s. net.
The Surgeon's Log: Being Impressions of the Far East. By J. Johnston Abraham. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.
Masters of English Literature: De Quincey. Edited by Sidney Low. G. Bell and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.
Wheat-Growing in Canada, the United States, and the Argentine, including Comparisons with other Areas. By W. P. Rutter. With Maps and Charts. A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.
Report for the Years 1909 and 1910 on the Victoria and Albert Museum and the Bethnal Green Museum. Wyman and Sons. 6d.
My Vagabondage: Being the Intimate Autobiography of a Nature's Nomad. By J. E. Patterson. Portrait Frontispiece. Wm. Heinemann. 8s. 6d. net.
My Tropic Isle. By E. J. Banfield. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.
A Study of Indian Economics. By Pramathanath Banerjee, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
In the March and Borderland of Wales—Shropshire, Herefordshire, and Monmouth. By A. G. Bradley. Illustrated by W. M. Meredith. Constable and Co. 5s. net.
In the March and Borderland of Wales—Glamorgan and Gower. By A. G. Bradley. Illustrated by W. M. Meredith. Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
The New Guide to Bristol and Clifton and the Bristol Channel. Edited by James Baker, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. J. Baker and Son, Clifton. 1s. net.
Between Two Worlds. By A. E. Lloyd Maunsell. Alexander Moring. 5s. net.
Specimens of Bushman Folklore. Collected by the late W. H. T. Black, Ph.D., and L. C. Lloyd. Edited by the latter, with an Introduction by George McCall Theal, LL.D. Illustrated. George Allen and Co. 21s. net.
Puppets: A Work-a-Day Philosophy. By George Forbes, F.R.S. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
India and the Durbar: A Reprint of the Indian Articles in the Empire Day Edition of "The Times," May 24th, 1911. Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.
English Poesy: An Induction. By W. Winslow Hall, M.D. J. M. Dent and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.
Phases of Dickens: The Man, his Message, and his Mission. By J. Cuming Walters. With Portrait. Chapman and Hall. 5s. net.
Plays for Amateurs and Home Reading: Dickens's Humour. Adapted by C. M. Tucker. Stead's Publishing House. 1s. 6d.
Old Indian Trails: Incidents of Camp and Trail Life Covering Two Years' Exploration through the Rocky Mountains of Canada. By Mary T. S. Schäffer. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d. net.
The Letters of an Englishman. Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
The Diamond. By W. R. Catelle. Illustrated. John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.
A History of British Mammals, Part VIII. By Gerald E. H. Barrett-Hamilton. Illustrated by E. A. Wilson. Gurney and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.
Poetry and Prose: being Essays on Modern English Poetry. By Adolphus Alfred Jack. Constable and Co. 6s. net.
A Woman in Canada. By Mrs. George Cran. Popular Edition. Illustrated. W. J. Ham-Smith. 3s. 6d. net.
A New Theory of Value, with Application to the "Strikes" and Other Current Interests. By a Practical Business Man. The Chiswick Press. 6d. net.
Organised Games for the Playground. By Robert S. Wood. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 2s. 6d.

- The Fauna of British India, including Ceylon and Burmah: Freshwater Sponges, Hydroids, and Polyzoa.* By N. Annandale, D.Sc. Illustrated. Taylor and Francis.
An Analysis of the Church of St. Mary, Chelsey, in the County of Berkshire. By F. J. Cole, D.Sc. Illustrated. B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 5s. net.
Java, Sumatra, and the other Islands of the Dutch East Indies. By A. Cabaton. Translated, and with a Preface, by Bernard Miall. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.
My First Summer in the Sierra. By John Muir. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
Casuals in the Caucasus: The Diary of a Sporting Holiday. By Agnes Herbert. Illustrated. John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.
The Invaded Solitude. By Magdalen Rawlins. Gowans and Gray, Glasgow. 2s. 6d. net.
Belgium of the Belgians. By Demetrius C. Boulger. Illustrated. Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. 6s. net.
L'Altare della Patria el'Arte di Arturo Dazzi. By Guido Guida. Illustrated. G. Ugo Nalato, Rome.
Medical Science of To-day. By Willmot Evans, M.D. Illustrated. Seeley, Service and Co. 5s. net.
The Magic of Spain. By Aubrey F. G. Bell. John Lane. 5s. net.
Across South America: an Account of a Journey from Buenos Aires to Lima by Way of Potosi. With Notes on Brazil, Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, and Peru. By Hiram Bingham. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 12s. 6d. net.
Gorboduc; or, Ferrex and Porrex. By H. A. Watt, Ph.D. (Bulletin of the University of Wisconsin, No. 351.) Madison, Wisconsin, U.S.A. 40 cents.
Medal System in Elementary Schools. By J. J. Faragher, B.A. New Edition. Liverpool Booksellers' Company. 3d.
Sandgate Illustrated. Compiled by F. A. Gane. F. J. Parsons, Folkestone. 6d.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

- Studi di Storia Orientale. Vol. I: Islám e Cristianesimo. L'Arabia preislamica gli Arabi antichi.* By Leone Caetani. With Maps. Ulrico Hoepli, Milan. 8 lire.
Seven Splendid Sinners. By W. R. H. Trowbridge. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.
My Own Story. By Louisa of Tuscany, ex-Crown Princess of Saxony. Illustrated. Eveleigh Nash. 10s. 6d. net.
A History of Russia. By V. O. Kluchevsky. Translated by C. J. Hogarth. Vol. I. J. M. Dent and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.
Memories: Personages, People, Places. By Henry G. Huntington. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 21s. net.

VERSE

- More Gordon League Ballads: Dramatic Stories in Verse.* By Jim's Wife (Mrs. Clement Nugent Jackson). Skeffington and Son. 2s. 6d.
The Inn of Dreams. By Olive Custance (Lady Alfred Douglas). John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.
Here and Hereafter. By Constance Goodwin. David Nutt. 1s. net.
The Embassy of the Muses. By H. P. Baker. Published by the Author, at 92, Lower-road, Rotherhithe. 3d.
The City of the Soul. By Lord Alfred Douglas. Third Edition. John Lane. 5s. net.
Fifty Poems. By John Freeman. Herbert and Daniel. 1s. net.
New Poems. By Katharine Tynan. Sidgwick and Jackson. 3s. 6d. net.
At the Silver Gate. By John Vance Cheney. Illustrated. F. A. Stokes Co., New York. $5.35 net.

JUVENILE

- Sylvia's Travels.* By Constance Armfield. Illustrated by Maxwell Armfield. J. M. Dent and Son. 6s. net.
Pinocchio, the Tale of a Puppet. By C. Collodi. Translated from the Italian by M. A. Murray. Illustrated by Charles Forward. J. M. Dent and Sons. 5s. net.
The Hero of Heroes: A Life of Christ for Young People. By Robert F. Horton, M.A., D.D. Illustrated by James Clark, B.I. Jarrold and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

- Atlantic Monthly; Good Health; Windsor Magazine; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The Travellers' Gazette; The Bookseller; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; The Parsé, Bombay; The Publishers' Circular; Revue Blue; The Smart Set.*

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND
... THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.
62-68, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON.
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Via the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.
PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.
For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,
JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year,
according
to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,
NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programmes on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
225 London Wall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1839).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 21.	Every Thursday Fortnightly.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17+	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£10.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and
SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £8 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

BOORDITE RIFLES, .400, .500, .600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 431	Reviews (continued) :—
I.—In a Garden 432	Shorter Reviews 442
II.—Japanese Students ... 432	Fiction 444
On Bookscapes..... 432	The Theatre..... 446
The Future of the Terri- torial Force 433	Pickwick Riddles—II. ... 447
John Churton Collins..... 435	Tattershall Castle 449
Plymouth: Future 436	New Zealand Sketches—III. 450
Reviews :—	Books for Boys 451
Ferdinand Lassalle..... 438	Music 453
The Weather 439	Books in Preparation 453
The Oxford Under- graduate 440	Imperial and Foreign Affairs 454
The Master Genius of Journalism 441	Motoring and Aviation ... 455
Indian Sport 442	In the Temple of Mammon 456
	Correspondence 457
	Books Received 458

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazines rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

THE ACADEMY next week will be enlarged to 32 Pages, and will contain, in addition to this, a Special Literary Supplement of 8 Pages, and an inset of 2 Pages, with Portrait, dealing with Babiism, by Sir Charles Walpole.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

LORD CURZON, in his comprehensive speech at the opening of the Exhibition of Old Masters at the Grafton Galleries, expressed very pungently the position of England as the "happy hunting-ground" of the foreign connoisseur and of the agent for Americans who desire to become possessors of authentic works of art. It is especially difficult to prevent valuable heirlooms from being taken out of the country at the present time, for, as Lord Curzon pointed out, "just at the very moment when this attack was being made on our virtue, our capacity for resistance was diminished by the enormous burdens of taxation placed on the owners of such works by the hand of the State;" thus the situation is growing worse, since the number of masterpieces is limited, and "as they disappear the price of the residue must continue to go up." It is hardly likely that a Government characterised by disregard of one of the most difficult arts of all—the art of government itself—will find much pleasure in Lord Curzon's suggestion that the annual grant to the National Gallery of £5,000 should be increased to £25,000; nor will Members of Parliament probably see their way clear to "create an Art Fund" by pooling their salaries, despite the humorous remark that they might "justly feel they were rendering a greater service to the State at Trafalgar Square than they could hope to do at St. Stephen's." There is, however, food for thought in the idea that a confidential list of all works of art of unique value should be drawn up, and that owners should be invited to enter into some form of honourable agreement that in the event of their wishing to dispose of such property their own country should come first. Could this be carried into effect, much of the recrimination and controversy which periodically invades the domain of Art might be avoided.

The heading "Private Organs in New York" appearing in a daily contemporary suggests subsidised newspapers, the carrying on of political campaigns, and those flights of verbal eloquence peculiar to the enthusiasts of the American Press. It refers, however, to actual musical instruments which have been recently erected in the private residences of certain enormously wealthy persons with a penchant for harmony at odd moments—Mr. Carnegie, for example, finds a charm in the melodious thunders while he is dressing; others, doubtless, woo sleep or fill the wakeful night hours by listening to the classics. Imagine, incidentally, the feelings of the organist on being awakened sharply at three o'clock of a winter's morn with the message that he is desired immediately to play Bach's "Toccata and Fugue in D minor," or to improvise a fantasia on the latest song! One point about these organs is rather perplexing: they are "cleverly built into the houses, so that, besides presenting magnificent decorations, the pipes by being scattered seem to send forth their music from all over the house." What would be the sensations of a guest with a 32ft. bourdon in his bedroom when it suddenly spoke, or with a shrieking "Mixture—three ranks" over his head? Some of these instruments can be played from different parts of the house. We refrain from comment upon the possibilities attaching to a musically inclined cook with a four-manual keyboard in the kitchen.

Most people of ordinary susceptibilities have been convinced this week that our extraordinary summer has really gone at last, and have tasted the joys of sitting by the fire with a book, a pipe, or a person—or perhaps all three—for company. Lament as we will the passing of the long, warm days (we will not whisper now that some of them were a trifle too warm), there is a sense of luxury and well-being which only comes when firelight suffuses the smoking-room or study, when the blinds are drawn, the world shrinks to the illumined circle, and the memories and musings of things most cherished win through the silent hour. As a nation we love the frosty days—when we get them—and the firelit evenings; has not Punch pictured the Englishman a thousand times in an attitude which has become more or less typical—with hands in pockets, feet wide apart, coat-tails before the blaze? Stevenson praised this comfortable rest-house on the day's journey, and many another writer has joined with him; every freelance in London takes up his pen in October to compose essays on "Firelight"; every editor in London sends them back by the dozen between now and February. And so it will ever be, until we become a radiator-warmed nation and inspiration wings her way to less prosaic climes.

Readers of our review appearing this week of Georges Brandes' recently translated Life of Ferdinand Lassalle will notice that an echo of that tragically ended career reached England on Wednesday last. Countess Helène von Dönniges, news of whose unhappy death was in that day's papers, met Lassalle at a Berlin salon in 1863; the two fell in love, and when they next met in the following year, resolved to marry. The story is told, as students and the elect are aware, in George Meredith's "Tragic Comedians"—less a novel, perhaps, than any of his other prose works—where the soul of Lassalle is compared magnificently, if we remember correctly the phrase, to a mighty cathedral organ "foully handled in the night by demons."

I.—IN A GARDEN

Here by the mossy garden well
 A sunrise blossom falls
 Upon my brow
 Enchantingly.
 Under the sudden spell
 I see a heaving-prow,
 And hear the shuttle in the lonely halls
 Of sad Penelope.

II.—JAPANESE STUDENTS

The glory of the golden past
 A mist of years outrolls;
 But slowly towers to shape dominion vast
 In dreams of youth. Grey fathers, gazing back, Mistrust the ardent children souls
 Upon the forward track;
 Wise mothers, praying to forget their fears,
 Divine the future through a drift of tears.

E. E. SPEIGHT.

The Fourth High School of Japan,
 Kanazawa, Japan.

ON BOOKSCAPES

SETTLING lightly one day before the well-stocked stall of a favourite second-hand bookshop, I desecrated, and made my own for the nominal fee of one shilling, two volumes of Sydney Smith, bound, as only the bookbinders of last century knew how, in smooth mellow calf. True, there should have been a third—probably was a third—but he had strayed like a prodigal from the sleek little family, and where he is to-day, to what shameless depth of ransacked twopenny boxes he has sunk, stripped and bedraggled maybe, predestined to the pulper, who can say? I think he must really have been a poor lot, for my prize of his better-conducted brethren included "Peter Plymley" and "Botany Bay" and "Chimney Sweepers" and "Man Traps and Spring Guns," and then, you see, I did not get him. On the whole, what wonder that I congratulated my bookseller. Whereupon he, phlegmatic man, made me a revelation. He told me that he had recently received an order for several hundreds of those lovely bindings, to be supplied at the uniform price of sixpence a volume. As to the contents, there was no specification. They were simply to form the bookscape in the library of some parvenu without a soul.

Now, in my bookscape they figure very well: two tall, smooth pillars like poplars in Spring. But a whole unbroken expanse of them! And then, not only their desert uniformity, but their wholesale acquisition! I wonder whether he ever dares to sit in that library, or whether the dreary, characterless, yellow ranks, innocent of a single sacred association or any impress of his mercantile personality save the one gross bargain, have not banished him, shivering and lonely, from that alien air.

Yet if the bookscape be true to its possibilities there is no sweep of swelling, heathery down, nor autumnal vista of changing leafage, that can excel it for delight. Its peculiar charm lies not in the massed array of greens and blues and reds, in prosaic layers of solid colour, as the manner of some is; nor is it to be found where the pedantic classification of the public library prevails. Elzevirs are not a prime necessity, nor are éditions de luxe the last condition of success. I am quite content to presume that one of those experienced gentlemen who "purchase libraries on advantageous terms" would survey my bookscape with a very superior air. First editions are but infrequent landmarks, and full-calf is judiciously restrained, while such fabled growths as "three-quarter levant" and "pigskin gilt" flourish in other climes. But no such advantageous gentleman could replace it, for it is my bookscape; and when my western window throws the soft evening sunlight across it in a slow-stealing trail, or when on a winter night the curtains are drawn, and the firelight flickers coquettishly on the low-toned backs, the familiar scene is alive with friendly confidences, and a breeze too subtle to be felt whispers half the memories I care to hold.

For there is no other bookscape like mine, though there be many fairer to the eye; may even be some as dear and intimate—to somebody else. To me it is as romantic as the map of a country beloved—and what is there more romantic than such a map, crammed with the symbolic suggestion of clustered specks and faint, wandering tracks? There are shady spots, sequestered nooks, breezy hills and smiling valleys in the serried landscape, each with its own tale of halcyon hours. And there are harmonies in my bookscape, chromatic, delightfully haphazard harmonies of colour, gardens of scarlet and crimson, and warm blue and restful green and broken flashes of white. Other harmonies, too, startling, whimsical and unexpected, that have shocked me now and then into delighted merriment: Francis Quarles dwelling amicably between Molière and "Tom Jones;" Matthew Arnold hobnobbing with Lafcadio Hearn (after being called a "colossal humbug" and a "fifth-rate poet"!) and dear old Dr. John Brown. ("The great Matthew," quoth Rab, "looks at God through an eyeglass!") Mr. Galsworthy perpetually entertains Jane Austen, and Boccaccio lies down with William Law. I have a memory of William Law—but more anon!

I will recount some of the aspects of my bookscape as I sit here taking in the expanse with my eye. There is a little church set on the top of a green Gloucestershire hill under whose shadow I lay on a summer's day with that copy of "Aylwin;" and there is a breezy common with a sheltered bluff where two of us communed together over that little volume of Mr. Belloc, and had a fleeting glimpse of Pegasus. That small edition of "The Queen of the Air" will always bring to mind the grey sheen of the evening sea creeping over the level sands of a Norfolk shore, while that shabby copy of "John Inglesant" is overhung by blossom-laden apple-boughs. There is the scent and rustle of woodland fern about my "Lord Ormont," and the fragrance of trailing roses—hundreds of white blooms embosoming an old arbour—lingers with Augustine's "Confessions." My "Elia" can tell of the snug fireside, after the buffeting of wind and rain in the winter night, and "The Defence of Guenevere" recalls a window-picture of sun-bathed fields, and the strange, peaceful leisure of convalescence.

These are some of the magic associations which make my bookscape fascinating to me, and warm with autobiography. And there are others of a different sort, memories of delightful gifts, eloquent of discerning friendship; or of chance introductions, first overtures of acquaintance with great lords of the pen, that were to ripen into cherished fellowship.

Another half-hour and the sun will be round at my western window. I know exactly where the first beam will fall: it will fall just where Sydney Smith's two volumes bereaved rise up like tall poplars in early Spring, beside the green quiet of Jusserand's "English Wayfaring Life." Then it will creep round to illuminate the whole storied scene.

What is that? Oh, William Law. Well, I took his "Serious Call" in my pocket one day as I walked over a lyric country to where a gentle stream slides noiselessly through the woodland. It is a very nice edition, neat and unobtrusive, and it did not at all inconvenience the pocket.

P. J. F.

THE FUTURE OF THE TERRITORIAL FORCE

FOR all those who take any interest in the Territorial Force the approach of April, 1912, must be fraught with some anxiety. In that month expire the four years' engagements of the bulk of the recruits of 1908, and between then and June the term of a large proportion of the old Volunteers who transferred their allegiance to the Territorials. Will they renew their engagements, or, failing that, are we likely to secure a sufficient number of recruits to take their places? These are the questions that are being asked by the Associations, the Recruiting Committees, and by Commanding Officers, more particularly in London and in the South. While they cannot be answered with any certainty to-day, one is bound to face the fact that, even if there is a high proportion of re-engagements, the supply of recruits to fill the ordinary wastage has been steadily falling off, and that, unless another boom in recruiting takes place, or some special inducements are held out, the numbers of the Force will be diminished next year, in spite of Lord Haldane's encouraging figures at East Lothian last week. It is in the hope of minimising this loss that I venture, through the courtesy of your columns, to put forward a few suggestions.

Needless to say, the chief and most pressing necessity is more money. In 1907, the last year of the Volunteers, the estimated cost of the Force was £1,894,159. For this outlay, out of a total number of 252,791 men, the country secured a camp attendance for fifteen days of 4,459 men, and for six to eight days 151,998 men. The Territorials in 1910 numbered 267,096, and we secured in camp for fifteen days 168,175 men, and for eight days and less than fifteen days 75,185, while for this enormously increased efficiency the total cost amounted to £2,683,902, an increase of only some £789,000.

Taking into consideration the numbers and expenditure of the Regular Army at home and abroad, say 261,000 men and a total cost, excluding Reserves, of £54,000,000, I submit that even the most hardened scoffer of the Territorials—and unfortunately there are many to-day—cannot contend that the cost of the Territorial—about one-twentieth of the Regular—is excessive. The recent increased allowances have been appreciated, and go to remedy some of the more glaring hardships attached to drills and other attendances, but if the Force is to compete with and overcome the numerous attractions which appeal to the leisure of the young man of to-day, more money must be provided. No officer or man ought to be out of pocket one single penny in connection with the work or play of his battalion. As it is, many officers who can ill afford it have to subscribe towards all sorts of sports and competitions, which keep their men together and increase their efficiency, while the general public are regularly appealed to and generously respond to the call to support battalion funds. Even the men themselves are not exempt. One hears of a crack Scottish battalion being 24s. per man out of pocket on a march through the country, which, while no doubt a pleasure to the men, also meant excellent training and a stimulus to recruiting. Such a tax on a citizen service is inexcusable. There are any number of inter-battalion, inter-county, and, most important, Regular versus Territorial competitions, which ought to be arranged all over the country, but no funds are provided for the purpose. More outdoor ranges, more drill-halls with club-rooms attached, are urgently wanted, and greater expedition in carrying out the plans—one hears, for instance, of a drill-hall three years overdue and not yet completed. The men are not sufficiently in evidence, especially in the country districts. Route marches, church parades, and the presence of local companies at all ceremonials where there is any excuse for their appearance ought to be the order of the day. The people must be familiarised with their defenders. Let us follow Lancashire's lead and mobilise periodically, thus arousing popular interest and at the same time putting one's finger on the weak spots in the Force. It will cost money for train-fares, bands, &c., but it will pay. For all such purposes I plead for a special grant of, say, £100,000, to be spent in the absolute discretion of the County Associations. I emphasise the right of the Associations to disburse such sums without reference to the War Office, because, though the distinguished statesman at its head who evolved the Territorial scheme may be trusted to take a broad view, the permanent staff have not yet risen to the occasion. A younger generation of officials may succeed in sufficiently loosening the bonds of red tape to allow of a discrimination between the paid soldier and the Territorial, and so ensure a more sympathetic handling of the problems involved in the increasingly difficult task of maintaining the public interest in a Territorial Force. The Recruiting Committees and County Associations were specially formed to provide recruits, and they ought to have a free hand in the matter, without, of course, seeking to encroach upon the training, which rests with the War Office. Meantime the combined supervision of the Commanding Officer, the Recruiting Committee, and the Association, with, if necessary, as a final tribunal, that useful body the Council of Associations, ought to be a sufficient guarantee to the Treasury that any such sum earmarked by the War Office will be judiciously expended.

I do not advocate payment of officers and men apart from the period of camp. There may be a good deal to say for a moderate scale of pay for drill attendance; but, on the other hand, that is not the spirit which permeates the Force as a whole; and the monetary attraction, while it would probably appeal to a wider circle, would not necessarily draw the best class of recruit. For the moment I think we might leave the amateurs of St. Stephen's in possession of that privilege. Nor do I propose to deal with the question of compulsory service, for the simple reason that, whatever may be its merits or demerits, it is a proposition which neither party will put before the country, and is therefore for the present out of court. That there is ample scope under the Territorial scheme can, I think, be demonstrated, provided the country will take the matter seriously and encourage the Treasury to be a little more liberal with its doles.

Let us assume that even with the additional grant suggested we fail to retain a fair proportion of the time-expired men next spring, are they necessarily lost to the defence of the country? Surely not. Within the last two years a notable body of men have rallied to the call—the Veteran Reserves, now known as the National Reserves, with that grand old soldier Lord Roberts at their head, have sprung into existence. Composed not only of old Volunteers, but of a large proportion of old Army men who have seen active service, the new body bids fair to conserve and consolidate the Territorial Force. Emerging at a time when the inevitable reaction from the recruiting boom began to take place, the Reservist movement appealed to many who, while unable to spare the time to take their places in the Territorial ranks, felt that they would like to be on hand if occasion arose. So far only registration without any obligation to serve has been attempted, and, short of an occasional parade and presentation of badges by private donors, little has been done to encourage this important movement.

Surrey, which was among the first to recognise and encourage the Reservists, now numbers some 3,500 trained men, or only about five hundred short of the total units under the control of her Association; while the County of London has over twenty thousand on the muster-roll. It only needs the other counties throughout the kingdom to take the matter up heartily to ensure a Reserve force equal in numbers to the present Territorial force, while its efficiency (owing to its leaven of Regulars) is likely, after its rustiness is worn off, to be considerably greater.

Here, then, is an asset which makes the probable reduction in the Territorial numbers not so serious as it might at first appear, but it is hardly necessary to say that, if the third line is to be effective, we cannot stop at a presentation badge and an occasional parade. These men must have uniforms and arms; they must put in a few drills during the year, and be at liberty to attend the annual camp on the same terms as their younger men-at-arms. It would indeed be a scandal if this excellent material—60 per cent. of the Surrey men are under forty years of age—were allowed to run to waste.

They must be encouraged to take their places with the Regular troops and Territorials on all possible occasions. Every effort should be made by company officers to enrol all men leaving the Territorials in the ranks of the Reserve. There are many officers, both Regular and Volunteer—as is evidenced by their registering as members of the National Reserve—only too pleased to give their time to the duties of organisation. But, of course, here again we are faced with the need of more money. Another possible source of supply may be looked for in the numerous rifle clubs in the country. So far beyond a certificate that the range complies with official requirements, the War Office takes no cognisance of this important body of men. While it is quite true that little disposition has been shown on the part of members to become amenable to Army discipline, on the other hand, no sort of inducement has been held out by "the powers that be" to encourage proficiency; no offers of ammunition at cost or even at reduced rates; no facilities for open-air ranges. These ranges have been provided by public subscription or by private donors. Honorary members contribute towards the upkeep and prizes; ordinary members have to pay for ammunition and entrance money for special prizes. An amazing degree of skill at the target is acquired—enough to put the shooting of the Regular Army to shame. As an example, the club, of which I have the honour to be president, during the first year of its existence defeated a team of N.C.O.'s of the Brigade of Guards. All this proficiency seems to be thrown away. Would it not be possible to develop a corps of sharpshooters by selecting the best shots, and by offering some inducement in the shape of a distinctive uniform, or a modest retaining fee to attach a certain number of such men to the local Territorial Corps? I am aware that success at a miniature range has little bearing upon shooting in the face of an invisible enemy; but, on the assumption that marksmanship is encouraged in the Army, there is no reason to believe but that civilian proficiency would tell in time of need.

But while Reservists and riflemen are useful adjuncts to the Territorial force, it is to the younger generation we must look to fill the gaps in the ranks. I plead, therefore, for a closer and organised connection with the Boys' Brigade, Church Lads' Brigade, Boy Scouts, and kindred societies. I would commence with the children of the county and national schools. It is well known that the educational authorities look with a jealous eye upon any fostering of what is known as "the military spirit" in the Council schools of the country. For some mysterious reason it is considered unwise, if not positively wrong, to pander to the natural tendency of the ordinary human boy for soldiering while in the State school, but it is considered an act of grace and patriotism to induce that same boy when he has reached the age of eighteen to enrol himself among the defenders of his country.

Why should this be so? Is there any reason why the schoolboy should not be taught to look forward to the time when he will be privileged to train himself to protect his hearth and home, and that meantime his natural bent for things martial should be encouraged and developed so far as the curriculum of the school permits? The knowledge and discipline so gained would never be forgotten, and it would be taken as a matter of course that when age and other circumstances permitted he should take his place in the Territorial Army. Once let this principle be instilled into the mind of the schoolboy, and there will be no need for compulsory service. Commencing with school, and carried into the ranks of the Boy Scouts, the various Brigades, and Cadet Corps, there ought, in my opinion, to be a combined movement having in view ultimate enlistment in the Regular or Territorial Army, and finally in the National Reserve. Let public opinion get behind a concentrated movement of this kind and its success is assured.

What is the attitude of the representatives of the people in Parliament? Does the predominant party go out of its way to back up the Secretary of State for War even in the matter of the Territorials, let alone the youngsters? Is there not a lukewarmness—not to call it by a harsher name—on the part of many Liberals in supporting the views of their War Minister? Is not their cry for peace at the bottom of the stinginess of the Treasury? We are all for peace, but not at any price. Would it not be well for the Labour party to rid itself of its obsession that every Territorial means an extra rifle and bayonet to suppress the striker? They should be the first to encourage and promote the means of defence, as they would be the first to feel the pressure which, in the absence of preparedness, a strong foe would bring to bear on this country. All honour to the Lords-Lieutenant and leading men in the counties, in most cases politically opposed to the promoter of the scheme, who have supported heart and soul the Territorial movement, while a tribute must be paid to the enterprise and publicity of the Press; but to ensure complete success the whole country must be behind it.

Are the employers of labour doing all they can? Many of the large firms have done yeoman service, but is there not a temptation in certain quarters, in these times of good trade and competition, to prohibit the willing Territorial from taking his fifteen, or even eight, days in camp? With the small man one can sympathise. At a busy time he cannot spare any considerable proportion of his hands or afford to pay extra for substitutes. The fact that men are willing in many cases to forfeit their wages and let the family go on short commons during camp is sufficient testimony to a keenness which surely should not be put to such a severe test. The suggested special grant in the hands of the Associations may find a way out here.

We want to put down with a firm hand the legend displayed by some employers, "No Territorials need apply," and to replace it with the notice "Territorials only accepted." We ought to try to put the Territorial and all associated with him in the country's defence upon a higher plane. His zeal and keenness ought to be recognised and applauded, not scowled upon or sneered at. Some members of the Army Council will have to become better acquainted with the Territorial, to take him more seriously, and to get rid of the prejudices engendered by the old Volunteer. Keenness, intelligence and endurance, properly led, will take a lot of beating, even by the machine-like soldier of the Continental type. Edward the Peacemaker gave a splendid send-off to the movement, which his Majesty George V. in every way supports. Heartened by their illustrious example, let us, therefore, co-operate on all sides to utilise the excellent material of the citizen soldier; but to do this effectively it is necessary, in addition to the various means I have ventured to indicate, first of all to parody Danton and demand L'argent, toujours l'argent, et encore l'argent.

R. J. TURNER, Chairman Caterham and District Recruiting Committee, and Member Surrey Territorial Force Association.

JOHN CHURTON COLLINS*

By FRANK HARRIS

HERE is a book which has given me three or four hours of pure and keen enjoyment. The son tells the story of his father's early life, and tells it excellently, bringing before us the happy, studious yet energetic boy, and making him live for us, and at the right moment, as by some happy fortune the father's own memoirs come in to carry on the story which the son completes with the untimely, inexplicable, tragic death.

Churton Collins' memoirs contain interviews and talks with half a dozen of the greatest men of his time, and record their opinions on the most vital matters. With Swinburne he discusses poetry and writers, and wins inestimable criticism, some of it new—contempt for Sainte-Beuve, admiration for Cyril Tourneur; from Carlyle he hears that "Christ was a world-historical humbug," Swinburne a "curious growth," George Eliot "dull," Ouida's work "damnable, hateful, abominable." Browning tells him what the path finders of the time thought of death and the hereafter:—

Tennyson told me that he felt positively certain of an extension of individual consciousness after death. Carlyle said to me a short time before his death: "I have no notion at all, not the smallest idea, whether I am going to be annihilated, or whether I shall burst out into something splendid and quite strange." Old Landor said, "I do not care a jot which way it goes. I am ready for either." Huxley felt very depressed and dissatisfied that he would be "out of it"—felt the hardness of having to quit consciousness when his curiosity was so ardent, when so many new truths were daily coming to light. Harriet Martineau was anxious to live because she hated the idea of annihilation, and that was, she felt, certain.

He (Browning) said himself that if he were perfectly certain that a new life was before him, that a new series of experiences was awaiting him—he should not scruple to determinate this life himself, after, he said, making arrangements to secure the comfort of those connected with him.

Browning goes on to say that his belief in God and God's goodness is absolute, and that every time he stretches forth his hand he is conscious of a miracle. An unforgettable, priceless book, which should be in every house were it but for these interviews.

As Churton Collins was a very old friend of mine I prefer to talk of him as I knew him—paint my own picture of him, so to speak.

The first impression Collins made on me was rather agreeable. Our meeting took place more than twenty years ago, shortly after his tremendous attack on Mr. Edmund Gosse in the Quarterly Review, an attack which made him famous. I had met him earlier at dinner, at Sir Charles Dilke's; but had had no intimate talk with him. Churton

Collins was some 5ft. 8in. or 9in. in height, a strong, square figure, not particularly muscular, though he was a fair walker and cyclist. The head was of good shape and size, the forehead broad, the eyes pale blue, the jaw and chin peculiarly square and massive. Considerable brain-power one would have said, and very considerable determination. His attack on Gosse provoked curiosity. "Why did you do it?" I asked. "His ignorance, carelessness, blundering," was the answer.

The tone of the schoolmaster; but the source of his anger was that he had an extraordinary reverence for facts, and Gosse treated them, he thought, far too lightly. Collins searched once through the registers of forty-two churches in Norwich to find the exact date of the poet Greene's death, and at length found it.

I feared at first that we should never get on well, for he had a spice, too, of the schoolmaster's envy: "Fancy Cambridge asking such a man to lecture," he said; "disgraceful!" His bitterness amused me; rage seems out of keeping with matters of Art and Letters.

Once I remember praising an article of his as better than anything Macaulay had done. He was overjoyed. He admired Macaulay beyond reason, knew pages of him by heart; thought him very unjustly treated by Arnold; was delighted at being compared with him. "Macaulay," he declared, "was one of the great English writers."

Later I found him misquoting some verse. For a while he argued the point, and then, on conviction, admitted that he had a treacherous memory. Strange to say, his bad memory was the secret of his extraordinary accuracy as a writer. He had to verify everything, and this habit of verifying grew into a virtue with him that corresponded to the careful punctiliousness of his nature. He lived in this way to me for several years, as a solid, strong, capable teacher of English literature, with wide reading, a bad memory, and a surpassing carefulness about mere facts; an honest, kindly nature, full of chivalry and loyalty, with incomprehensible bitterness towards what he regarded as pretentious ignorance; a good and cheery host, an easily pleased and laughter-loving guest, preferring his pipe and armchair and a good talk about letters (poetry for choice) to anything in the world. He liked beer, too, and good, plain English living, and found his real temptation in a glass of old port.

When I took over the editorship of the Saturday Review, in '94, he was one of the first—after Bernard Shaw, Cunningham Graham, H. G. Wells, and D. S. McColl—that I invited to help me. While he was writing reviews for me we became friends, and I got to know him well and hold him dearly.

Of course we used to talk Shakespeare interminably; he admired him beyond words, and had some vague idea of his personality, a nebulous and incoherent idea including Hotspur as well as Hamlet, but still an idea. He saw Shakespeare through professorial spectacles, all smoke-coloured with holocausts of inconsistent facts. I think I made the master plainer to him; but I would not be taken as saying that he ever accepted my views even partially. He found them "very interesting;" assured me more than once that when my book came out he intended to review it for the Quarterly; but there the matter rested. I think I reached him first on the side of textual criticism; he had the usual mandarin nonsense in his head about "Titus Andronicus" and the "First Part of Henry VI." and the first two Acts of "Pericles" not being Shakespeare's, and followed the usual attribution of "Henry VIII." A good deal of that I managed to alter in time, and this book holds the proof of it.

On page 42 he gives an account of a talk with Swinburne

* Life and Memoirs of John Churton Collins. By L. C. COLLINS. (John Lane.) 7s. 6d. net.

and says:—"Agreed with me when I thought that both Peel and Kyd may have had a hand in 'Titus Andronicus.'" Whereas, on page 146, he writes to Sir Sidney Lee on his "Life of Shakespeare" in this vein:—

It seems to me that we really have no right at all to question the authenticity of "Titus Andronicus." It is the youthful Shakespeare to a T—external and internal evidence seems to me conclusive. Nor can I agree with you that "Troilus and Cressida" could possibly have been written as early as 1603; surely it has every mark of the latest style . . . "Henry VIII." . . . Fletcher could never have written, in my humble opinion, Wolsey's speech to Cromwell; but this is, of course, mere opinion. Nor can I go with you when you say that it is certain that Shakespeare didn't write "First of Henry VI." and the old plays on which Second and Third were founded.

But even in yielding he was stubborn-slow and scrupulously conscientious. He would argue each new point till he was convinced, and often go away unpersuaded, but he did not hesitate to admit afterwards that I had been right. In the above letter to Lee look how he limits Shakespeare to Wolsey's farewell to Cromwell, though the soliloquy before the "farewell" is still more clearly Shakespeare's. But for some reason or other Collins wasn't sure of it, and would not admit it—a stubborn, honest soul if ever there was one!

Collins had a most absolute admiration of genius, and delighted in praising a young poet without any qualification.

Gradually I arrived at the conviction that this sober, stolid, honest Professor would rather have written one beautiful line, would rather have composed one supreme page, than have won all the honours of the trade. He was near enough to genius to tell that it was different in kind and in degree from talent; he had an instinctive, worshipful reverence for it—a passion of admiration.

And this was the tragedy of his life. He knew beyond peradventure that nothing he could do would live; that the best in him was what he called "laborious mediocrity;" that the reach of genius and the ease were beyond him for ever. "Others labour," he used to say, "with hope, comforting themselves with the belief that they are doing the great work they admire. I have no delusions. I am doing good hodman's work, and that is all." And that was the secret of his hatred of any one who was not what he called "a genius," and yet who came to distinction. There he let the passions of envy and hatred take the reins.

I cannot help thinking that of all the terrible tragedies of human existence there is none greater than this: to desire fame, to agonise to reach it, and to know all the while that the power is denied; and this was the tragedy of Collins' life.

But this was not enough to wreck the stout, strong ship of his destiny. He had a large family; many calls upon his powers; he was a glutton for work, and he worked inordinately even after he had passed middle-age. "If I cannot reach the highest," he said to himself, "at any rate I will do all that is in me, bring out all that I have got, show all the wisdom." And beyond this desire of self-realisation there was also a desire to make money for his children, and as the years went by this became the object of his life. He was not content to do as much journalism as an ordinary journalist does, while writing as many books as an ordinary writer; he also lectured two or three times a day for months together. He told me he earned £4,000 a year. After earning such sums for twenty years he had no business to be hard up, for his wants were simple and his house could have been kept up for a thousand a year. But in money matters Collins was a child. He did not know one investment from another, and had to take advice which was not always disinterested. This feebleness in him, this failure to grasp ordinary business details, was part of the idealism of the man. It went in my mind with his straggling, lank hair and untidy, careless dress.

One day, when talking of Carlyle, he confessed that he too was a martyr to indigestion—had indeed been for years such a sufferer that he thought of suicide again and again:—

"It is only my family that keeps me back," he used to say, "otherwise I would have ended it long ago, and got a respite. Once I went down and plunged into the Serpentine, thinking it might change things, get rid of the bad ideas and the depressing thoughts, and I found the swim did me all the good in the world. I threw off the indigestion through it."

Gradually through the years that followed he seemed to have learned to live. He got rid of the indigestion to a certain extent, but the depression continued darker and darker. There were of course lighter, happier moments. He stayed with me once on the Riviera, and was intensely interested in the gay, pleasure-loving life of Monte Carlo, declaring that he had never had a better holiday, and went back with a lighter heart.

But the catastrophe was only put off. He himself traces the cause of the attack to "a great stress of work and then a sudden cessation." The last words—a "sudden cessation"—are most significant. Work shielded him to some extent from despairing thought. When his mind was delivered over to itself it ground itself to powder, as millstones do when they have nothing else to grind.

Towards the end he wrote frankly in his diary about his misery and depression: "Looking for D(eath)." A few days later he writes: "I can sleep well, God be thanked!" Next day: "This fearful depression again; what will become of the children if I get worse?" Then on September 2nd: "Am now in dull, dead, suicidal misery. . . ."

And then the tragic, untimely end, and one is free to think of poor Churton Collins not as he was when harassed and worn out, but in the earlier, happier days. I love to remember his laughter, his pipe, his good fellowship—all the kindness of him, and all the charm—his enthusiasm, too, his chivalries, the insight of him, and the honesty, for after all he was a great worker, an honest English workman:

"A good man gone where we all must go."

PLYMOUTH: FUTURE

By WILFRID L. RANDELL

Out! Out alas! My destiny is fulfilled:
Hurry me hence within with quick co
The wreck and ruin of my former self.
Farewell my name and honours! Thou, my garland,
Farewell! my successor must wear you now,
To shine in new pre-eminence—a rogue,
Perhaps less perfect, but more prosperous!

"THE KNIGHTS" OF ARISTOPHANES.

As by observing the position of a planet on three separate occasions it is possible to construct its complete orbit, so from the past and present of a country or a town we should be able to deduce its future. Plymouth in the past bore an illustrious banner to the house of fame, and that banner was emblazoned with the names of seamen whose hands upheld it, was blown upon by the winds of the sea. Plymouth of the present lives, to a great extent, by the sea which her citadel-crowned height adorns. And it is safe to forecast that chiefly, if not only, by developments in connection with the sea will the town of capstan and chanty preserve and enhance its honoured name.

Those developments—if they take place—will not differ essentially from the lines of past years. The time has gone by when the salt-encrusted worthies assembled on Plymouth Hoe and talked largely about expeditions to the Indies, or proposed thrashings to be administered to objectionable foreign Powers; to-day, in taut uniforms, their descendants gather in the club-house and over the walnuts and wine converse on naval matters, controlled in their movements by various personages hidden in a building in London, whence flash messages and orders innumerable on wings swifter than the wind. But the same spirit is there, though the men and the ships have a vastly different appearance. Plymouth—and Devonport (lest Devonport be angry at the omission of her arsenals and dockyards)—exist partly by the grace of the Navy; and it is a question whether the commercial side of their sea-life has not been overpowered. In an article which appeared in the Pall-Mall Gazette about three years ago, from which I may quote, I commented upon this, noting that for many years Plymouth has been at a disadvantage in the competition which she has so strenuously maintained:—

Her magnificent haven attracted the attention of the Admiralty, and for her splendid situation and contour of coast she had perforce to pay the penalty. Battleships, destroyers, submarines—every imaginable war-craft occupy the wide Hamoaze, her western waters; dockyards and stores and victualling-yards line the Devon shore for miles. To the east the Navy is encroaching with giant tanks of oil-fuel, and when not long ago a scheme was set afoot to deepen that portion of the harbour for the accommodation of liners the Admiralty vetoed it at once. Not altogether in the nature of a penalty, of course, is this predominance of the A.B. and his accessories, for where ships are built and launched and kept men and trade follow; yet there are many who think longingly of what Plymouth might have been—a port unequalled, where the mightiest liners afloat could have come alongside and unloaded; and there are others who think that the two things could be combined.

In one sense commerce and the Navy do already join hands at Plymouth, since the finest liners of the world constantly anchor inside the breakwater to take up and discharge mails and passengers. The White Star boats, the New Zealand Shipping Company's packets, the Orient, British India, and Hamburg-American liners, and many more, visit the port as regularly as clockwork on inward and outward voyages. But Plymouth wants more than this. Why should she not be a terminal port, with the traffic and honour and profit of a second Glasgow or Liverpool? One glance at the map is enough to show the unrivalled position of the town; it guards the very gateway of the land; vessels making it their headquarters avoid the fogs, the shoals, the complicated traffic of the English and Irish Channels; its magnificent harbour defies all gales, even those which drive almost straight in from the south-west. A whole fleet can ride safely sheltered here, as has often been proved. Its excellent railway service includes one of the crack trains of the world; two systems afford it distributive facilities for mails, freights, and passengers which many a larger town might envy. And yet not a single vessel above average tonnage—always excepting warships—can dry-dock at Plymouth; not a single liner is accommodated with wharfage. Once, many years ago, during a London dock-strike, the Liguria, an Orient boat, came into the Great Western Docks; as far as I am aware no vessel of her size (and she was not big, as liners go now) has since entered. Why is this?

At the time of writing the article quoted above a scheme was under consideration which, if it could be carried out, would settle once and for all the question of Plymouth's commercial prosperity. It was proposed to construct an outer harbour at a part of the coast on the Devon side which is of favourable contour. This harbour would enclose about a thousand acres of sheltered water of adequate depth—48ft. over more than half of its area. Lying, as it would, outside the present haven, the cautious entry into the Sound would be avoided. There would be no necessity for the double transference and handling of the thousand or twelve hundred mailbags which often form one boat's portion. However smartly this operation may be performed, it is an annoying waste of time; it should be possible, especially in the case of important long-distance mails, to transfer directly from boat to train. Many other advantages might be mentioned, not the least of which would be the elimination of the tedious journey up either Channel with England on the port or starboard all the way and the equivalent delay. The total cost of putting the scheme through, inclusive of four miles of railways to link up, was estimated at £2,000,000. "If," said the Western Daily Mercury, commenting upon the subject, "such a dock should be found in existence to-morrow by some feat of magic, it would be used at once by the largest liners afloat."

But, as usual, the scheme was banned. Parliamentary powers could not be obtained. The Admiralty wants Plymouth to grow to order, on the naval side; and as "Plymouth" in this respect means the adjacent town of Devonport, she may well be downhearted. If the "Three Towns" were one united body, and the absurdity of their separate control were remedied, Plymouth would stand a better chance of accomplishing something notable in the way of deep-sea hospitality instead of being a mere port of call. As things are, it is difficult to understand why she has not become, in these days of saving minutes, first or second port in the kingdom after London.

Is Plymouth verging upon that indolence of old age which overtakes cities and countries as well as men and women? Do the few new shops and "improvements" signify a feeble struggle against an impending fate? Is she resting upon the laurels hardly won, content to have made history and to let the present, which is the history of the future, pass her by? It is not a simply local matter, this question of Plymouth's development; it means something to the country, precisely as the health or illness of a part affects the whole. From time to time schemes are mooted; they raise a wave of enthusiasm in the whole district; Southampton trembles, Liverpool frowns; but they pass unfulfilled, and Plymouth sinks back to her placid existence. When a guileless excursionist once inquired the reason of the high wall erected on Staddon Heights to stop the spent rifle-bullets from falling into Bovisand, he was told by a wag that it was built "to stop the small-pox from reaching the town." There is a conservatism which is too rigid, too keen on setting limits and laying down laws, and if a wall could be built to protect Plymouth from its encroachment, it would be well. Meanwhile other ports gain the traffic and prosperity which should be shared by her; her broad waters are given to the man-o'-war and the "little cargo-boats that sail the wet seas round," and the stately liners, which ought to berth and unload, look in for an hour as guests who cannot stay, since Plymouth cannot "put them up."

REVIEWS

FERDINAND LASSALLE

Ferdinand Lassalle. By GEORGES BRANDES. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

SOME time ago, in the columns of THE ACADEMY, we passed in review the somewhat eventful days of Helene von Racowitza. An occasion such as that naturally drew out an account of the central episode of that perplexed and passionate life—her tragic affair with Ferdinand Lassalle, which passed to literary fame, under Meredith's auspices, in "The Tragic Comedians." And thus, in its turn, it became necessary to consider who and what the man was who came to so fateful an end, for, as has repeatedly been said, there is no tragedy in the death of mediocrity. In order to see Helene's love-story as one of the earth's great tragedies it was necessary to be assured that the lovers were of heroic proportion. In her case this might be held to be a very doubtful question. But then with her it did not matter so much. She did not die. For her there was no tragedy, or, at least, the tragedy was of indirect consequence. It was rather of Lassalle we wished to know whether he was composed of the necessary tragic timber, and it was clear to see that he did fulfil this condition. This much was apparent, despite some unhappy obscurations, in Helene von Racowitza's own memoirs; but when, as now, it becomes possible to discover him not in the way of oblique reflection, but full-length in a biography of himself, it is more than ever clear that he was even such a man as he seemed to be.

This biography by Brandes is, of course, no new one. It has seen the light of day on the Continent for some time, and now it is to be had in English it seems strange indeed that the thought of rendering it for English readers had not earlier occurred to some publisher. It is, perhaps, next to even if not before, the study of Shakespeare, the work of his pen most destined to live. He himself says, "With reference to this portrait, or to the art of portraiture in general," that his effort has never been to be brilliant. "My ideal is Velasquez, and his ideal was not brilliance, but truth." In spite of this, however, the book is undeniably best entitled by the word "brilliant." It is learned and exhaustive, even as it is also detailed and careful, but happily these attributes are not in any necessary conflict with brilliance of treatment.

All aspects of Lassalle are treated in turn. If the work is brilliant, it is very largely so by reason of its subject, for it would be difficult to imagine any book with Lassalle as theme (however much we may disagree with his tenets) being otherwise than cornucopian. One of the most admirable features in it is that while the concluding tragedy of his life is given fully and vividly, it is accorded its proper place in the canvas. In a sense it is the most important event in his life. There are few things more important in a man's life, there is certainly nothing that more precisely finds the value for his life than his death. Yet Lassalle was of heroic timber. When he met the lady by whom he was to come to his untimely end he was a figure in the front of his age. That is to say that, however much we may desire to fix our attention on his dramatic end, it is primarily necessary that we should look at the man in the light of the life he lived. And this Herr Brandes does. The book is divided into two main portions, each in turn being entitled "Lassalle before the Agitation," and "Lassalle as an Agitator." In the first is to be discovered a personality precocious enough in all conscience. At the age of twenty we find him in Paris with Heinrich Heine, and, if you please, fighting battles on behalf of that mordant mocker. One would scarcely imagine Heine greeting any one open-armed, much less a youth of twenty who was willing to undertake the advocacy of his temporal affairs. Instead, we find Heine writing to Lassalle in this fashion: "You have the right to be impudent; the rest of us usurp this Divine right. In comparison with you, I am but a modest gnat." A career begun in this way could not, surely, end otherwise than dramatically. And the letter that Heine wrote subsequently to Varnhagen von Ense, by way of introducing Lassalle to him, happens not only to be a very considerable tribute to a young man at the threshold of life, but is also one of the most important clues to the inner heartiness and frankness of the Aristophanes of his age.

Leaving Heine, Lassalle struck forthwith on the episode that was to give the destiny to his whole life. Brandes' habit of beginning each of his chapters with a dramatic opening is rather apt to confuse the true order of the Countess Hatzfeldt affair. For instance, one would like to know more of the beginning of that fateful friendship than merely to be told, as an explanation after the central business has been dealt with, that "Mendelssohn . . . introduced Lassalle to the Countess." Yet, having been introduced, Lassalle's advocacy of a woman cruelly wronged, unable to get justice because her husband was of high rank, enormously wealthy, and a personal friend of the King, displays him as a man who, however impudent (as Heine put it), was yet cast nobly. And the long, weary fight that followed only confirms the sight. When one comes to consider it, it is positively amazing. Here was a youth of some twenty-three years; poor, when it is remembered that early nineteenth-century legal proceedings in Germany were in question; with the stigma that his age placed on his Jewish origin; with no influence to command, and with the legal order against him: such a man undertaking to compel a personal friend of the King—a high-born and colossally wealthy German Junker—to accord justice to his wife. It is Goliath and David outdone. Fight after fight was lost; case after case went against him: but defeat was only the signal for the opening of a newer combat. It sounds foolish beyond words, and so it was; but it was successful nevertheless. In the middle of 1848 the fight was begun; and, as Brandes says, "at length, in August, 1854, his opponent, the Count, was exhausted. The silly Jewish boy had been too much for him. His strength was broken. Lassalle set his foot upon his neck, and dictated terms of peace under conditions most humiliating and dishonorable to the Count."

We have given some space to these early events of Lassalle's life because the later portions belong to history, and also because it is these portions that best indicate the character of the man whose later years were to mean so much to Germany. The winning of his case placed him at once in an independent position. A certain part of the annuity he won from his opponent for the Countess she made over to him in a life interest. And so he turned to several literary ambitions that had lain idle during his long legal campaign. Each of these Herr Brandes examines exhaustively and in turn. The ponderous work on Heraclitus, entitled "The Philosophy of Heraclitus the Obscure," which he had planned and begun prior to his campaign, first engaged his attention. Then this young Hegelian turned to his great work on the law of inheritance, which he called "The System of Acquired Rights." Previously, in the great forward stirring that moved through Europe in 1848 (one of the results of which was the overthrow of Metternich, that symbol of absolutism), he had declared himself a keen Republican, patriotic withal. Now in this present work he takes his stand academically on the same ground.

All this study and strife was only preparatory to one end. He might have interspersed his legal contests on behalf of Countess Hatzfeldt with imprisonments many, by reason of sedition, yet he cannot be said to have taken his position historically in any sense of the word until his thirty-eighth year. Then he began his career as an agitator, a career that led to the permanent establishment of the Social Democratic party, a party whose power in Germany is such at the present moment that none can say what its future is to be. All this portion of his life and achievement we dealt with when treating of the Racowitza memoirs; and therefore we do not allude to it fully now. It is sufficient to say that he was thirty-eight when turned to the task of active agitation, and he had not achieved his fortieth year when he met the lady through whose weakness he came to his death. The work he accomplished during those two years proves him to be of heroic mould, even though we had not the somewhat grudging testimony of Bismarck himself. And certainly Georges Brandes' biography is a valuable study of an interesting and fascinating personality.

THE WEATHER

Weather Science. By F. W. HENKEL, B.A., F.R.A.S., Member of the British Astronomical Association. (T.
Fisher Unwin. 6s. net.)

WHAT a wonderful collection of phenomena is the English weather! It is supposed to dominate our conversation; we grumble at it whatever be its mood; it is sometimes our unrecognised friend, at other times our relentless and far-sighted enemy; but we could not live without it. Its secrets are known only to the weak; all the professors of logic and mathematics could not discover an empirical formula which would foretell the weather. With all the text-books of "weather science" we should be rash to forecast the weather two days hence; all the meteorological experts, with their hundreds of telegrams conveying barometric observations, could not do more than suggest the probable or average weather over a large area, e.g., London and Channel—they would not even dare to guess the atmospheric conditions which will prevail to-morrow at Hastings. And so for local forecasts we must seek the humble and ignore the learned. The fisherman, whose school has been the atmosphere he breathes, who knows nothing of cyclones and anticyclones, will prognosticate for our immediate needs with remarkable accuracy. His education has been subconscious; he learnt to foretell the weather just as he learnt to eat; indeed his daily bread and the weather have been interdependent. We thus see with all the advances of science and perfection of recording instruments that weather prognostics have progressed but little. But this small advance must not be minimised. The weather expert, if defeated by local vagaries, is able to herald the approach of a gale, and may thus appreciably decrease the dangers of the mariner and the troubles of the agriculturist.

Mr. Henkel's volume will serve as an interesting guide to the amateur weather-prophet. The approximate functions of the temperature, atmospheric pressure, wind velocity, rainfall, etc., and also their measurement, are carefully described, and we grow so interested that we instinctively feel that every dust eddy in the roadway is the ghost of some extinct cyclone. The different types of cloud formation and their respective antecedents and results bring us still nearer to the great unknown. A science built up on such a complicated foundation provides many pitfalls for the unwary, and is often the delight of the superstitious individual. Mr. Henkel therefore warns us against many popular illusions. The barometer is not a "weather-glass," because the coming of rain and the barometric pressure do not depend on each other, though both depend on the direction of the prevailing winds. Thus rain often occurs associated with northerly winds and a rising barometer. As the author points out, it is difficult to estimate the value attached to some of the old weather sayings, such as:—

When cats sneeze, it is a sign of rain.

When dogs eat grass, it will be rainy.

Nevertheless, meteorology is such an embryonic science that it is risky to sneer at any one, and even if these saws are more honoured in their breach than in their rigid observance, Mr. Henkel must not forget that it is preferable to carry an overcoat on a fine day than to be without it on a wet day. On the subject of tornadoes, Mr. Henkel refers to our climate in a sentence which should be repeated from every pulpit in this land of croakers:—

Those who are fond of complaining of the badness of our own weather may at least be reminded that we have much to be thankful for in our exemption from such catastrophes; though besides this purely negative benefit, the existence of many positive advantages alluded to in the course of this work may with more justice cause our own climate (or at least that of the more maritime Western regions) to be regarded as one of the best in the world, though perhaps that of certain stations in the Southern Hemisphere is more salubrious.

And we all think the same in our heart of hearts.

Mr. Henkel's book attempts to appeal both to the student and to the general reader, and thereby runs the gauntlet of both parties. The arrangement is undoubtedly bad if all the endless repetitions which occur are necessary. Buy Ballot's law is quoted on three occasions; in another chapter and on consecutive leaves we are told that "since the total amount of light given by the full moon to the earth is only about one-eight-hundred-thousandth that of sunlight, any action [of the moon on our atmosphere] must be of excessively small amount." The remark "The moon in one sense is always changing, in another always the same" is reiterated with great sincerity; and so on. Then again the attempt to repeat himself sometimes causes the author to trip: on p. 47 we are told that Pascal found the barometer recorded 25in. of mercury at the top of the Puy-de-Dôme as compared with 30in. at the base; but on p. 162 we read that Pascal observed a pressure of 26in. of mercury at the top! Which are we to believe? How frequently the utility of a book is diminished by the absence of diagrams—Mr. Henkel should have included synoptic charts to illustrate the types of circulation of the atmosphere, as in Abercromby's "Forecasting by Weather Charts." He does not even include a copy of the daily weather chart.

Mr. Henkel unfortunately omits mention of the most recent types of recording instruments. We sincerely hope that photographic recorders of the "shadow" type are not still used in first order stations, and that electrical instruments have taken their places. The old-fashioned sunshine-recorders, which did not register faint sun, should have been replaced by platinum grids and automatic temperature-recorders; neither is there any reference to the barograph as used at the South Kensington office.

Weather observation and inference are very satisfactorily treated, but the author falls on dangerous ground when he wanders into pure science. This may be due to a looseness of expression, and, while of small import to the general reader, may be misleading to the student. On p. 32 there is a tendency to confuse "pressure" and "force;" to speak of the "pressure on unit area" is redundant, as pressure is the force on unit area. We are told on p. 67 that "when the air is dry it is denser than if partly composed of moisture," because air is denser than water-vapour. The latter fact is undoubtedly true, but of the preceding inference we feel doubtful. When air takes up moisture there is no displacement of air; air and moisture exist according to Dalton's law of partial pressures, the sum of the separate pressures. In equilibrium, but we cannot value as suggested in wet weather elsewhere winds. thermoundergraduate will really not mind going out every day in the cold and getting wet "if only he can make his boat win." There has only been at this task one really successful modern, and he is the author of "Keddy." "Keddy" is the one perfect book written about undergraduate Oxford, because it is all true and all lifelike, and nothing else but true and lifelike. "Keddy" is (to use the phrase of a famous Oxford man) a perfect "foolometer." You may test an Oxford man by it, and if he does not see how good "Keddy" is, but begins to talk priggishly about the absence of any mention of lectures or the serious side of study, you may dismiss him as Coleridge dismissed the critic who could not tell the ring of Shakespeare's verse—he may have ears, "but so has another animal."

Now the success of "Keddy" was obviously due to the fact that the author observed life at Oxford very closely, and then what he saw with entire candour. And this, too, is also what Mr. A. Hamilton Gibbs has done. Hamilton, in an excellent and pointed way, says that "it has been left to the present generation to write the great Oxford Man—according to the facts as we read his book, has a great sincerity, and a fund of common sense. These are essential qualities about the undergraduate. He knows himself; and that is a quality which a Lincolnshire stable-boy, or a Lincolnshire stable-boy, but he is an undergraduate. The cap fits.

Great many of the things that old men do. He has the genuine quality to resist the temptations—at least so one can draw portraits of him because he never had

His survey is, of the common man and the common aminee, the more too. He is not a student; he has a very probably also of the things about him and he pursued a week-long to be the head of a this better than Mr. Gibbs. He has concentrated himself, for the benefit of his readers, mainly on boating and boxing; and he writes like a past master (or present master, if the phrase be allowed). He even enters into the charmed circle of Blues, and tells us with much biting irony why it is that a boxer is only a "half." Of course in all this, in the more limited part of his book, or in the wider, where he surveys all undergraduate mankind (except when they play football or cricket), there may be things that some critics will not recognise; but that will be their fault. They may desiderate a more serious view, and begin to talk about the idle rich. There is no doubt that Mr. Gibbs' undergraduates are rich and that they assume the air of being idle. But as a matter of fact he knows—none better—that there is very serious work done at Oxford, that no one is handicapped by being poor, and that every one can if he will be studious as well as (like Mr. Gibbs' characters) clean and merry. A charming epitaph said of its subject, in the language of the eighteenth century, that "His Religion did not make him insociable, nor his Mirth irreligious." Now that is exactly true of the Compleat Oxford Man; and there is nothing in Mr. Gibbs' charming book to prevent our seeing it.

A final word may be added, perhaps, on what, after the two special subjects of Mr. Gibbs' enthusiasm, will strike readers as being the best parts of the book, or at any rate the truest. Such are the descriptions of the attitude of undergraduates towards dons' wives and "tea in the parks," the account of an interview with a nervous Vice-President (the successor of one who allowed anybody "chapels" for the asking), and the description of a "Smoker" with the rather irritable young Dons at the end. We do not dare to suspect too much literalism even in these; though we are getting very near it when we have a verse of a College song. On the other hand, we feel sure we have wandered far from fact when we find the consumption of Veuve Clicquot not uncommon, and are told that the University hooligan is "very often destined for the Church." Finally, we are very glad to see a good word, more than once, for College servants. And if we recognise portraits of them or of Dons, we hold our tongue.

THE MASTER GENIUS OF JOURNALISM

Masters of Literature: De Quincey. Edited by SIDNEY LOW.
(G. Bell and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

CHARLES LAMB is reported to have said, with that playful spite which was characteristic of certain of his humours, that he never dared look at the Cumbrian mountains for fear of seeing the apparition of Wordsworth's great hooked nose between their peaks. Some such association is almost inevitable in the case of any writer of marked individuality, and there is one for the name of Thomas De Quincey. This is not, as might at first be imagined, his waistcoat-pocket pennyworth of happiness, but something less recondite and even more characteristic—a litter. That huge bath, full of the manuscript fragments of many years' accumulation, into which, when some publisher or editor pressed for copy, he fished with such sublime impartiality; those locked doors from which he fled in comic terror of the inextricable chaos they restrained—these are the associations which seem most fitting to the man.

De Quincey is an example of the narrow limits in which indubitable genius may find expression. One had almost written that in him we have genius subsisting on the minimum—this in a quantitative rather than in a qualitative sense. Genius is always specific rather than comprehensive; its peculiar abnormality ever counterbalanced by curious deficiencies. But literary genius has never more emphatically declared itself within such limited scope than in the case of De Quincey. The very circumstances of his life betrayed few of the "irregularities of genius" which we have come to look for. He is not to be reckoned among the "great philanderers." He neither hated his country rhetorically nor loved her lyrically; and he rather flattered than despised his public. But his unique distinction lies here: he achieved recognition as a master of English prose through the medium of writings that were almost wholly fragmentary, and with none of the white-heat motive-power that, in the form of an exalted doctrine or a sublime passion, has so often lifted the wings of genius to its loftiest flights. De Quincey should have a special niche in the temple of the devotees of l'Art pour l'Art, for his genius lay entirely in the direction of perception and expression. He dreamed massive works that never saw their second chapter, but he could invest a mere contingency with the lucid magic of his fancy, and a white cloud seen through a window was more to him than a yellow sea of primroses to Peter Bell.

Mr. Sidney Low, whose Introduction to this volume, if brief, is a valuable contribution to the criticism of De Quincey, presents his subject in the suggestive light of the genius as journalist. He shows how circumstance helped to define the author, for De Quincey commenced his literary activity in the halcyon period of magazine literature, when that medium was informed with a seriousness and uniformly high quality which, with all the brilliance of present-day journalism, has perhaps never been quite regained. But it was not altogether that he had in the first instance to "cut his work to magazine scale;" his genius was, as we have shown, of just that peculiar order. There was little that came his way but he could illuminate with the chromatic light of his imagination; much that suggested to him infinite possibilities of treatment; but his power could be sustained only over a short compass, or rather, it so swiftly distributed itself that few of the great possibilities he discerned had opportunity for sustained development:—

He had thought of many things; but it seems that he had thought out none. . . . There are brilliant flashes of truth everywhere, but they are not followed out: they guide us to nothing, or lead us astray into some tangled swamp of discursive prolixity.

De Quincey himself laid something of this to the charge of opium, but while it may have aggravated, Mr. Low is of the opinion that it does not entirely account for the deficiency.

But such considerations as these are not to mitigate our full enjoyment of De Quincey's prose, nor do they subtract in any appreciable measure from the undoubted genius of his work. We have not his projected "History of England in twelve volumes," or his "book on the relations of Christianity to man," but we would not on this account resign his "Confessions," his "Murder as One of the Fine Arts," or his "Vision of Sudden Death." If he was nothing more than a sublime journalist, De Quincey merits the title of Perpetual Laureate of Journalism. Often too discursive and digressive to be brought even into the category of the strict essay, his brilliant fragments seldom fail to sustain the level of a lofty, rich, and rhythmical prose. Indeed, as Mr. Low points out, he has his indisputable place in literary history as the prose-poet of the romantic movement, and his influence as a stylist on his successors has been incalculable. All that goes to make that much-discussed quality, style, is to be found in rich abundance in these selected pages; rhythm and colour, passion and pathos, facility and felicity—et l'homme.

In this particular instance, as he is ready to own, Mr. Leo has had a happy task, for few writers lend themselves so perfectly to the work of selection as De Quincey. And the editor has given such a sublimated as should serve to perpetuate "the English Opium Eater's" fame, and attract not a few new feasters to his delectable fare.

INDIAN SPORT

Stalks in the Himalaya: Jottings of a Sportsman-Naturalist.

By E. P. STEBBING, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S. Illustrated.
(John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. STEBBING is an officer of the Indian Forest Department, which he joined in 1893, and, being a member of an Imperial Service, has been liable to serve, and, as his record shows, has served, in many Provinces of Upper India, from Zhob in the West to Chittagong in the East. He dwells chiefly upon his expeditions after game in Chamba, Sikkim, on the Bhutan frontier, on the Himalaya-Tibet road beyond Simla, the Salt Range country, and the Afghan border. He limits himself strictly to his subject—sport, so that he says nothing of any importance of these parts of India in their other aspects; his descriptions of the mountainous country are of a very general character, except where he refers to the trees, of which he had professional knowledge. This is not his first effort in literature. His earlier work on "Jungle Byways in India" dealt with sport in the plains; this is meant to be a companion volume, compiled from the jottings and notes of a sportsman-naturalist, treating of the shooting of big game and birds in the hills. It contains the usual enthusiastic eulogy of the charms of a camping life in the hills, which all who have tried it have felt; but Mr. Stebbing is too practical an Anglo-Indian to gush at any length over mountain scenery and the glories of Nature. He quickly comes to the big game, the goral, the various sorts of deer, the Kashmir and Shou or Sikkim stags, and then deals, in different parts, with the bears, the cats (tigers, panthers, leopards), the goats, and the sheep, with some observations on the pheasants, monal, kaleej, and cheer, and the chukor. Though he was not always successful, he procured trophies of most of the larger animals he mentions—the several kinds of bear, the serow, the tahr, the markhor, ibex, bharal, and urial.

If it pleases Mr. Stebbing to write such books, transcribed from his notes, there is no earthly reason why he should not do so; but he cannot expect other people to take the same interest or find the same amusement in his personal adventures, his stalks after animals up tremendous acclivities, his descents of precipitous slopes, his escapes and his triumphs. Such books are commonplace and altogether ephemeral. General Kinloch (whom Mr. Stebbing persistently calls Kinlock) wrote a much better book on "Large Game-shooting in Tibet, the Himalayas, &c.;" also Major Bruce's "Twenty Years in the Himalaya," and Mr. Eardley-Wilmot's "Forest Life and Sport in India" have anticipated Mr. Stebbing as to his Himalayan ranges visited and the subjects treated. The whole matter has been somewhat overdone, and no more books on sport in the hills are required unless an author has something special to say. Mr. Stebbing has hardly anything new to add to the knowledge of sport, the ways of animals, or natural history. The observations, based on his personal experience, on the proper manner to treat shikaris (native hunters) may be useful, though other sportsmen hold, he admits, very different opinions. He records a warning against wearing a wrist-watch while stalking without covering it up, as on one occasion it transmitted a helio message to a fine stag, at which he had an absolute pot-shot, and thus lost. He also exposes the absurdity of globe-trotters taking an English valet into the interior of the hills, which once at least resulted, for want of accommodation in the forest bungalow, in the servant having to share his master's room, and probably his bed also. It will be news to many that in some places urial live in flocks, numbering up to thirty.

But if Mr. Stebbing has otherwise nothing new to offer, he makes a fresh departure in English grammar in using the expressions "even for he who," "necessary for he who," "a man to replace he who," where "him" was obviously the correct word. However, Mr. Stebbing should not be discouraged; he should continue taking notes, and when he has earned his pension and retires he may be able to do something better than merely record personal experiences. The illustrations of the heads of animals, which are very well done, are a prominent feature in the book, and the views of mountain scenery, though for the most part mere sketches, recall to the memory many a familiar spectacle.

SHORTER REVIEWS

ART AND MEMORY

Training of the Memory in Art. By LECOQ DE BOISBAUDRAN.

Translated by L. D. LUARD. (Macmillan and Co. 6s. net)

M. LECOQ DE BOISBAUDRAN was a great art teacher, whose life coincided almost exactly with the nineteenth century. His qualifications amounted to genius. He had original notions of his own, and (what was still more to the purpose) he could communicate them to his pupils. Those pupils included some of the most famous names in modern painting and sculpture, through whom in widening circles he has influenced and still influences others as famous. Education, he realised, could not create genius, but it could do a great deal towards developing it, and in his hands it achieved some very remarkable results. His main theory was that expressed in the admirable work before us—that one of the indispensable qualifications for a true artist is the cultivation of the memory gift to its highest possible power. Memory means so much. It means swift accuracy, it means a tenacious grasp of the essential features of a subject, which is gained by memorising salient details to the suppression of the irrelevant and the superfluous. Mr. Boisbaudran trained his pupils to feats of memory which are nothing less than astounding, and some of the examples given in this volume of memory-drawings from well-known subjects would be almost incredible were it not that they exist to shame the doubter. Before a man could produce such results at all he needed a very high degree of technical skill of the ordinary sort. But armed with the acquirement demanded by M. Boisbaudran, he could memorise his subjects, and especially the pictorial moments of Nature as she lives and moves—the swift and evanescent attitudes of the human figure and passing phases of expression, in the fresh air and open country, and lighted by the sky—as no ordinary technical training could possibly bring him to do.

Furthermore, M. Boisbaudran would have nothing to do with prizes and competitions. His students were made to understand that their business was to study Nature simply and without prejudice, with the sole purpose of recording the impressions received directly from her. Their eye was to be single, so that their bodies should become full of light. No work of art can be produced with double and incompatible aims: the man who desires to win a prize will think of his judges more than his work; and more recently, as Mr. Louis Parker has shown in practice, the art of pageantry will only reach the point of being an art when there is no confusing question of the disposal of any possible pecuniary profits. Thus if there were among the pupils any youth of genius—that is to say, with an individual message to deliver—he would have freedom to develop and to deliver that message instead of being fettered by the conventions demanded by the judges in prize competitions. All this, of course, has been said before, and by nobody more strongly than Ruskin; but M. Boisbandran was the first that we know of to give these principles full play and opportunity. So his book, which records those principles and aims and methods, is stimulating and instructive in the highest degree, and we can only express our gratitude to the translator, who has made available for us in the English tongue the precious lifeblood of this great master spirit.

Our Fighting Sea Men. By LIONEL YEXLEY. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

THE average Englishman, whose ways do not lie near the sea and its ships, or at any rate near its fighting-ships, has very vague ideas as to the life on board the battle-craft on which his safety so intimately depends. Thousands of good people who visit their favourite watering-places year after year have never seen a cruiser, or have only seen one as a blur of grey and a wisp of smoke in the distance; they do not know a torpedo-boat from a punt, and take but the slightest interest in affairs which excite the enthusiasm of Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth; and this, not because they are particularly stay-at-home folk, or unpatriotic, or lacking in intelligence, but simply because their lives are passed out of touch with naval matters. They know, if they read the papers, that the crew of a battleship numbers anything from five hundred to eight or nine hundred men; but of the rules and regulations, the arrangements and complications, necessary to control and employ to the best effect such an assembly they know as much as they do of the breech-mechanism of a 13.5 gun.

To such folk this book of Mr. Yexley will be—or ought to be—of enthralling interest, for he is an expert on all naval subjects, as those of us brought up in dockyard towns are well aware. Of the modern fighting-ship and its personnel he treats with exceptional first-hand knowledge; he is frank and fearless in his comments, and so clear that the least technical reader can fully comprehend him. For instance, he does not defend such a “regrettable incident” as the throwing overboard of a ship’s gun-sights, but he speaks pertinently with regard to the necessity for something more than the customary inquiry conducted by naval men only. Such breaches of discipline, he maintains, “should be dealt with by an outside and entirely disinterested authority, with power to go into the matter with the object of tracing the cause and effecting its removal.”

The chapter entitled “In Lighter Vein” contains many amusing stories, some of which we should like to quote had we space to spare. In the first half of the book Mr. Yexley tells much of the history of our battle-fleet; he covers an immense amount of ground—in the chapter “Ship Mutinies,” for example, we have the tale of the Bounty and Pitcairn Island. The main portion of the volume, however, is concerned with service conditions at the present day, and makes fascinating reading; the whole book, in fact, is one which should be studied by any one who is interested in the men of the English Navy. And, in a country protected by these floating fortresses, who dare say he can disregard them?

The Romance of Aeronautics: An Account of the Growth and Achievements of all Kinds of Aerial Craft. By CHARLES C. TURNER. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service, and Co. 5s.)

THE idea of being able to rise in the atmosphere and travel through unlimited space—

To reign in the air, from the earth to highest sky—has so possessed mankind at all times that it can be traced back to the earliest traditions of the human race. Aerial navigation, in one form or another, figures largely in the ancient pagan mythologies. A belief in horsemen of the air is to be met with in early Hebrew folklore, whilst in the Scriptures we read of those winged celestial beings the seraphim and cherubim. The first flying creatures of this terraqueous globe were probably the Ornithosaurians, those Dragons of the Air of the Mesozoic or secondary period of time, and therefore it is by no means strange that ancient races should have bequeathed to us the effigies carved in stone of various huge winged monsters like those to be found in the ruins of the buried cities of bygone ages. Such symbolic figures were familiar to the Assyrians, and no doubt to still earlier peoples. Mr. Turner only cursorily glances at the fanciful legendary period of aerial navigation. Like Mr. Gradgrind, he is anxious to get to the domain of facts, hence the romantic part of his story is considerably curtailed. He mentions, however, the adventure of Simon Magus, the Magician and founder of Gnosticism, who, on attempting to ascend to the heavens, plunged—

With hideous ruin and combustion down
To bottomless perdition.

The volume, which contains many interesting illustrations, deals chiefly with the more modern and authentic side of aeronautics, and shows what great advances have been made in the art of so-called flying during recent years. After all, Bishop Wilkins may not have been so very far out when he declared more than two centuries and a half ago that the time would come when men would call for their wings as they did in his day for their boots and spurs.

Peeps at the Heavens. By the REV. JAMES BAIKIE, F.R.A.S. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d. net.)

THESE astronomical peeps provide a fund of information concerning the world of our system and the starry spaces beyond. The author has adopted a simple style of writing, avoiding technical terms almost entirely, and his account of the heavenly bodies will be easily understood by any fairly intelligent child or more elderly tyro. Long ago it used to be universally thought that comets were sent to foretell all sorts of dreadful things, and even in these days of enlightenment some benighted people may be found who still believe that—

A Blazing Star

Threatens the World with Famine, Plague, and War;
To Princes, death; to Kingdoms, many crosses;
To all Estates, inevitable losses;
To Herdmen, rot; to Ploughmen, hapless Seasons;
To Sailors, storms; to Cities, civil treasons.

Halley’s Comet, which reappears every seventy-six years, put in an appearance in the eventful year 1066, when William of Normandy was getting ready to invade England, a “strange coincidence” which, with others, may account for the superstition. Another comet—Donati’s, with its magnificent plummy tail—travels for more than two thousand years before reappearing. The illustrations to this interesting volume are excellent, especially those in colour by Constance N. Baikie.

Australia. By FRANK FOX. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d. net.)

MESSRS. BLACK are adding several new volumes to their admirable series "Peeps at Many Lands and Cities." One of the latest gives a concise but entertaining and instructive account of the great Australian continent and the adjacent islands. Ostensibly written for young people, these small books will, no doubt, also prove interesting reading to many persons of maturer years, and the volume under notice is sure to be appreciated by every one who opens it. The first chapter relates the beginnings of the "Sleeping Beauty" land and the coming of the English, the second deals with the Australia of to-day; while other chapters describe the natives, the animals and birds, and the "Bush," or forest, of the sunny Southern continent. The last chapter of all is devoted to the Australian child, the hope and the pride of this youngest of civilised nations. A word of praise must be bestowed on the coloured illustrations, and the one depicting the garden-streets of Adelaide shows how even a busy and populous city may at the same time be "a thing of beauty" and "a joy for ever." It would be an improvement if the titles to the plates were printed in a rather bolder type.

Britain on and Beyond the Sea. By CECIL H. CROFTS. (W. and A. K. Johnston. 1s. 6d.)

THE present volume on "Britain on and Beyond the Sea" is issued as a Handbook to the Navy League Map of the World, and is "dedicated to the British Schoolboy." It is divided into two parts: Chapter I. deals with the naval history of Britain from 1588-1911, and is broken up into periods which treat of the various engagements as they took place. Chapter II. gives a short and concise account of British dominions beyond the sea. Both the map and the handbook are clearly and well arranged, and should prove of great assistance and interest to the schoolboy who wishes to learn as much as possible about the Empire to which he belongs.

NEW EDITIONS

Seven Splendid Sinners. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

Twelve Bad Men. Edited by THOMAS SECCOMBE. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

Twelve Bad Women. Edited by ARTHUR VINCENT. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

If good people like to read about wicked people—and we must suppose that they do, otherwise the inference is staggering to humanity—here they may find their pleasure, as it were, by the bucketful. "Bad Men"—"Bad Women"—"Splendid Sinners;" was there ever a "splendid" sinner? Is there not rather something inherently, inevitably squalid and pitiful about these sycophantic amusers of kings and toys of the courtly throng, courtesans, clinging avariciously to favour lest the worst of the outer darkness be their portion? There was much fine gold in some of their natures, doubtless; but the gilt and tinsel spoil it. Such as they were, however, we suppose there will always be plenty of readers eager to know their story, unpleasant though it often may be; the colours are vivid enough to make a popular appeal, and inasmuch as the events dealt with are matters of history, forming, in some cases, important elucidative elements in the movements of famous characters, they cannot very well be neglected by the student.

In the three books here noticed some of the most notorious sinners are shepherded into favour, and (alas! for feminine frailty or feminine craft) the seven "splendid" ones are all ladies—the Duchesse de Châteauroux, Catherine II. of Russia, the Duchesse de Polignac, Lola Montez—so the list goes on. Mr. Trowbridge writes well and tactfully, although we question the advisability of tacking a stanza of Swinburne's "Dolores" to each chapter—one stanza per sinner; it is a little too pointed for our taste.

Mr. Seccombe's collection of twelve "Original Studies of Eminent Scoundrels by Various Hands" is a capital idea, and it must be bracketed with Mr. Vincent's twelve "Illustrations and Reviews of Feminine Turpitude set forth by Impartial Hands." Many capable writers contribute articles on many capable sinners, and the general result is very readable; Mr. Alfred Kalisch's sketch of the life and times of Barbara Villiers, Duchess of Cleveland, is excellent; and Mr. W. A. J. Archbold's study of the notorious Judge Jeffreys is most comprehensive. All three of the volumes are attractively presented, and their contents, being written and supervised by men who have a literary reputation, rise considerably above the level of the too frequent, ordinary book of this class which only lives by its its scarcely veiled suggestiveness.

FICTION

CLAYHANGER—PART II.

Hilda Lessways. By ARNOLD BENNETT. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

"HILDA LESSWAYS" is not, as many people will suppose, a sequel to "Clayhanger;" the two books are rather complementary, running as it were on parallel lines. In "Clayhanger" we had the evolution of a youth from the crude, inexperienced, provincial boy, to the lover and the master man; in the later work we are given the history of the woman with whom he fell in love, from raw girlhood to unhappy and experienced womanhood.

The process by which we arrive at a realisation of Hilda Lessways' rather complex character is familiar to readers of Mr. Bennett's books. He is no vivid, free-handed impressionist, dashing in his brushfuls of colour here and there, standing off and attitudinising to observe the startling effect; he is the steady worker in monochrome, filling in almost every detail, analysing the thoughts of his models, until we wonder whether in a few years he will not become, in a restricted field, a second Mr. Henry James. It is masterly, but, in the case of Hilda, not so convincing as it was in the depiction of Edwin Clayhanger; nor does George Cannon, the enterprising sinner who rouses reluctant passion in the girl who is fascinated by his smooth capability in worldly affairs, act consistently at the crucial moment when Hilda, married to him, discovers that he has a first wife still living. Such a man—expert, callous, and clever at subterfuge—would surely have made a better fight when the frightened Hilda tells him what she has overheard; so it seems to the reader, for he holds her heart at times of emotion completely in his power, and she would have believed in him through everything. Several times we are led to conclude that the author's psychology is slightly at fault.

These things, however, do very little harm to the book from the standpoint of interest. "Clayhanger" held us from start to finish; so does "Hilda." It is abundantly clear that the scheme of the two novels—and doubtless that of the third which is promised—was thoroughly conceived and planned from the beginning. They fit like the pieces of a puzzle, although, perhaps, this is not a perfect comparison since at points they inevitably overlap—Edwin and Hilda's conversation at the critical moment of their intercourse, for instance, is one point. This does not matter; indeed, it was necessary in order to make the second novel complete in itself. Mr. Bennett's picture of the Orgreave family is one of the finest things he has done; every individual of that prosperous group, from humourless Mrs. Orgreave and her kindly, waggish, clever husband, to vivacious little Alicia, at the "flapper" stage of existence, is intensely alive and true. The life at the Brighton boarding-house, which forms the scene of a great part of this story, is so accurately and ingeniously portrayed that it makes the reader shiver. "Cannon's Boarding-house," despite its new and splendid brass plate, was not an exhilarating spot when Hilda took up her quarters there as Cannon's assistant:—

The street and the house were disappointing. After the grandeur of the promenade the street appeared shabby and third-rate; it had the characteristics of a side street; it was the retreat of those who could not afford anything better, and its base inhabitants walked out on to the promenade and swaggeringly feigned to be the equals of their superiors. The house also was shabby and third-rate—with its poor little glimpse of the sea. . . . It looked like a boarding-house, and not all the style of George Cannon's suit and cane and manner, as he mounted the steps, could redeem it from the disgrace of being a very ordinary boarding-house. . . . The party passed into a long, narrow hall, whose walls were papered to imitate impossible blocks of mustard-coloured marble. The party was now at home. . . .

With many touches resembling the "blocks of mustard-coloured marble" the depressing atmosphere is skilfully conveyed; the stale smell of past meals, the drone of the inane conversations, the cheerless bedrooms, the "kennels of the unclean servants"—Hilda realises it all, and "the organism of the boarding-house seemed absolutely tragic to her, compact of the stuff of sorrow itself."

Without doubt the book is depressing; but he who begins it must finish it, and leave off with the acute anticipation of the concluding volume of the trilogy strongly upon him. Let us hope that it will prove Mr. Arnold Bennett's masterpiece. To do that, however, it must be leavened with a little more of his lighter touch—the happier side of life which, as we know the "Five Towns" people, is not altogether swamped by the grimness and tragedy of too introspective heroes and heroines.

The General Plan. By EDMUND CANDLER. (William Blackwood and Sons. 6s.)

MR. EDMUND CANDLER is widely known as the author of "The Mantle of the East" and "The Unveiling of Lhasa," the latter of which in particular will be found on the shelves of most readers of books of travel. But we think we are right in saying that in this book he makes his first appearance as a writer of fiction. His stories are all concerned with the remarkable, and all save one with India or its neighbouring countries, Burma and Tibet. This topography and choice of subject naturally suggest Kipling, and it is with him that Mr. Candler has most in common. He has the same zest for the occult, the same sympathy for the ordinary man in the lonely and difficult posts which he is called upon to fill in the East, the same love of colour and the same trick of backing away from the emotional. He is, perhaps, more restrained in style than Kipling, but at present far less perfect in construction. Of the nine stories in the book, four, "Gunga Water," "Mecca," "Walden," and "The Waters of Thunder," stand out as more remarkable than the rest. The first deals with the pilgrimage of Tilak Singh, a Sikh who had inherited a sinecure post in the palace of a decayed native kingdom, to Ramésvaram and how he found a soda-water bottle on the banks of the sacred river and believed it to be miraculously sent to him as a receptacle for holy water. We follow with all the vague distinctness and aroma of a dream his journey down India as far as that place, a week from the shrine of his pilgrimage, where a fanatic Brahmin destroyed his vision by telling him the real nature of his sacred bottle. "The Waters of Thunder," which in atmosphere recalls "The Man Who Would be King," and also the journey over the mountains in "Erewhon," is an account of an exploration into the middle of Bolivia to seek a waterfall, the din of which was so terrific that all living things in its neighbourhood were congenitally deaf; it also provides a problem in casuistry of great interest.

All these stories are of the nature of masterpieces. The touch is always sure, the details are handled with the utmost skill, and every page glows with rare colour and a fine sense of mystery. Of the others, "Probationary" tells of a young police-officer who in an unconstitutional manner revealed the murderers of a native king's favourite; while "The Testimony of Baghwan Singh" is concerned with the ghost of a bereaved lover and how it sought and found an explanation of its loss. "A Break in the Rains" recalls "The Mark of the Beast" in describing the eerie vengeance which followed the desecration of a native idol. What Mr. Candler knows of India must be very great; he never seems at fault for the most intimate detail, and he has no difficulty in convincing us that India remains a gold mine for the tale-teller of real gifts. By this volume he puts himself, in our opinion, far ahead of all writers of Indian stories but Kipling, and we see no reason why he should not in the near future give us another inspired revelation of the jungle such as "The Jungle Books," or another such close and haunting transcript of native life as "Kim."

The Unofficial Honeymoon. By DOLF WYLLARDE. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

WHEN an authoress says of her book, "It has no parallel in real life, and is, I believe, utterly impossible in all its details," the critic, especially the captiously inclined one, is disarmed, and, under the circumstances, to cavil would be more than ever objectionable and out of place. We will not therefore find fault with the strange title Miss Dolf Wyllarde has chosen to give this delightful story of the simple life under a tropical sky. We must, nevertheless, warn the reader that "The Unofficial Honeymoon" has nothing in common with "the first month after marriage," which is the dictionary definition of that generally supposed blissful period. Indeed, it precedes by some months the consummation of the "excellent mystery," and is nothing more shocking than an al fresco courtship under more or less primeval conditions with no censorious Mrs. Grundy, or inquisitive policeman round the corner to play Peeping Tom. The problem the authoress has set herself to solve—for this is unquestionably a problem-novel—is, put briefly, how would a man and woman act for whom there was no such thing as public opinion? So by means of a tidal wave, or something of the sort, she casts her selected couple ashore on an uninhabited island in Polynesia, where she leaves them to their own resources for six months. There is danger of “a return to the merely animal,” but the situation is saved by the timely arrival of a mission-boat driven out of her course, and “the imperative necessity of the one woman to the one man” is satisfied according to the usages of polite modern society and the canons of the Church.

The Red Lantern. By EDITH WHERRY. (John Lane. 6s.)

MISS (or should it be Mrs?) WHERRY'S book labours under the initial disadvantages of a flaming representation of a red Chinese lantern on the cover, a title printed in large letters of a very sanguinary hue, and a very familiar quotation on the title-page concerning the incompatibility of East and West. But it is not the mere riot of sensation which these things suggest. The story tells, often intelligently and always carefully, of the Boxer rising of 1900, as it affected an American Mission in Peking and two Eurasians, who were at one time among its inmates. In the proem, perhaps the best part of the book, we meet Mahleex, the daughter of a Chinese woman and a “foreign mandarin,” in a coffin-maker's shop, where she attends on her old grandmother amid all the weirdness and fantasy proper to a Chinese background. To placate the old lady on her deathbed Mahleex tries to cut off her own indecently large feet, and is found unconscious and carried by a deaf-mute to the Mission. Her after-life contains plenty of vicissitude, a large part in it being played by Sam Wang, another Eurasian, who is also a Boxer, a qualified medical man, and a complete ruffian. The authoress overdoes her descriptions at times, and they are apt to smack of the guide-book. No doubt she is right in assuming great ignorance of Chinese life in her readers, but the excess of local colour has its natural effect in making the story itself seem rather immaterial.

A Painter of Souls. By DAVID LISLE. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

MR. DAVID LISLE is to be heartily congratulated upon his novel “A Painter of Souls.” It is a piece of work of which he may be justly proud. Miles Dering, the character round which the plot of the book revolves, is a young Irish painter, full of genius, and a pupil and ardent disciple of the famous Carrière. Besides being a rising artist he has absorbed ethics from an uncle, who had been a friend of Emerson and a member of the Brook Farm Community. He has a studio in Rome, where the mise-en-scène of the book is laid, and the author paints for his readers an interesting, vivid, and life-like pen-portrait of society life during a winter season in the Eternal City.

A famous artist, who scorns and makes fun of Carrière's methods, nicknames Dering “The Painter of Souls,” but Dering proves his genius to be stronger than ridicule, for his character stands well out and is finely drawn throughout the book. His love-story is both human and real. There is a point on which no doubt many readers will agree—namely, that the girl, Violet Hilliard, who wins the heart of Miles Dering, is not worthy of him or of his greatness. The subtle character of the Princess Borizoff is a piece of unique characterisation. The book is one which will undoubtedly meet with well-deserved approbation.

THE THEATRE

“THE GREAT NAME”

THEATRE managers in London resemble more and more those plucky and persistent Frenchmen who go down to the Seine day after day, year after year, armed with baits and rods, and a small box to sit upon, and fish. The former are just as likely to bring the public into their theatres as the latter can ever hope to hook a fish. In the case of the latter there are no fish to hook; but the former have no such excuse to put forward as to an audience. It is merely a question of bait. Again and again these dogged gentlemen, who do not, as some may think, run theatres for fun, have been told by observant people as well as by the audience to whom they make so many piteous appeals, what is the bait that attracts. They know better. They have devoted their lives to the business of theatres in one capacity or another, and they are in no need for friendly advice. They surely are experts, and whether the plays they put up in such painfully quick succession fail instantly, or drag their half-deserted length along for three months, they hold that they are the plays which ought to have attracted because they produced them.

How really sad it is! Also, how amazing. They are, unbelievably enough, incapable of learning a lesson from the abortive attempts of their brothers. Because A and B fail with such and such type of play, it does not follow that I too shall fail. The productions of A and B had not the inestimable advantage of my personality in the leading part, they say to their obsequious hirelings, who agree. Just as if that mattered. There is no actor or actress on the London stage who has the power to draw a single human being into the theatre if the play is uninteresting. As in horse-racing, where men back their fancies and lose ninety-nine times out of a hundred, so it is in play-producing, where the manager puts up a play that he likes without taking the trouble to ask himself if the people for whose entertainment it is produced will like it also.

Mr. Charles Hawtrey is just as inexperienced and persistent as the French fishermen and the rest of the managers. He has seen that audiences have refused to support adaptations from the French, so he characteristically pins his faith to an adaptation from the German made by himself. In the case of “The Great Name,” with which he recently reopened the Prince of Wales's Theatre, having been very successful with an adaptation from the French, by accident, it would not have mattered very much who made the version used. Mr. Hawtrey would have seen to it that the adaptor transplanted the scenes and characters from their native and only element to that of England, where they are impossible. “The Great Name,” by Victor Leon and Leo Feld, was a great success in Germany. It deserved to be. It told a simple human story excellently, and presented a set of everyday German people with admirable faithfulness, and the author's dialogue was full of humour and pathos. It was natural that such a play should have made an instant and irresistible appeal.

Mr. Hawtrey bought the English rights, believing—and rightly believing—that English audiences are no different from those of Germany in that they, too, have hearts that are easily touched, and a great appreciation of a charming story. He then set to work to remove from the play those very points of excellence which carried it to success. He twisted its characters out of all recognition by making them belong to a different nationality. He removed the scene from Germany to England, and he ruthlessly contorted the main motive so that he, as leading actor, should be regarded as an amusing, irresponsible creature. Victor Leon and Leo Feld have therefore precisely the same cause of grievance against English managers as nearly all French authors have against them. The play as they wrote it has not been seen. What has been seen is merely a weak distortion—something to which they would be ashamed to sign their names.

In German we found an accurate atmosphere of a middle-class home. The reek of garlick was everywhere. We found men and women who had walked straight out of the street on to the stage. We had met the successful composer of well-orchestrated tunes, the man who had made a fortune by supplying light, catchy numbers to musical plays, whose sentimental valse were played in every restaurant and beerhouse by every amateur pianist, either with both hands or one. His clothes were right, his hair characteristic; it was right that he should wear rings and glasses and have run to fat in early middle-age. It was right also that his publisher should almost live in his over-grand house and refer to the homely old mother, who counted every farthing, in the matter of contracts. Above all, it was most right that there should be a fly in the ointment of this too successful man—two flies; that one should be that of heavy sentiment in the shape of unrequited love, and the other a secret and bitter jealousy of those less successful musicians who wrote music that would live, and not mere graceful jingles which hung not much longer on the air than rings of cigarette-smoke. The play was written by Germans for Germans about Germans—in which case there must be simple sentiment as well as picturesque sausages.

It almost goes without saying that the woman who had won and retained the successful man's love should be married to an old friend and fellow-student whose music was too high-class to be popular. It goes without saying also that the wealthy valse-monger should have discharged this embryo Grieg or Schumann from his orchestra, having failed to recognise in the grim, cynical face of the embittered musician the round, optimistic countenance of the boy by whose side he worked; that, discovering the true state of things, he should rush off to his old sweetheart and offer, even thrust, his enthusiastic help upon her and her husband; and that at last, as all his suggestions had been proudly refused, he should urge the great musician to win a hearing for his magnum opus by putting it before the public under another name—the name of his successful friend. The truth must, of course, be told when there is a lull in the tumultuous applause long enough to permit of the announcement.

All this was interesting, amusing, pathetic, and right. The last Act, however, led up to a splendid and very moving situation—a fine paradox. The Act was placed in the artistes' room of the concert-hall during the first performance of the great symphony of the unknown musician. The two men, both nervous and on tenterhooks, came face to face and spoke to each other as men only speak in moments of great excitement and suspense. The musician, while thanking his generous friend for all that he had done, told him of the jealousy which had been eating into his soul. To be renowned, to have money, to enjoy triumphs—ah, how he envied all these! And then the valse-king turned upon the pale, half-starved creature and confessed that such jealousy was as nothing when compared to that which he felt for the man who had composed the symphony which was at that very moment holding the audience spellbound. Jealousy! . . . He would gladly put all his valse, money, renown, ease and comfort in a heap and watch them blaze if only he had it in him to write such music. His name would die with him. His friend's name would be cut deep into the heart of his country.

And then the final curtain—the success of the unsuccessful man, the self-disgust and misery of the man who had succeeded. All very good and sincere and excellent. What does Mr. Hawtrey do with it? He makes himself "John Harcourt," a well-groomed, conventional person, who certainly had a club in St. James's Street, and went to Eton and Oxford. He put him in an extremely civilised house in St. John's Wood. He talked about "musical comedies" at the Gaiety, not of the comic operas for which the German composed his tunes. There is a world of difference. He dragged in a Lady Roderick. His mother might easily have passed muster for a Duchess. He twisted the whole thing out of the lower middle-class German atmosphere into the public-school atmosphere of England. The perpetual Jew music-publisher was therefore comic in two senses. The pale-faced Robert Brand, the other composer, was too real, too tragic, for so untruthful a frame. The love-story was trimmed almost all away, hedged, and made foolish and insincere. It became English mutton which had never hung in the same larder as a piece of garlic, and at the same time it was not mutton at all. It was a vegetarian substitute.

The acting success in this unsatisfactory, unsatisfying production was indubitably made by Mr. Arthur Playfair as the music-publisher. Utterly unlike a music-publisher, he gained all the laughter of the evening by a genuinely comic piece of work. Mr. James Hearn did more than any other English actor could have done with his material, and brought into the play a note of actuality which was inimical to it. Miss Lydia Bilbrook looked very beautiful and picturesque, and played her extraneous part most charmingly. It goes without saying that Miss Mary Rorke was good to the eye and ear. So also was Miss Dorothy Thomas as the unsuccessful musician's brave wife. The boy and girl were badly cast. Miss Enid Leslie, late of the Gaiety Theatre, bore its marks upon her. Every moment we expected to see her catch the conductor's eye and break into a song of six notes. Mr. Charles Hawtrey was, with all his limitations, very natural and at times very sympathetic. He played for laughs where no laughter was needed, and was either afraid to let himself go in the big scene in the last act or incapable of doing so. Perhaps he felt that his personality and his version were wrong. If so he was perfectly right. Mr. Hawtrey must stick to his last. It is a pity, but he cannot assume the character of any man who is not the very spit of himself. He is always then very well worth seeing.

PICKWICK RIDDLES—II.

BY PERCY FITZGERALD

AMONG other prodigies in Pickwick is Wardle's great barouche, which ought to have had four stout horses to draw it. This vehicle held—how many persons will it be supposed? Let us count. There was old Wardle himself, his two daughters, his sister, his future son-in-law, and Tupman (six in all), with yet another, the fat boy, outside. That makes seven, and, as two of the party were very corpulent men, there was surely no room for any more. But presently they were joined by Messrs. Pickwick, Winkle, and Snodgrass, and, incredible as it may seem, accommodation was found for all. How, it does not appear. The party now consisted of eight inside and two outside, making in all ten. The corpulent Mr. Pickwick was added to the other two corpulent gentlemen. Then begins the eating of lunch, with plates and bottles, which required additional room for elbows, &c.

Dr. Slammer, who challenged Winkle at the Rochester Ball, said he had identified him by the gilt buttons on his coat, which showed a bust (Mr. Pickwick) and the two letters "P.C." This was inconceivable, unless the Doctor had seized on one of the buttons and brought it close to the light to decipher.

One of the most curious problems in the work is the mysterious system of punctuation adopted by the author. System it may be called, as it is quite uniform and directed by a sort of general rule. Further, it does not seem to have been followed in his other writings. The chief feature was an old fashion of using commas in odd places where one would have expected the words to follow on without separation. He also used the colon and semi-colon profusely where one would have expected commas. To illustrate this treatment, I will supply a few instances:—

... the same, who with a brass label &c. looked at the thinness of his body, and the length of his legs, gave him and to whom he proceeded, when his friends had exhausted themselves, to return, in chosen terms, his thanks &c.

In this strain, with an occasional glass of ale, by way of parenthesis, when the coach changed horses, did the stranger proceed, until they reached Rochester Bridge, by which time the note-books, both of Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Snodgrass, &c.

And again—

"You rendered us a very important service, this morning, five o'clock, came the stranger.

... to the depth of misery—

...ionally, were to ordinary

into his clothes." But it seems our author was mistaken here. Mr. Pickwick must have unpacked his portmanteau and put his clothes into a carpet bag, which he carried to the Golden Cross: vide the picture. It is well to be accurate even in such trifles.

The old lady at Manor Farm, who was too feeble to move from the fireplace, and who had to be assisted to the arbour leaning on a stick with one hand, the other resting on the fat boy's shoulders, suddenly and miraculously regained all her youthful strength at the Christmas festivities, galloping up and down in the country dance. Wonderful!

We have all laughed heartily at the "tall quadruped" and Mr. Pickwick's driving of the chaise from Rochester. But there are some odd, unaccountable things. Why was Winkle made to dismount from his "tall horse" to pick up Mr. Pickwick's whip when the two Pickwickians in the carriage could have done so? or why not Mr. P. himself? Why did Mr. Pickwick himself get down to hold the tall horse when he did not get down to pick up his own whip? In the "sagacious dog" picture the artist forgot to furnish his gun with a cock.

One of "Boz's" pleasant illusions for himself and the reader is that there was an old affectionate friendship between Wardle and Pickwick. What a glowing, touching speech the latter made at the wedding! Two dear old "pals" and contemporaries who may have been boys together. Yet their whole knowledge of each other was comprised within a span of a few days!

is stated that there were "no children" in Mrs.

lodgings, but was there not the noisy and obstre-ny? How did Jingle prophetically know of 's famous play "Black-eyed Susan" two production? At the drunken scene at ster aunt whispered to Tupman about was that Tupman was not in the Pickwick up to bed. Bantam, it pliant cane" made of ebony— curiosity? But this is not all novel in which there are two g? Here we have chapter

No. 2. When the mistake

ed to No. 2, but only en in the text. The one title-page printed for red, and the second ere are 609 pages

osthumous Papers single page has re "Pickwick

er confusion.

number or they were the third that none

the artist half-dozen could be ery name

"The

ing a

Pick-

The

not loss

dress

ssued

up in

TATTERSHALL CASTLE

THE report that this English castle has been purchased, with the object of conveying it bodily to America, opens up many vistas. First of all it affords a vantage ground from whence the trend of modern land legislation may be appreciated. To possess land and houses in Great Britain is rapidly becoming as penal as to own the shares of a brewery company. Not content with the injury of rendering such property unsaleable, save at slaughter prices, the trusted leaders of the Radical party seem to be intent on holding the owners of real estate up to public obloquy. Mr. Lloyd George never fails, when addressing an indiscriminating audience, to represent the landowner as worse than a drone in the social hive. Castles and parks must of course often come into the market, but, if England were really prospering, home buyers doubtless would be found for them. When travellers return from scenes of Oriental despotism they tell us of areas of fertile territory lapsing into prairie. The State is ever busy in such lands in the congenial occupation of killing the goose of security which lays the golden eggs of national prosperity. While judging others we are ourselves guilty of precisely the same folly. The coming Conservative Administration will fail in its duty if it does not at the earliest moment set to work to repeal the recent legislation which has well-nigh killed the traffic in British land. State plunder of the wealthy landowner is a futile and myopic policy. Revenue so raised goes the primrose way to the everlasting bonfire of State expenditure. If the wealth of all our millionaire landowners were confiscated to-day, in a couple of years' time the problem of ways and means and taxation would have to be faced afresh under worse conditions. We should but have hamstrung our best "pullers."

From another point of view the recent incident enables us to realise the haphazard fashion in which our national archaeological possessions are guarded. We say "national," for the individual owner would surely be the first to admit that he is but the temporary custodian of any unique treasure of the past which is to be traced on his corner of the map of England. In this respect we owe the same duty to posterity to guard our historic inheritance inviolate as we do to protect our shores from invasion.

Some of the most truly Wordsworthian lines are those suggested to him by Beaumont's picture of Peele Castle in a storm. In those verses the poet expresses with magic fidelity the atmosphere of imagination with which we are wont to surround a favourite relic of antiquity. About it—

The air
Nimbly and sweetly recommends itself
Unto our gentle senses.

There, "cased in the unfeeling armour of old time," it is associated in our minds with days of loitering pleasure, when, in the treasured companionship of congenial friends, we have wandered about it in the grey of summer dawning and the twilights of the Spring. The birds that wheel about its mossgrown turrets sound a language familiar to our ears. A friend of the present writer, who knew his Sussex by heart, was accosted by the stationmaster at Chichester on the afternoon of February 21st, 1861. "Do you miss anything, Sir?" he was asked. The familiar landscape was bereft of something. What was it? For a moment our friend hesitated. "Why, what has become of the Cathedral spire?" he demanded. It had telescoped that afternoon, and thus fulfilled the words of the old proverb:—

If Chichester Church steeple fall,
In England there's no King at all.

Surely that instinct which binds us by ties of sentiment to the land of our birth is not lightly to be tossed away. We weave into the fibre of our being an appreciation of those features in which England differs from every other land. A man may lie parched with malarial fever in an African swamp or have to face the music in a Canadian log-hut, with the mercury in his heart down to minus 50. He dozes and there flits back to him the light that never was on sea or land. He is once more in English meadows; larks scatter their liquid music over his head; incense-breathing morn hovers about him like a benediction.

A picture had it been of lasting ease,
Elysian quiet, without toil or strife;
No motion but the moving tide; a breeze;
Or merely silent Nature's breathing life.

Thus Wordsworth muses over the picture of Peele Castle in a storm, that same castle which he had watched from day to day in unruffled calm. When he wrote his noble verses the poet had just heard of the death of his brother at sea. The landscape lashed in the fury of the trampling waves at that agonised moment more truly accorded with the deep distress that humanised his soul. The halcyon calm with which in his memory the Castle was haloed no longer appealed to the deepest stirrings within him.

From this wonderful picture we come back to the sordid story of the impending exportation of Tattershall Castle. Year by year we hear of the treasures of Literature and Art being "lifted" to the United States. It is inevitable, and it is not unreasonable that such treasures should sometimes leave England. The Anglo-Saxon race forms the backbone of the race inhabiting the United States. They are our flesh and blood. Their history up to the period of separation was our history. The day may come when the two peoples will be for practical issues one again. It is therefore but reasonable that a fair share of the common heritage of which we are equally proud should cross the sea. But to root up from their native soil historic buildings is another story. The rape of Tattershall Castle will rob us of that which not enriches him that filches it. Perked up in some Yankee domain it would merely move the beholder to contemptuous laughter. It is true we have our Cleopatra's Needle, but the poor thing has wasted away more in our acid-laden atmosphere in thirty years than it would have done in thirty centuries among its native sands. Temple Bar at Theobald's Park is like a once-active worker stranded in an almshouse. We once heard a conversation of two Scots about the temple on Calton Hill. "'Tis a na-ational monimint," said one. "I ca' it a na-ational disgra-ace," said the other. Incongruity, pretension, sham are fatal to the best-laid plans of millionaires.

We hold that the contemplated vandalism should be illegal. We ought to have a permanent Commission whose function it should be to schedule our national resources in treasures such as this, which can never be replaced. It should no longer be legal to destroy or mutilate them. Here is a chance for our Socialist friends to do real service to the State. We have laws as to treasure-trove; we take steps to prevent the extinction of rare birds and beasts. Why should the chance owner have it in his power to rob the community of that which belongs to all alike? Who is the owner of a priceless work of art or of a noble building? Surely the man who has eyes to see its glories. The rich man may have it in his custody, but his artistic perception may be less than that of the ninth part of a tailor's. We want a census of castles, monastic and other historic buildings, cromlechs, camps, and other prehistoric relics. No private owner should have it in his power to do away with them without the consent of a competent public authority.

Our American cousins are some of them intent on the cult of the bizarre. It is rather pitiful to see what very little good the vast wealth of their millionaires is to them. A millionaire cannot eat two dinners a day; sometimes he dare not eat one. But his effort often is to start some futile demonstration of human ostentation. To spend thousands of pounds on a dinner to be eaten up in a balloon or down a coalmine is an exhibition of poverty-stricken lack of ideas which makes the judicious grieve. A few years ago an American friend asked the present writer to lay out for him an English route by which he might see the real beauty and ripeness of the old country. We knew our man, and give him an itinerary by loitering along which he could realise the mingled splendour and simplicity of large tracts of rural England—the noble sweep of our Down country, the homely attractions of villages almost unchanged in tone since the days of the Armada; the magnificence of our storied buildings. Our American went home with a wealth of reminiscence which he will not lose for the rest of his days. Had he been a traveller of a different type we should have said to him, "Go to Cook's. They will fix you up."

A. E. CAREY.

NEW ZEALAND SKETCHES

By W. H. KOEBEL

III.—UP-COUNTRY (continued).

ALL this, however, is concerned with only one aspect of Bray's Hill. There are few who go to the township by the side of the sea and fail to return. As a matter of fact, it is on the homeward way that the place attains its greatest importance as a landmark. I have already referred to the attitude of mental irresponsibility that a visit to the township induces in some. It must be admitted that the sudden coming together of sociable atoms from all parts of the district is trying to the best-ordered temperament. A few may cast their eyes on the whisky when it is yellow. Even so, there is very little harm done as a matter of fact. The thing may occur only four times in the year, and therefore claims every right to the privileges of an exception. In the case of others it is different, of course, but to these I am not referring just now. If a bachelor has suffered from one of these exceptional periods, it may be left to his conscience to reproach him. If a married man, it is certain that his own conscience will be actively assisted by a similar force in skirts that will sit at his side in the buggy on the homeward way. There is no doubt that the pointing-out of error is a reasonable, commendable, and even a charitable act. It can be effected in various ways. Strangely enough, I have never yet discovered one of these that was received with genuine and hearty appreciation by the culprit. The latter has a curiously impracticable idea that if he acknowledges his fault the matter should end with the admission. Whereas the wife knows quite well that it is only at this point that it should begin.

It must be admitted that mankind occasionally employs unfair strategy in order to avoid that which, after all, is nothing more arduous than the rôle of listener. From time to time you may meet with some evidence of this on the outskirts of the township. On such occasions you may see a buggy, drawn by two galloping horses, speeding furiously along the level road that leads from the spot. The pace is certainly an amazing one for the mere home-coming of husband and wife. But there is method in the driver's madness. Subdued by the stress of this wild career, the woman is perfectly silent. Otherwise she would have much to say. Now, you know, this sort of thing is not quite fair. It is not even wise, for this indirect muzzling is only effectual for a time. One might entertain more sympathy for the man, were it not that the utmost success of his procedure can only result in the putting off of the evil hour. It is at Bray's Hill that retribution falls. No mortal horses can mount the ascent here at any other than a walking pace. Bray's Hill stands for the deluge, all the more overwhelming for its long-pent-up force. This spot represents the endless story of the world, the ultimate triumph of woman over man. It is sacred to moments of rue and to the fire of purification, while the horses plod steadily upwards. At the best of times Bray's Hill is a long hill; but there are occasions when it seems longer than others.

Perhaps I am entering too deeply into matters that by rights partake of the nature of family secrets. In any case, we have topped Bray's Hill now, and can leave its atmosphere behind us. All about are the peaks and valleys, the white specks of grazing sheep on their sides. The road dips and falls and winds, now leading through the ford of a miniature stream, across which the horse plunges at a canter, striking up sheets of sparkling water into the sunlight, now fringing the steep sides in the shape of a boldly conceived cutting, now spreading out over a level stretch dappled with the white blossoms of the tetre. And then comes the bush itself. The horse is thudding along a cool and exquisite aisle of verdure. The great trunks of the lofty forest trees are smothered and hidden by the undergrowth that presses in rich green waves of handsome leafage to the edge of the narrowing track, while above the roof of foliage is impenetrable. Here and there, where an opening in the foliage permits the sight, are glimpses of graceful nikau palms and spreading tree-ferns, and the thick carpet of maidenhair beneath. It is fairyland, deepened and rendered more wonderful by its solemn hush. There are many miles of it, and each is as perfect in its sylvan beauty as the last. Then the greenery to the front is illuminated by a blaze of sunlight. The green waves recede as the track sinks down the side of a gorge. A minute later the horse's hoofs are splashing in the waters of a river whose rippling current hastens onwards in its summer shallowness. Save where the ground slopes down towards the ford on either hand the banks of the river rise in sheer walls of rock, heavily hung and festooned with trees, shrubs, and creepers. It is very majestic, sufficiently awe-inspiring to take away the breath for a moment or so of him who beholds it for the first time in this unexpected fashion. The bush has closed in again, and the last murmurs of the river have died away. After a while the horse shies with a frantic start that sends his hindquarters into the mass of leafage. Just ahead is a Maori on his wiry pony, who has swung suddenly into sight from round a jutting promontory of green. The big fellow grins broadly, gives out a hearty "Tenakoe!" in greeting, and has passed from sight.

Onwards through the walls of bush, and the clearings, open stretches, streams, and rivers! What if we have to ride for five or six hours or more! Distance is nothing in Maoriland provided that horse and rider are fit and happy. Not quite so happy at the end of the journey as at the beginning, for all that. With the loss of the full spring in the action of the horse comes the sympathetic lessening of the man's vitality. There is a point, when three-quarters of the journey have been accomplished, that makes the thought of the homestead a blessed one. That point has been reached even now, and passed! The mount has taken all four legs in charge of his equine soul, and is cantering as he has not cantered since he left the livery-stable in the township. A couple of minutes later he has entered a clearing. In the midst of it rises a small slab-built, Noah's-ark-shaped erection. By no stretch of imagination could you call the building an imposing one. Perhaps its most salient feature is a single iron chimney placed at one end in the form of a flattened lime-kiln, and seemingly altogether out of proportion to the size of the dwelling it serves. No, I fear that the shanty can hold out no claims whatever to orthodox beauty. Were you to see it in the midst of a town, it is possible that you might even condemn it as an eyesore. Placed where it is, you bear no other sentiment towards it but a wholesome affection. It is a homestead; is not that enough? The clearing itself in the centre of which the building stands is in a state of transformation that detracts somewhat from the natural charm of the place. It is thickly strewn with the blackened stumps of giant trees—a grim warning to the encircling dense forests of the fate that is to be theirs.

You may anticipate a pleasant surprise on entering the building itself. If so, I fear that you will suffer disillusion. It is the home of honourable makeshifts. It is a place where kerosene-tins do duty for the more elaborate chairs in vogue nearer the centres of civilisation, and where packing-cases, cunningly contrived, blossom forth into almost every article of furniture of which the modest household may stand in need. A similar ingenuity prevails throughout. The wool from the newly-introduced sheep forms a not inappropriate stuffing for the home-manufactured cushions, and the leaves of illustrated journals serve to increase the crudity of the plank walls. For culinary purposes a camp oven, that is to say an ordinary iron pot swung from a chain over a roaring log fire, together with a couple of saucepans, form the equipment of the kitchen. You will kindly undertake no risks with the household objects here. Breakage is a serious matter, as will be brought home to you by the sight of the windows, where the paper that serves in the place of the more transparent material will of necessity have to remain for many a long day ere the damage can be repaired. Where packhorses form the sole means of transport, the carriage of necessities, to say nothing of luxuries, is no light task. For the well-cut road has died away, and has shrunk into nothingness long ago. All that is here is a thread-like track, struggling for its existence against the onslaughts of the vigorous shoots of young grass that seek to cover its bareness; a faint thing that winds its way, snake-like and timorous, through the heaped logs, fallen trees, and the various hindrances flung out by the yet rebellious virgin land.

Little more is required to complete the picture. Within a stone's-throw of the house flows a creek, rippling gently in the summer months, foaming and swollen in the rainy winter. A few rough kennels shelter the half-dozen sheep-dogs, while the horses are grazing near by in great content just now. It will be different in the winter. Then, shaggy-coated and mud-besmeared, they will wander uneasily to and fro, and at times will make their way, in the absence of a barrier, to the few boards that constitute the verandah flooring in an impertinent attempt to seek shelter from the periodical outburst of pouring rain. For all that, you need waste neither your contempt nor your pity upon this solitary homestead. It has already afforded some very pleasant hours to its inmates. Moreover, it marks the second stage of the squatter's upward career. Quite near by may be seen an erection—scarcely a building—half-European, half-Maori whare, that was his shelter when first he commenced his battle with the soil. It is a reed hut that sprang into existence on a small open space before a tree had been felled or the earth trodden by the foot of a single sheep. This second stage will go the way of the first ere long, you may be certain of that. It will stand for nothing more than a remembrance of the past then. With the widening of his cleared lands and the increase of his flocks will arise one of those spacious, soft-tinted bungalows, with its attendant comforts and gardens. It is only for the present that he is tied to the humble little shanty. But neither the reader nor I are under any restriction of the kind. We can ramble at our ease the length of every species of homestead, from this youthful enterprise to the finest and largest building that ever had its foundations in mutton and wool.

BOOKS FOR BOYS

BY SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

I WAS much interested in Mr. Richard Middleton's article the other week on "Treasure Island," and gladly respond to his request for other experiences of boys' tastes in reading. I am forty-eight years of age, having been born in September, 1863. I could read fairly well before I was seven; consequently my boyhood includes the whole of the 'seventies. The first book I can remember was in our nursery—an immense folio seventeenth-century "History of the Bible," with a picture on every other page. We never read the print, but "Jacob vigorously wrestling with the Angel" and people "Digging the grave for Sarai" represent in my mind's eye those events even now. The first book which was read to my brothers and myself was "Willie's Birthday," a highly proper story, in which Willie asks and is allowed to do anything he likes on his birthday and comes to dreadful grief. The second was "Sandford and Merton," and we naturally had what we called "a sneaking likeness" for Tommy Merton "the wicked one." There were some excellent fairy stories published in those days, "King Gab's Story-bag and What it Contained," by Heraclitus Grey, with delightful pictures by Walter Crane. Then there was a fat little book, translated from the German, called "A Picture Story-book" (which in 1855 was in its fifth edition); it had 400 quaint illustrations, and contained three capital stories—"Dame Mitchell and her Cat," "The Adventures of Prince Hempseed," and the enthralling "History of a Nutcracker," a book which I should have thought it would pay to republish. We read and re-read Louise M. Alcott's books, "Little Men" and "Little Women" and "The Eight Cousins." They were girlish, American, and gentle and simple mixed together in a way we could not understand, but they held us in their sway.

We liked "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking-glass" fairly well, but thought "The Water Babies" rot, and could see no fun in A Becket's "Comic History of England." We liked the pictures in Surtees' books, but found it difficult to understand the political cartoons in "Punch," even when explained.

I remember buying the first number of "Little Folks" outside the old tin station at Westbourne Park early in the 'seventies. The earlier stories in it were "The Magic Beads; or, Gilbert's Shadow," "The New Mistletoe Bough," "Raggles Baggles and the Emperor," "Stories Told by some Little Folks around the Nursery Fire," containing one whose title pleased us—"How Polly Patterson took a Dislike to a Little Girl in a Whitey-brown Frock." "The Star in a Dustheap" and others of equal merit followed. A short reading-book called "Nelson's Series, No. 9," had a great influence on us, and by the end of 1875 we could practically recite the whole of it by heart. It consisted of singularly well-chosen extracts from the best authors and some poetry. I could not recite "Beth Gelert" for tears, but I loved Macaulay's "Horatius" and "Armada," and Campbell's "Battle of the Baltic" and "Hohenlinden." We next took in "The Boys of England," a dashing publication that had so great a vogue that the proprietor, Edwin J. Brett, was not only able to make a priceless collection of armour, but still leave a handsome fortune. This was largely due to one story, "Jack Harkaway," which I believe was written by a wayward genius named Stephens Hayward, who is just now attracting the attention of "Notes and Queries." Jack went through incredible adventures. The story started with "Jack Harkaway's School-days," which must have run for a year; then "Jack Harkaway at Oxford," then among the Brigands, the Pirates, and Savages in America, Asia, Africa, &c., finally winding up with the comprehensive title of "Jack Harkaway and His Son's Adventures Round the World." Whether they went into the third generation I cannot tell, but every number ended up with a desperate situation, and they never succeeded in quite killing the villain, whose name, I think, was Hunsdon. I have not read it since those days, but I fancy a great many of the feats were annexed from better books, and the interest was kept up from week to week and year to year with an energy that never flagged. Wells, I read with interest the other day, approved of "Jack Harkaway" as a stimulant to the imagination, but my parents mildly objected to him. We were given "Tom Brown's School-days," "St. Winifred's," "Eric; or, Little by Little," and "Agathos" on our birthdays, and dutifully read them; but "Harkaway," "Jack Rushton, or Alone in the Pirates' Lair," and somebody who was the "Boy Chief of the Delawars," were the sweets at our literary feast.

All the sentences were short—there were no descriptions, explanations, or moralising that needed skipping. Although full of braggadocio and heroics, the morals were always sound and patriotic. The "Young Folks' Weekly Budget" was a publication of a slightly different kind—it aspired to be more moral and less "penny-dreadfully." It dealt, so far as its serials were concerned, in well-illustrated tales of Giants and Dwarfs—stealing most of the ideas, I fancy, from the "Idylls of the King" and that period. We liked stories of adventure, and read some of them over and over again—"Masterman Ready" and "The Little Savage," by Marryat; "Coral Island," by Ballantyne; "The Swiss Family Robinson," and "Tom among the Crocodiles." "Tales of the Colonies," by the late C. Rowcroft, a story of emigration to Tasmania early in the nineteenth century, specially held us captive. (We skipped, of course, all the law about the convicts.) I remember reading the long, close columns of the "Wandering Heir," by Charles Reade, when it appeared in the second or third Christmas Number of the "Graphic" about 1872. I did so because I wanted to know what the splendid pictures were about. About this time we came across a strange strain of books—"Valentine Vox the Ventriloquist" (which caused us to buy a sixpenny book of instruction as to how to "ventriloque!"), "Silvester Sound the Somnambulist," and "Verdant Green." Of grown-up books about the mid-'seventies, I read "The Marchioness of Brinvilliers" and that terrible story called "Caleb Williams," by Godwin, side by side with two pious ones—"Susan Hopley; or, the Adventures of a Maid Servant" and "The Basket of Flowers." Some books we never read right through—for instance, we always shut up "Monte Christo" directly he found his fortune. We never read "Gulliver's Travels" after Brobdingnag, and had no curiosity as to what became of Robinson Crusoe after he got off the island. We thought the rest of all these books tedious. "The Pride of the Mess" and "The Star of the South," a tale of the American Civil War, by the same Stephens Hayward, also formed part of our library at this time. We also read with avidity "creepy" stories—"Bring Me a Light" and a "Noctuary of Terror" in "Once a Week" were our favourites, together with a short story by Lytton at the back of the "Haunters and the Haunted."

The "Dumberdene," which came out in "Belgravia" or "London Society," was a prime favourite.

Many years later I found myself sitting one night at dinner next to the late Lord Brabourne, and he told me that the "Dumberdene" was written by his sister, under circumstances deliberately made similar to the conditions under which "Frankenstein" was written—viz., a number of young literary people determined to see who could write the most gruesome story.

We liked "The Gold Beetle" and "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" of Poe, but none of the others. Side by side with all these grown-up stories we contentedly read our younger brothers' and sisters' copies of "Chatterbox"—a wonderful half-pennyworth full of stories translated from the German, and enjoyed Harrison Weir's clever pictures of animals. I wonder if it goes on now—I never see it; but it flourished in my day without an advertisement of any kind. Both my parents were omnivorous novel-readers, and as they came out I read all the serials in the "Cornhill" and "Temple Bar"—Trollope's, Hardy's, Miss Braddon's, and others; I did not understand them very well, but would read them. We were fond of a gloomy story called the "House of Elmore," by Robinson, because the father in it was like our grandfather, and we sympathised with the heroics of Guy Livingstone and "Barren Honour." "Ouida" was considered to be desperately wicked, but I am sure we came to no harm by reading "Under Two Flags." We liked "The Path-finder," by Cooper, and most of Marryat's. We preferred "The Lancashire Witches," "Old Saint Paul's," and "Jack Shepherd" of Ainsworth's, and got through some of G. P. R. James. We were urged to read Scott, but found him so difficult to get into—it took such a long time to get to the point. We only cared about "Pickwick," or rather parts of it, as far as Dickens was concerned. Thackeray we never attempted. No one supervised our reading; one week we were reading a grown-up book, the next a girl's story by Mrs. Molesworth—as one of my sisters said, "We would rather read a Directory than nothing at all."

"Ernie Elton; or, The Lazy Boy at Home and at School," I have forgotten to mention as an old favourite by Mrs. Eiloart. Of course we were familiar with Hans Christian Andersen, Grimm, and the "Arabian Nights;" but my mother objected, for reasons which we did not then understand, to Madame D'Aulnoy's effusions. We never liked Kingston—we thought him too long and too full of incident. We read George MacDonald's "At the Back of the North Wind" because of a certain cosy picture in it. Manville Fenn and Henty were popular, and we read every line of Ballantyne's, and once I had a much-prized letter from him. The "Boy's Own Paper" came out just as I was giving up boys' books. It was brought out by the Religious Tract Society with the avowed intention of combating the influence of penny dreadfuls, which I think had got worse. It was far better done than "Peter Parley" or "Every Boy's Annual," which was full of impossible articles telling boys how to make things, "How to Make Artificial Fireworks"—as if any boy cared a rap about "safety" fireworks—"Practical instructions in Plane-turning," &c. The only redeeming feature was that it introduced me to Jules Verne and some capital school stories of H. C. Adams. Jules Verne was a revelation. I remember at the commencement of one year vowing to be as exact and as punctual as that impossible but fascinating hero Phileas Fogg, and at another time to be as silent and reserved as Captain Nemo, greatly to my own discomfort. I took in the "Boy's Own Paper" until I was ashamed to do so; and this must close the literary recollections of my boyhood, as in 1880 I was a youth—I mean I was seventeen.

MUSIC

DEAN RAMSAY tells us somewhere that when Mrs. Siddons first appeared on the stage in Edinburgh, the General Assembly—that company of Signiors than which we can suppose none to exist more potent, grave, and reverend—fixed its most important business for the days when she did not act. This has always seemed to us the most remarkable tribute to the player's art that has been recorded; and, musing on the glory of the actress, we have perhaps wondered if the day would come when a musician should win honour of so amazing a kind. Surely we may now say that it has come. The Americans are a grave and serious people—an unlikely people to neglect, even for an hour, any important business to which they had set their hand. Their legislators would not adjourn, as ours were wont to do, for a race-meeting, would they? Yet have we lately read that during the recent tour of two hundred choristers from the good town of Sheffield, "in one State of America the House of Representatives vacated their seats" for them! Music is clearly avenged, and Mrs. Siddons has a rival!

The long and laborious journey of these intrepid singers seems to have been a triumphant progress. Canada, the United States, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and the Fiji Islands have vied with each other in paying them unprecedented marks of delight and respect. In Capetown an Archbishop conducted an open-air service for them. But the action of the American statesmen strikes us with the greatest admiration. The whole story of this musical tour reads like a highly-coloured romance. Our sober minds are a little bewildered by it all. Yet there is no manner of doubt that everything happened as has been described. Dr. Harriss, an Englishman domiciled in Canada, where he has acquired wealth, conceived the idea of this gigantic tour. He is an Imperialist, and although he was anxious to show to our Dominions how well an English choir could sing, he admits that his compelling motive was "to take two hundred English folk round the Empire, letting them see what the Empire really meant, and then bringing them back to England and turning them loose to act as Empire agents." It would appear that his scheme has thoroughly succeeded. The choristers are now determined to use their voices in singing the praise of Empire; their madrigals and their fugues will no longer be the chief joy of their lives.

It is a remarkable instance of the saying that enthusiasm will achieve anything. The determined spirit of Dr. Harriss has enabled him to do what Mr. Barnum might have shrunk from undertaking. The unflagging zeal and devotion of the two hundred singers with that of their conductor, Dr. Coward, has carried them through a task that required almost super-human powers, and we look in vain for words which shall adequately convey our congratulations to all those concerned in this wonderful enterprise. Musicians who know what Sheffield singers can do will feel no surprise when they hear of the artistic success of the tour, of the magnificent impression made upon the music-loving in our great Dominions. Sheffield could doubtless supply several such choirs as that formed of those of the singers whose circumstances permitted them to wander over the earth for six months, and display their beautiful voices and their finished art to their brothers and sisters over the seas. And Sheffield would be the first to admit that she is not alone among the towns of England in producing choirs which could so impress the world. Our choirs are among our most precious possessions, and the glory that has been achieved by one of them will be rejoiced in by thousands of admirable choristers whose voices will never, perhaps, be heard outside their native town.

BOOKS IN PREPARATION

MR. JOHN LANE is a sort of literary Columbus. He is always bringing to light the work of a new writer whose genius has been glowing beneath a bushel. With keen enthusiasm, and very natural flamboyance, he sends out delightful preliminary notices which must bring blushes to the sometimes beardless faces of the authors to whose work he refers. Take, for instance, a very pleasant example. Mr. Lane has found Mr. Hector H. Munro, and he calls him "A New Humorist," although as "Sake" Mr. Munro's witty writings have made a host of friends. Of his forthcoming novel, "The Chronicles of Clovis," Mr. Lane has composed the following gem: "Clovis is an embodiment of the Modern Man in his most frivolous, cynical, mischief-loving vein. He moves through, or inspires, a series of congenial adventures in the world of country-house and restaurant life. The chronicles of his sayings and misdoings form a feast of wit and humour that will convince many that it is no longer necessary to go abroad for our humorists." And this: "'The Progress of Mrs. Cripps-Middlemore' deals with the vagaries of a middle-class family suddenly enriched. Mr. Bendall has a wicked wit, which, with his ability to assume the attitude of the interested looker-on almost amounting to inspiration, stamps him as a humorist." Luckily Mr. Hector Munro and Mr. Gerard Bendall, author of that most amusing book "Mrs. Jones's Bonnet," can afford to smile comfortably at these delicious outbursts. We know them for what they are, and so completely sympathise with Mr. Lane's pride and enthusiasm. We are much interested to hear that Mr. B. W. Willett, late of Kegan Paul and Co., and earlier of Magdalen College, Oxford, has recently joined Mr. John Lane. Both are to be congratulated. Mr. Willett is not only a publisher of wide experience, but a golfer of no mean prowess.

Stephen Swift and Co. add rapidly to their already interesting and even valuable list of books, every one of which hitherto has contained something original and arresting. Among their new volumes we find "An Englishman in New York," by a brilliant writer who hides behind the pseudonym of "Juvenal," and who has set down with great force and skill his impressions of a vast and hysterical city; "Poems," by Mr. Charles Granville, a writer not of mere love verses and Nature sonnets, but of poems filled with ecstasy and spiritual insight which deal with the soul of man—the eternal rather than the transitory; and "Motley and Tinsel," a novel by Mr. J. K. Prothero, which in serial form was the subject of a well-remembered libel action founded on the coincidence of the plaintiff's name with that of one of the book's characters. As a protest against the absurd state of the law in this connection Mr. Prothero has altered most of the names of his characters to those of actual men who are well known in literature and journalism. It is perhaps hardly necessary to add that he has done this with the consent of the gentlemen in question. It is to be feared, however, that the person who sees the means of adding to his unearned income by hunting through the pages of new novels for a character who inadvertently bears his name will continue to do so. The law permits and rewards such industry. It has almost become a new profession.

Mr. John Murray informs us that the final revision of the proofs of the second volume of the "Life of Lord Beaconsfield" will not be completed in time for publication this side of Christmas. This is a matter for general regret. The first volume made all its readers eager, like Oliver, for more. On or about the 17th inst. Macmillan and Co. will publish three books which deserve to be widely read. The first is "Autobiographical Memoirs," by Mr. Frederic Harrison, which is packed full of contemporary history, anecdote, and criticism; the second, Mr. F. W. F. Fletcher's "Sport on the Nilgiris and in Wynaad," and the third "The First American Civil War—1775-1778," by the Rev. H. Belcher, with chapters on the Continental or Revolutionary Army and on the Forces of the Crown, with numerous illustrations, coloured maps, and plans.

Mr. Edmund B. D'Auvergne's history of "The Coburgs" will be ready in a few days' time. Published by Stanley Paul and Co., it deals fully and sympathetically with the rapid rise of a family intimately connected with the Thrones of England, Belgium, and Bulgaria, and almost every reigning family in Christendom. This firm is publishing at once an equally interesting volume in the shape of a biography of La Fontaine. It is written by "Frank Hamel," and should be in the hands of all earnest students of the literature of France in a period which can boast of such masters as Boileau, Racine, and Molière. La Fontaine himself, though not perhaps so great a writer as these, has flung his name into French history. His Fables and Contes are among immortal works.

Mr. William Heinemann has had a translation made of M. Octave Uzanne's new book "The Modern Parisienne," to which Baroness von Hutten has added a Preface. M. Uzanne has made a close study of his fellow-countrywomen who live on the "right side" of the Seine, and has already written very charmingly of their dress and manners. Mr. Max Beerbohm's long-promised novel "Zuleika Dobson" is due this month. It is a long time since anything has been seen from the pen of this delightful writer, although happily his pencil has been busy. It is some years now since "More" created a cult, and some months since the dramatic criticisms in the Saturday Review have borne the magic word "Max." They were something more than mere criticisms of generally inferior plays. They were mosaics of bizarre words, ingenious patchwork quilts of neat and precise word-pictures.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE WAR

AT the moment when the Franco-German negotiations over Morocco have taken a hopeful turn Europe has once more been plunged into the depths of anxiety by the abrupt action of Italy in declaring war upon Turkey. From the comments of the daily Press it would seem as though the situation which led to the opening of hostilities was of recent origin. Consequently Italy has been severely condemned because, by means of an ultimatum with a twenty-four hours' time-limit attached, she forced the issue to the arbitrament of the sword. For some months past, however, it has been no secret in diplomatic circles that the relations between the two countries were becoming strained to the point of breaking. Again and again Italy has obtained from the Porte assurances that her interests in Tripoli would receive more sympathetic treatment than had hitherto been the case; but these pledges have proved utterly worthless. In England we have heard little concerning such pourparlers, for it is a far cry to Tripoli, and the daily Press, being in reality only a commercial institution, records merely that which, in journalistic language, is of "live," and therefore simply of paying, interest. Italy's patience was clearly exhausted. For the rest, her diplomacy anticipating war was bound to take into full account the strategical considerations of the moment. The Turks are masters of tortuous diplomacy, and it would have been their aim to prolong negotiations while they reinforced their army in Tripoli. Delay would further have placed an Italian military expedition at a disadvantage, inasmuch as with the approach of winter a landing on the Tripolitan coast would have been attended by considerable difficulties.

In an attempt to judge impartially of the rival cases as presented by the two belligerents let us not forget the odious record of the Young Turks since they seized the supreme power. Only a few months ago the columns of the English newspapers were full of recitals of atrocities committed in Albania—the burning and pillaging of churches, the massacre of women and children, and the committal of nameless horrors. The Turks then vigorously denied the veracity of these accounts, but the evidence of independent witnesses was overwhelming and conclusive. It was only at the last moment, when the patience of Europe had been exhausted and the intervention of the Powers seemed imminent, that the Porte decided upon a welcome change of policy. It is the same régime and, to a large extent, the same barbarous methods which in the past the Italians have been compelled to tolerate in Tripoli. We are told that in bestowing our sympathies we must bear in mind that Great Britain has within her Empire many millions of Moslem subjects whose feelings must be considered in a crisis like the present. But also Great Britain has many millions of Christian subjects whose creed teaches that a cruel and corrupt administration such as that of Turkey cannot endure.

A superficial sense of fair play at first leads us to feel genuinely sorry for the hapless plight of Turkey—an Empire in the turmoil of domestic strife, lacking even a Government to guide and control its people, let alone direct them in a campaign against Italy, without a sea force to convoy its troops to the scene of war, beset on all sides by hostile States ready on the first signs of disintegration to invade its outlying territories. On the other hand, it would have been unreasonable to expect Italy to tolerate injustice and oppression until such time as Turkey had built a modern Navy, reconstructed the defences of Tripoli, and strengthened its garrison, or, in other words, until military and strategical conditions as between the two potential belligerents had approached equality. War to-day is not arranged according to sporting ethics. With our entire approval, it will be recalled, Japan, ally of Great Britain, seized the moment when Russia was wholly unprepared and forced hostilities upon her. Moreover, she attacked the Russian Fleet before war was actually declared; and so soon as the war was over, also with our entire approval, she laid hands on Korea. Germany and Austria profess righteous indignation at the action of Italy, which they describe as "an infringement of international principle," "tantamount to piracy," &c. But not many months have elapsed since Austria robbed Turkey of Bosnia and Herzegovina, while in sending a gunboat to Agadir the pious censors of the Wilhelmstrasse provide us with a still more recent precedent in international aggression. France is also annoyed with Italy. In her case, as in that of other Powers, the reason is manifest. As a neighbour of Tunis a weak Turkey is preferable to a strong Italy in the Tripolitan territory. It is abundantly clear, from international incidents of the past few months, that the Powers of Europe are either not ready for war, or else are sincere in their determination that the coming of the general conflagration, so often predicted, shall be stayed. For instance, if Germany had wished to provoke a conflict over Morocco she would not have been content with timorously sending a gunboat into the harbour at Agadir. She would have landed a considerable force, taken possession of the Hinterland, and, together with her allies, defied Europe. Italy, with timely foresight, gauged the trend and limitations of world politics to-day. She realised that the Powers, anxious to avoid the general conflagration, would not intervene to save Tripoli. Naturally, her already successful initiative has annoyed her zealous partners in the Triple Alliance. Germany particularly is placed in a predicament. She is the friend and adviser of Turkey and the ally of Italy—and Turkey and Italy are at war!

The dread shared by all the Powers of the outbreak of a conflict that would involve the whole of Europe has led them to insist that Italy shall localise the area of hostilities. Italy has, of course, consented, for by so doing she will not be prevented from attaining the object for which she went to war—the annexation of Tripoli. She has no desire to invade Turkey proper. The Ottoman Army, in spite of many years of bad pay and maladministration, is not without military prestige and capacity. But the Turkish Army is in Turkey, not in Tripoli, and the Italian Fleet effectually patrols the intervening waters. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the so-called war has up to the present proved a very harmless affair. The Duke of Abruzzi, one of those fortunate heroes destined by fate and fortune always to be in the public eye in connection with some exploit of gallantry, has disposed of several antiquated little Turkish torpedo-boats. Thereupon the newspapers announced in bold black type, "Two Naval Battles." The out-of-date battleships which Germany sold to Turkey for a consideration far in excess of their real value have been generously allowed by the Italian Admiral to reach the Dardanelles. The Italian Navy, so we are given to understand, would disdain an uneven conflict. The tale of blood and slaughter is not yet complete. Two barges, misnamed transports by the Press, containing Italian troops were reported to have been sunk. Then, at the time of writing, there is a rumour that Tripoli has been bombarded. On a previous occasion when a similar rumour was prevalent it turned out that the Italian Fleet was only indulging in a little target practice out at sea. The latest reliable news from the "fortress" declares that "The Turks display a profound indifference. It seems as if for them, at any rate, this day is precisely the same as another. Their batteries are deserted and their sleeping guns are still wrapped in their coverings." The only measure so far taken by the Turks which could be described as retaliatory consists in putting out all the lights along the coast. The refusal of the Turks to fight must be extremely irritating to the martial ardour of the warm-blooded Italian warriors. In vulgar language, the Turks are "taking it lying down." Surely never in history was there a war so bereft of bloodshed. Doubtless if the Italians could find a Turkish soldier or sailor they would kill him, or at least inflict upon him serious wounds; but it must be understood that according to the rules of the game such soldier or sailor must be found "within the localised area of war." It would really seem as if both belligerents are genuinely desirous of avoiding bloodshed. Their motive is not, of course, humane. It arises from fear of a possible sequel—a European conflagration. Altogether we are bound to regard this fear as wholesome. At least its existence is reassuring to all who realise the evils and count the cost that would be entailed were the little campaign to become war on a serious scale among the nations of the earth.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

DURING the past summer motorists who have used cars with enclosed bodies of the torpedo type have endured much discomfort owing to the excessive heat, and many attempts have been made to overcome this drawback whilst retaining the advantages of the torpedo type of body. This appears to have been accomplished by Mr. S. F. Edge, who, as a result of his personal experience, has had designed a Torpedo Pullman body which is claimed to combine comfort with freedom from excessive heat, noise, and smell. Fitted to a 30h.p. six-cylinder Napier chassis, the complete car is exceptionally low, although there is ample clearance underneath to minimise the dust-raising. The suspension is also said to be remarkably comfortable, whilst another feature is that the driver's seat is made adjustable to suit drivers of varying height and length of limb. Mr. Edge himself uses a car of this type.

Few cars of what may be termed the moderate-powered class have come more decisively to the front during the last year or two than the all-British Vauxhall. Following on the brilliant speed records accomplished on the track at Brooklands, it is now announced that in the Russian reliability race from Petersburg to Sevastopol, a distance of 1,400 miles, a 20h.p. Vauxhall, driven by Mr. Percy Kidner, has completed the whole journey without the loss of a mark, and has thus won the first prize in its class. Out of the sixty-three starters, which included cars of British, Continental, and American make, only forty-three reached the destination, a result which need excite no surprise when one realises that Russian roads are frequently merely rough cart-tracks. The performance of the Vauxhall in such circumstances is a triumph for British workmanship.

It is announced that there will be no motor-car exhibition in the Grand Palais this year, the principal French manu-

SIX-CYLINDER PERFECTION.

POINTS to look for in your new

SIX-CYLINDER CAR:

ABSOLUTE RELIABILITY under all conditions,
ECONOMY OF UPKEEP, and SMOOTHNESS OF RUNNING
at high and low speeds.

ALL THESE are combined in the new six-cylinder
18-22 h.p.

BELSIZE CARS

—the result of years of experience.

Price £395.

CATALOGUE AND ALL INFORMATION FREE.

BELSIZE MOTORS, LTD.,

CLAYTON,
MANCHESTER.

LONDON { J. KEEL, LTD., 72, NEW BOND STREET, W.
BELSIZE LONDON AGENCY, LIMITED, DEAN'S YARD
CAVENDISH SQUARE, W.

EXPORT:
A. W. ROSLINGTON, 10, AVENUE HOUSE, LONDON, E.C.

facturers apparently being of opinion that the benefits arising from the show are not worth the expense entailed. The splendid building will, however, be utilised at the end of the year for an exhibition of aeroplanes, which, it is almost needless to say, will be the biggest, most comprehensive, and most interesting in the brief history of aviation. The opening day has been fixed for Saturday, December 16th, and the show will remain open until the evening of Tuesday, January 2nd, 1912. Even at this early stage the whole of the space on the ground-floor has been engaged by exhibitors of aeroplanes, and arrangements have had to be made to house machines on the upper floor. This will be the third annual aeroplane exhibition held in the Grand Palais.

If official encouragement and lavish prizes can effect their purpose, France is not likely to lose her commanding position in the world of aviation for a long time to come. No less a sum than £48,000 is being offered in prize and purchase money in connection with the aeroplane trials now in progress on the military ground at Rheims, of which £24,000 may be won by the most successful flying-machine constructor. The trials, which are intended to discover the most suitable type of aeroplane for military purposes, consist of weight-carrying, speed, and altitude tests, with a final flight of 186 miles (non-stop) at a minimum average speed of 37 miles an hour, and with a load of 661lb. Following the example set in the Daily Mail race round Great Britain, all the essential parts of the machines were stamped at the commencement of the trials, and none of the stamped parts may be rechanged. The winning machine will be bought by the Government for £4,000, and an order placed for ten similar machines.

Apparently the Wright brothers have not been so inactive during the last year as the absence of news with regard to them might have led many people to suppose. It is reported that they have been busy in perfecting a new device which, if successful, will revolutionise aeroplane construction. In their new machine, which is practically ready for testing, propellers are entirely dispensed with, movable wings in imitation of the flight of birds taking their place. The brothers Wright displayed such un-American reserve and quiet confidence while conducting the experiments which resulted in astonishing and convincing the world, that one feels inclined to attach more credence to the latest rumours as to their doings than would be accorded in the case of most other inventors.

The science of aviation may now be fairly said to constitute the subject of a firmly established and flourishing industry in this country. At present the number of certificates granted to aviators by the Royal Aero Club is between 140 and 150, and this is being constantly increased by finished pupils from the various flying schools in England. In efficiency of tuition these schools now compare very favourably with those of the Continent, which not long ago held what was practically a monopoly in this field of enterprise. During the last two months one well-known English flying school has taught and granted certificates to nineteen pupils, of whom fourteen were officers of the Army or Navy. Of these, ~~one was the only~~ British Brigadier-General who has qualified as an aviator, and another a naval cadet who enjoys the distinction of being the youngest person to pass the tests of the Royal Aero Club.

R. B. H.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE City is sublimely optimist. It has lost money steadily for the past eight or nine months, and it thinks that this is quite long enough. Therefore it has made up its mind that prices will go up. And they have gone up. But careful observers notice that most of the dealings are professional. The public has not yet come in. True, it may change its mind, and once again begin to gamble. That is a thing no man can tell us. I can only say that if the public begins gambling before either the Morocco or the Tripoli questions are settled it will show itself to be greatly lacking in common sense.

The position to-day is this. The bull account that existed in the various markets has disappeared. That is to say, the people who had bought shares upon money borrowed from moneylenders and banks have lost both their money and their shares. The banks and the moneylenders have acquired both. There are still just the same number of shares to gamble in, but they are now held by rich and acute people instead of by impecunious ones. If the rich financiers think that war is improbable they will engineer a fresh rise, and unload as near the top as they can. If they find a European conflict unavoidable they will sacrifice every share that is in the least risky, for gold, and gold alone, tells in warfare. But the unloading will produce a panic—it will afford the world a spectacle it seldom sees outside the United States—a struggle between the great finance houses—ruthless and cruel—a fight that must bring down some of the largest firms, and will be long remembered.

The German banks have financed Turkey already to the extent of ten or twelve millions. They will fight to the bitter end to save their creditor and their customer. If he is destroyed they will themselves be involved in his ruin. The wealth and power of the great German banks is enormous. But it is of mushroom growth. The Deutsche was not established until 1870. To-day it rivals the great English joint stock banks that are the result of sixty years or more of patient building-up. It may not possess the prestige of a house like Rothschild, more than a hundred years old, but it controls immense enterprises all over the world. It has not the minute ramifications of that extraordinary Crédit Lyonnais. But it has the courage of a Morgan and an influence second to no bank in the world. To the student of history rapid rises connote rapid falls. The German banks have one and all plunged in Turkey. If Turkey falls they will be crippled for years. Hence the superhuman, almost undignified, efforts made by Kaiser Wilhelm to patch up a peace between Italy and the Sultan.

CONSOLS AND MONEY.—As money grows dearer, Consols should fall. But we have seen a really good rise in Consols, and money rising also. The banks want all the money they can get for the autumn crops in the United States, in Canada, in Egypt, and in the Argentine. Even were peace assured, the autumn demand would be large. But, with politics in a dangerous condition, the call for gold is the more urgent. Yet Consols go up. It is plain that they are very heavily oversold.

FOREIGNERS.—Italian Rentes have been supported by the Italian Government, and have only fallen a few points from the highest. Turks, however, tumbled badly, and did not get any support until Tuesday, when they recovered a shade. Other foreigners have really not felt the trouble. This would show, if nothing else did, that the great bankers are very optimistic,—strangely, and, let us hope, rightly, full of hope. The Morocco question we none of us believed could result in war. But Tripoli was "a horse of another colour." Yes, the banker smiled. It is that he is so deeply involved that he can do naught else.

HOME RAILS.—Every dealer and every broker tells us that a universal coal strike is one of the certainties of the autumn. All the country thinks that we are not yet at the end of our Railway Strike. Yet Home Rails are firm and all prices have risen. The fact is our English Railways are much too cheap, and big investors are buying quietly. One big broker has locked up half a million Dover A, presumably because he believes that Kent will one day prove an enormous coalfield. Other wealthy people buy Sheffield A and B as a long lock-up—also relying upon the coal to be found in the Doncaster field. As investments all the English railways yield high interest and have great possibilities.

YANKEES soon recovered. But is the battle over? No one seems to know. Morgan has definitely taken the bull side, but the Standard Oil people seem yet bearish, and their holdings are enormous. Kuhn Loeb do not buy Unions; perhaps they wait the result of the strike. The market has had a big rise from the bottom, and a reaction might come any day. It is clear that trade does not improve. Eries seem the cheapest thing in the market, but any gamble must be dangerous in stocks that are manipulated until some definite lead is given by those who are in command.

RUBBER.—Although all the other markets have responded to the bullish sentiment in the Stock Exchange, Rubber remains dull. Prices droop and there is no business. The Rubber Share Trust asked its shareholders to reduce the capital by 12s. 6d. per share. They refused, like silly people. The meeting was funny. Bauman said that he had had no quarrel with Arbuthnot, and added that the baby was Arbuthnot's own, and he wished to God he would nurse it! This remark, so naïve and so true, made us all laugh, but did not carry the meeting. — The general view of the City is that rubber shares are quite high enough to-day.

OIL.—The Continent has decided that the oil war is ended, and some big option buying of Shells sent the price spinning upwards. Spies were also strong, and the oil markets generally showed strength, even poor Nigeria Bits rising to 8s. Indeed, all oil shares, except the hopeless Maikop concerns, have been strong—the more one hears of Maikop the more one is sorry for the foolish people who have put their money into the field; on all sides it seems a failure.

KAFFIRS.—In spite of the East Rand fiasco, Rand shares have been good all the week. The shops have supported their special shares, and though there are no signs of the public having come in, a very fair rise has taken place. It may continue. The new drill is said to save a great deal of money on reefs of about 36in. width, and on the Central Rand mines, which are the richest, Messrs. Wernher Beit report large savings. Frankly, although the Rand mines are in the main well managed, they are also extravagantly managed. Big savings can be effected, and must be effected, if the dividends are to be maintained.

RHODESIANS have jumped, and Chartered have been bought by the option-dealers. But the public seems sick of the market in which all the shops only mark up prices in order to unload. The Jumbo report is bad, very bad; yet the shares rise! The mill is to be used to crush Commonwealth ore and a profit will be made; but the mine is heavily mortgaged, and I should advise holders to get out. An agitation is being got up in Globes, but whether it will succeed I cannot say. It is also said that the Goldfields Company gets unfair advantages out of the Chartered Company. In short, the air is full of trouble. Yet so hard is the market made by bear repurchases that I cannot see any fall.

DIAMOND shares have also moved up, and they say that a determined effort is being made to catch the bears in De Beers, which are talked to 19. The account here is heavily over-sold, and the bear-hunt may prove successful.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are also more active, and Cements have improved upon the promise of a good report. Hudson Bays also rose on the land statement. The Forestal shareholders are offered both ordinary and prefs. at a price which gives them a handsome bonus. This company does well, and will do better. Marconis are also bought.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"TREASURE ISLAND" AS A BOOK FOR BOYS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Richard Middleton, in THE ACADEMY of September 23rd, raises a question which has always exercised the minds of editors of boys' papers and of writers of boys' books. Mr. Middleton says, truly enough, of the boys' taste in reading, that "he knows what he likes," and asks, "What was it in 'Treasure Island' that the readers of Young Folks did not like?" At a loss to find an adequate solution of the puzzle why a story containing "pirates, treasure, a desert island, some good fighting, and a boy hero . . . the elements that we should seek in a model work of that description," fell so flat when presented in serial form, Mr. Middleton advances the theory that "Stevenson's characterisation is more than skin-deep," that the "grown-ups in the book do not turn to the boy-hero for orders," and that "his splendid achievements (i.e., the boy-hero) are due to luck rather than judgment, and he emerges from his adventures without a halo." While concurring in this criticism, I venture to think it does not touch the weak spot in "Treasure Island," regarded as a serial story. Its failure in Young Folks was due to causes which every editor of a boys' paper will recognise.

It is a fundamental rule with a boys' serial that unless it "catches on" in the first three instalments, it will not catch on at all. Judged from this standpoint, the fault of "Treasure Island" is evident. It not only opened with a "Prologue" (called Part I. when the story appeared in book form) which boys as a rule do not understand, and are too impatient to read, but the three first instalments are uninteresting—from the boys' point of view—and have little to do with what follows. The real story began in the fourth instalment, and by this time the interest of the readers had waned.

The title in Young Folks was "Treasure Island; or, the Mutiny of the Hispaniola." The sub-title was not a good one, and maybe Stevenson thought so, as, like the Prologue, it was subsequently dropped. There were other circumstances which acted prejudicially. Nowadays a new serial in a boy's paper is boomed for weeks beforehand, and the reader is led to believe that the story will surpass everything that was ever written. "Treasure Island" was modestly announced, without the slightest flourish of trumpets, the week only before it started; it was hidden in an inside portion of the paper, and beyond a small and very poor picture in the opening instalment it was never illustrated. Stevenson congratulated himself that he did not "get illustrated"—it was the price he had to pay for his copyright, and the bargain was a good one for him, but not for the proprietor of Young Folks, for the prospects of the serial were blighted at the outset. The boy-reader is shrewd, and he would naturally assume that a story with no pictures, and occupying a subordinate position, was not worth taking the trouble to read.

Apart from the initial defect, "Treasure Island," I conceive, failed as a serial because it did not comply with what a boy looks for—it did not picture a hero appealing to his imagination. The boy likes a hero whose mantle he can don; into whose triumphs he can enter; whose deeds he can fancy he is performing. Mr. Middleton is quite right in what he says about the "grown-ups." All the way through Jim Hawkins is a little outside the picture, instead of being constantly in the foreground. Moreover, the story is told in the first person, and for some reason which might be worth discussing the personal form of narrative is not popular with boys. "The Black Arrow" can be only considered a pot-boiler by the side of "Treasure Island," but it fulfilled the requirements of the serial, and probably by this time Stevenson had learned something of his new craft, for in the opening he plunges into the marrow of the story in the approved style. Again, "The Black Arrow" was finely illustrated by the late W. Bowcher, and it was always in the place of honour. Hence its success.

May I be pardoned a reference to myself in connection with "Treasure Island"? In THE ACADEMY, of March 3rd, 1900,

Mr. Robert Leighton, the editor of Young Folks at the time "Treasure Island" appeared as a serial, wrote as follows:—"As indicating the kind of story he (Mr. James Henderson) desired for Young Folks, he gave to Stevenson copies of the paper containing a serial by Charles E. Pearce—a treasure-hunting story entitled 'Billy Bo's'n.' In his 'My First Book' article in the Idler Stevenson seems to suggest that 'Treasure Island' was already formed and planned in his mind prior to the time at which it was thought of as a serial for Young Folks; but there is evidence that in 'Billy Bo's'n' he found and adopted many suggestions and incidents for his own narrative." Dr. A. Japp, who was the medium of communication between Stevenson and Mr. Henderson, joined issue with Mr. Leighton, and in THE ACADEMY the following week told how he had heard Stevenson read the first half of the story, which half he took to Mr. Henderson. It would be very flattering to myself if I could say that "Treasure Island" owed something, if only in a suggestive sense, to my early effort in the same direction, but the matter is conclusively settled by a passage in a letter of Stevenson to W. E. Henley to be found in the additional Stevenson correspondence published this year. In this letter Stevenson refers to his contemplated boys' story, and says: "It's all about a map, and a treasure, and a mutiny, and a derelict ship." That my story had an island, a cypher, a map, and a mutiny is nothing. Such things are stock materials dating from Poe's "Gold Bug," and perhaps earlier. It is pretty clear, however, that the whole of the manuscript was not in Mr. Henderson's hands at the time the story began to appear in Young Folks. Later on copy came somewhat slowly from Stevenson, and I had it from Mr. Clinton, the sub-editor of Young Folks, that on one occasion the instalment arrived so late that he was compelled to divide the sheets for distribution among the compositors—an act of spoliation which aroused Stevenson's wrath. Mr. Clinton's ornate literary style moved Stevenson, when writing to Mr. Edmund Gosse, to say "it's like buttermilk and blacking; it swings and hums away in that last sheet like a great old kettle full of bilge water." As Clinton was at the time defending "Treasure Island" against adverse criticism, this sounds a little ungenerous. One need not, however, labour the point. Thirty years have gone by; the paper and its "humming" sub-editor are both dead, and so also are Mr. Henderson, Dr. Japp, and, alas! Robert Louis Stevenson.

CHARLES E. PEARCE.

Chiswick.

"UNWISE HUSBANDS AND UNWORTHY WIVES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not know whether the letter of your correspondent Clara Beesley excites more pity or disgust. But any woman to express such views must be, to say the least, of a very coarse grain. What does such a woman know of a "higher life," either in a man or a woman? Yet she has the impudence to speak for her sex, the sex to which Joan of Arc, Florence Nightingale, and Josephine Butler belonged. The woman who begged her husband's pardon, after he had so humiliated her, is utterly contemptible. No one would despise her more than the said husband. I am afraid, if such methods were commonly resorted to, the marriage state would soon develop into boxing matches. A perplexed wife can hold her own in these days, and to good effect, as well as a perplexed husband, as those who read the daily papers know. The ending of that play—"The Taming of the Shrew"—which is often brought forward as an example of how to manage a wife is stilted and unnatural. No woman with the spirit of Katharine would submit, in the way Shakespeare makes his heroine do, to Petruchio's stupid command. In fact, if the famous dramatist had been true to life, Petruchio would not have risked his reputation before his friends by commanding his wife at all. He would have known she was of too uncertain a quantity.

Again, your correspondent says that "there were no perplexed husbands in the days of our ancestors." Although I am no great student of history, I could mention some very renowned ones. Moreover, the finest writer of ancient Greek comedy makes special mention of woman as an inveterate plague, yet who in spite of that strangely fascinates man. Perhaps one of your cultured readers will give the passage and the name of the author to which I refer.

But putting such arguments aside, our sex would indeed be pitiable if our "love" and "reverence" could only be excited by physical chastisement. We would then only deserve to be slaves—deserve to be treated no better than the animals. Aristotle, although no doubt a very wise man, possessed the bias of his time and his sex. I wonder, if he lived in these days, when candidates for Parliament have to take men in motor-cars to the poll, and when hooliganism is rampant in religion, politics, and trade, would he say "Men obey reason"! One with keener insight and free from prejudice—Christ—showed wonderful tenderness towards women. What did He say to the woman in adultery? "Go, thou, and sin no more." And to her persecutors, "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." It was because of Christ's infinite tenderness that Mary Magdalene, repentant, wept over His feet, and wiped them with her lovely tresses. And were not the women unto His death more faithful to Jesus than even His Apostles?—I am, yours faithfully,

GERTRUDE MAGEE.

8, Glasgow-street, Rock Ferry, Cheshire, Oct. 2, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- Carlton's Wife.* By Effie A. Rowlands. Coloured Frontispiece. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
- Likeness.* By Edith Dart. Mills and Boon. 6s.
- Pollyooly.* By Edgar Jepson. Mills and Boon. 6s.
- The Fatal Woman.* By Dick Donovan. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
- The Roundabout.* By Gladys Mendl. Chapman and Hall. 6s.
- Essence of Honeymoon.* By H. Perry Robinson. Illustrated. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.
- The Common Law.* By Robert W. Chambers. Illustrated by Charles Dana Gibson. D. Appleton and Co. 6s.
- In the Days of Serfdom, and Other Stories.* By Leo Tolstoy. Translated by L. and A. Maude. Constable and Co. 6s.
- The Outcry.* By Henry James. Methuen and Co. 6s.
- Dan Russell the Fox: an Episode in the Life of Miss Rowan.* By E. OE. Somerville and Martin Ross. Methuen and Co. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

- Casanova and his Time.* By Edouard Maynial. Translated by Ethel Colburn Mayne. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.
- Daughters of Eve.* By W. R. H. Trowbridge. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 15s. net.
- The French Ideal: Pascal, Fénelon, and Other Essays.* By Madame Duclaux (A. Mary F. Robinson). With Portraits. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.
- William Pitt and the Great War.* By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. Illustrated. G. Bell and Sons. 16s. net.
- Madame de Brinvilliers and Her Times, 1630-1676.* By Hugh Stokes. Illustrated. John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.
- Sixty-eight Years on the Stage.* By Mrs. Charles Calvert. Illustrated. Mills and Boon. 10s. 6d. net.

- The Seymour Family: History and Romance.* By A. Audrey Locke. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 6s. net.
- The Cavendish Family.* By Francis Bickley. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 6s. net.
- The English People Overseas. Vol. III. British North America, 1763-1867.* By A. Wyatt Tilby. Constable and Co. 6s. net.
- Francis Bacon and his Secret Society.* By Mrs. Henry Pott. Second and Revised Edition. Robert Banks and Son. 7s. 6d. net.
- The Record of an Adventurous Life.* By Henry Mayers Hyndman. With Portrait Frontispiece. Macmillan and Co. 15s. net.
- Tarnished Coronets: Studies in the History of the British Peerage.* By M. Nelson D'Auvergne, M.A. Illustrated. T. Werner Laurie, 12s. 6d. net.
- London Stories. Part I.* Edited by John O'London. Illustrated. T. C. and E. C. Jack. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

- My Italian Year.* By Richard Bagot. Illustrated. Mills and Boon. 10s. 6d. net.
- Across China on Foot: Life in the Interior and the Reform Movement.* By Edwin J. Dingle. Illustrated. J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 16s. net.
- Boys: What they Are and How to Manage Them.* By Archibald K. Ingram. With a Preface by Lt.-Gen. Sir R. S. S. Baden-Powell, K.C.B. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 3d. net.
- Inspired Millionaires: A Study of the Man of Genius in Business.* By Gerald Stanley Lee. Grant Richards, Ltd. 3s. 6d. net.
- The Forging of Passion into Power.* By Mary Everest Boole. C. W. Daniel. 5s. net.
- Sea-Fishing.* By C. O. Minchin. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.
- Where Do We Come From? Is Darwin Correct? A Philosophical and Critical Study of Darwin's Theory of "Natural Selection."* By Herbert Morse. Kegan Paul and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
- Banks and People.* By Thomas Farrow. Chapman and Hall. 1s. net.
- The Bargain Book.* By Charles Edward Jermingham (Marmaduke) and Lewis Bottany. Illustrated. Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.
- Modern Paris: Some Sidelights on its Inner Life.* By Robert Harborough Sherard. Illustrated. T. Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.
- The Young Man from Stratford: A Juryman's View of the Bacon-Shakespeare Controversy.* By Henry Saint-George. Portrait Frontispiece. Wm. Reeves. 2s. net.
- Experiments in Play Writing in Verse and Prose.* By John Lawrence Lamb. Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons.

THEOLOGY

- The Epistles of St. John Verse by Verse, with Short Reflections on each Verse, etc.* By Frederic Noel, S.S.J.E. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 1s. net.
- Plain Sermons on the Sacrament of the Altar.* By the late Rev. W. H. Cleaver, M.A. Fourth Edition. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 1s. net.
- Mysteries for the Meek: a Series of Little Sermons at the Lord's Service on the Lord's Service. Addressed to the Lord's Little Ones and Others of the Childlike Mind.* By a Priest of the Diocese of Worcester. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 1s. 6d. net.
- Christian Teaching of Coin Mottoes.* By the Rev. Wm. Allan, D.D. Illustrated. S.P.C.K. 3s. 6d.

VERSE

- Phantasmagoria, and Other Poems.* By Lewis Carroll. Illustrated by Arthur B. Frost. Macmillan and Co. 1s. net.
- Rata and Mistletoe.* By Dora Wilcox (Madame Hamelius). George Allen and Co. 2s. 6d. net.
- A Book of Babes in Woodcut and Verse.* Made by Louise M. Glazier. Elkin Mathews. 1s. 6d. net.
- Eastern Songs.* By Ben Kendim. With Coloured Frontispiece. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 5s. net.

JUVENILE

- A Great Emergency, and Other Tales.* By Juliana Horatia Ewing. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse. G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.
- The Peter Pan Picture-book.* By Alice B. Woodward and Daniel O'Connor. Illustrated. Fourth and Cheaper Edition. G. Bell and Sons.
- Talks about Birds.* By Frank Finn, B.A., F.Z.S. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 6s.
- The Captain Chum.* By Ross Harvey. Illustrated by Kingsley Howe. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.
- Fairy Tales from Brentano.* Told in English by Kate Freligrath Krock. Pictured by F. Carruthers Gould. New Edition. T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.
- Two to Nowhere.* By A. St. John Adcock. Illustrated by Morris Meredith Williams. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

PERIODICALS

The Open Window; The Literary Digest, N.Y.; The Home Counties' Magazine; Bulletin of the Archæological Institute of America; The Cornhill Magazine; The Triad, Dunedin; L'Œuvre; La Grande Revue; Everybody's Story Magazine; Friendly Greetings; Sunday at Home; Girl's Own Paper; Woman's Magazine; Boy's Own Paper; The Open Road; The English Review; Blackwood's Magazine; Matriculation Directory, September, 1911; London University Gazette; The Bookseller; The International, N.Y.; The Nineteenth Century and After; The Publishers' Circular; The Parsi, Bombay; Peru To-Day; The Idler; The Hindustan Review; The Fortnightly Review; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Revue Bleue; La Revue; Mercure de France; Deutsche Rundschau; Educational Times; The Empire Review; School World; University Correspondent.

NOW READY

ONE SHILLING

OCTOBER ISSUE

Financial Review of Reviews.

Proposed Industrial Court for the Settlement of Labour Disputes
By SIR CHARLES W. MACARA, BART.

What to do with Home Rails Now. By W. R. LAWSON.

What the Investor Wants. By THE INVESTMENT CRITIC.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL INFORMATION. ANALYSIS OF REPORTS. NEW CAPITAL ISSUES. STATISTICAL RECORD.

PUBLISHER, 2, WATERLOO PLACE, Pall Mall, S.W., AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND ... THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON,
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE TO SOUTH and EAST AFRICA. WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES LIVERPOOL

to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,
JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BREMEN.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,
NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
225 Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Royal Charter dated 1839).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £32.	Days 28.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17+	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£10.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £8 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

BOORDITE RIFLES, .400, .500, .600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 463	Books in Preparation 484
Sirmio 464	W. B. Yeats and J. M. Synge 485
The Willow-tree Woman 464	Imperial & Foreign Affairs 486
De Omnibus Rebus 465	Motoring and Aviation ... 487
Home Rule and Antiquarianism 466	In the Temple of Mammon 488
Some New Experiences ... 467	Correspondence 489
Reviews—	Books Received 490
A Nation in the Making 469
Pauline Theology..... 470	SUPPLEMENT
Poems 471	Light and Twilight..... 1
Shorter Reviews 471	Reviews—
Fiction 472	Marie Louise 2
The Theatre..... 473	The New India..... 3
On the South Devon Coast 474	The Transformation of Archæology in India Threa-	Palestine 4
tened..... 476	Poetry on the Dissecting-
After the Crisis 478	table 5
Music 480	The Compleat Small-
Art 482	holder 6
October Magazines 483	Shorter Reviews 6
	Fiction 8

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

LORD ROBERTS, "the hero and the man complete," astonishes the world from time to time by some new evidence of his activity and capacity. We were not in the least surprised that he gave his support to the stalwarts who followed the lead of Lord Halsbury against the humiliating surrender at discretion—or, as we think, indiscretion—by the majority of the Peers of rights which were inalienable. Lord Roberts has been accustomed to overcome obstacles—however formidable in appearance—and not to enter into a campaign of finesse with his adversaries.

We own to surprise, however, when we observe from the veteran Field-Marshal's pen a cogent, closely-reasoned, and terse exposition of a sane policy for the Unionist party, such as has proceeded from no other source. In a single column Lord Roberts exhausts essential principles, which it is customary to extricate with difficulty from streams of verbiage, full of the snags of hesitation and saving clauses.

Lord Roberts having disposed of the possibility of a Liberal party whose prominent features are chaffering and self-abasement proving equal to the situation, proceeds to ask how far the Unionist party under leaders who have not possessed or who have lost the capacity for leadership, are likely to respond to the exigencies of the moment. In a few paragraphs, Lord Roberts deals in a really masterly manner with the way in which the Unionist party should approach the question of social reform, and glances at the necessities of national defence—"Is it too late to hope that the Unionist party will come forward to lead the millions that wait for a leader?"

Hope and expectation are not synonyms. Hope is denied to none but the fallen archangel, expectation is the equipment of the foreseeing and reasoning man. All honour to the veterans Lords Roberts and Halsbury who have endeavoured to enjoin the path of duty.

It is our intention to publish a symposium on the question of Home Rule for Ireland. Sir Charles Walpole in two articles has recently dealt with Irish Legislative movements and systems of the past. Professor Kettle in this week's issue writes a weighty introductory article. We notice that he complains of Sir Charles Walpole's articles as savouring of antiquarianism, and writes: "We modern Home Rulers have it for our foible to be loyal to the twentieth century;" and later on: "We go not upon the past, but the present." That is absolutely the editorial view, but we do not agree with Professor Kettle that it is widely adopted. Many at least of modern Home Rulers are incessantly harping on English "robbery" in the past. Lord Dunraven has recently issued a volume* which will shortly be reviewed in these columns. The book is in excellent prose, and, as Professor Kettle would say, of much antiquarian interest. Its tendency, however, is to keep open the sore—not to heal it. We welcome the attitude of being "loyal to the twentieth century" and the policy of the clean slate.

A literary event of great importance to all who are interested in Shakespeare's works—and who is not, either at home or abroad?—is the promise of a new volume by Mr. Frank Harris. Very shortly Messrs. Methuen will publish "The Women of Shakespeare." We have had the advantage of seeing an advanced copy of the Introduction, and it foreshadows a study of great value and interest. The frontispiece is a portrait of the "Dark Lady of the Sonnets," drawn by Joseph Simpson after the portrait at Arbury.

That which Lady Newdigate-Newdigate in her book "Gossip from a Muniment Room" failed to appreciate, has not escaped Mr. Harris' trained perception. The authoress publishes one letter of Mary Fitton to her sister, with the comment that there is nothing remarkable in it. We cannot endorse that opinion, as Mr. Harris has discovered the line:

"Time, that limits all things, bares me of words."

The plan of the book is an elaborate examination of the prototypes amongst Shakespeare's surroundings who furnished him with the material for the female figures in his plays and sonnets.

The work promises to be one of extraordinary interest, judging by the Introduction, which is instinct with all the author's literary grace and charm. Many will look forward with an expectation of unusual enjoyment to the forthcoming publication.

We are informed that Abbas Effendi, the head of the Moslem sect professing the Bâbi reformed faith, is now in London, and we doubt not that he will be much exploited by those Churchmen of all denominations who are prone to sensationalism. It will be a misfortune if this single-minded professor of a simple and pure form of religion should be vulgarised by any modern form of advertisement. We publish in this number an article by Sir Charles Walpole on the little-known history of The Bâb and Bâbism.

* The Legacy of Past Years: a Study of Irish History. By the Earl of Dunraven, K.P. (John Murray. 7s. 6d.)

SIRMIO

[From Catullus]

My Sirmio, Queen, undoubted Queen of all the isles that be,
Whom Neptune hath on placid lakes or on the boisterous sea,
How gladsomely and with what joy do I revisit thee!

That I have left Bithynian plains and Thynia far behind
I scarcely may believe, but oh, what perfect peace of mind
My lovely Sirmio once again and all unharmed to find!

Oh, what more blest than cares dismissed, soul's burden laid aside,

Fatigued with travel and with toil, at home once more to hide,

And to the couch of one's desire the weary limbs confide?

Ah! this alone repays the toil of foreign field and dale, Hail, sweetest Sirmio, Queen of Isles, my happy homestead, hail!

To greet thy tardy lord's return let wine and song prevail!

Ye, too, rejoice, ye limpid lakes and waterfalls of Rome,
My merry-men, let laughter ring through mine ancestral dome,

To welcome to his native land your lord arriven home!

CYRIL MORGAN DREW.

THE WILLOW-TREE WOMAN

THE incense, an old vibration of the Japanese heart, quite peculiar, naturally fastidious, gesticulated, while stealing up from a two-horned dragon's mouth, for my friend (who returned home from America by the last steamer) to stop his talk on automobiles and sky-scrapers. It was only a little while since the new moon, looking so attractive after a shower-bath of rain, had left the pine branches of my garden. I begged my friend to change his Western sack-coat for one of my yukatas, the cotton summer dress with somewhat demonstrative design (thank heaven, it is in the summer time all free, when we are allowed to act even fantastically), as it was, I told him informally, out of place in my Japanese house; I confess that the poetical balance of my mind has grown to be easily ruined by a single harsh note of the too real West. When I, with my friend new-made in Japanese robe, most comfortably stretched my body upon the mats, I felt the night lovely, the dusk so blessed; my friend said he wished, if possible, to cry heartily while listening to some old Japanese songs of tragedy whose pain he had almost forgotten. The words reminded me at once that Madam Kosei, the well-known singer of gidayu or lyrical drama, was appearing in some entertainment-house close by; with much glee he received my suggestion to take him there. When we left the house the moon was seen nowhere.

"Dzden, den, den"—the sound of the three-stringed samisen trying for the right note was already heard when we sat ourselves down in the hall, where my artistic mind began soon to revolt against the electric-light, which only serves to diffuse the music deep or low, the song tragic or simple; I thought if we only could hear them in a small room, perhaps of eight mats, with candles lighted, where the voice reaches the ecstasy when it suffocates! The husky cough, quite natural for the professional singer who has forced her voice too severely, made us understand that we were going to hear Kosei in the tragic death of O Ryu, that poor willow-tree woman who grew under the blessing of dews and suns.

The audience hushed like water when the singer's voice rose: "The leaves fall, the tree cracks, the axe flashes. . . ." O Ryu, the willow-tree woman, shivers, trembles in pain as her last days are reached; she cries over her sleeping child, Midori, whom she got by Heitaro, her husband, and she says, "The child will grow even without the mother's milk. If he should become great and wise and live up to his father's reputation with arrow and bow! Oh, must his poor mother go away? The voice, the sad voice, calls me back to the tree. Oh, voice calling me back. . . ."

Once she had no human form, but was only the willow tree on whose high branch Suyetaka's hawk alighted when he was hunting, which was almost doomed, then, to be cut down, as he saw no other way to get the hawk; it was Heitaro, the clever archer, who shot the branches to pieces and rescued the bird, of course, and also saved the tree from its ruin. The inhuman tree grew human at once in feeling the sense of gratitude toward Heitaro, whom she decided to serve in the rôle of woman: the days, the years that passed made her forget that she was a tree; her love for her temporary husband was sealed in Midori.

The scene changes from night to day. The fallen willow tree never moves when people try to pull it to its destination. Who in the world could know its secret heart? Who could hear its inner voice, except Heitaro and Midori? When they hasten to the place, the tree, not wholly dead, seems to stir as if in joy; why should it not, as its husband and child have come to bid farewell at the moment it is taken over to the dark and death? The tree moves when Midori and Heitaro lead the people in singing, because they pull with the strength of humanity and love.

We, I and my friend, were silent when we returned home from the entertainment-hall; I fancied that he was impressed as much as I was. We all take the same step in the matter of humanity without any discussion. I left my friend in his room, I myself retiring into the mosquito-net of my compartment, whence I could see the paper lantern still burning in the darkness, swinging as if a lost spirit of the willow-tree, perhaps, of my garden; what would it speak to me? I could not sleep for some long while, being absorbed in my own reflection.

It was Buddhism which encouraged and endorsed the superstition, even with added reasonings; it would only need a little light of circumstances to make it shine like a pearl which quickens itself, to speak figuratively, with the golden faith within. The humanising of a tree, whether it be a willow or a pine, has its origin in the general Nature-worship which is as old as the sun and the moon; I think it is one of the prides we can fairly well claim that we never laugh, jeer at, or wound Nature, and never invade her domain with cold hearts; it is, in truth, the Western intellect that has taught us of the scheme and secret how to force the battle against Nature. Must we thank the West for our disillusionment? It was the romance of trees—like that of the willow, for instance—that saved at least old Japan from natural ruin; how such an allegorical story impressed our Japanese mind!

I used to hear, when I was young, of the lovely maiden ever so young and sad, who disappeared, like a star into the morning mist, into the cherry-tree, when the evening bell sent the sun down across the West, and the flower-petals fell fast to the ground; I began to dream of the luminous moment of meeting with that lady of apparition, when my boyhood grew to ripen into youth, and of the ecstasy of shock and deathless joy in her single touch. I confess I was ever so haunted by the woman of the cherry-tree. The pain I earned from realising the fact that I should never get her, although she was within my hand's grasp, became healed only lately.

Where I lost my idealism I got humanity; to-day, when my days of youth have begun to fade into the colour of grey, I am married, and have children crawling by my side. The story of the willow-tree appeals to my mind more intensely than the lady of the cherry-blossom. I think that the worship of the tree belongs to an age ten years later than the flower adoration.

YONE NOGUCHI.

DE OMNIBUS REBUS

BY ARTHUR MACHEN

It must be, I think, four years since I wrote in THE ACADEMY on the subject of Education. And a day or two ago, looking in the daily paper, I saw that somebody had been pointing out that a classical education disposed men to idleness, and that technical instruction in the methods of production and distribution was more useful than the classics, and equally elevating.

Now, though this is nonsense, it is not quite the usual nonsense which is talked on the subject. The man who is opposed to compulsory Greek at the Universities is usually content to say that, though Greek is beautiful, there are comparatively few who are mentally fit to study it; that most young men are constitutionally incapable of deriving benefit from Homer and Sophocles, and that it is mere waste of time to force them to acquire an elementary knowledge of a language which they will never appreciate, and the reformer in most cases presses for some branch or branches of physical science as a substitute for Greek. Then there is another body of opinion which declares brutally, but in the main truly, that Greek does not pay, and that the Universities should teach business methods—otherwise the art of hustling. There are many minds to whom the school described by Stevenson in "The Wrecker" must appeal as the perfection of good sense; the pupils were given imaginary credits at the beginning of each term, and were required to speculate, day by day, in Wall Street and the Wheat Pit. But the most recent of our educational reformers not only says that Greek does not pay, but that a knowledge of commerce elevates the mind. It is an astounding claim; for the life of me I cannot see how a process of instruction in the manufacture, transmission and distribution of Siberian butter and Dutch gin can have on the mind an effect in any way analogous to that produced by the Odyssey or the Edipus. One might as well say that a draper's shop is as good as the "Arabian Nights;" the proposition is evidently sheer, unthinkable nonsense.

It is nonsense because the aim of true education is to develop, to foster and direct the imaginative faculty—incomparably the most important asset in the human equipment. In saying this, I do not mean to declare that writing novels is the supreme office of man, though I do mean to say that the faculty by which novels are written is the supreme faculty of man. In logical language the imagination is the human "difference;" it is of the essence of humanity. That is, a man without imagination is a contradiction in terms, as inconceivable as a dormouse with a taste for landscape-painting and lyrical poetry. All human performance, every great achievement of man, is the result of the exercise of the imagination; and, it may be added, by the way, this faculty is as necessary in keeping shop as in writing poetry or building Cathedrals. When the late Professor Churton Collins was in America he met an engineer, who told him that he was firmly convinced of the value of the classics in business—in his own business. "They stimulate the imagination," he said, "and all invention is the result of a powerful imagination." Before reading the "Life" of Churton Collins I had occasion to deal with aeroplanes in an article that I was writing. I pointed out that if men had not dreamed long ago of Icarus and of the flying-horse we should not have got our letters by the "First U.K. Aerial Post" the other day. And when you are shown a whole street of shops bearing the same name, and are told how the founder of the business began with one small shop and one assistant you may be sure that here is a case of imagination applied to retail trading.

For reasons of all kinds, then, education ought to be so ordered as to do everything possible for the development of this faculty; and there is no better way than the way of Latin and Greek. Here you have two literatures; that is, two new-old worlds of thoughts and dreams and beauty; and he who makes the voyage and discovery of these worlds has of necessity widened and broadened and strengthened his imaginative faculty; he is so much more of a man than he who knows no tongue but his own.

Of course there is one great and pressing reform needed in classical—as in all other—education. Referring again to the Life of Professor Churton Collins, I see that Mr. Frederic Harrison, writing to the Professor about the study of Italian, declined to discuss some Board of Examiners; all examiners and all examinations, Mr. Harrison declared, were essentially and inevitably and invariably bad. This is one of the truest and the best things that I have read for many a long day: examinations and the mode of teaching which examinations make necessary are, indeed, utter abominations, grotesque and injurious follies. Examination knowledge is mechanical knowledge, and mechanism of any kind, material or spiritual, is the great foe of the imagination. The examiner and his "papers" should be abolished; and in their place the old system of the thesis—and, possibly, of the disputation—should be restored. The only test of real knowledge is the doing of original work. The carpenter who wants a job is not required to describe a plane from memory; he has to show that he knows how to use a plane.

It is ill indeed that people are talking this sorry stuff about the abolition of the classics, in this age of all others, when we are most in need of them. It is odd how the obvious things, how the things which are terribly and insistently obvious, somehow seem to elude our observation. Ask half a dozen men to tell you what in their opinion is the distinguishing and prerogative mark of the present age: each will give you a different answer, and I doubt if one will be the true and real answer. The religious man will tell you, sadly, that there is a great falling off in faith—people don't believe as they used to believe. The politician will impress on you that this is a democratic age; that "the people" are at length coming to their own. The "practical" man will talk of the improved means of locomotion; he will tell you that in the last hundred years we have made more advance in this way than in the eighteen hundred years which preceded them. Then another will point to the spread of education; yet another to the extraordinary developments of science; another to the unique complexity of the social and economic problem in our times. And all these answers are right in a sense; but not one of them is the real answer. Most of these points have been paralleled in the past. No period can ever be more faithless than the age in which Horace flourished. The servile class did not vote in the Athens of the Peloponnesian war; but the Athenian democracy was democratic enough to ruin the State by sheer power of oratory—otherwise gabble. As for modern science—I speak, be it understood, of the science of the last ten years—it is rapidly approximating to the position of the ancient alchemists. And as for education, I have seen many letters from the products of the modern L.C.C. school which are neither better nor worse spelt than the epistle of the Vinegar-yard lady in Smollett. No, none of these answers really establishes the grand point of difference between this age and other ages. Even the swift travelling answer is not satisfactory. It is true we do move about much more quickly than our ancestors; but the difference is neither radical nor essential. I cannot feel that Edinburgh, for example, would impinge differently upon me if I took eighty hours to get to it instead of eight hours.

What, then, is the essential difference between man as he is and man as he was? Just this, I think, that imagination has become—or almost become—a dead language. Observe, I do not say an unknown language. Latin is a tongue perfectly well-known to a good many people. Indeed, I have no doubt that there have been hundreds or even thousands of scholars in the last three hundred years whose knowledge of Latin has been greater than that possessed by many ancient Romans. Nevertheless, Latin is undoubtedly a dead language.

And so it is with the imagination. We have great artists now—men who by a conscious and intense effort unlearn, as it were, the tongue that is in their ears all day long, and acquire the strange speech of beauty. These are the fakirs of art; people who through great agonies have raised themselves into a kind of superhuman ecstasy. We have artists as we have scholars; but we have no craftsmen, any more than we have little children who babble away in funny, unconscious Latin to one another, quite unaware of the fact that they are using the oratio obliqua, and of the rule as to dum in the sense of donec. A man no longer takes a bit of wood, a bit of stone, or a bit of iron, and quite unconsciously makes it into something beautiful. He may be taught to copy—and perhaps to copy exquisitely—the work of former years; but if he does so he will be speaking a dead language; he will be like a clever schoolboy with his elegiacs, that sound as good as anything that Ovid ever wrote, which are, for all that, a mere exercise: wax fruit, not fruit growing and swelling on the tree. And all the natural and unconscious beauties of the old craftsmen were fruits of the live tree of the imagination, and that tree, I am afraid, is now dead.

HOME RULE AND ANTIQUARIANISM

By PROFESSOR T. M. KETTLE

I.

SIR CHARLES WALPOLE will not think me merely rude if I begin by observing that his two excellent articles* belong rather to antiquarianism than to politics. Who now reads Bolingbroke? asked Edmund Burke. And who now dreams of linking the modern Home Rule demand with Poynings' Act or the Sixth of George the First? The assemblies of which Sir Charles Walpole writes were not Parliaments of Ireland: they were merely Parliaments of the English interest in Ireland. As such, they are a fit and fruitful subject for research. Not only do they belong to Irish history, but, studied at large and in the full context of their times, they are Irish history. But to the ordinary Nationalist they have no more to do with Home Rule than the Edict of Nantes.

Let me explain. There was a period—about the beginning of the eighteenth century—in which the history of Parliamentary institutions in Ireland was canvassed in a violent controversy. Less than a decade after the Battle of the Boyne Ireland renews her old task of conquering her conquerors. The colonists stir with that ferment which is afterwards, in Grattan's words and under Grattan's leadership, to "transform a Protestant settlement into an Irish nation." In such circumstances these men of the Pale naturally turned for justification to the history of the Pale Parliaments. Molyneux, the friend of Petty, argued the independence of Ireland—that is to say, the English colony in Ireland—with such weight of precedent that the Government handed over his book for review to their most effective critic—the public hangman. That functionary burned it in 1698 with all due ceremony; but the book had a hidden flame of its own which struck from mind to mind, not missing Swift's, until corruption was withered up, and a place scorched clean for the founding of Grattan's Parliament.

In those days Sir Charles Walpole's essay would have touched raw nerves in Dublin and London. Favourably or unfavourably received, he would certainly have had nothing to complain of in the matter of liveliness. To-day one reads it with a sort of pleasant lassitude. It interests, even fascinates, but it has nothing in the world to do with the Home Rule Bill of 1912. Suppose you prove to a Nationalist that Ireland, or at least the Pale, did in the past enjoy political autonomy as of right; he will reply, "Very good. Let us restore it in a large way." If per impossibile you prove the contrary, he will reply, with unruffled amiability, "Very good. Since Irish autonomy has never before existed, it will be our glory to create it." Either way you are encumbering yourself with what a Longford peasant would call dead knowledge.

II.

All this will apply with less force to the Parliament of 1782-1800 than to earlier Assemblies. That body was but the mutilated torso of a National Parliament. Or rather, since a living image is more appropriate, it was an immature organism which had not yet grown up, and was never suffered to grow up, to the stature of the Irish nation. Yet, although it was a Garrison Parliament, it had begun to find its way to the hearts and the affection of the people. Although it was a Penal-law Parliament, it had learned from Grattan the gospel of religious freedom, and had in 1793 made a substantial move towards the emancipation of the Catholic majority. Above all, and for all its limitations, it was an experiment in freedom which had richly justified itself, especially in the field of material progress. For these reasons the extinction of Grattan's Parliament is regarded by Home Rulers of the present day as a crime of lèse-liberté of a fundamental kind; the memory of what that Assembly was and what it did holds a place both in the prose and in the poetry of the national movement. And for these reasons it is necessary to correct a cardinal error into which Sir Charles Walpole has fallen:—

This Parliament, which extinguished itself more than a century ago, was, with one exception, a Home Rule Parliament as defined by Mr. Redmond—viz., "a Parliament freely elected, with an executive responsible thereto."

The exception which he specifies turns on the exclusion of Catholics. But there was another exception which breaks the very backbone of the comparison. The Executive Government in Grattan's Parliament was responsible not to the Irish, but to the English House of Commons. Without this fact as a key, the course of Irish politics in that period would be altogether unintelligible. In a matter so notorious it is hardly necessary to call witnesses, but the reader will permit me to quote the brief account of the system given by Mrs. J. R. Green in her recent book "Irish Nationality:"—

All Bills had to go through the Privy Council, whose secret and overwhelming influence was backed by the Privy Council in England, the English law officers, and finally the English Cabinet. Irish proposals were rejected not in Parliament, but in these secret Councils. The King had a veto in Ireland, not in England. The English Cabinet, changing with English parties, had the last word on every Irish Bill. There was no Irish Cabinet responsible to the Irish Houses; no Ministry resigned, whatever the majority by which it was defeated.

It was precisely because Grattan's Parliament was not a Home Rule Parliament that Pitt and his agents were able to organise its suicide and self-extinction. It must be remembered that when the Union was first proposed in

* THE ACADEMY, September 23rd and September 30th.

1799 it was defeated. Had a system of Home Rule existed the Government would have been driven from office, and in the inevitable Election the patriotic Opposition would have damned Pitt's plan beyond all redemption. But the Government were under no compulsion to resign. They remained to bribe, to bully, to cajole with insincere promises, and by these methods to accomplish what Lecky styles the great crime and great blunder of the Union.

III.

So much for what I have called, in no wounding spirit, the antiquarianism of Home Rule. Let me not seem so foolish as to suggest that there is no historical argument for Irish autonomy: such an argument there is, and, fully understood, it is conclusive. But to find it you must go to the whole spiritual and material history of the Irish nation, and not to the merely political history of that fragment of the Garrison which, from time to time, created for itself assemblies of varying degrees of power or impotence. This argument has often been made, but we modern Home Rulers have it for our foible to be loyal to the twentieth century. We are sick of that caricature which depicts Ireland as the mad heroine of a sort of perpetual suttee in which all the interests of the present are immolated on the funeral-pyre of the past. "Repeal the Union!" cried Canning in one of his lapses; "Restore the Heptarchy!" We agree. The mere fact that an institution existed a hundred years ago is no reason why it should be re-established to-day; that principle, if conceded, would bring back not only Grattan's Parliament, but the Bourbons. We go, not upon the past, but upon the present. History is indeed necessary to any full comprehension of the content of politics; it is the Rubicon between savagery and civilisation, between a horde and a nation. But if all the histories were burned, and an impartial observer (moved by no bias except a weakness for justice and efficiency) were to study the actual government of Ireland, we claim that his report would be an unanswerable case for Home Rule. An attempt will be made in a further article to give a sort of shorthand summary of the main lines of that report. For the moment, as an indispensable introduction, we may so far follow Sir Charles Walpole as to ascertain, by the historical method, what is really meant by Home Rule.

There has been in Ireland a marked evolution of thought on the subject. O'Connell began by demanding simple Repeal of the Union. But by 1844 he had advanced towards a Federal programme.

"Besides the local Parliament in Ireland having full and perfect local authority," he writes in that year, "there should be, for questions of Imperial concern, colonial, military and naval, and of foreign alliance and policy a Congressional or Federal Parliament, in which Ireland should have a fair share and proportion of representation and power." The change of programme was not received with universal approval. O'Connell died, and Repeal and Federation alike were swallowed up in the Great Famine. But when Isaac Butt came to formulate his scheme at the Home Rule Conference of 1873, he renewed the Federal proposal in terms almost verbally the same. The Conference resolved:—

That, in claiming these rights and privileges for our country, we adopt the principle of a Federal arrangement, which would secure to the Irish Parliament the right of legislating for and regulating all matters relating to the internal affairs of Ireland, while leaving to the Imperial Parliament the power of dealing with all questions affecting the Imperial Crown and Government, legislation regarding the colonies and other dependencies of the Crown, the relations of the Empire with Foreign States, and all matters appertaining to the defence and stability of the Empire at large; as well as the power of granting and providing the supplies necessary for Imperial purposes.

Mr. Parnell declared his mind with great candour on the introduction of Mr. Gladstone's Bill in 1886:—

Undoubtedly I should have preferred the restitution of Grattan's Parliament . . . but I consider that there are practical advantages connected with the proposed statutory body, limited and subordinate to the Imperial Parliament as it undoubtedly will be, which will render it much more useful and advantageous to the Irish people than was Grattan's Parliament. . . .

It seems clearly established, by the way, that Mr. Parnell had never been at the trouble of ascertaining the nature and powers of Grattan's Parliament. Mr. Redmond stands where Parnell stood. He claims for the Irish people "the legislative and executive control of all purely Irish affairs."

Where, asks the triumphant critic, is the line to be drawn between Irish and Imperial affairs? We answer that it was drawn by O'Connell and Butt, by Gladstone and Parnell. It can be drawn to meet the circumstances of to-day by men of goodwill, after discussion and mutual adjustment. Why not postpone Ireland until a scheme of Home Rule all round, either for the United Kingdom or for the whole Empire, can be worked out? We answer that Ireland comes first on grounds both of ethics and expediency. But a Home Rule assembly, functioning in Dublin, may well afford a model and a basis for a new organisation of the Empire. If so, let it be remembered that it was not Mr. Chamberlain but Mr. O'Connell who first in these countries gave Imperialism a definite and articulate form. Enough has been said at all events to show that Home Rule is no mere resurrection of a mouldered past, but a modern polity devised for modern needs. It differs not in species, but in genus from the Assemblies of which Sir Charles Walpole has written.

SOME NEW EXPERIENCES

BY FRANK HARRIS

AGAIN and again lately I have been asked why I don't criticise living writers and books of the day in the same spirit as I criticise Shakespeare. Now whenever the chance comes to me this is just what I do: I criticised Arnold Bennett's "The Old Wives' Tale" in this way, and now I seize the opportunity to talk of Mr. Wells' latest book and a play of Lord Dunsany.

The book of Mr. Wells is entitled "The Country of the Blind" (Nelsons), and contains some thirty of his short stories—all those he thinks worthy of republication. In an "Introduction," which deals with the efflorescence of short stories in the 'nineties, he mentions me with Barrie and Stevenson among the notable writers, and I can hardly show my appreciation better than by talking frankly of some of these short stories of his. The majority I had read when they first appeared, and had found abundant cleverness in them and an admirable sense of what is fitting in form and language; but nothing more, no revelation of human nature, no appeal to the soul, nothing enduring. Had that been all I should have been unable to say anything of this book, for it is my custom only to consider such books as I love and can therefore praise from the bottom of my heart. The star-finder and not the fault-finder, it seems to me, is the true critic.

In this book, however, there are two stories which I read with the keenest interest—two stories of the kind I most admire, which, therefore, I am delighted to praise and appraise, for they will show us Mr. Wells, I believe, at his most characteristic. The two stories are "The Country of the Blind," which has given its name to the book, and "The Door in the Wall." Both stories are symbolic, and have accordingly a double interest for us as stories first and afterwards as allegories illustrating some spiritual truth or experience.

Before analysing them let me say one thing in general about their author and his place in contemporary literature. In my opinion neither Barrie nor Stevenson has written anything at all comparable with these two stories of Mr. Wells. Indeed, "The Man Who Would be King" is the only story of Kipling which I would rank with these two, and, speaking frankly, I prefer "The Country of the Blind" to Kipling's best.

Having said this about Mr. Wells not grudgingly but with real pleasure, I must get to the stories themselves. On reading them through again I cannot recapture the pleasure I felt when I first read "The Door in the Wall." It seems to me only half thought out. It's as if a man of genius had caught the idea of a great story and then treated it off-hand slap-dash as a journalist.

I do not speak only of the writing of the story, but of the architecture of it, though, as often happens, the writing is on much the same level as the architecture. The hero is a child when he first finds the Door in the Wall, the door leading into the paradise of dreams, the ideal world. Now that does not seem to me to be true.

A child has no need of a door in the wall in order to find paradise: the whole world is miraculous to him, wonderful, fascinating. It is not an ordinary person who is about to come round the corner, but an Indian in full war-paint with bleeding scalps hanging from his waistbelt. The loafer at the public-house is not a wastrel, but a boatswain who has just returned from a pirate cruise on the Spanish main. In childhood all doors lead into the ideal world. But when childhood is over and forgotten and the real world has made its grotesque, tragic imprint on the soul, the youth finds the door in the wall with his first love; she first teaches him that he is dirtied with the world's mud, and his ideals even are unworthy. It is his first love which transforms the world for him, shows him what might be, opens for him the door in the wall, and gives him a foretaste of paradise.

Mr. Wells is not content with choosing a child to find the door in the wall; he also invents a sort of governess, who turns the child out of his earthly paradise; and here again the symbolism of the story, it seems to me, is not observed. No outsider turns us out of paradise; we leave the ideal world of our own free will, because, after all, we are much more at home in the real world, and our souls hanker after the fleshpots. The youth comes out of his paradise because he misses the homely touch of common things, and his soul even thirsts for the taste of a girl's lips. At least so it seems to me, and I should have liked Mr. Wells to find the artistic symbol for this truth.

Still, I admire "The Door in the Wall" on the whole, though I should have preferred another ending. I think Mr. Wells should have presented his hero as having attained his goal and realised his ambition; he should have been offered the Premiership, and then when he had reached the best that this world could offer I would have had him turn away to seek the "Door in the Wall" and the ideal world. Still, as I say, Mr. Wells' version is provocative and interesting, though I must insist that I could not re-read the story with the pleasure I felt at first. It did not seem to me to wear well.

I can leave it the more readily because it is not so good a story as "The Country of the Blind." Mr. Wells was right to make this, the eponymous story, the chief story of the book. It is far and away the best story in it, and I think one of Mr. Wells' latest stories; at any rate it is his masterpiece.

Mr. Wells compares the short story with a small picture, and this is the right way of looking at it; but if, instead of treating the short story or small picture as a "jolly art," he had just recalled the fact that all the greatest stories of the world were short stories, that "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" and "Lear," like the "Antigone" and the "Agamemnon," are short stories, just as most of the great pictures of the world are small pictures, he would have come nearer the truth. But still here is his masterpiece. Let us see how he has treated it.

"The Country of the Blind" is thirty-three pages long, or, say, ten thousand words, and the first thing that strikes me is that Mr. Wells takes nearly ten pages to get his hero into "The Country of the Blind," ten pages which have no influence on the story at all, which do not even tell us much about the hero; ten pages of what I must call scaffolding, necessary to the builder, no doubt, in order to help his imagination to work, but which should have been taken away after the house was built, the story realised.

But now we come with Nunez the mountaineer of the Andes, and find ourselves in "the narrow, shut-in valley which is 'The Country of the Blind.'" At the very beginning Mr. Wells strikes the keynote. Through the mind of Nunez runs the old proverb, as if it were a refrain, "In the country of the blind the one-eyed man is king."

It was this proverb, no doubt, which gave Mr. Wells the idea of the story. He will show us that this proverb is not true, is indeed the reverse of the truth, the theme of Mr. Wells' story being that in the country of the blind the man with eyes will be made a common servant, and before he is admitted to citizenship or fellowship he must lose his eyes and become blind. Now there is, of course, an element of truth in this theory.

All the stories of great men born into the world are stories of men gifted with eyesight in the country of the blind. It is not true that the man with sight becomes king; it is never true except with many qualifications. Let us examine the matter. With fine insight Mr. Wells begins with the fact that the blind will not believe what the man with eyes says, and the truths he tells them make them hate him. He represents to us that Nunez, his hero, gets into conflict with the blind people, which, of course, is true, and at last, in order to get food, he has to submit to them, and they make him a servant. Here my agreement with Mr. Wells comes to an end.

He represents Nunez as isolated in a hostile world; no one believes in him, no one credits the fact of his vision; even the girl he loves begs him to submit to an operation, and be blinded in order to become like an ordinary person. Rather than consent to this, he leaves her, and climbs up out of the shut-in valley, and turns his back for ever on the country of the blind.

Now all this, it seems to me, is false, and a libel on humanity of the worst. Mr. Wells has fallen into a half truth lower than the proverb he seeks to disprove; lower because more hopeless and more untrue. The truth is that in the country of the blind the one-eyed man is king; but not the man with two eyes and perfect sight. Your Mahomet, who is one-eyed, makes himself king; your Shakespeare, who has two eyes and perfect sight, is made a common servant of, and passes through life almost unknown by the many. It is, however, absolutely untrue to say that even a towering genius like Shakespeare can be born into the world with no one to understand him or appreciate him. On the contrary, your Ben Jonson sees him completely, and, when he is not blinded by vanity and jealousy, he will boldly proclaim that Shakespeare was not "for an age, but for all time," greater than any Greek or Roman of them all, an Immortal among the Immortals. Even Lord Southampton saw enough of him to give him £1,000, or say £10,000 of our money, in order to let him buy the best house in Stratford, and write his "Hamlets," that no one cared for, rather than the "Titus Andronicuses" which every one hurried to see. On this side and on that, when he least expected it, Shakespeare found admirers and defenders. Were that not true genius would end in suicide. And as we drop in the scale and come to the one-eyed we find the appreciation more common and the admiration more intense.

Luther comes out of the first examination almost in despair. Every one seems against him, the nobles as well as the priests, and the common people are awe-stricken and stand aloof. Suddenly a knight whom he does not know comes up to him and slaps him on the shoulder cheerily: "Well done, little monk!" he cries; "go on; you'll win yet;" and Luther, thrilling, makes up his mind to go on to Worms "though it rain devils." Mahomet, too, found supporters even among his enemies, and help and encouragement on all hands. Did not Napoleon conquer twenty millions of people without a weapon and almost without striking a blow? The truth is every great man born into the world is surrounded by an invisible cloud of witnesses, some of whom see him as he is, others catch glimpses now and then of his greatness, enough to recognise and admire and love him. Of course he will be lonely in proportion to his greatness, but he will never be alone, and for the one supporter whom he knows there are a hundred whom he may never know, but who are working for him. What does Wordsworth say?—

Thou hast great allies.
Thy friends are exultations, agonies
And love and man's unconquerable mind.

One other feature of Mr. Wells' story strikes me as untrue and unduly pessimistic. The girl whom Nunez loves does not recognise his superiority, and begs him to let himself be blinded in order to be as other men and marry her. This appears to me a libel on womanhood: when even the Disciples hide themselves and hold aloof, the women kept near the Cross heedless of self. Mahomet's wife stood by him through good and evil report, even when he married a younger woman. The girl Shakespeare loved did not, perhaps, see him as we see him; but she surely knew that he was an extraordinary man, and gave herself to him in defiance of convention and morality with passionate abandonment. The truth is that the great man, almost without exception, finds his most constant and most loyal supporters among women. Women have a peculiar weakness for the best and for the worst of men. It is mediocrity that leaves them cold.

Mr. Wells' reading of the whole story is unduly pessimistic, a libel on humanity: and how lamely it ends! Nunez, the great man, can do nothing but leave the Country of the Blind no wiser than he entered it. What an impotent and disappointing conclusion!

And yet the idea is a great idea, and the story one of the best of English stories, only Mr. Wells has taken his art too lightly; the "jolly art" must be a ministry before it produces a masterpiece.

REVIEWS

A NATION IN THE MAKING

A Holiday in South Africa. By the RIGHT HON. SIR H. MORTIMER DURAND. (William Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.)

A WORK from the pen of Sir H. Mortimer Durand cannot fail to attract attention, even though it be of the light nature suggested by its title. The book, indeed, consists of a number of sketches which have appeared in serial form, and which are concerned with the author's experiences in the course of his trip, a journey undertaken in order to "watch on the spot the progress of the movement which has now resulted in the birth of a new nation."

The author's itinerary included Capetown—this as a matter of course—Kimberley, Potchefstroom, the battlefields of Natal, Johannesburg, Pretoria, Bulawayo, the Victoria Falls, and Salisbury. Thus he saw many things, and what is more, if the expression be permissible, he saw them shrewdly, as was only to be expected. Perhaps the most valuable of his remarks are those which deal with the question affecting Briton and Boer, whites and blacks. Concerning the eventual fusion of the two former races he is optimistic. It is undoubtedly with strong reason that Sir Mortimer points out that the differences which separated them, far from being inherent, were for the most part the result of mutual misunderstandings. Although in certain quarters some slumbering rancour may yet remain, there can be no doubt that the final traces of this must in the very near future die out completely beneath the force of the new ideals which now fill the mental horizon of the South African.

However paradoxical it may appear, no force would seem to rival that of a sanguinary war in the subsequent uniting of factions and nations. In South Africa history has repeated itself once again. Until the conclusion of the great struggle between Briton and Boer the conception of United South Africa was an undreamed-of thing. Nevertheless during the past decade not only has birth been given to the idea, but the vague inception of the ambition has now matured and swollen into a definite aim that looms large in the minds of the various colonies. This, when it is achieved—as, apparently, cannot fail sooner or later to be the case—must inevitably quench the last sparks of jealousy and animosity. The predicted consummation, it is true, cannot fail to exercise a certain influence upon the Empire as a whole; but so long as the leaders continue to be imbued with a fitting spirit not only of patriotism, but of ordinary fairness, there is no reason why this influence should not work purely towards a very admirable end. In any case, the workings of this new force are already evident, having increased amazingly in intensity during the past two years. In Natal itself, "of all the four colonies the most exclusively British in blood and sentiment," the growth of national feeling has already attained to unexpected proportions. Concerning this the following paragraph is of exceptional interest:—

As one Natal man put it to me, "The Dutch don't love us and we shall have some unpleasant pills to swallow; but if we keep our tempers all will come right in the end. It is better for the country." That was what men were beginning to say everywhere, "It is better for the country." Among soldiers and civilians alike, between October and January, the feeling seemed to spread like a prairie fire. The men who had come out in their thousands nine years before to fight against the Boer invaders now caught up the cry of Africa for the Africander; and merchant and lawyer and farmer seemed to join in with equal enthusiasm.

The agitation, the author explains, is the work of Englishmen loyal to the British flag, and than the chief of their Boer collaborators, General Botha, no personage is to be more fully admired and trusted. Sir Mortimer Durand has much to say on the relations between the colonies and the motherland. Very justly he emphasises the fact that, while untravelled folk at home clamour for a full measure of loyalty from Greater Britain, they themselves are not a little apt to forget that they owe to the lands oversea as much as is given. As an example of crass foolishness he cites the case of an Englishman who inquired of a visiting Canadian concerning his President, naming the President of the United States!

On the subject of the colour problem the author's remarks cannot fail to be appreciated by those who have had actual experience of this very burning question. Although the expression of his views is necessarily somewhat guarded, he is in favour of yielding to the judgment of the men on the spot whose knowledge has been gained by practical experience. The Kaffir is a child with the passions of a man, and undoubtedly requires firmer handling than is agreeable to the minds of a number of sentimental and untravelled folk in England. The present condition of affairs is, to say the least of it, unsatisfactory. The limitations of caste have entered with lamentable thoroughness into the field of manual labour. All unskilled labour, having become "Kaffir's work," is shunned by the white, whether Afrikaner or newly-arrived European. The result has been the inevitable one—the demoralisation of the lower classes of European labourers, and the formation of an aristocracy of the whites that is to a large extent spurious. The situation is the more to be regretted since so large a proportion of South Africa is eminently fitted for European manual toil. No effectual remedy has yet been introduced, but the situation is one that has to be faced in all seriousness, for until a solution is found the progress of South Africa will continue to be retarded by a condition of affairs that in itself is purely artificial.

PAULINE THEOLOGY

St. Paul in the Light of Modern Research. By the REV. J. R. COHU, sometime Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. (Edward Arnold. 5s. net.)

It is a pity that Mr. Cohu did not give his latest book the title which in his Preface he admits would have been better—viz., "St. Paul in the Light of Modern Thought." For the chief part of this clever work is a searching examination of Pauline theology in relation to the development of modern views on Christianity. At the same time those who know the author's former writings will understand that there is no shrinking from the most recent critical standpoint, though such criticism is rather incidental than the main thesis.

Mr. Cohu adopts the view of Matthew Arnold that "Paul's reign has only begun," and that his influence in the future will lie in direct ratio to the liberation of his ideas "from the elaborate misconceptions with which ecclesiasticism has overlaid them." We wonder what Arnold would have said about Mr. Cohu's estimate of St. Paul's conception of the Church and the Sacraments. It appears to us sufficiently "ecclesiastical" to accommodate the most orthodox. But whatever line he adopts, Mr. Cohu is possessed with a refreshing, even captivating boldness.

He begins by the startling, if probable, statement that "Paul himself, were he amongst us now, would be the very first to call for a revision of his own theology in the interests of Paulinism and of religion itself." It is slightly humorous to contemplate Paul among the higher critics. It is no disparagement to Mr. Cohu to say that he has himself stepped into the gap. But his method is not so much that of revision as an explanation of the development of St. Paul's ideas to a convergent maturer aspect by a natural evolution of his views, and an endeavour to translate the Pauline theology into the message required to-day. This in itself is no easy task, especially in the face of the varying and contradictory opinions on St. Paul's writings advanced by opposing schools of thought. We congratulate Mr. Cohu on a distinct measure of success. He has given us a scholarly piece of work, full of original thought, with a keen perception of the complex and baffling character of the Apostle. His chief aim is to show that the theology or teaching of St. Paul is based absolutely on the religion of Christ, and that these two are absolutely correlative: in concrete expression the Gospel of the Sermon on the Mount and the Gospel of the Pauline Epistles is one.

Such a position, we are aware, presents great difficulties to some minds. In dealing with this difficulty Mr. Cohu is at his best. With minute care he approaches what seem glaring inconsistencies, while he patiently unravels the tangle of Judaism in which Paul's philosophy is wrapped. The bed-rock of his position is the personal relation of Paul to Christ. Paul's views on Predestination, Justification, and Election may be illogical, inconsistent, limited, and coloured with Rabbinical teaching. That does not touch us to-day. What is important is his conception of the Person and work of Christ, and, above all, his experience and realisation of the effects of Christ's example and teaching on his own life, and, prophetically, on the life of all Christians in succeeding ages. This is admirably brought out by Mr. Cohu. In our estimate to-day of St. Paul's teaching we have to liberate ourselves from hallowed prejudices, from traditional views and accepted prepossessions, but "it is as hard for us to escape from them as it was for Paul to shake himself entirely free of his Rabbinic Judaism." Mr. Cohu thinks that the difficulty is insuperable for many. But he has done first-rate pioneering work in clearing the way. Not that he would claim to have overcome all obstacles. Far from it. Paul's views on sin and death, flesh and spirit bring us into very deep waters. Yet one great truth emerges—salvation through the love of Christ. This should be sufficiently clear as an answer to those who say "Leave St. Paul and go back to Christ." But in this direction Paul is emphatically the leader. Here pre-eminently, Mr. Cohu rightly insists, is his message to modern thought.

Having said thus much, it is only fair to add that we cannot quite follow the author in all his interpretations. The chapter on Paul's Conversion is weak and inconclusive. To attach the hackneyed label "psychological" tells us nothing. To speak of "eliminating the magical element" betrays a misleading notion of the term "magic," which is a crude mechanical process totally different from supernatural religion. Is any difference of belief required for the account of Paul's Conversion and for the Baptism or Transfiguration, or the Ascension of Christ? Is there any difference of degree? Is one more difficult than the other? But there is nothing savouring of "magic," as anthropologically understood, in any of these relations.

The chapter on the gradual development of Paul's views on Eschatology is remarkable for some unexpected deductions; notably that his later teaching involves our Lord's Resurrection direct from the Cross and not from the Tomb, that our resurrection is instantaneous at the moment of death, that there is no intermediate state, and that Paul believed in the universal salvation of all mankind. These and similar difficulties are summed up in an excellent appendix on the hopeless Antinomies of St. Paul. All students of the Pauline Epistles should welcome Mr. Cohu's valuable study, which certainly finds a place among the ablest and most interesting theological works of the year.

POEMS

The Inn of Dreams. By OLIVE CUSTANCE (Lady Alfred Douglas). (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

The City of the Soul. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS. Third Edition. (John Lane. 5s net.)

SEVERAL of the poems by "Olive Custance," which appear in this new collection, "The Inn of Dreams," will be familiar to those who have read a slim volume by the same author entitled "The Blue Bird," "Endymion," "Hyacinthus," "Black Butterflies," "Beauty," and others, are here reprinted. Knowing the prevailing attribute of these—a certain charming dreaminess of outlook which invests all things seen with a mantle of gleaming, jewel-like words—they will be prepared to find the same quality expressed here. It is the same quality, we must admit—neither stronger nor more advanced in thought, and to the sternly critical eye there is not much "muscle" in these poems. There is considerable beauty, however, and we are not sure whether it is not better to write daintily and delicately than to belong, as it were, to the glorious company of footballer poets who kick their ideas high into the heavens and gasp mightily and unrhythmically with the exertion. They are liable to be rather unlovely and crude; they can never make the Little passionate song

Out of the shadows of immortal things, as "Olive Custance" happily expresses it. Hardly a poem in this book is without some haunting line, such as the imagery from "Spring in the South," a sonnet:—

And as a lovely woman languidly
Trailing her long blue robes, so comes the sea. . . .

Some of the stanzas err, however, by being too precious and artificial; the first passage of "Candle-light" is an example:—

Frail golden flowers that perish at a breath,
Flickering points of honey-coloured flame,
From sun-set gardens of the moon you came,
Pale flowers of passion . . . delicate flowers of death . . .

Very young poets invariably do this sort of work, and are generally sorry for it after. How much better and stronger is the sonnet entitled "Grief," with its fine opening:—

I, that was once so eager for the light,
The vehement pomp and passion of the day,
Am tired at last, and glad to steal away
Across the dusky borders of the night;

or the little lyric "Daffodil Dawn," simple, yet as cleanly and clearly cut as a diamond.

Lord Alfred Douglas, while intent as ever upon perfect artistry, adventures in wider fields of thought. There is no need to criticise at length this third edition of his "City of the Soul"—the poems were welcomed long ago as exceptional both in the fineness of their technique and the beauty of their conception; all lovers of poetry know the worth of the sonnets. Here, for instance, the true poet speaks:—

Only to build one crystal barrier
Against this sea which beats upon our days;
To ransom one lost moment with a rhyme!
Or, if Fate cries and grudging gods demur,
To clutch Life's hair, and thrust one naked phrase
Like a lean knife between the ribs of Time.

Greatly daring, Lord Alfred even wrote a "Sonnet on the Sonnet," and it is worthy to rank with its classic predecessors. Again, an "Ode to Autumn" many poets conscious of great gifts might have hesitated to indite, but the author is justified in the very first verses:—

Thou sombre lady of down-bended head,
And weary lashes drooping to the cheek,
With sweet, sad fold of lips uncomfited,
And listless hands more tired with strife than meek;
Turn here thy soft, brown feet, and to my heart,
Unmatched to Summer's golden minstrelsy,
Or Spring's shrill pipe of joy, sing once again
Sad songs, and I to thee
Well-tuned, will answer that according part
That jarred with those young seasons' gladder strain.

We have quoted enough for fairness—enough to refresh the memories of those who have read and to quicken the desire of those who have not. Such distinguished work is needed in a day when tinkers, tailors, and pushers of bath-chairs take to "literature," and we could wish that more of it came from the same hand.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Health for Young and Old, Its Principles and Practice.

By A. T. SCHOFIELD, M.D. (Wm. Rider and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

IN this unconventional manual the author's aim has been to enforce those principles that underlie all health questions, and to lay stress on certain facts in daily life that are but little known. So instead of laying down exact laws and dietaries, which, after all, can only suit the few, and hence prove inapplicable to the majority, he confines himself to pointing out the general rules that govern health at different ages. He divides his work into two parts—"The Principles of Hygiene" and "The Practice of Hygiene." The first, starting with "The Story of Life," ends with "How to Wash," and the twelve chapters forming it embody a great amount of necessary information and advice. In the second part it is sad to read: "If ten babies are born in the slums, one lives; if in the West End, five live." And: "If a child only succeeds in living till it has turned four, it will not be in much danger of its life till after sixty. It is a dreadful fact to face, that as long as a child is dependent on its nurse and mother absolutely, it seems in imminent danger of its life." This is mostly due to improper feeding. On the other hand it is gratifying to find that Dr. Schofield is decidedly optimistic with regard to our girls. "The girl is getting much taller, stronger, healthier, cleverer, wiser and more sensible every year, and there is far less 'hysteria' and 'nerves' than twenty years ago." This is pleasant reading, for we must not forget that "women have to bear the future race, and it is a physical necessity for the well-being of mankind that the bodies of women be strong, healthy and well proportioned in every way,"

And the hand that rocks the cradle
Is the hand that rules the world.

Dr. Schofield has dealt learnedly and exhaustively with his subject, and his manual should be welcomed by every household.

Byways of Ghost-Land. By ELLIOTT O'DONNELL. (Wm. Rider and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

OF ghost-stories there is seemingly no end, and Mr. Elliott O'Donnell has firmly established himself as a recognised provider of this particular variety of literary fare. Every few months he produces a fresh batch of vouched-for accounts of awe-inspiring and blood-curdling ghostly phenomena, and this, his latest collection of the so-called "strange—but true" is quite as horrific as the earlier ones. We have not the space to introduce the reader into the numerous byways the author has explored either personally or through the medium of friends, but we cannot refrain from quoting the following experience from the chapter entitled "Buddhas and Boggle Chairs." It has to do with one of the latter, "a uniquely beautiful piece of furniture" made of ebony:—

One o'clock struck, and ere the hollow-sounding vibrations had ceased the vague form once again appeared behind the chair, and the malignant, evil eyes met mine in a diabolical stare; whilst, as before, on trying to speak or move, I found myself tongue-tied and paralysed. As the moments slowly glided away the shape of the thing became more and more distinct; a dark and sexless face appeared, surmounted with a straggling mass of black hair, the ends of which melted away into mist. I saw no trunk, but I descried two long and bony arms, ebony as the chair, with crooked, spidery, misty fingers. As I watched its development with increasing horror . . . I suddenly realised with a fresh grip of terror that the chair had moved out of the corner, and that the Thing behind it was slowly creeping towards me. . . . Clawing at my throat with its sable fingers, it thrust me backwards, and I sank gasping, retching, choking on to the pillow, where I underwent all the excruciating torments of strangulation.

The volume contains a number of other equally terrifying experiences, and the wonder is that so many persons have survived to place them on record. Even on the peaceful Thames Embankment, up Chelsea way, Mr. O'Donnell has encountered at twilight giant spectral reeds and bulrushes which swished across his face. We are wondering what he will have to tell us next, and devoutly hoping there will be no rise in the price of salt.

Missionary Adventures: A Simple History of the S.P.G. By G. M. FORDE. (Skeffington and Son. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Church and the Children: A Handbook of the Graded Sunday-school and the Catechism. By REV. R. E. JOHNSTON. (A. R. Mowbray and Co. 1s. 6d. net.)

IN "Missionary Adventures" Miss Georgiana M. Forde relates some of the principal adventures and vicissitudes which befell the pioneers of the S.P.G., and also traces the progress of that Society in various parts of the world. Founded in June, 1701, in a comparatively short space of time its missionaries turned their ceaseless energy to the work of spreading the Gospel. Centres were established in many parts of Africa, America, and Asia, and the untiring efforts of the pioneers of the movement have been succeeded by those of other generations. The book is concise, well put together, and should prove of great use in the teaching of the young.

The Rev. R. E. Johnston, in preparing a handbook of the graded Sunday-school, does so with the idea of its being introductory to the "Marden Manuals of Graded Lesson Courses" compiled by the same author. The main object of the little work is to aid teachers and those responsible for Sunday-school work in providing instruction suitable to each stage of a child's development, and used in conjunction with the Marden Manuals should prove of great usefulness to those who undertake the training of the young in the Christian Faith.

Map of Tripoli, Morocco, and the Near East. (George Philip and Son. 1s. net.)

THOSE desirous of following the course of the war between Italy and the Ottoman Empire will find this a useful map for the purpose. It is well printed and cheap, and has the additional advantage of including Portugal within its area, so that the operations of the Royalist raid into that country may be watched at the same time. Inset are maps of Morocco and the Dardanelles on a reduced scale, so the field of likely hostilities is well covered.

FICTION

The Russian Wife. By GERTRUDE M. FOXE. (George Allen and Co. 6s.)

"THE RUSSIAN WIFE" is described as "a story of excitement and startling situations." The prologue raises our hopes—the eccentric poet Bashiloff, who possesses little but his genius, loves the Countess Poljakoff, wife of the rich Vassili Petrovitch. The Countess refuses to fly with her lover to the Caucasus, so the passionate Bashiloff resolves to await the return of the husband. Realising his determination, the woman strikes down her lover with a battle-axe pulled from the wall, and hides the body in a cellar, the family ghost appearing at the correct moment. The social position and advancement of the children had triumphed over the Countess's scanty love. Unfortunately for the reader, this ends the promised excitement, the remainder of the story detailing the morbid history associated with the lover's son. Sergei is unbalanced like his murdered father, but inherits the ambition of his mother; these two traits, aided by his love for his wife, Nadia, completely wreck him. Nadia, the heroine of the story, is the possessor of a love which fills her little soul. The authoress endeavours to persuade us that Nadia, with her boring insistence upon her love and her bottomless wells of patient misery, will save Sergei from himself. Sergei is the central figure of a terrible tragedy in which his love for Nadia wrecks him physically, mentally, politically, and socially. Knowing Nadia, we are surprised at his foolish sacrifice. The story throughout is one of bitterness and gloom, the puppets do not deceive us, and the only true ring occurs when the mad Sergei attempts to avenge his father.

Hurdcott. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

WE could wish that Mr. Ayscough had given us a little more of the Lambs and of the pretentious Mr. Hazlitt in this book, and a little less of his heroine, Consuelo Dauntsey. The sketch of the former, unfortunately so quickly passing, seems to us executed in an excellent vein of humour, while we do not greatly care for Mr. Ayscough's psychology. He is fond of winging conscientiously around serious matters with complete sincerity and unfailing literary craftsmanship, but he does not succeed in flying high enough to hold our attention. He plays so long with what he finds uncommon in his heroine's character that he manages at last to make her appear commonplace, not to say tiresome. Of Hurdcott, her lover from afar, we hear comparatively little, which is a pity, because he might have been interesting, if one had had the chance of making his closer acquaintance. The reader acknowledges that he had manners above his station, but he does not feel that the unfortunate young man's tragic romance was made any more natural by a posthumous revelation of his exalted blood. Throughout the story there is an exasperating sense of being kept at a distance. This seems partly the effect of the author's rather undramatic methods, and partly due to that common mistake of restricting the humorous vision to the humorous characters. If we could have seen Consuelo and Hurdcott and Basil, the young Eurasian who did not care to be a lord, with the same eyes as those with which we saw the two Misses Dauntsey, Uncle Rupert, and Lady Caradoc, we should have liked them better, and Mr. Ayscough would have written a better book. As it is he has produced one which is often solemn and not seldom dull. Very pleasing at times it certainly is, but it gives us the impression of having listened to a lay sermon, of having been called upon to reverence two people vastly better than ourselves, who nevertheless leave us cold. And this feeling is enhanced by the fact that while "Hurdcott" is quite a longish production, it has a plot which would not have crowded a short story.

THE THEATRE

MEN, SUPERMEN, AND MARIONETTES

THE London stage is all the better for the return of Sir John Hare and Mr. Robert Loraine—the former a splendid representative of the old school, the latter a young and enthusiastic exponent of the new. It was perhaps as right that Sir John Hare should make his reentrée in a piece which might have been written in early Victorian times as that Mr. Loraine should commence management with a play by Mr. Bernard Shaw. Would the result have been any different, we wonder, had Sir John appeared in "Man and Superman" and Mr. Loraine in "The Marionettes"? Would the precise, polished, essentially artificial methods of Sir John have been as strangely wrong in the super-modern play as the natural, breezy vigour of Mr. Loraine's methods would have been quite hopeless in the mechanical, chessboard stuff of M. Pierre Wolff?

"The Marionettes," done into English, and very good English for the most part, by Miss Gladys Unger, suffered somewhat for having been seen after "Man and Superman." Though it is not to be assumed that Mr. Shaw's play is perfect, it has a vitality, a swing, an impudence, and a dialectical persuasiveness which make M. Wolff's play all the more lifeless and made to measure. Then, too, the characters in "Man and Superman" are recognisable. They have their prototypes in a dozen different parts of London, especially Adelphi-terrace, and St. John's-wood. There have been many John Tanners at Oxford. No man can be in the inner ring at Balliol who is not a John Tanner. The Tanner manner is essentially Balliol, and wears off about two years after an undergraduate comes down. England is peopled with Mr. Shaw's apparently impossible women. They may be found in large numbers in Manchester, Leicester, Southport, Bath, Matlock, and Cheltenham. They abound in Earl's-court and West Kensington, and there are one or two in Maidenhead. Mr. Shaw's artistic young men walk on at His Majesty's Theatre in dozens, and occasionally at the St. James's in ones and twos. His elderly ladies are photographically exact, and his Americans, with all their practicality and childish snob-bishness, visit the City of London every season in ever-increasing numbers.

But where, outside the plays of Sardou and Mr. Sutro, can be found the wire-pulled, inhuman tailor's dummies of "The Marionettes," except in the autumn dramas at Drury-lane? In fact, "The Marionettes" is a Drury Lane drama without its earthquakes, its racehorses, its railway accidents, and its sinking ships. The play is founded on the same artificial thesis, on the same mechanical lines. The characters wear the same clothes nearly always as wrong. They say the same things, with a greater abundance of stilted words. They belong to the same nationality, which is neither French nor English, but the nationality of the theatrical stockpot. M. Wolff calls them by one set of names, M. Sardou called them by another set, and Messrs. Raleigh, Henry Hamilton, and Alfred Sutro by others. They belong just as obviously to these writers as Mr. Shaw's characters belong to life. We know them for Stockpot at first sight. We know exactly what they are going to do and precisely what they are going to say. Mr. Sutro employed them all in "The Walls of Jericho" and "John Glayde's Honour." They were lately at the Haymarket in "Above Suspicion." We met them quite recently in "The Hope," and here they are again in "The Marionettes." How small a nation Stockpot is can be judged from the fact that its inhabitants do not number more than a dozen, each one of whom has many aliases.

In "The Marionettes" the Marquis Roger de Monclars marries a young convent-bred girl called Fernande to acquire her money. In order that M. Wolff may spread his mechanism over four Acts he makes this Roger of Stockpot blind and deaf so that he shall neither see nor hear the overwhelming love of his baby-wife, which is tremendously plain to every one else. He also, for the same reason, makes Fernande unaware of the fact that there are hundreds of shops in Paris at which she can buy the pretty, fashionable clothes that are worn by all her friends. He asks us to believe that Roger is so great a fool that he cannot see the obvious beauty of his wife because she is not dressed by Lucile. That is the First Act. In the Second Act he dresses Fernande in the skimpy coverings of a demi-mondaine and shows us Roger in love. He makes him so obviously and hastily in love that it becomes the subject of amusement to all her friends. There are to be, however, two more Acts, so he then makes Fernande blind and deaf. That is the end of the Second Act. In the Third Act he brings in young Monsieur Pierre Vareine, whom we have only seen for a moment or two in previous Acts, to make passionate love to Fernande, so that she may speak to him over the telephone in the small hours of the morning and be overheard by Roger. Without waiting to hear what she is saying, he makes Roger jump at the conclusion that his wife is going to run away with a lover, seize her by the throat, hurl her on to a settee, and then fling himself out of the room and bang the door so that Fernande may rise up, quite unhurt, and tell her convenient uncle that "Roger loves me, he loves me." How clever! What excellent construction! That is the end of the Third Act. In the Fourth Act there is nothing for anybody to do, and those of the audience who are betting on a certainty wait to see husband and wife clasped in each other's loving arms. Even then, however, the curtain is kept up in order that Sir John Hare, who is "starred" on the programme, may enter, speak two lines, and go off again. And then, at last, it falls.

There is not enough story, such as it is, in the whole of these long-drawn-out Acts to provide sufficient matter for a mechanical one-act piece. So it is filled out with altogether superfluous Stockpotians, who come by mechanism and so depart. One of these is Raymond Nizerolles, and he is played so delightfully and is made so wilfully human by Mr. C. M. Lowne that we wish he had taken the evening into his own hands and made every Act a monologue. Although Mr. Arthur Wontner and Miss Marie Löhr have a great deal more to do they are unable to make half as much of it. It is true that Mr. Wontner wears Stockpot-clothes well enough and says Stockpot stereotopics with immense earnestness. Miss Marie Löhr emulates his example wholeheartedly, but the more emotion and distress the pair of them depict the less they move us. We cannot believe in them. They are bloodless. We know them for marionettes. They came to the Comedy Theatre by way of the Garrick, the St. James's, the Haymarket, and Drury Lane. The only emotion Miss Löhr stirred in us was one of infinite regret that she, who is so admirably fitted to show us girlish charm and lightness of heart should have been drilled into a part so wooden and so ineffective. Sir John Hare, as the convenient uncle, gave us another example of his polished artificiality, and played in his best effortless and irresistible manner. Mr. Godfrey Tearle, the only person in the play who made any effort to look French, really appeared to be passionately in love, and gave an admirable performance. It was unnecessary to place a line on the programme to the effect that the play was produced under the direction of Mr. Dion Boucicault. The needless restlessness of the actors made it apparent. They made every room in which they appeared like a railway station on a chilly day. Besides, although undisguised as French people and talking colloquial English, one of the characters was made to sing a song in French. The production of "The Marionettes," then, puts the Comedy Theatre back to 1800.

The modernity of "Man and Superman," on the other hand, was done ample justice, and was, for the most part, assisted greatly by the acting. Mr. Loraine did not merely appear as John Tanner. He was John Tanner. In every movement, turn, gesture, and thought he was the living man. He did not deliver his long speeches of dialectical fireworks as though he had committed them to memory. He said them on the spur of the moment. They were all impromptu. It was the performance, not of an accomplished actor with a clean, strong, resonant personality, but of a superman, a man almost too much alive, a man who might easily become almost too manly, too much of a good thing. He was admirably supported. Mr. Ernest Mainwaring, who took up Mr. Bishop's part at a moment's notice, was so good that he did not make us regret Mr. Bishop. Higher praise is impossible. Miss Florence Haydon was altogether perfect, and Miss Doris Lytton delighted us. There is a great future for this young lady. Mr. Guy Standing, Mr. Sass, and Mr. Gwenn could not have been bettered. The one weak spot in an excellent cast was Miss Pauline Chase. It was almost an act of cruelty to entrust her with such a part. In any case it was not kind to the audience. After a round of the new plays it was refreshing and exhilarating to listen to Mr. Bernard Shaw's characteristic pot pourri of vital bosh.

ON THE SOUTH DEVON COAST

By W. H. KOEBEL

A WHILE ago I was reading from a magazine some verse that sang of Devon. The verse was pretty matter, that went with a lilt; doubtless the majority of folk who read it smelt for a while the air of the moors, and saw with their minds the softly-timbered coombes that delve downwards to press apart the bright-red cliffs and thus to hold communion with the waves below. But not I; nor any other of those folk who have more than a passing knowledge of the West Country. The reason is simple enough. The lines—the exact wording of which escapes me—implored the reader amongst other things to listen to the song of the nightingale in Devon. Now the nightingale is as rare in Devon as are diamonds in its soil. The bird, in short, shuns the county. It is his one serious lapse from discernment and taste. In his own heart the West Countryman feels and resents the slight. Therefore it was none of his genuine tribe that wrote those pretty verses.

Yet in at least one sense we can avenge ourselves on this ungallant night-singer. Let us tell him at once that there exists no county that misses his notes less, for the simple reason that there is no county that holds so many compensations of its own. Just now it is South Devon that I have in mind, and in particular the coast that stretches from Dartmouth inlet to where Exmouth sits in such imposing fashion by the side of its broad estuary. It is a coast of bold cliff and glowing sea, this, into which bite deeply the mouths of the Dart, the Teign, and the Exe. It has its towns with which its thousands of visitors are familiar. Exmouth, Starcross, Dawlish, Teignmouth, Torquay, and Dartmouth ring with too accustomed a sound in the ears of Londoners and Midland folk—so says many a staunch old Devon man whose profession is unconcerned with tourists. It is not to be denied that the multitudes that throng the beaches have thrust away the old-world atmosphere of each place. But the remedy is perfectly simple. If your temperament urges you to avoid the rather blatant gaiety of the popular resorts, there are tranquil corners in plenty left between the three rivers. There are lesser-known coombes—their names you must find out for yourself, since it is not fitting that those who cannot discover such haunts for themselves should be led to unearned bliss in the easy guide-book fashion—that hold out every possible joy to the lover of unspoiled nature.

Here, it is not even essential that you should look on blue sky above and blue sea beneath—a great concession this! Given even a horizon that is dull, and grey, and lowering, the spot is independent of the gloomy thing; it has provided its own colour, regardless of clouds and weather. In the first place, there is the warm red of the cliff that stands up in its ruddy defiance over the sea. No sail ever made a more harmonious background to the close-clinging grass and the spreading shrubs and trees, while the little plateaus on the slopes bear blossoms and hues of a variety too numerous to be mentioned here. Where the sea laps are caves, and great rocks, and tiny semicircles of sand, and out on the waters will be the sails of a Brixham trawler or two, and perhaps the distant hull of a battleship that has steamed out from Torbay. If you have chosen the right coombe there will be no other evidence of human life.

So much for the stray nooks of the coast. You may become the owner of one, for a morning or an afternoon, at the sole cost of a walk. But no county must be judged even from a coastal fringe as delightful as this. After all, where earth and sea meet is the consistent haunt of the tripper alone; the native is concerned with wider horizons. For him is the dim blue swell of the moor, the green and russet of the sloping orchards, and the soft and verdant meadows where browse the red Devon cattle, whose hides harmonise so conveniently with the soil. The moor comes first, of course, and in the eyes of the average stranger there is only one in South Devon, and what should that be but Dartmoor? Dartmoor overshadows all else, I admit, but there are other and minor stretches in its neighbourhood that hold a charm of their own that is almost as deep, if not so wide.

Haldon Moor is one of these, and I will drop yet further down in the scale of size, and hold up the Lesser Haldon before you as a feast sufficient for any man's æsthetic needs. Now, whether you make for Haldon from Teignmouth, Dawlish, or from any of the villages just inland, your way will be much the same in its characteristics. You will climb up steep lanes, with lofty banks that sprout ferns, and that are starred with close clusters of wild flowers. Now and again the bank will fall away to admit a wooden gate, and if you lean on the sociable timber and gaze—but you had far better do nothing of the kind! If you are wise you will gather no broken impressions from halfway houses. You will hold back your curiosity, if necessary for two hours or more, until you have laboured upwards to the spot where the hedges and banks dissolve for good and all.

Then you may step on the heather and the ling, avoiding, from a sense of the fitness of things, the foxgloves that prick upwards in their thousands of purple spires; avoiding

MR. JOHN LANE'S AUTUMN BOOKS.

Art Volumes

MINIATURES: A Series of Reproductions in Photogravure of Eighty-five Miniatures of Distinguished Personages, including Queen Alexandra, The Queen of Norway, The Princess Royal, and the Princess Victoria. 15 guineas net. [Shortly.]

BALLADS WEIRD AND WONDERFUL. With Designs by VERNON HILL. 21s. net. [Shortly.]

OTHER PEOPLE: A new Album of Drawings by CHARLES DANA GIBSON. 20s. [Shortly.]

SALOME. By OSCAR WILDE. A new Edition with Illustrations by AUBREY BEARDSLEY and an Introduction by ROBERT ROSS. 5s. net. [Shortly.]

Sport and Travel

STALKS IN HIMALAYA: JOTTINGS OF A SPORTSMAN NATURALIST. By E. P. STEBBING, Author of "Jungle Byways in India." Upwards of 100 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

CASUALS IN THE CAUCASUS. By AGNES HERBERT, Author of "Two Dianas in Somaliland." 12s. 6d. net.

UNDISCOVERED RUSSIA. By STEPHEN GRAHAM, Author of "A Vagabond in the Caucasus." 12s. 6d. net.

JUNGLE FOLK: Indian Natural History Sketches. By DOUGLAS DEWAR, Author of "Bombay Ducks," &c. 10s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

Historical and Biographical

MADAME DE BRINVILLIERS AND HER TIMES, 1630-1676. By HUGH STOKES. 17 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

THE WIFE OF GENERAL BONAPARTE. By JOSEPH TURQUAN, Author of "The Love Affairs of Napoleon," &c. 17 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

SOPHIE DAWES, QUEEN OF CHANTILLY. By V. M. MONTAGU. Many Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF GUY DE MAUPASSANT. By his Valet FRANÇOIS. Translated by M. ROUND. 7s. 6d. net.

THE ANARCHISTS: THEIR RECORD AND THEIR CREED. By ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. Many Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND MEMOIRS OF CHURTON COLLINS. Written and Compiled by his Son, L. C. COLLINS. 7s. 6d. net.

LIFE OF SIR JOSEPH BANKS, President of the Royal Society. By EDWARD SMITH, Author of "William Cobbett," &c. 12s. 6d. net.

Miscellaneous

TALK OF THE TOWN. By MRS. JOHN LANE. 6s. Third Edition.

THE CRIMINAL AND THE COMMUNITY. By Dr. JAMES DEVON, Medical Officer at Glasgow Prison. 6s. net.

THE MAGIC OF SPAIN. By AUBREY F. G. BELL. 5s. net.

THE DIAMOND. By W. R. CATTELLE, Author of "Precious Stones," &c. 7s. 6d. net.

Verse

THE CITY OF THE SOUL. Poems LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS. A New Edition. 5s. net.

THE INN OF DREAMS. By OLIVE CUSTANCE. 3s. 6d. net.

POEMS BY MARIE CORELLI. 5s. net.

Six Shilling Novels

THE GLORY OF CLEMENTINA WING. By W. J. LOCKE.

THE DANGEROUS AGE. Translated from the Danish of KARIN MICHAËLIS. 3s. 6d. net.

WIND ON THE HEATH. By ESSEX SMITH.

THE LIFTED LATCH. By GEORGE VANE.

THE CHRONICLES OF CLOVIS. By HECTOR H. MUNRO (SAKI), Author of "Reginald."

THE RED LANTERN. By EDITH WHERRY.

SAM'S KID. By F. E. MILLS-YOUNG.

THE YOUNG IDEA. By PARKER H. FILLIMORE.

THE DEMPSEY DIAMONDS. By ALLEN ARNOT.

THE PROGRESS OF MRS. CRIPPS MIDDLEMORE. By GERALD BENDALL.

SEKHET. By IRENE MILLER. [Shortly.]

THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

also, for a less sentimental reason, the little, stony, fossil-haunted pits that lurk beneath the surface growths here and there. Having achieved all this, you are at perfect liberty to look about you.

Inland, some dozen miles away, rise the folds of Dartmoor, the big brother of this little moor, crowned by its Tors that stand out like mystic castles against the sky. To the west is the valley of the Teign, sloping shoulders of land that fall in leisurely curves to the level of the broad stream far below, pleasant, smiling stretches that harbour villages of whitewashed, deeply-thatched cottages, broad clumps of timber, cornfields, and here and there a vivid splash of the red, fallow soil. By the harbour at the river's mouth are the roofs of Teignmouth, an insignificant little architectural spread, as seen from here. Following to the east the country beneath the broad hand of the sea, you will make out little of Dawlish, for it is hidden behind its screen of forest; but there, far beyond, is the great estuary of the Exe, a wide sheet of water that eats far into the hills, with the piled roofs of Exmouth on its further bank visible even from here. Beyond this again rises the mighty sequence of red cliffs, until, dimly seen on the horizon, the red walls give way to white.

The little moor of Haldon itself is a fitting spot from which to drink in a panorama such as this. Its heather carpet is well aired; it is open to every light breeze that blows, and for inhabitants it has the bees in myriads and the butterflies and birds. You would say that this Lesser Haldon was the frankest place on earth; yet one never knows. Even Haldon has its secrets.

There is a dip just here on the very edge of the heather country. At the bottom is a small copse, a shy spot that has strewn its approach with dense masses of bracken, and rank coils of impeding blackberry bushes. Effective barriers these, the very sight of which is apt to restrain a wandering stranger, even should he be desirous of visiting the insignificant copse, which is in itself unlikely.

But you who know will go on in defiance of the thorns and breast-high bracken. You will brush through the protesting leaves of the copse itself, and in the very centre you will light upon the dead soul of the place—the remains of a small grey chapel, ruined, and with gaping window places. Swathed closely about by the surrounding foliage, the place consents to reveal itself only when the wayfarer has penetrated to its very walls.

It has a history of its own, this ruined chapel of Ladywell, although of this the dwellers in the countryside itself suspect nothing, even should they be aware of the existence of the tragic thing. It was in the thirteenth century, so runs the legend, that a spring of holy water gushed out one day without warning from the spot. The event was celebrated with such pomp as the neighbourhood could afford, and the little chapel of our Lady's Well rose up by the side of the spring. Sunk in its placid hollow, the peace of the spot apparently remained unbroken until the early part of the fourteenth century, when a certain Robert Maddicot was named its priest.

In those days the material or spiritual tendencies of a priest lay very much at the discretion of their owner. The clay of Robert Maddicot was of the rankest. That he prowled Haldon Moor and swooped down to wrest his spoil from a belated wayfarer was nothing. It was necessary to live in those days, just as now, and a highway robber had little to fear then except from his immediate antagonist. But matters did not end here, for the priest in his leisure hours was an all-round man—in fact, a proper villain. So Agnes, the daughter of Roger the Miller, discovered in the end. Whether Agnes was winsome I have no means of knowing. For the sake of the story let us endow her with all the comeliness that ever cost a woman dear! But, after all, the pathos of her corpse floating in the Holy Well needs no such veneer. By the walls of the chapel lay the small body of her dead child, slain in company with its mother by Robert the Priest.

Can you picture the hue and cry that ensued? The wild chase over the heather and through the bracken, up and down the great slopes, while the quarry panted in despair, and the fierce shouts of the pursuers echoed? You need conceive nothing of the kind. Robert the Priest had no occasion to run. He confessed to the high Church authorities in proper form, obtained Benefit of Clergy as a matter of course, and concluded the matter with a mild purgation!

This is the story of Ladywell. There are many other haunts in the neighbourhood that lay claim to legends equally grim. But of them all, none, I think, has been so appropriately guarded as this, shut off from the sunny, swelling hills by its close shroud of verdure. For every thousand times that it has been passed, I doubt if it has been entered once. I have not the least fear, moreover, that this publicity will endow it with an unwelcome popularity. The place is uncannily secretive. He who would discover that particular copse, and, having lit upon it, would find the little chapel within it, must be a man of patience. He will search for a long while first.

ARCHÆOLOGY IN INDIA THREATENED

No one can always agree with Lord Curzon, and as a principle it is undesirable that an ex-Governor or Viceroy should endeavour to interfere with the actions of his successors. But there may be occasions on which a protest from an emeritus officer is justifiable, and indeed necessary, to prevent a mistake being made. For instance, Lord Lawrence led the opposition to Lord Lytton's Afghan policy. Such an occasion has now arisen. In an excellent letter to the Times of Saturday, October 7th, Lord Curzon has called attention to a measure in contemplation which would mean the reversal of his policy in one of its best features and entail serious consequences. The proposal is now under consideration at the India Office to abolish the post of Director-General of the Archaeological Survey of India, which Lord Curzon got revived in 1902, and to leave the archæological work of India to be performed (or mismanaged) by the Local Governments, some ten in number, who ordinarily have no one qualified in archæology, or specially interested, to superintend it properly. The present Director-General, Mr. Marshall, is an officer of the Supreme Government, an officer of very high attainments—as his record shows—gifted with enthusiasm, energy, and sound judgment in a very difficult subject. Mr. Marshall was specially selected for his post, and has done admirable work since his appointment. In the proposal now before the Indian Secretary there are principles at stake. Centralisation and spending were in vogue under Lord Curzon. With the usual swing of the pendulum decentralisation and economy now hold the field. But, as Lord Curzon rightly points out, the expenditure on this appointment is "the merest drop in the ocean."

The work of conservation as well as restoration has been thoroughly well carried out, as exemplified in the magnificent remains, such as the Taj Mahal, and many other splendid buildings which have been rescued from "vandalism or Philistine contempt," and can now be seen and cordially appreciated by every visitor to India as well as by the residents, European and native. Great discoveries have been made, such as pillars of Asoka and the relics of the great Buddha himself. Not one-quarter of the work awaiting to be accomplished has been completed. Of many remains of the highest archæological importance it may still

D. APPLETON & CO.By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.*THE COMMON LAW.With nearly Sixty Illustrations by CHARLES DANA GIBSON.

This new Novel tells a story of Bohemian life in the artists' quarters, and has been compared to Du Maurier's "Trilby." It has all the interest and fascination of the author's best society novels, together with the added charm of the gay artist life, its witty small talk, its undisguised disregard of convention. 6s.

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS.*THE GRAIN OF DUST.

In this story the author gives us the love of the successful young lawyer for his typist, and shows the powerful influences for good and evil which affect his life through this overmastering love. 6s.

By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN.*THE WOMAN HATERS.

The Daily Chronicle says that Mr. Lincoln is a winsome humourist who develops his story in a happy atmosphere of intimacy between writer and reader. 6s.

By GEORGE GIBBS.*THE BOLTED DOOR.

A Novel throbbing with life, in which the hero and heroine are forced into marriage by the will of an eccentric millionaire, and "The Bolted Door" in question is the barrier between them. 6s.

By NINA L. DURYEA.*THE HOUSE of the SEVEN GABBLERS.

This story relates the amusing adventures that befell some American girls who rented an ancient chateau near Paris. 6s.

By PAUL WELLS.*THE MAN WITH AN HONEST FACE.

An adventure, wherein the hero gets entangled in the coils of an intrigue, the clue to which is cleverly withheld. 6s.

By H. K. WEBSTER.*THE GIRL IN THE OTHER SEAT.

Readers of "The Whispering Man" will be glad to get a story by the same author, that grips and interests from start to finish. 6s.

By CAROLINE FULLER.*THE BRAMBLE BUSH.

A bright and amusing story of Bohemian life, full of unusual situations. 6s.

ALONG THE ANDES AND DOWN THE AMAZON. By H. J. MOZANS. Royal 8vo., gilt top. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

A companion volume to "Up the Orinoco and Down the Magdalena." Gives a vivid picture of one of the most interesting sections of South America, and a mass of information about Peru, Ecuador, Botoga and the countries of the Amazon.

AERIAL NAVIGATION. By A. F. ZAHM. Demy 8vo., fully Illustrated, decorated cloth. 12s. 6d. net.

A comprehensive volume on aeronautics and the meteorology of the subject. Special attention is given to military aeronautics and to the scientific uses of the aeroplane.

HEREDITY IN RELATION TO EVOLUTION. By W. E. CASTLE. Fully Illustrated. 6s. net.

An interesting work for students and general readers, containing all the results of the latest experiments in animal breeding.

THE SUN. By CHARLES G. ABBOT. Cloth, 8vo., fully Illustrated. 10s. net.

Contains the latest solar knowledge, and many hitherto unpublished results of researches and new explanatory hypotheses illustrated by many new figures and engravings.

25, Bedford Street, London.

STANLEY PAUL'S LIST

THE COBURGS: The Story of the Rise of a Great Royal House. EDMUND B. D'AUVERGNE, Author of "The Bride of Two Kings," &c. Photogravure, Illustrated, 16s. net. This book is an important contribution to contemporary history, and a fascinating and intimate account of the relations of the greatest personages of our own time.

JEAN DE LA FONTAINE: The Poet and the Man. FRANK HAMEL, Author of "The Dauphines of France." Illustrated, 16s. net. La Fontaine has a unique place in French literature. He stands between the old and the new. He possessed the humour of the Renaissance period and adapted it to the clear and sparkling style of the grande siècle. His story should appeal to all students of a remarkable period of French literary history. Among the women of his circle were the gay niece of Mazarin, Mme. la Duchesse de Bouillon; the hysterical and devout Madame, wife of Gaston d'Orléans; the actress, La Champmeslé; and his particular benefactress, Mme. de la Sablière. To these and other kind friends he was indebted for the ease and luxury he loved.

A TOUR THROUGH OLD PROVENCE.

(Avignon, Villeneuve, Tarascon, Les Baux, Montmajour, Arles, Nîmes, Orange, &c.) A. S. FORREST, Painter of "Morocco," "West Indies," "Portugal" Illustrated with 108 Original Half-tone and Line Drawings. Cloth gilt, 6s. net. The very name of Provence excites vivid anticipations of the quaint and the picturesque, and no more delightful companion for a trip through its old-world associations with pen and pencil could be found than this book published at such a cheap price.

A WOMAN'S WINTER IN SOUTH AMERICA.

CHARLOTTE CAMERON, Author of "A Passion in Morocco." Illustrated. 6s. net. An interesting account of a 24,000-mile journey undertaken by the author last winter. It is the first time this entire coast has been described from a woman's point of view.

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS

RED REVENGE. A Stirring Romance of India by CHARLES E. PEARCE, Author of "Love Besieged," "The Amazing Duchess," &c.

EVERY DOG HIS DAY. By HAROLD AVERY, Author of "A Week at the Sea," &c.

GOD DISPOSES. By PELLEW HAWKER.

THE LOTUS LANTERN. A Japanese Romance by MARY IMLAY TAYLOR, Author of "The Reaping," "The Impersonator," &c.

THE LOVELOCKS OF DIANA. By KATE HORN, Author of "Ships of Desire," "Edward and I and Mrs. Honeybun," &c.

OUR FIGHTING SEAMEN. LIONEL YEXLEY.

Large crown 8vo., 6s. net. Observer says:—"Mr. Yexley has raised some very grave questions in this volume. . . . No one who is interested in the Navy can do wrong by reading this work and giving the matter contained his earnest consideration."

THE A.B.C. OF JAPANESE ART. J. F. BLACKER.

Illustrated with 150 line and 100 half-tone Illustrations printed on art paper. In large crown 8vo., 5s. net.

BOOKS IN REQUEST

AN IMPERIAL VICTIM. EDITH E. outhell. 24s. net.

FRANCE OF JOAN OF ARC. Lt.-Col. ANDREW C. P. HAGGARD. 16s. net.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS

THE CARDINAL. NEWTON V. STEWART.

OUR GUESTS. ST. JOHN TREVOR.

RUFFLES. L. T. MEADE.

HODSON'S VOYAGE. W. H. KOEBEL.

MARRIAGE OF LENORE. ALICE M. DIEHL.

PASSION IN MOROCCO. CHARLOTTE CAMERON.

THE IMPERISHABLE WING. MRS. HAVELOCK ELLIS.

A PRISONER IN PARADISE. H. L. VAHEY.

WHEN SATAN TOOK FLESH. A. J. ANDERSON.

MADGE CARRINGTON. "DRAIG GLAS."

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, Essex Street, London.

Original from

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

be truly said, "Pereunt, etiam perire, ruinae." Above all, the restoration and custody of their ancient buildings are matters of great interest to the native peoples, who appreciate intensely, as Lord Curzon writes, any reverence shown to the monuments of their faith. "No word of criticism, nothing but praise, has been bestowed by them upon the active policy that was initiated ten years ago; and amid many symptoms of discord or unrest we have in recent years been able to point with confidence to this claim upon the respect and gratitude of our Indian fellow-subjects."

Where Lord Curzon's measures were politically beneficial their reversal would amount to a grave political blunder, to be perpetrated for the sake of a petty economy and of "decentralisation gone mad." All that is required is the retention of the expert Director-General as a central directing authority until the work is completed. Many "Philistines" may scoff at archæology and the preservation of ancient monuments. We have no space to argue with such persons over its value, which civilised nations, as well as scientific societies, have agreed to acknowledge. Archæology should be entrusted to experts. In the cause of archæology, art, culture, æsthetic beauty, good taste, and, in this case, of Imperial policy also, we desire to join strongly in Lord Curzon's sound protest against the abolition of the Director-Generalship and the proposed reversion to the provincial system—previously found wanting—of Public Works officers and overworked civilians being left to exercise their ignorant fancies on ancient remains of unrivalled importance and value.

AFTER THE CRISIS

I.—THE ROYAL POSITION

By POLITICUS

A FEW months ago a discourser on the political crisis, after having defined the correct attitude of the Crown in regard to that crisis as one of scrupulous non-intervention, on the ground that it must on no account give the semblance of immersing itself in party politics, much less appear to become the tool of a faction, and that it must least of all attempt by an arbitrary personal act to subvert a Constitution which it has sacramentally pledged itself to uphold, added these pregnant words:—

Nor will the situation in any way be redeemed if, as is urged as a convenient course, the House of Lords gives way and sacrifices the vital interests of the Empire to save the face of the Royal position. Once any such menace or pressure has been employed the status of the Throne has been automatically transferred to a new plane.

The pressure in question has been exercised, and the status of the Crown, hitherto loyally instinct with devotion to its neutral duty, is ipso facto relegated to an altered category. This is a sad circumstance, the saddest circumstance of all this ugly business, and if there is a disposition to argue that it was in its essence unavoidable it must be clearly understood that it has been brought about by the persistent blundering of those counsellors who, as in contradistinction to the Cabinet, form the immediate personal advisers of the Crown. These counsellors have been misled by two egregious fallacies, which have been again and again trumpeted so loudly by hazy dialecticians that they never met with any clinching or forcible refutation. The first of these is the theory that the Crown has power to create peers to end a deadlock between the two Houses. The second is the assumption that the Sovereign is bound to conform to the advice of his Ministers, provided he cannot replace them with others, whatever that advice may be.

With regard to the first fallacy, it is sufficient to state that the Crown has not, and never had, the power constitutionally or legally to create peers in the way it has recently been called upon to do. It has, it is true, been asserted in some text-books that it possesses such a power, but such text-books are merely the pious personal opinions of a few speculative individuals, and their contention in this case is totally opposed to the authority of historical data, and is, moreover, at variance with the common sense and sanity of any chance investigator of the problem. That is to say, that even if such a prerogative did exist, to call upon the Crown to resort to it in 1911 can, in the mind of the most casual observer, have no possible defence.

The counsellors of the Crown, therefore, started with an initial blunder, which they followed up with a series of others which can only be computed by tabulating categorically the representations they should have made. They should have represented:—

1. That the Crown has no power under any circumstances to coerce any branch of the Legislature, and that any such coercion must prove fatal to the welfare of its future influence.

2. That if it could be said to possess a right to coerce the House of Lords in regard to certain Bills, it could on no account coerce it to the acceptance of a Bill involving its own destruction. Such a thesis has never been asserted in any text-book, and involves a violation of the solemn oath to preserve the Constitution taken by the Sovereign on his accession. It is noteworthy that this point was put to the Editor of the leading Government organ, and elicited the feeblest of replies.

3. That this violent measure could only be resorted to when every possible attempt at compromise had been doggedly rejected by the Upper House. It is now almost inconceivable to reflect that this high-handed act was threatened, in the face of the fact that the House of Lords had accepted the relinquishment of practically the whole measure of its efficacy.

4. That the formula had always run in the text-books "to end a deadlock between the Houses," and could not possibly be extended so as henceforth to read "to prevent an anticipated deadlock before it has arrived." Nothing is more remarkable than the indelicate haste with which the whole of this infinitely grave matter has been rushed in less than two years. It might have been thought that at least before the name of the Crown was brought in the crisis might have come to a head, that the Prime Minister might even have resigned, so that the impasse as an accomplished fact might have been brought home to the general mind, and the necessity of some abnormal act of intervention emphasised by its requisite and ostensible antecedents.

5. That in order to safeguard the elementary decencies of this departure, so reluctantly acquiesced in, the peerages about to be created should under no sort of circumstances be sold. The fact that this stipulation was not made furnishes the most serious indictment against the counsellors in question.

It is now necessary, having stated the representations that should have been made on behalf of the Crown, to estimate how far its advisers were actuated by the influence of the second fallacy referred to above.

This fallacy, that the Sovereign is bound to accept the advice of his Ministers, provided he cannot replace them, whatever that advice may be, has found its most vigorous advocacy in the columns of the Spectator. Its absurdity is glaring on the face of it. It is only necessary to ask, "Suppose the King was advised to go down to the House of

The OXFORD and CAMBRIDGE REVIEW

OCTOBER 1911.

Just Published 2s. 6d. net

UNIONIST PROSPECTS. Mr. F. E. Smith, M.P.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE DREADNOUGHTS

Mr. Alan Burgoyne, M.P.

THE TWO ROMES OF TO-DAY

"A. Delle Rive."

MEDIÆVAL BYWAYS.—IV. SUDDEN DEATH

AND DOCTORS. Mr. L. F. Salzmänn, F.S.A.

THE EDUCATION OF STUDY

"Tu Ne Cede Malis."

THE POEMS OF GOD

Rev. A. Smythe-Palmer, D.D.

EMIGRATION AND IMMIGRATION

Sir Clement Kinloch-Cooke, M.P.

THE EVANGELISATION OF PARIS SINCE

THE SEPARATION. M. Georges Goyau.

KINETIC AND POTENTIAL SPEECH

Mr. Arthur Ransome.

THE LAND AND THE PEOPLE

Sir Hereward Wake.

"PRINCE ROMAN."

Mr. Joseph Conrad.

Reviews of Books

London: CONSTABLE & CO. Ltd. 10 Orange Street W.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

ON OCT. 26. WITH 3 ILLUSTRATIONS BY C. E. BROCK.

THE CASE OF RICHARD MEYNELL.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

THE COURTIER STOOPS.

By Sir JAMES YOXALL, Author of "The Wander Years," &c.

CHAWTON MANOR AND ITS OWNERS:

A Family History. By WILLIAM AUSTEN LEIGH, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and MONTAGU GEORGE KNIGHT, of Chawton. With Portraits in Photogravure and numerous Illustrations. Crown 4to., 21s. net.

TWO VISITS TO DENMARK.

By EDMUND GOSSE, LL.D., Author of "History of Modern Literature," "Father and Son," &c. Large post 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

NEW EDITION IN ONE VOLUME, WITH A NEW PREFACE.

Large post 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

PAUL THE MINSTREL, and other Stories.

Reprinted from "The Hill of Trouble" and "The Isles of Sunset." By ARTHUR C. BENSON, Author of "The Upton Letters," "From a College Window," &c.

LEAVES OF THE TREE. Studies in Biography.

By ARTHUR C. BENSON, Author of "The Upton Letters," "From a College Window," &c. Large post 8vo., 7s. 6d. net. [Oct. 19.]

PASTELS UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS.

By Mrs. MARGARET L. WOODS, Author of "The King's Revoke," &c. Large post 8vo., 6s. net. [Oct. 19.]

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

G. BELL & SONS, Ltd.,

York House, Portugal Street, London, W.C.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Now Ready. Completing Dr. Rose's Life of Pitt. Medium 8vo., xvi. + 596 pages. With Photogravure Plates. 16s. net

William Pitt and the Great War.

By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D.

In this Volume Dr. Rose traces the career of Pitt from the year 1791 to his premature death early in 1806. As in the preceding volume, "William Pitt and National Revival," the events of this period are elucidated by many hitherto unedited documents. The two volumes together form the most complete life of William Pitt that has yet appeared, and will be a lasting contribution to the history of England.

To be completed in Six Volumes. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net each Vol II. Just published.

The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift.

Edited by F. Elrington Ball, Litt.D.

With an Introduction by the Right Rev. the Bishop of OSSORY.
Vol. I. previously issued.

The Times on the first volume:—"For the first time we have the beginning of a complete edition of the whole correspondence, both to and from Swift, arranged in chronological order, printed from the best texts, and annotated with extreme elaboration. Swift's letters have been often, but never well, edited before this."

Favourite Savoy Operas.

By Sir W. S. GILBERT.

Containing the full libretto, revised by the Author. Each with 8 Colour Plates by W. RUSSELL FLINT, and Decorative Covers.

Crown 4to., 3s. 6d. net each,

First List of Volumes.

The Mikado.

The Pirates of Penzance.

[Now ready.]

Iolanthe.

Patience.

New Book by Walter Crane.

Now ready. Crown 8vo., with many Illustrations, 6s. net.

William Morris to Whistler.

Papers and Addresses on Art and Craft and the Commonweal.

By Walter Crane.

Uniform with "Bases of Design," &c.

Also an Edition de Luxe, strictly limited to 350 copies. Medium 8vo. With Covers and End-papers designed by the Author. Uniform with "Ideals in Art," &c., 10s. 6d. net.

The Lysistrata of Aristophanes.

The Greek Text Revised, with an English Metrical Translation.
With Introduction and Commentary

By Benjamin Bickley Rogers, M.A.

Small 4to., 10s. 6d. [Ready October.]

This Volume, with the "Thesmophoriazusae," already issued, makes up Vol. IV. of the Complete Edition. Price 15s.

MASTERS OF LITERATURE.

Crown 8vo. With Portrait. 3s. 6d. net each.

Just Published, NEW VOLUME.

De Quincey.

A Selection of the Finest Passages from his Works, Chosen and Arranged, with Editorial Connections and a Biographical and Critical Introduction. By SIDNEY LOW.

"An extremely valuable series . . . they are valuable to those who are familiar with the original books; they are still more valuable to those who do not know them, for they are able to make acquaintance with these writers under the guidance of those who know them well, and who can tell them what is best worth reading."—Public Opinion.

Lords and make a party speech, ought he to do so?" The answer might be that that is an extravagant hypothesis. One may point out that its extravagance is infinitesimal compared with the extravagance of creating five hundred peers. Or, again, one might inquire, "Suppose the Prime Minister had invited the King to create peers to pass a Bill disfranchising every Unionist, ought he to have done so?" Again it will be said that this is extravagant. But it is not extravagant from the point of view of theory, and it is only by whittling down from extreme cases that one arrives at what actually is included in any contention.

It therefore appears on the face of it that the King is not bound to accede to any advice tendered him by an inevitable Ministry, but must refuse both in defence of his own dignity and on behalf of that trusteeship which he pre-eminently exercises for his people. If, however, there is any doubt upon this point as affecting the recent crisis, it is as well to consider this very remarkable paragraph in the Westminster Gazette of August 16th:—

It is nonsense to suggest that the Prime Minister, by having the guarantees, made all subsequent Parliamentary proceedings a sham. Whatever was said and done in November, Mr. Asquith still had to go to the King a second time, and he could not have obtained the use of the Prerogative had the Government been seriously weakened either in the House of Commons or the country.

Naturally one asks: Why could he not have received the use of the Prerogative? He was the only possible Minister, and no weakening of a lost by-election or two would have rendered him otherwise. The deduction therefore remains established that in the matter of acceding or refusing the King had the power to use his discretion. The Crown had beyond dispute an option in its procedure.

It was an error that the Sovereign should countenance for a single moment the revival of a grotesque anachronism, whereby its autocratic weight was to be thrown into the scale of party politics. It was an error that it did not insist on the fact that an attack on the House of Lords was of all things in the world outside its province. It was an error that the crisis was not allowed to develop so that it might satisfy to the full the required obtuseness of conditions and interval of contention. These were errors, but one cannot withhold a graver term as applicable to the fact that not only was the creation of Peers to be made to enforce an absolutely one-sided settlement, towards which the Government had not budged the fraction of an inch; but it was finally to be aimed at a single solitary stipulation on the part of the House of Lords that Home Rule before enactment should first be submitted to the people. Was that a pig-headed assertion of privilege and property that must needs be overborne by an unheard-of machinery of force? One must also stigmatise with regret the circumstance that no assurance was rigorously exacted by the bestower of these peerages that they were on no account to be sold. One may also add that the names of some of those upon whom this ambiguous honour was to be conferred leave a most unpalatable sensation of regret that the monarchy should, even indirectly, have a hand in such ignominies. There is no Republican feeling in this country, or likely to be, but the supreme overlord of the State must be essentially an impartial holder of the scales between the parties. If he is anything in the conflict, he must be the umpire. The game has been given, it would appear, against one side, while the other has with impunity been permitted to violate recognised rules of fair play. Thus has the lustre of the sceptre suffered, to the profound distress of all loyal persons; but of course to the intense jubilation of many in other quarters, who had determined to drag it in the mire.

Lord Haldane has still further aspersed the Throne by attributing to its occupant last November the astounding utterance—"Whatever the people decide I will accept." It is needless to point out that the Throne had no power to accept what the people decided without the consent of the House of Lords. The impropriety of the alleged words suggest the aberration of the Minister who uttered them, and will no doubt produce an official contradiction.

MUSIC

It is believed by certain shrewd observers of musical fashion that public concerts of chamber music have had their day; that since the rich pleasure which the playing of fine orchestras gives can now be frequently enjoyed, it is not likely that the more delicate delights of chamber music will again be tasted as they once were by the mass of musical amateurs. For a good many years the cultivated amateur who had got beyond the miscellaneous concerts of songs, with a violin or pianoforte piece thrown in, found his chief joy in the performances of Ella's Musical Union and the St. James's Hall Popular Concerts. Only enthusiasts could habitually enjoy a Saturday visit to Mr. Manns' orchestra at the Crystal Palace, for the journey was so wearisome; the Philharmonic Society's Concerts were few; chamber music, therefore, held the first place in the affections of the amateur, and the Quartettes of Haydn and Beethoven, and the Trios of Mendelssohn and Schumann, first heard at St. James's Hall, were thrummed and strummed at home wherever a fair pianist or violinist could gather a few persevering colleagues together. But when opportunities for hearing orchestral music began to multiply, when Symphonies and excerpts from Wagner's operas began seriously to attack the heart-strings of the elect, there eager souls hastened to worship at the newer shrine, and little by little their interest in chamber music declined. It became "the right thing" to adore Richter and his orchestra, and when other great conductors, such as Mottl and Nickisch, found their way to England, the younger generation could think only of the gorgeous splendours of orchestral music. The dear old quartette and quintette were put away, and young people who could dilate for ecstatic hours on the thrilling moments passed at a Wagner concert were found to be as ignorant as the Chinese of the charm of chamber music. We do not mean to imply that the real lovers of good music who had once been familiar with the best chamber music were ever unfaithful to it. They could always enjoy a Rasonmowsky Quartette on Tuesday, even if they had listened to the Ninth Symphony and the Trauermarsch on Monday. They, a devoted remnant, always supported the Joachim concerts, and did their best to encourage the numerous quartette parties to which the rise and progress of the Royal College of Music gave birth.

But the large majority of people who thought music "divine"—that is to say, the people who cannot have too much of whatever happens to be the musical Cynthia of the minute—these turned aside from the whisper of the gentle quartette, and had ears only for the sonorous diapason of the orchestra. Many of these good people, it may be said in passing, find at present that the music of Bach "says more to them" than any other; they have got beyond Wagner to some extent, and they suspect that the worship of Bach is the "right thing" just now. They will only come out of their dens to listen to the music which "does not really appeal" to them, if an unusually brilliant combination of artists is there to interpret it; in these cases their worship is for the stars, and not the music. There is a deal of humbug and make-believe about the exaggerated professions of love for

... THE ...

EYE=WITNESS

Edited by HILAIRE BELLOC.

CONTENTS of No. 17. THURSDAY, Oct. 12th.

PORTUGAL NEXT.	THE GREATNESS OF THE
COMMENTS OF THE WEEK.	MOMENT.—V.
THE POLITICIAN'S WAY.	BALLADES URBANE. XVII.
THE WHIP HAND.	The Ballade of a Book-
POETRY: LEPANTO. By	Reviewer.
G. K. Chesterton.	ON INNS. By Hilaire Belloc.
THE JEWISH QUESTION.—	THE HONEYMOON. By A.
VI. The Second Solution:	DRINKS AND THE MAN.
Exclusion—Historical.	By C. C.
AN OPEN LETTER TO A	LAND TRANSFER. By
GENTLEMAN OF AD-	E. S. P. H.
VANCED AGE. By Junius.	CORRESPONDENCE.
FUN WITH THE CALF.	REVIEWS.
THE RAILWAYS AND THE	THE CITY. By F. W. G.
GLADSTONE ACT.	Etc.

Sixpence Weekly.

At all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Publishing Office: 10, John Street, Adelphi, W.C.

Mr. FIFIELD'S NEW LIST

IN PREPARATION.

- THE MAGIC CROOK: a Fairy Tale. By GREVILLE MACDONALD, M.D. With 55 Illustrations by ARTHUR HUGHES. 5s. net.
- THE COUNTRY HEART and Other Stories. By MAUDE EGERTON KING. 6s.
- ROUND ABOUT A BRIGHTON COACH-OFFICE. By M. E. KING. New Popular Issue. 3s. 6d. net.
- CHRISTIAN'S WIFE. By M. E. KING. New Issue. 2s. net.
- THE ARCHDEACON'S FAMILY. By M. E. KING. 3s. 6d. net.
- THE BLOOD OF THE POOR. An Introduction to Christian Social Economics. By GODFREY BLOUNT, B.A. 3s. 6d. net.
- THE SCIENCE OF SYMBOLS. By GODFREY BLOUNT. Cheaper Edition. 1s. net.
- CASTELLINARIA: Further Diversions in Sicily. By HENRY FESTING JONES. 5s. net.
- EVOLUTION: OLD and NEW. By SAMUEL BUTLER. 5s. net. New Edition, with Author's Revisions, Appendix, and Index.
- POEMS OF JOY and Others. By W. H. DAVIES. 2s. 6d. net.
- THE SECRET THINGS. Poems by MARGARET LOVELL ANDREWS. 1s. net.
- THE POET'S CALENDAR. By MARGARET MACDONALD. 1s. net.
- ON MAETERLINCK. By HENRY ROSE. 1s. and 2s. net.
- CHARLES DARWIN and SAMUEL BUTLER. By HENRY FESTING JONES. 1s. net.

READY.

- THE VINEYARD. 6d. net monthly. 6s. per annum, post-free. Edited by MAUDE EGERTON KING.
- THE NURSERY OF TORISM. By H. S. SALT. 1s. net.
- THREE PLAYS BY BRIEUX. With 50-page Preface by BERNARD SHAW. 5s. net, postage 4d.
- RACIAL DECAY. By O. C. BEALE. 5s. net, postage 4d.
- THE THEORY and PRACTICE OF TRADE UNIONISM. Preface by SIDNEY WEBB. 6d. net.
- NATURE POEMS. W. H. DAVIES. 1s. net. Second Edition.
- FAREWELL TO POESY. W. H. DAVIES. 1s. net.
- THE THIRD ROAD. By KATHLEEN CONYNGHAM GREENE. 1s. net. Second Edition.
- THE CAMEL AND THE NEEDLE'S EYE. By ARTHUR PONSONBY, M.P. 3rd Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
- MY COUNTRY: Right or Wrong. By HERVE. 3s. 6d. net.
- THE COMPLETE WORKS OF SAMUEL BUTLER, Author of "Erewhon."

List and General Catalogue on application.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, Clifford's Inn, E.C.

From MR. JOHN OUSELEY'S AUTUMN LIST.

Health and Empire. FRANCIS FREMANTLE, F.R.C.S., F.R.C.P., &c. 7/6 net. Illustrated.

The Standard, in a whole-column review, says:—"Mr. Fremantle writes with ability and knowledge. . . . The book is one to be read carefully."

The Records Unrolled. Rev. E. S. BUCHANAN, M.A., B.Sc. 2/6 net. A new work on the Ancient MSS. of the Holy Scriptures. With Plates.

The Catholic Times says of the Author:—"His work is interesting and well done . . . we admire the reverent love which prompted and the patient zeal which sustained him." The Christian World says:—"An interesting and freshly-written book. . . . Readers will wish to know more about this unquestionably early and striking form of the New Testament text."

Darwin and the Bible. H. ARMYTAGE. 6/- net.

[Ready shortly.]

The Royal Progress of our Lord. Venerable Archdeacon TROTTER. 5/- net.

[Ready shortly.]

Modern Views of the Bible. Rev. P. A. ELLIS. 2/- net.

With an Introduction by the Dean of WELLS.

The Daily Mail says:—"The book deserves to be widely read, and we warmly commend it to all." The Church Times says:—"A book to recommend."

The Testimony of Jesus. A BEREAN. 1/- net, leather.

[Just ready.]

Forty Years at Westminster Abbey. T. J. WRIGHT,

Clerk of Works. 2/6 net.

[Ready shortly.]

The Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty. J. THOMPSON.

6d. net.

[Just ready.]

Wanderings in Many Lands. Sketches of Travel.

Professor NELSON FRASER, M.A. 6/- net.

[Ready shortly.]

Finger-Posts to Animal Life. Illustrated. R. BROOKS

POPHAM. 5/- net.

[Ready shortly.]

NEW FICTION.

Where Day Begins. ALFRED BUCHANAN, Author of "A Bubble Reputation," &c. 6/-

" . . . Grips you."—The Times. "A vigorous book."—Morning Post. "A strong book."—The Scotsman.

Send for Complete List of Gift-Books in Leather Bindings.

JOHN OUSELEY, Limited, Fleet Lane, Farringdon Street, E.C.

NEW FICTION—(continued).

The Great Betrayal. HAROLD WINTLE, Author of "A Mirror of Folly," &c. 6/-

"A very powerful and exciting story."—Outlook. "A clever thing."—Morning Leader. "Wonderfully enthralling. . . . Quite one of the successes of the year."—Westminster Gazette.

The Altar of Moloch. KINOTON PARKES, Author of "Potiphar's Wife," &c. 6/-

[Just ready.]

Complications at Collaroll. ROSE BOLDREWOOD (Daughter of Rolf Boldrewood). 6/-

An Odd Situation. Mrs. HENRY GREY GRAHAM. 6/-

"Pleasantly written . . . never wearisome."—Times. "A very pleasant love story."—Daily Chronicle.

[Ready shortly.]

The Temple of Demos (A Dream). H. M. BOWER. 6/-

In Time's Storerooms. ETHEL BALFOUR, Author of "A Winning Loser." 6/-

Mrs. Charteris. CONSTANCE HOWELL, Author of "Married in India," &c. 6/-

The Minister's Marriage. Mrs. ALICK FRASER. 6/-

Blue Bell and Heather. "COILA." 3/6 net.

"Very agreeably written."—Evening News.

POPULAR 2/- net NOVELS.

Art Cloth, Coloured Wrappers.

The Laws of Leflo. By the Author of "Miss Molly."

The Chancery Lane Tragedy. RICHARD F. JUPP.

View Thy Trespass. C. H. DUDLEY WARD.

The Torch of Life. EDITH M. HARVEY.

As One Flesh. Mrs. E. G. LEWIS.

Girl Life in the Harem. By a NATIVE OF DAMASCUS.

Ring of Ug. E. ELLIOT STOCK.

music made by many of these otherwise honest folk, and we doubt whether they would continue to patronise a regular series of chamber concerts after the first year or two, even when given by a combination so extraordinary as that of Messrs. Bauer, Kreisler, and Casals. But we wish, indeed, that we may be wrong in this supposition; we should consider it a real sign of grace, of a healthy tone among the concert-going public, if these recently inaugurated concerts came to be regarded as regular institutions which no amateur would dream of failing to profit by—if they came to hold such a place in the life of musical London as do the Sunday Orchestral Concerts, let us say, in Paris. We cannot bear to think that the shrewd observers are right in their prophecy, and that the day will not return when amateurs are as ready to enjoy fine chamber music as they are to hear symphonic poems. We insist upon hoping that broader views, more catholic tastes, may come to be the rule. We English need constantly to be reminded of the Italian shepherd's maxim—"Non perché mi piace il giglio, gl' altri fiori sprezzero"—that sensible shepherd who did not propose to neglect the rest of his garden because the lily happened to be his favourite flower. We are all amorous of our flowers nowadays, just as we all are "devoted to" music, and there is a curious likeness in the course of our love for forms of gardening and forms of music. When we were young, the lady's greenhouse was her joy and pride, the stoves and succession-houses, with their tropical plants, were all that interested the rich proprietor and his visitors, while the beds and borders outside were only the concern of John the gardener. But since the advent of the "herbaceous border" and its successor and rival the rock-garden, it is rare to find any one who takes the trouble to walk through the "houses," except, indeed, there be a carnation-house. Your truest gardener, however, loves flowers of whatever kind and wherever he can grow or see them, even though circumstances may induce him to specialise in one direction. In like manner, your true music-lover will keep a place in his heart for the tender if less gorgeous blossoms of chamber music, as well as for the magnificent wealth of colour that he gets from the tones of the orchestra.

The concert of Chamber Trios given last week at Queen's Hall by Messrs. Bauer, Kreisler, and Casals, which has moved us to indulge in these reflections on the attitude of the amateur towards chamber music, was one of those rare musical occasions when the critic's function in its ordinary sense could be put aside, when every listener competent to form an opinion could surrender himself to the delight of enjoying a performance which must have reached perfection as nearly as is possible in an imperfect world. It is many years since anything like it had been heard in London. We must go back to the days when we heard trios played by Mme. Schumann, Joachim, and Piatti to find anything of the same class, and he would be a bold laudator temporis acti who would confidently affirm that these three magnificent artists produced a finer ensemble or displayed more interpretative power than the three musicians who, we trust, are going to revive the former glories of chamber music concerts, and stem the tide which has set in with so vehement a rush towards orchestral music that it disregards the equal claims of the quartette and trio. Well acquainted as we were with the consummate musicianship of the three artists, we will own that we were to some extent surprised by their marvellous unanimity. Each of the three is an unrivalled solo-player, yet such was their ensemble last week that one might readily have supposed that their lives had been passed in playing trios together. We can never forget that playing; the gods of music had indeed descended from Olympus to favour mortals with an echo of the music of the spheres.

ART

JAMES AUMONIER, R.I.

BY ONE OF HIS STUDENTS

MUCH has been said and written during the last week about the late Mr. James Aumonier, who passed away on October 4th in his eightieth year. His fine work is known and admired in all parts of the world, but only we who loved him knew the greatness of the man. He hated publicity, fuss, and sensationalism; was modest in the extreme about himself; and he had attained the age of seventy-six before he could be prevailed upon to have a "One-Man Show"!

He never "re-arranged" Nature, but painted always just what he saw before him faithfully and conscientiously. If it were necessary for purposes of composition to make any alteration, he would do so with a humbleness of spirit that was perfectly astonishing to those of us who were younger and less reverent. I remember on one occasion hearing him say, with a sort of apology, "I have taken the liberty of moving that tree a little to the left."

Students found in him an ever-ready helper and friend. No work was too trivial for his notice as long as it was earnest and sincere; but he had no patience with any kind of carelessness, and could not understand that impressionistic cleverness which to him amounted to affectation. Yet he would never entirely condemn the work of another, however false it appeared to him. He would say—"I do not see it like that, but it may be right; everyone must paint what he sees."

In the last years of his life he suffered some adversities which at times caused him great anxiety of mind for the sake of those belonging to him. But he came of the old Huguenot stock, and misfortune could not crush his strong, brave spirit. Until a fortnight before his death he worked, losing none of his power till his fingers could no longer hold the brush. He died as he had lived, giving as little trouble as possible, his only anxiety being to spare his family the sight of his sufferings.

A great artist has gone from us, but we, who knew him, mourn most of all for the great-hearted man. As someone else has already said—"He taught us how to live and how to die."

A pretty little exhibition of the work of Miss E. M. Leeson, Miss E. Leoni Wright, and Miss Mildred Ledger was opened this week at the Walker Galleries, New Bond-street. Of the paintings on view, those by Miss Ledger impress us the most; her portraits especially are exceptionally fine. It was a daring thing to attempt a "Lady Hamilton: after Romney," but the result is eminently pleasing, and the simple "Portrait" (No. 116), a study in low tones of a woman in profile, reminiscent of Whistler, is the finest thing in the gallery, although two or three items of a somewhat conventional, decorative group on its left are not far behind in artistic value. "Primroses," the placid face of a girl with a bowl of the flowers, is a good example of a "popular" subject treated with deliberate stiffness without detracting from its beauty, and the various street scenes in Cornwall (one of which we note is duplicated) have the spirit of the county. "The Cottage Window" is too set—the lady before the casement looks as though she had posed for a photograph; but, on the whole, Miss Ledger's work is of a very high standard indeed.

The best picture shown by Miss Leeson is probably "A Brittany Weaver," but it is badly placed in a shadowy corner; it shows lack of finish, but the face and figure are excellently given; all her Brittany studies are good. Miss Wright is not at her best in the paintings of Kew Gardens—too many young artists are beguiled by the wealth of colour there in the time of the azalea-bloom; she succeeds, however, in little landscapes such as "Strand-on-the-Green" and "Alfriston" (wrongly printed "Alfristen"), though in this sketch of the famous hostelry she should have made more of the gargoyles which adorn it. Her crayon head, "Ivy," a study of a laughing child, is charming, and her miniatures, in a class by themselves, should not be overlooked.

OCTOBER MAGAZINES

THE English Review for October begins with a poem, entitled "The Everlasting Mercy," by John Masefield, which is open to criticism on several points. It runs to over forty pages. The story could have been told with infinitely greater effect in prose, and the sentimental, religious musings which overpower its latter part are totally incongruous with the ruffianly "hero." It has beautiful passages, and it has deplorable passages; in the short space at our disposal we can neither quote nor comment as fully as we should like to do, but the reason for casting a fight, a drunken brawl, and the subsequent repentance of the principal character into rhyme seems elusive. Other features of this leading monthly are a good article on "Navy Discontents," by Stephen Reynolds, a suggestive discussion of "Thoroughness in the Theatre," by Gordon Craig, two capital studies of boyhood by Richard Middleton, and a short sketch of Dartmoor life by Eden Phillpotts. A hint to the railway authorities is conveyed by an ex-railway man in an interesting contribution on the recent trouble:—

One of the railways in the South of England was scarcely affected by the strike. This was due to the fact that the general manager of this company made a point, wherever possible, of personally investigating all complaints or suggestions sent in by the staff. He visited districts affected and acquired information direct from the men, instead of merely relying on reports from interested officials, and, in consequence, he was respected and backed by the staff when trouble arose.

The most attractive article in the latest issue of the Dublin Review to students of literature is one on Francis Thompson, by A. A. Cock. It is poetic criticism of the lighter order, with plentiful quotations, and though it throws no particularly strong illumination on Thompson's poems, it is well worth reading; the author draws some interesting analogies with Blake and Wordsworth. Mrs. R. Balfour discusses "Fiona Macleod and Celtic Legends," and other writers in this excellent number are Hilaire Belloc, W. S. Lilly, and Mrs. Alice Meynell.

Sir Clement Kinloch-Cooke, M.P., in his Empire Review deals strongly with "The Passing of Sir Wilfrid Laurier," noting certain inconsistencies in the career of the Canadian Premier, and pointing out that commercial union is as important for the consolidation of the Empire as unity of ideals. Other matters of general interest to politicians are thoroughly treated by capable writers, and the inevitably serious nature of the contents is varied this month by a delightful article, entitled "Oddities," from the pen of Mrs. Ella Hart-Bennett, in which some curious letters are reproduced written by persons whose acquaintance with the English language was just sufficient to lead them into amusing errors. One of these, from a coloured girl seeking a situation, we cannot resist:—

My Ma's very 'ticular bout where I goes. I've been on Govment Hill [Government House] with the Eternal

Mr. Elkin Mathews' Autumn List.

The initial Volume of Lionel Johnson's Collected Works.

POST LIMINIUM: Essays and Critical

Papers by LIONEL JOHNSON. Edited, with an Introduction, by THOMAS WHITTEMORE. Crown 8vo., 6s. net. [Ready in November.]
*The above is the initial Volume of the Collected Works of Lionel Johnson—long demanded by his admirers here and in America—a detailed prospectus of which may be had on application.

CANZONI OF EZRA POUND, Author of

"Personae" and "Exultations." Printed at the Chiswick Press. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Ezra Pound has already become a personality, if a somewhat wayward one, in the world of contemporary verse. Elaborate and well-ordered rhyme-schemes, scrupulously worked out, are a distinguishing feature of his verse, and the self-imposed fetters seldom obtrude. . . . Mr. Pound enjoys another advantage in that the most hackneyed poetical shibboleths hold something new for him—something denied to the minor poet. Mr. Pound is a visionary with a gift of expression that disdains poetical commonplaces. In consideration of so rare an equipment we are tempted to close our eyes to some astonishing lapses."—Athenaeum.

New Volume by MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

LYRICAL POEMS. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

Uniform with "Canzoni." Printed at the Chiswick Press. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net. [In the Press.]

PROSPERO AND OTHER POEMS. By

WILLIAM GERARD, Author of "Dolcino: a Tragedy." Fcap. 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

BALLADS AND VERSES OF THE

SPIRITUAL LIFE. By E. NESBIT (Mrs. Bland). Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

POEMS. By MARNA PEASE (Mrs. Howard Pease).

Royal 16mo., 2s. 6d. net.

A BOOK OF BABES, in Woodcut and Verse.

By LOUISE M. GLAZIER. 32mo., 1s. 6d. net.

THE FLEDGLINGS (Sketches of Child Life).

By HENRIETTA HOME, Author of "The Child Mind." With a Frontispiece. Fcap. 8vo., 2s. net.

SURVIVALS. By R. CHARLES MOIR. Crown 8vo.,

2s. 6d. net.

THE LONE TREK. By DENYS LEFEBURE

(Syned). With Photogravure Frontispiece. Royal 16mo., 2s. 6d. net.

JACK B. YEATS, Being a View of his

Pictorial and Dramatic Art. By ERNEST MARRIOTT.

Adorned with a Portrait of the Artist when a Child by his Father, and a Chart of Pirate Island by JACK B. YEATS. Fcap. 8vo., 1s. net.

SONNETS BY "LUCILLA." Printed at the Chiswick Press. Imperial 16mo., 2s. 6d. net.

MIRAGE. By DOUGLAS AINSLIE. Small 8vo.,

3s. 6d. net.

THE DIARY OF DR. J. W. POLIDORI,

1816. Relating to Byron, Shelley, &c. Edited and elucidated by W. M. BOSSETTI. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES. Fcap. 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

MRS. ALFRED TRENCH. By the Author of

"The Views of Christopher."

"Here is a little book of rare quality, temperament, and distinction—a book that is not afraid to look straight into the eyes of life, and has yet enough of human kindness and wisdom to close its survey in a spirit of sympathy and indulgence. It is a real book, a live piece of literature, a sincere picture of life."—Daily Telegraph.

VIGO CABINET SERIES. New Volumes.

Royal 16mo. Cloth 1s. 6d. net; Wrapper, 1s. net.

A SINGER OF DREAMS. (A Prose Idyll.)

By STANHOPE BAYLEY, Author of "The Sacred Grove."

A MERE SONG AND OTHER POEMS. By M. E.

GRAHAM.

MILES STANDISH. By LONGFELLOW. Dramatised for Performance by EDITH ASHBY.

THE LURE OF EARTH. By CHARLES E.

MOYSE.

PUCK'S FLIGHT AND OTHER POEMS.

By JOHN RODBOROUGH.

AT THE WORLD'S EDGE AND OTHER

POEMS. By MARIA STEUART.

ESCAPADES. By V. TAUBMAN-GOLDIE.

SIX LYRICS FROM THE RUTHENIAN OF

TARAS SHEVCHENKO (with a Biographical Sketch), also THE SONG OF THE MERCHANT FROM THE RUSSIAN OF LERMONTOV. Done into English by E. L. VOYNICH.

THE WATER CARRIER OF VENICE. By RUTH YOUNG.

UNDER THE SWEDISH COLOURS: A

Short Anthology of Modern Swedish Poets. Done into English Verse by FRANCIS A. JUDD. With a Preface by EDMUND GOSSE.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

General's lady [Attorney-General] and with the Lord [Bishop] and I may say with all the rankest families in Nassau.

The October number of the Quarterly Review contains an article on "Diplomacy and Trade," which emphasises the defective condition of our diplomatic and consular services with regard to the commerce of this country. The author, Percy F. Martin, has travelled widely in the Latin-American Republics, and has made a close study of the question. The principal papers in the Economic Journal for this month are those on the National Insurance Scheme (by R. Lennard) and "The Theory of Railway Rates" (by Professor Edgeworth).

Turning to lighter fare, we find the Smart Set, with its new cover, quite up to the average as a budget of entertaining and clever stories and articles; while the Atlantic Monthly strikes the happy medium between mere entertainment and contributions provocative of thought. Among the latter is a remarkable "human document," entitled "The Handicapped: by One of Them," describing vividly the evolution of a philosophy of happiness by a man physically deformed who has his own way to make in the world. The strong point of the Home Counties Magazine is its first article, "The Haymarket," by J. Holden MacMichael, in which many interesting anecdotes of old times in that busy district are brought to light.

BOOKS IN PREPARATION

MACMILLAN AND CO. are particularly busy this month. An examination of their interesting list discloses the fact that they are adding to the almost abnormal rush of autumn publications several volumes which are likely to take a permanent place on the shelves of judicious collectors of books. "The Story of Emma Lady Hamilton," by Mrs. Frankau, for instance, is, without doubt, a volume to possess. It will contain thirty reproductions in colour by a special process, and eight in monochrome of famous paintings and engravings by and after Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Thomas Laurence, Romney, Angelica Kauffman, Madame Virgée Le Brun, Masquerier, Westall, and other contemporary artists. It will have also thirty-seven illustrations in photogravure of personal and topographical interest printed on the wet, and a catalogue of portraits, caricatures, engravings, and sketches far more complete than any which has hitherto been attempted. It must be clearly understood that the plates are not produced by the three-colour, four-colour, or any other mechanical process, but that they are printed in colours exactly by the same method as that employed by the Intaglio printers of the eighteenth century. Although not engraved by hand the result is exceedingly beautiful. This is due on the 20th. On the 17th a new economical work, entitled "Monopoly and Competition: a Study in English Industrial Organisation," by W. Hermann Levy, Ph.D., Professor in the University of Heidelberg, will appear; and in the same week Dr. Bland Sutton will add his volume "Man and Beast in Eastern Ethiopia" to works on Anthropology. Mr. Algernon Blackwood's new novel, "The Centaur," is due on the 20th. Its scenes are mostly laid in the Caucasus, and it is said that its author has developed even further his already well-known gift of imagination—the power of describing unusual experiences and sensations and a keen insight into the spiritual side of man's nature.

A work of very special interest to all those who are keenly alive to the important work of the great Indian Army is about to be published by A. and C. Black. Written by Major G. F. MacMunn, D.S.O., with illustrations in colour by Major A. C. Lovett, Gloucester Regiment, it is called "The Armies in India." Lord Roberts, in his foreword, gives it as his opinion that the author's review of the method by which the existing Army has obtained its present state of perfection will greatly help to a proper understanding for the necessity of studying the characteristics of the many Indian races. To their collection of books for young people A. and C. Black are shortly to add a new edition of Grimm's Fairy Tales, illustrated by Mr. Charles Folkard, which will have the benefit of Ruskin's well-known Preface; an exciting romance of wild Wales in the days of the Civil War called "Red Men of the Dusk," by Mr. John Finnemore, illustrated by Mr. Lawson Wood; a story of public school life and adventure by Mr. Warren Bell, the well-known boys' writer, called "Green of Greyhouse"; and Miss Grierson's "Life of St. Paul," with drawings in colour by Mr. Oswald Moser, R.I.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash, who seems to be specialising in autobiographies, has persuaded Mr. Frank Newton Streatfield, C.M.G., to write his recollections. Mr. Streatfield has, as everyone knows, enjoyed a very distinguished official career in many regions of the globe, and has observed the fortunes of war from many points of view. It will be remembered that Mr. Streatfield served in the South African War of 1877-79 as Commandant of Levies, and that he has done State service at Franskei and Bechuanaland. It is easy to assume, therefore, that his reminiscences will include his personal recollections of many of the most distinguished soldiers of the last half-century. If the book is less sensational than at least one of its predecessors on Mr. Nash's list, it is safe to say that it will not be less entertaining.

Mr. William Austen Leigh, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, has collaborated with Mr. Montagu G. Knight, of Chawton, in the production of a volume called "Chawton Manor and its Owners: a Family History." Although the unspoiled and untrammelled neighbourhood of Chawton is known only to the ordinary reader as the birthplace of Jane Austen, the story of its old manor must be full of quaint and curious romance, for the authors have searched deep among old family papers in order to tell again the story of the defence of Chichester in the Civil War, and bring to light many tales of local things which will not be without a certain charm to all lovers of topography and country lore. They print also a shorthand report of the interview between the Fellows of Magdalen College and King James II. What will Sir Isaac Pitman have to say to this?

Mr. A. C. Fifield's list includes volumes varied enough to suit many tastes. "Castellinaria: Further Diversions in Sicily," by Mr. H. F. Jones, and "Round About a Brighton Coach-Office," by M. King, may stand for home and foreign travel; "Poems of Joy," by W. H. Davies, "The Secret Things"—poems by Margaret L. Andrews, and "The Poet's Calendar," by Margaret Macdonald, will please those whose fancy turns to the Muses; an edition of Samuel Butler's "Evolution Old and New," and "Charles Darwin and Samuel Butler," by Mr. H. F. Jones, are books for the sterner students of philosophy. "The Magic Crook," by Dr. Greville MacDonald, is a fairy-tale with many illustrations, that will appeal not only to children; and for the reader who desires mere entertainment Mr. Fifield issues "The Country Heart, and other Stories," "Christian's Wife," and "The Archdeacon's Family," by Maude E. King. "The Blood of the Poor: an Introduction to Christian Social Economics" and "The Science of Symbols," both by Mr. Godfrey Blount, B.A., are promised shortly, with a study of Maeterlinck by Mr. Henry Rose.

Hutchinson and Co. have just published "Lucas Malet's" long-expected novel "Adrian Savage." They claim thus to have perpetrated the literary event of the autumn. Faced with new novels by Mr. Hewlett, Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. Robert Hichens, Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. Henry James, and Mr. Joseph Conrad, we confess that we do not quite see how this contention can be put forward. It is the time-honoured right of publishers and of parents to regard their offspring as swans, however obviously they belong to the goose family. "Lucas Malet" incontestably glides gracefully and proudly on the upper waters of literature among the not too numerous swans. Her appearances in public are shy and infrequent, and if they never fail to be greeted with the clamorous welcome of many admirers, they are not more epoch-making in the literary sense than those of the writers we have named. If Hutchinson and Co. had said that the appearance of "Adrian Savage" was the literary event of the autumn, so far as women-novelists are concerned, we should have agreed very cordially. They add Miss Evelyn Everett-Green's new novel, "The Evolution of Sara," to their excellent list this week. Mr. John Dill Ross's "Sixty Years" of adventures by land and sea is in great and well-deserved demand. It is more entertaining and exciting than a whole batch of novels.

Abbé Duchesne's "Early History of the Christian Church," which Mr. John Murray is getting ready for publication, has been placed by the Consistorial Congregation of the Vatican upon the Index Expurgatorius. Whether this high-sounding act will have any great effect upon its value to earnest students in England remains to be seen. The first volume of the English translation was published about two years ago, and as the MS. of the second is at this moment in the printer's hands, it cannot be long before it will be ready for us to review. We look forward to the task with keen interest. "The Bulb Book," written, appropriately enough, by Mr. John Weathers, is ready. It contains much information as to bulb-growing and other horticultural matters, and should be in the hands of expert as well as enthusiastic amateur gardeners. For more or less immediate publication Mr. John Murray announces "The Life and Letters of Martin Luther," by Dr. Preserved Smith, who, despite his Christian name, has been able to deal with animation with much new material in regard to good old Martin Luther; Sir Edward Durand's "Rifle, Rod, and Spear in the East"; "The Gentle Art," by Mr. Henry Lamond; and the final volumes of Lord Broughton's "Recollections of a Long Life," edited by his daughter, Lady Dorchester.

W. B. YEATS AND J. M. SYNGE*

SINCE the death of J. M. Synge on March 24th, 1909, there have been not a few who have somewhat eagerly waited to hear what W. B. Yeats had to say concerning him and his work. Indeed, with characteristic English timidity and uncertainty on all matters appertaining to the mystical ritual of Art, there have been critics who have waited in order that Mr. Yeats might give them an indication of what line criticism should take with regard to the strange author of "The Playboy of the Western World." There have been those who have dismissed Synge lock, stock, and barrel as an undramatic accumulator of coloured verbiage. Yet in the main, critics, arrested by the phenomenon for which they could not discover the actuating secret, have written as though they knew not what to say, as though they would gladly praise, but were afraid to praise lest they should praise the wrong things; and at least one has honestly declared that without the promised declaration by W. B. Yeats we were all faced by a responsibility that was at least undesirable.

It is not merely that J. M. Synge was one of the Directors of the Abbey Theatre together with Yeats and Lady Gregory; nor even that for ten years Synge and Yeats were steadfast friends, continually in each other's company, though this last in itself gave the latter an insight into Synge's art and ambitions such as none other can have acquired, or have had the opportunity to acquire. It is rather the fact that Synge received the impulse that led him to the source from which he derived his art. How much this meant is not always recognised. Very largely, it is true, it was an accident that led to the suggestion that Synge should leave Paris to take his way to the Aran Islands. But it was a very happy accident. It is difficult to glean authentic and direct information concerning the Synge of Paris days; but if he were then similar to his older self of the later Dublin days—and the perpetual history of human nature insists that men do not change but merely develop—then the man who roved the Continent from 1893 to 1899 was a man not a little impressed by the power of his own genius. In his maturer days the distinction between George Moore and J. M. Synge was said to be that while the former had doubts as to who was the foremost living writer in the English tongue, Synge was never in any manner of doubt at all, and it is very unlikely that the same man in his younger days was innocent of the same emotions. Therefore, when Yeats met Synge in that little hotel in the Rue Corneille in the year 1899, and bade him leave Paris, where literature had become far removed from life, and proceed to the West of Ireland to express a life that had never found expression, the situation was a vital one—far more vital than either of its two participants could ever have realised at the time. The fact that Synge acted on the advice is everybody's knowledge, and it is to be examined in its results in a handsome collected edition of perhaps the only plays of their own decade that shall rescue themselves from oblivion and pass to literature. But it gives Mr. Yeats an authoritative voice on anything he may choose to say concerning his friend.

It is this that makes his present publication important; even as it is this that will cause many to read it with increasing disappointment. Perhaps they who will suffer the greatest disappointment will be the critics aforesaid, for Mr. Yeats has rigorously excluded from his pages any attempt to criticise or appraise his friends' dramatic achievement. We remember having seen at odd times various matter over Mr. Yeats' signature that has given an invaluable indication as to Synge's aims and purposes. Perhaps it is wise, however, that these should be excluded. It is always better that a man's work should find its way through the years unattended by expositions that are his own or that derive from him. Invariably there will be found in it possibilities and susceptibilities, inherent with its conception, but undreamed of by its author, and these things may well be obscured by an author's own pronunciamiento. But there is a mass of information very relevant to the understanding of Synge, which we should like to have known, but which has been withheld from us. For example, and on a side issue, Mr. Yeats' account of the 1899 meeting in Paris is only available in an introduction to an edition of Synge's "Well of the Saints," published some years ago by A. H. Bullen, and not very easily procurable now. It would have been no bad thing had this been rendered to us anew, and been made the beginning of an account of his friendship with Synge, that would not have traversed the inviolacy of friendship, and yet have permitted us an intimacy with that strangely aloof and mordant personality such as would have better equipped us for an understanding of his written achievement.

* Synge and the Ireland of his Time. By William Butler Yeats. With a Note concerning a Walk through Connemara with him by Jack Butler Yeats. (The Cuala Press, Dumdrum, Ireland. 10s. net.)

The fact is that one is mainly concerned either with the man who achieved the work, or with the work that he achieved. It would be difficult to conceive of anything else that in any way affects the matter. And yet this study of Mr. Yeats is concerned with neither one nor the other of these two interests. In fact it may be said that it is mainly not concerned with Synge at all, though its beginning is with Synge at a dramatic moment of his history. There is almost more of Synge in the following opening paragraph than there is in the rest of the book:—

On Saturday, January 26th, 1907, I was lecturing in Aberdeen, and when my lecture was over I was given a telegram which said, "Play great success." It had been sent from Dublin after a second act of "The Playboy of the Western World," then being performed for the first time. After one in the morning my host brought to my bedroom this second telegram, "Audience broke up in disorder at the word shift." I knew no more until I got the Dublin papers on my way from Belfast to Dublin on Tuesday morning. On the Monday night no word of the play had been heard. About forty young men had sat in the front seats of the pit, and stamped and shouted and blown trumpets from the rise to the fall of the curtain. On the Tuesday night also the forty young men were there. They wished to silence what they considered a slander upon Ireland's womanhood. Irish women would never sleep under the same roof with a young man without a chaperon, nor admire a murderer, nor use a word like "shift," nor could any one recognise the country men and women of Davis and Kickham in these poetical, violent, grotesque persons, who used the Name of God so freely, and spoke of all things that hit their fancy.

Nevertheless, directly this one matter is concluded, Mr. Yeats proceeds to occupy himself with sundry other matters, the relevance of which to Synge is hard to discover, although in a certain way it is very closely connected with "The Ireland of His Time." Familiar names—such as Thomas Davis and T. F. Taylor—cross his pages; and J. M. Synge's name flits in and out in rather a confusing and perplexing way.

It is just this lack of orderly sequence that destroys much of the value of this book. Yet from another standpoint it is just this lack of orderly sequence that gives it much of its strange charm. Mr. Yeats speaks in one place of having written "most of these thoughts in my diary on the coast of Normandy," and indeed the whole book reads as though it were some kind of a diary, as though its author had unpacked his ideas concerning much that had engaged his thoughts in the literary history that Ireland is now achieving for herself, on the ways, means, and manner of that achievement, with only a secondary interest in Synge himself. Often it reads as though the thought of Synge suddenly crossed his mind, with the result that he penned down some sentences concerning Synge that are startling in their illumination: such, for instance, as "He was a drifting man full of hidden passion, and loved wild islands, because there, set out in the light of day, he saw what lay hidden in himself;" or the record of his conversation with Synge, in which they spoke of the not altogether strange preference that many minds in England and Ireland gave to "Riders to the Sea" over "The Shadow of the Glen." These things startle our attention doubtless because the sudden memory of Synge that caused them in no less a degree startled Yeats as he wrote. But one of the chief gains of all this is quite another matter. We may not receive as much knowledge of Synge, nor as much criticism of his work, as we may desire; but we do get a prose that in its musing reminiscence works its way into a long, rolling cadence that is peculiarly haunting.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

JAPAN'S NAVAL EXPANSION

A MESSAGE from Reuter's correspondent in St. Petersburg declares that information has been received there of the intention of the Japanese Ministry of Marine to demand from the Diet at the next session an extraordinary credit of forty millions sterling, to be spread over a period of seven years, and to be devoted to the purpose of naval expansion. Obviously in this announcement is to be found Japan's answer to recent measures of international importance in the region of the Pacific. Those students who have knowledge of the assertive character of Japanese policy will not be surprised at the decision of the Tokyo Government. The determination of our Colonies to possess strong Navies under their own control in Far Eastern waters, the revision of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance in such a way as to leave that instrument nothing more or less than a polite record of platonic friendship, and the advancement of the date of the opening of the Panama Canal to 1913, were factors which Japan was bound to take into consideration. Viewed in a sense strictly correct, the expansion of her Navy is purely a matter of her own domestic concern. At the same time we should be lacking in the quality of ordinary precaution were we not to attach to her action the deep significance which it warrants. It is apparent that not only in the Western, but in the Eastern Hemisphere the rivalry in armaments on a tremendous scale is now actively in progress, and that in our endeavours to maintain a two-Power standard we must take into full consideration the hypothetical distribution of our Navy as against enemies not only in the West, but in the Far East. In plain language our prestige no less than our vital interests will not be adequately protected in the Pacific unless we calculate upon the basis of a two-Power standard against Japan. Furthermore the question seriously arises as to how far we should assist Japan to expand a Navy which one day might conceivably be employed against ourselves. It is notorious that the finances of Japan are at present in a precarious state. To a large extent the cost of increasing the Navy has hitherto been met by appropriations from war loans, and it is difficult to see how any further expansion can be carried out without recourse to the English money markets, or, in other words, to the pockets of the English public. Japan will not, of course, candidly declare the object of her borrowing. She will merely indulge in a transaction of shuffling funds—that is to say, attracting money for the avowed purpose of railway or other productive development, and, not needing immediately to apply the whole sum to such purpose, will re-lend it to the Admiralty, who will promptly invest this British money in Japanese warships. A precedent, as I have already pointed out, is to be found in her appropriation of thirty millions sterling from the Russo-Japanese war funds.

Ostensibly they negotiated the loans for the purpose of waging war against Russia, but it is beyond all reasonable doubt that the financiers of the West were hoodwinked into providing an additional thirty millions sterling which it was never the intention of Japan to utilise for any other object than the systematic construction of warships over a period she well knew must extend far beyond the latest date when hostilities could have been brought to a close. Leaving altogether out of the question the underlying but ever present motive of an Imperial ambition—a motive that, sooner or later, must invariably have committed her to the creation of a sea force of first magnitude—it is to the lessons of the China war, and particularly to the corollary of that campaign whereby, in regard to the Kwantung fortress, Japan found herself dispossessed of the fruits of victory, that we must look for the determining point in her destiny as a naval Power. During the period of ten years following the conclusion of the Treaty of Shimonoseki two separate programmes of expansion reached completion, and her Navy increased from 61,000 to upwards of 280,000 tons, so that on the outbreak of the recent hostilities she was able to command, exclusive of her torpedo flotilla, an effective fighting force of seventy-six vessels of all classes, representing a total displacement of 275,000 tons. In the course of the campaign she lost in all twelve ships, aggregating 46,000 tons, but of these only four vessels—two battleships, the Hatsuse and the Yashima, and two second-class cruisers—were of material fighting value. Against this loss, however, she was able to place seventeen ships with a total of 105,000 tons, some of which she had captured during engagements, and others she had raised from the harbour of Port Arthur, where they had been sunk by the Russians on the eve of the capitulation. These seventeen ships comprised eight battleships and one armoured cruiser of various degrees of fighting efficiency, two first-class protected cruisers, one third-class protected cruiser, and five destroyers. Japan emerged from the war, therefore, with eighty-one warships, representing a displacement of 333,000 tons. During the past half decade she has, in ships built and building, still further augmented her Navy by 258,000 tons. Thus there have been two distinct periods in her recent history, each following the conclusion of a successful war, during which Japan resolutely set herself the task of realising an ambitious scheme of naval armaments.

In a broad survey of world conditions as they exist to-day it requires no effort of the imagination to see that Japan holds a position of overwhelming superiority in the Pacific. Her Empire is geographically compact, and the territories over which she wields a political influence lie at her very door. Outside the region of Eastern Asia she has now no serious national responsibilities, and it is unlikely for years to come that the strategical disposition of her fleets will take them far from home. Within a few days of their base her warships are able to show the flag in the coast and the river ports of her helpless neighbour China, and to this natural advantage is to be attributed in a large measure Japan's growing influence in the capital and in the provinces of that great Empire. It has not been entirely due to coincidence that a conclusion, favourable to our ally, of protracted and troublesome negotiations with a patriotically stubborn Wai-wu-pu has frequently synchronised with the sudden and sinister appearance of a Japanese squadron in the waters of Pechili. We cannot, as I have already said, prevent Japan from still further strengthening her position by means of additions to her Navy, but that is no reason why we should blind ourselves to a potential menace and continue to lend her money and patronage.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

ON Wednesday of last week 118 candidates were elected to membership of the Royal Automobile Club, which brings the total number of members, including those belonging to affiliated clubs, to nearly twenty-four thousand. Many unpleasant things have been said about the Club in reference to its alleged indifference to the interests of the motoring community—more especially since the transfer of its headquarters to the palatial building in Pall Mall—and its attitude towards the A.A. and M.U. in such matters as the proposed National Council of Motoring certainly lends itself to adverse criticism; but motorists should not forget the great services the Club has rendered, and continues to render, by the holding of its "trials." All through the year its experts are engaged in subjecting to exhaustive tests motor-cars and new devices designed to reduce the cost or add to the comfort and convenience of motoring, and its "certificates of performance" have rightly come to be looked upon by motorists as invaluable. It may not be generally known that these certificates, which set forth in the fullest detail and with absolute impartiality what a car, tyre, or other accessory has actually done under expert observation and ordinary touring conditions, may be obtained by any one on application to the Secretary of the R.A.C., who will also be pleased to furnish any supplementary information that may be desired respecting any particular trial. The most recent entries for official tests are a 15.9h.p. (R.A.C. rating) "Sunbeam;" a "Mira Magnetolite" electric car-lighting equipment, which is entered for a 3,000 miles trial by Messrs. Jarrott and Letts; and the Thomas Transmission, which is to be tried on a Delahaye car from London to Edinburgh and back.

In the columns of a French contemporary (La Vie Automobile), M. Faroux, perhaps the most famous living writer on technical automobilism, outlines his conception of what the typical motor-car of ten years hence will be; and although experience has proved the fallacy of many a prophecy relating to motor-car evolution, the well-considered opinions of so intelligent and level-headed an expert are well worth attention. M. Faroux does not anticipate any drastic departures from the main features of present standard design. Modifications of detail will be numerous, but in all essentials the car of 1921 will be much the same as it is to-day. He considers that the part of the modern car which is the most in need of radical improvement is the suspension; shock-absorbing devices are, in his opinion, merely palliatives necessitated by the unsoundness of all existing methods of suspension. The dispensing with the gear-box, the increasing of engine and transmission efficiency, and the development of the two-stroke motor represent, according to M. Faroux, the probabilities in motor-car evolution during the next ten years.

Perhaps, however, the most interesting and important pronouncement of the French expert is with regard to the tyre of the future—a subject of perennial interest to every motorist. He is firmly of opinion that, so far as pleasure vehicles are concerned at any rate, the pneumatic will never be supplanted, although improvements in their construction will be made from time to time. As M. Faroux has been intimately associated with the organisation of many open competitions for spring wheels, he is entitled to speak with authority upon this point, and his opinion will be endorsed by many who have devoted special attention to the subject, and noted the rise, progress, and rapid decline of practically all the numerous devices which have made their appearance during the last ten years, and been confidently expected—by the inventors—to consign the pneumatic to oblivion. Another interesting vaticination of M. Faroux is that the next ten years will witness the arrival of the ideal small car which will render motoring a pastime for the multitude. This car of the future will have a four-cylindrical engine of about 8h.p., and it will be sold at £100 or less, fitted with two-seated body, and completely equipped for the road. This is, of course, the car which thousands of people have long been waiting for, and when it does materialise, the day of universal motoring will be at hand.

The Secretary of the Automobile Association and Motor Union informs us that the Secretary for Scotland has authorised the Association to perform in Scotland all the duties specified in Article 1 of the Motor-car (International Circulation) Order of 1910 in reference to the work of examining and certifying motor-cars and drivers for use in foreign countries, and to issue international passes in accordance with the International Convention. Similar authority with regard to England and Ireland had already been delegated to the Association, which is the only organisation entitled to issue the passes in all the three countries. Applicants can now be examined at any of the offices of the Automobile Association and Motor Union—in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dublin, and Belfast.

At a meeting of the committee of the Royal Aero Club on the 3rd inst. aviators' certificates were granted to Captain F. W. Richey, Captain Steele Hutcheson, and Lieutenant C. L. N. Newall, and two new members—Lieutenant J. F. Lecky and Lieutenant E. J. Strover—were elected. It is interesting to note that the holders of the three certificates of proficiency above mentioned are all users of "Bristol" machines.

The attention of commissioned officers in his Majesty's Regular Army, the Royal Navy, and the Royal Marines is drawn to the Army and Navy Aviation Prize of £1,000, presented by Mr. A. Mortimer Singer, one of the members of the committee of the Royal Aero Club. The entrance fee is £1, and the rules can be obtained from Mr. Harold E. Perrin, the Secretary, at 166, Piccadilly, W. Entries have already been received from Captain E. L. Gerrard, R.M.L.I.; Lieutenant C. R. Samson, R.N.; Lieutenant R. Gregory, R.N.; and Lieutenant W. Parke, R.N.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

LAST week's optimism did not last very long. The Stock Exchange declared that it was growing nervous over Morocco. But this was merely an excuse. Prices had risen, in some markets very considerably, and the holders of pawned stock thought it a good opportunity to get out. As there are no buyers of speculative shares to be discovered, and as dealers have neither the inclination nor sufficient capital to put stock on their books, they let everything go with a run. The political situation does not appear to have changed at all. It still seems certain that Morocco will be exchanged for a portion of the French Congo. It is still almost certain that Austria views the Italian expedition with the greatest dislike. England will probably declare a protectorate over Egypt, and in the general scramble Turkey will certainly get badly damaged. She is desperate, and desperate people are not usually very particular what they do.

As the Bank of Egypt liquidation proceeds, the City finds it rather more disagreeable than they first anticipated. According to the statement given to the bankers who attended the meeting, the assets amount to £3,122,000 and the liabilities to £2,749,000. But these assets are made up to a great extent of £2,480,000 "customers' loans" in Egypt. It is understood that large sums have been borrowed by the Mohammedan religious community. No legal action could be taken to recover this money. But it is perfectly secure, and will probably be taken over by some other bank. Nevertheless, it seems very doubtful how much the Egyptian assets will produce. The figures in the balance-sheet to December 31st, and those on the day the Bank stopped payment, show astounding differences. Cash has fallen nearly £309,000 in the nine months, and the Bank only had £64,000 in the till when it suspended payment. The securities, however, show a strange stability, for they have only fallen £25,000. Evidently either the Bank had pledged these securities or its directors were afraid to sell them. Bank premises in the end of the year balance-sheet stood at a nominal figure. They have since been raised to £120,000. No one will grumble at this, as it is understood that they are worth even more money than is to-day stated. Perhaps the two most astounding items in the new figures are the acceptances and the appearance of a loan from Glyn's. Acceptances on December 31st were £1,733,319. They have only fallen £218,000 in the nine months! Glyn's loan of £117,000 is a new item, or was not disclosed in the old balance-sheet. It must be admitted that the Bank of Egypt failure is one of the worst Bank failures we have had in England for many years. The Egyptians are furious with the suggestion that Luzatto brought about the failure. They say that the failure was entirely due to the incompetence of the directors and the extremely bad management of the Bank after Luzatto died. At first the stoppage was received very quietly in both Cairo and Alexandria. But now that the figures are available the strongest feeling is manifested, and there cannot be any doubt that the collapse has done a great deal to shake English credit in Egypt. Most unfortunately nearly all the people that England sends out to Egypt are bad men of business, knowing little of Arabic and not understanding the Eastern character. As a result the native Egyptian, the Greek, the Levantine, and the Italian all have the greatest contempt for English business methods. The failure of the Bank of Egypt will not help us. The National Bank will, it is said, pay all the depositors, taking a lien on the uncalled capital. But the Stock Exchange evidently considers that the National Bank is not doing very good business, for the price of the shares has fallen since the announcement was made.

With reference to the fourteen million Argentine Loan, a story has been current that the Syndicate were unable to pay up their instalments. This has been definitely denied. It is also denied that the Argentine Republic will be in the market again. The Argentine Minister of Finance cables a flat denial.

MONEY.—The Stock Exchange had to pay 4 per cent. for its loans at the settlement, but this was not an unreasonable amount, and shows that all our banks have plenty of money to lend out. The extraordinary movement of the Reichsbank at the end of the quarter settlement has caused a good deal of talk in the City, but the credit of the German banks is good, and unless we get a war they will be able to pull through. But the accumulation of credit in Germany is enormous. The whole of Germany is living upon credit. Whether this is quite wise is a doubtful point. The multitude of banks of every description that are continually lending out money and pawning the securities on which they lend the money grows every day. The business looks astoundingly dangerous, but the German has absolute confidence in the future of his Empire; and as long as he can keep peace there is very little chance of a collapse. The German joint stock banks run on about 10 per cent. of cash, and the German mortgage banks have actually accumulated nearly 600 millions of credits, on a perfectly nominal amount of cash. Then there are thousands of banks that lend to poor people founded by Schultz-Delitsch and Raffeisen. When things are good credit grows rapidly, but it has a habit of withering up under misfortune. Then gold is the only thing that tells. Whether we have not all made a huge mistake in our system of currency is a debatable point. It is too late now to alter, and we must accept facts as they are. In the present day the nation that has the biggest supply of gold is the nation that can stand up the longest, and Germany has certainly less as compared with her credits than any other nation in the world. She has built up vast industries, but they have become so vast that they have outgrown their strength.

CONSOLS.—Consols pulled themselves together last week, but they have gone flat again, notwithstanding the efforts of all the postmasters in the country to sell a few. Nothing, however, will be done by such amateur attempts to strengthen the Consol Market. The only legitimate and businesslike way is to sell Consols to bearer in £5 blocks.

FOREIGNERS.—A contemplation of the Foreign Market acts as an antidote to the pessimism of the City. Here, in spite of war and rumours of war, prices remain unchanged. There is hardly any speculation except in Perus and Tintos. Nobody wants to sell any bonds and there is no scare anywhere. Guayaquil and Quito rose on a boom cable from the President, which probably means that the Ecuador Government are in need of money. But none of these Central American republics can be trusted a yard, and the sooner they are all taken over by the United States the better for the creditors. After all it is only a question of time before this will become an accomplished fact. As soon as the Panama Canal opens the United States will be compelled to act. In the meantime it might probably be a good speculative lockup to buy some of the more rotten bonds.

HOME RAILS.—Gradually and slowly the railways are making up the losses they sustained through the strike. It is known that most of the lines will in the end secure as good traffics this half-year as they did in the corresponding half-year of 1910, and this knowledge keeps the market moderately steady. Great Northern have already succeeded in wiping out their loss. We cannot, of course, tell how much the strike cost, but we know that some of the railways spent very large sums, which they will of course charge against the expenses of the half-year. The rise in the price of coal will not affect any of the companies until 1912, as the contracts are made once a year. After all, the coal strike may never come to pass. It has been talked about for a long time. It is the maddest thing that a British agitator ever suggested. Possibly if such a strike came to pass it would so disgust the average workman with the leaders of the Trades Unions that it might turn out a blessing in disguise.

YANKEES.—The speculator very wisely keeps out of the American market, and all the business is done either on behalf of New York or is purely professional gambling entered into by the jobbers in the American houses in London. It is useless to argue about the future of American railways when there is no business going. The American bankers have now as much money as they want, and actually, instead of being financed from Berlin, New York is financing Germany herself. The market moves in spasms, and I can see no sign of any improvement this year. Perhaps, towards the end of the year, the banks will mark up prices in order that their balance-sheets may show up. This is often done, and some gamblers make a point of speculating upon it. But we need hardly expect a boom until next spring. Wise people keep out of such a risky market as Yankee Rails. Investors, however, may buy Unions and consider themselves lucky to secure a 10 per cent. stock at so low a price.

RUBBER.—Some of the rubber reports that come out are good. North Hummock, for example, although the price of this share is too high. But others are not so satisfactory. The British Rubber Estates of Java, which promised us £5,221 in the prospectus, does not propose to pay any dividend at all. The estates are moderately capitalised, but evidently working costs are very much too high. Notwithstanding the fact that the Company sold its coffee at from 45 to 48 guilders a cwt. as compared with 31 guilders prospectus price, there is practically no profit to show on the year. The Company will be very lucky if it manages to go through another year without calling for further capital.

OIL.—Everything in the oil market is good. Shells are going up every day. Spies are strong. Burmahs are being bought. Lobitos still rise, and Nigeria Bitumen have jumped 10s. This Company has found good oil in its deep wells. Another piece of good news for the oil market is the striking of oil by the Guapo, one of the Taylor companies in Trinidad. Trinidad looks as though it would turn out a fairly profitable oil-field.

KAFFIRS.—The latest blow to the Kaffir market is the news that Wit Deep is flooded in its lower levels. This will stop development work and reduce profits. Wit Deep, considering the life of the mine, are too high in price. People talk about bargains in the Kaffir market, and the newspapers publish tables of yields, but all these tables omit the lives, which are the most important thing. Everybody seems to forget that a mine is a vanishing asset, and that no sane person would buy a mine share without writing off so much every year as amortisation. If the amortisation question is considered very few mines in the Kaffir market are undervalued. The Kaffir magnates know the value of their properties to a sixpence, and they are far too cute to let the public have them when they are cheap. It is reserved for the British public to buy them at the top. The big houses pretend that they are supporting this market, but I see very little sign of it to-day.

RHODESIANS.—Rhodesians are being puffed for all they are worth. No one can say that the Rhodesian magnates do not support the Press. They spend many hours every day in giving away calls to journalists, and go in for this sort of thing. As it costs the Rhodesian magnates nothing, and as it ties up a journalist by the leg for the rest of his natural life, there does not appear to be much in it for either party. Puffs of Rhodesian mining ventures should always be read with the greatest caution. Eventually Rhodesia will become a very reasonable agricultural colony. But if we take the capitalisation of the mines of Rhodesia from the day when the Chartered Company started, we shall find that hundreds of millions of paper have been created, and that the return of this capital is so small as hardly to be discoverable. The dividend-paying mines in Rhodesia are few and far between. Most of the dividend-paying Rhodesian companies make their money out of stock-jobbing, and not out of genuine mining. All the Rhodesian houses are out with one idea—to sell shares to the public as quick as they can. As they have literally millions of shares to sell, one can understand their anxiety to see those shares written up in the newspapers.

MISCELLANEOUS.—London General Omnibus have had a big rise, and if it be true that they have earned enough to pay a 15 per cent. dividend, the rise is justified. The report will soon be out; but I do not fancy that the Board, in view of the heavy depreciation that takes place every year in a motor-omnibus, will dare to pay more than 5 per cent. It is asserted that they have got their running costs down to 8d. a mile; if so, this is a feather in the cap of the engineers. Marconis are still bought; but Cements are weak, and we wait anxiously for the report, which should be out very shortly.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE FUTURE OF THE TERRITORIAL FORCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read with extreme interest Mr. R. J. Turner's admirable article in your last issue on 'The Future of the Territorial Force.' I think he has touched upon every one of the most important points to be considered in keeping up its efficiency, and has some good suggestions to offer as well. He writes at a most opportune moment, for next April—none too far off—will be a time of vital importance to the Territorial branch of our Army, as in that month the engagements for four years of men who joined in 1908 will expire.

Therefore a large number of recruits will be required to fill up not only these vacancies, but also the shortage which exists at present.

I do not propose to consider the case of men re-engaging. I think it advisable that a small number should re-engage in order to make a leaven of old soldiers, as with the Regulars; but as a whole it is better for the nation—nay imperative—that fresh batches of young men should be passed through the Territorial Force every four years, so that in a certain number of years we should have nearly the whole of the young manhood of the country trained to arms. I hold this view as the chief and most essential raison d'être of the Territorial Force, just as it is the main object of compulsory service and conscription.

Where are the recruits to come from? Or rather let me express it differently—What are the reasons that a good supply has not been forthcoming so far, and that the Force is still under strength?

Mr. Turner puts it down first and foremost, most correctly, to the need of money; in other words, enough money is not spent on the Force, a view with which every one who knows the working of the Force will agree. The truth of the matter is, and there is no use in hiding it, that if any nation wants an Army of trained soldiers it must be prepared to pay for it—no matter whether those soldiers are to belong to the first, second, or third line of the Army. In every other profession or trade money has to be freely expended on the pupil, yet the unfortunate soldier is expected to teach himself at his own expense, and very often to his own pecuniary loss. A working man who happens to be out of work when he is called out for training, does his training and has lost a fortnight in looking for work—the obtaining of which is of vital importance to him. The State should do something for him. As regards the employer. Mr. Turner is quite sound in his idea that all employers should display the notice "Territorials only accepted." A great step forward would be reached in this vexed question when this is accomplished. I call it a vexed question for, in my opinion, the one great fault in the Territorial Army scheme is the part our friend the employer is expected to play. This gentleman has practically the whole burden placed on his shoulders. We are supposed to shut our eyes to the losses incurred by him in his business by having all his assistants away at once, and having to engage new and raw hands temporarily, to say nothing of the severe handicap caused by a rival who is unpatriotic enough to refuse to allow his employees to join the force. This is quite unfair.

As for the Veteran Reserve, it is a splendid movement. Here again, money is wanted. For the men must be given instruction every year in order that they may keep pace with the continual and endless changes in drill formations, words of command, and musketry. Otherwise they would be quite useless on a sudden emergency. I would suggest, roughly, a small permanent staff kept for the purpose at a regimental dépôt or Territorial barracks where the men could come at any time during the year as their labour engagements permitted them (thus entailing no hardship), do their training, and, on completion of it, receive their allowances.

I fear I have greatly encroached on your space, but the whole subject is of such absorbing interest that one letter is not sufficient to do justice to all the intricate details. I will therefore draw my remarks to a close by expressing the hope that my countrymen are fully aware of the great importance of the Territorial Army as a national factor. It is turning out a magnificent Force, and it has a great future before it. No one who has seen the officers and men—their smart turn-out, their work at manoeuvres and in quarters during the year (I have in my mind the West Surrey Battalions particularly) can deny this. It would be the greatest misfortune to let it now die of inanition after the initial difficulties of its existence have been surmounted so successfully, for in its place must come "compulsory service," with all its attendant disadvantages, as every sane man must realise that our Empire must have an adequate Army to defend its honour, population, Possessions, and trade—in fact, its very existence.

T. QUIN, Lieut.-Colonel (Retired).

Lingfield, Surrey.

WANTED, SCIENCE IN CRITICISM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—To the man in the street who, from his common ground of outlook, is no mean reader or interpreter of signs and imports, the results of our present world chaos (for social disorganisation has developed into a universal thing) must appear to be due to the manner of our subjection to an empiric condition of affairs rather than to the manner of our objection to it. For it cannot be denied, in the face of experience, that the social evils and distresses of the times emanate more from pure ignorance (human forms of impotence) than from pure wilfulness (human forms of desire). I am speaking, of course, of civilisation in general. This fact of ignorance is proved by the general though futile efforts promoted to ameliorate or rectify conditions.

Now, speaking for our own critical attitude as a nation, why is it that our endeavours to alter or amend conditions merely hang fire or add to the heat of controversy? It is because criticism, to be effective, must be soundly objective, and not, like ours is, merely imperfectly so. An empiric condition of things cannot be successfully fought by empiric forms of opposition. To illustrate this I submit the following instances:—

1. Our religious or spiritual life is disorganised. You cannot readjust it by further disorganisation—by disestablishing a National Church.

2. Our political life is disorganised. You cannot readjust it by further disorganisation—by demolishing or dismembering a political union.

3. Our industrial life is disorganised. You cannot readjust it by further disorganisation—by Penal Statute or State Insurance.

4. Our civil life is disorganised. You cannot readjust it by further disorganisation—by Universal Suffrage.

Now these are supreme instances of our empiric attempts to alter an empiric condition of things. It would take a volume to recount all the minor instances. But it is these very supreme instances which should make the objective of criticism sound and therefore effective in producing a supreme state of order. Failure must, therefore, be due to systematic unsoundness—to structural rottenness. A basic form of adjustment is wanting in this sense, and it is here that a certain brilliant assertion in the forcible writing of Mr. Frank Harris strikes me as being very significant.

Present conditions, according to this writer—and I am not making a literal quotation—make it impossible for a man to give of his best—only of his second best. What this second best amounts to is of no consequence whatever, seeing that it can have nothing to do with a man's own purification, and, therefore, in an indirect way, with the welfare of his country.

But surely a system or condition of things which fails to demand as well as reward the best efforts of mankind is a system which, like our own, must fail in every leading or commanding characteristic. It systematically impoverishes and destroys its ground of stimulation—namely, Genius, whatever form it may take,

And yet—mark the canting hypocrisy—we pride ourselves on the possession of Shakespeare.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. C. DANIEL.

Loughton, Cherry Hinton, Cambridge, October 9th, 1911.

THE LATE MR. CHURTON COLLINS AND ROBERT GREENE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—I notice that Mr. Frank Harris illustrates what he is pleased to call his friend's extraordinary accuracy and reverence for facts by telling us that Mr. Collins searched through the registers of forty-two churches in Norwich to find the exact date of the poet Greene's death—and that he at length found it. This surely is a discovery which is quite a surprise to the majority of Elizabethan students. When Gabriel Harvey wrote that Greene was buried on September 4th (1592) in the "new churchyard near Bedlam" he must have been writing at random if Mr. Collins's discovery was not a mare's nest. For my part, I am more inclined to accept the word of a contemporary than to trust the "extraordinary accuracy" of Mr. Collins. Mr. Harris must know what that is worth if he has taken the trouble to examine his friend's thesis that Shakespeare was a good classical scholar and much indebted to the Greek tragic poets. Even Mr. Gosse, with "his ignorance, carelessness, and blundering," could not have produced any quite so inaccurate, inept, and incoherent. Mr. Collins's edition of the "Plays and Poems of Greene" for the Clarendon Press is a still better example of his "extraordinary accuracy"—it is not too severe a criticism to say of that perfunctory piece of armchair editing that as a final edition of an English writer it is a gross insult to English scholarship.

I am, yours truly,

HESTER BRAYNE.

October 9th, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED FICTION

- Adrian Savage.* By Lucas Malet. Hutchinson and Co. 6s.
Troubled Waters. By L. Cope Cornford. William Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
The Progress of Mrs. Cripps-Middlemore. By Gerard Bendall. John Lane. 6s.

- The Chronicles of Clovis.* By H. H. Munro ("Saki"). John Lane. 6s.
Under Western Eyes. By Joseph Conrad. Methuen and Co. 6s.
The Love-Locks of Diana. By Kate Horn. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
Mated. By Isabel Smith. Digby, Long and Co. 6s.
The Mark of the Cross. By Edgar Swan. Digby, Long and Co. 6s.
Mates at Billabong. By M. Grant Bruce. Illustrated. Ward, Lock and Co. 2s. 6d.
Danger Mountain: A Story of Adventure in Unexplored New Guinea. By Robert M. Macdonald. Illustrated by A. Webb. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.
The Boshury People, circa A.D. 1900. By Arthur Ransom. Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.
The Story of Helen. By M. F. Hutchinson. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. S.P.C.K. 3s. 6d.
Another Pair of Shoes; A Northumbrian Story. By Austin Clare. Illustrated by Oscar Wilson. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.
In the Days of Queen Mary. By E. E. Crake, M.A. Illustrated by W. S. Stacey. S.P.C.K. 2s.
Hugh Carrington's Ordeal. By Charles W. Haskins. Illustrated by W. S. Stacey. S.P.C.K. 2s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Annual Progress Report of the Superintendent Hindu and Buddhist Monuments, Northern Circle, for the Year ending March 31st, 1911.* Punjab Government Report. P. S. King and Son. 1s. 4d.
Beautiful Britain: Stratford-on-Avon, with Leamington and Warwick. By Dixon Scott. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d. net.
The Consolations of a Critic. By C. Lewis Hind. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.
The "Adoration of the Magi" by Jan Mabuse. By Maurice W. Brockwell. Illustrated. The Grafton Galleries, W. 10s. 6d. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

- Forty Years of Friendship as Recorded in the Correspondence of John Duke, Lord Coleridge, and Ellis Yarnall during the Years 1856 to 1895.* Edited by Charlton Yarnall. Portrait Frontispiece. Macmillan and Co. 8s. 6d. net.
The Baganda: An Account of their Native Customs and Beliefs. By the Rev. John Roscoe. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 15s. net.
Tolstoy. By Romain Rolland. Translated by Bernard Miall. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.
The Wife of General Bonaparte. By Joseph Turquan. Translated from the French by Violette Montagu. Illustrated. John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.
The Regent's Park and Primrose Hill: History and Antiquities. By A. D. Webster. Illustrated. Greening and Co. 5s. net.
Turkey and Its People. By Sir Edwin Pears. Methuen and Co. 12s. 6d. net.
Fore and Aft: the Story of the Fore and Aft Rig. By E. Keble Chatterton. Illustrated. Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.

VERSE

- Ballads of Old Birmingham.* By E. M. Rudland. E. F. Hudson, Birmingham. 1s. net.
Survivals. By R. Charles Moir. Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.
Œuvres d'Horace—Satires. Texte Latin avec un Commentaire Critique et Explicatif. By Paul Lejay. Hachette and Co. 15f.
At the World's Edge, and Other Verses. By Maria Steuart. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.
Prospero, and Other Poems. By William Gerard. Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

- Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; The Book Monthly; The Land Union Journal; The Antiquary; Harper's Monthly Magazine; Monthly Musical Record; The Author; Literary Digest, N.Y.; St. Nicholas; Dublin Review; Bird Notes and News; The Anglo-Russian; The Publishers' Circular; The Bookseller; The Century Magazine; Feuilles d'Histoire du XVIIe. au XXe. Siècle; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The Parsi, Bombay; The Moslem World; Cambridge University Reporter; The Scottish Historical Review; Revue Bleue; The Mask, Florence; The Tourist Magazine, N.Y.; United Empire; Mind.*

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
 In exposure of humbug
 In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR.

A Weekly Review
 of Politics, Art,
 Music, Literature,
 and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY
 of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers for 6s. per annum (post-free)
 or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London.

If you want to hear the herald publishers sing of the autumn new books, get the October BOOK MONTHLY, which is now ready, 6d. net. It contains all the book news of the hour, and so is essential to the serious reader. Equally it is necessary to the other reader, because, when he has devoured its contents, he can talk about books as if he really were a bookman. The special articles in the October number are interesting and the Supplement of portraits and pictures is eminently attractive.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

THE BOOK THAT EVERYONE IS READING MY OWN STORY

By LOUISA OF TUSCANY, EX-CROWN PRINCESS OF SAXONY.

"One of the most remarkable autobiographies ever written."—Referee.

Third Large Edition. Now Ready. Price 10s. 6d. net.

NASH'S NEW BOOKS.

A Book that Men will Enjoy.

REMINISCENCES OF AN OLD 'UN

By FRANK N. STREATFEILD, C.M.G.

Illustrated. Price 7s. 6d. net.

A breezy narrative of an interesting and strenuous life lived in various quarters of the globe. The "Old 'Un's" recollections are full of humour and optimism, and reveal a delightful personality.

Ready on Thursday.

MR. FRANCIS GRIBBLE'S NEW BOOK.

THE ROMANTIC LIFE OF SHELLEY

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

With Six Photogravure Portraits. Price 15s. net.

NASH'S NEW BOOKS.

An Up-to-date Book on the New Union and Rhodesia.

SOUTH AFRICA TO-DAY

With an Account of Modern Rhodesia.

By H. HAMILTON FYFE, Author of "The New Spirit in Egypt." 10s. 6d. net.

"He has the gift of making whatever he writes about interesting, and there is not a dull page in his book. . . . Mr. Fyfe concludes a most interesting book with a short account of the Duke of Connaught's tour, in which he took part."

—Westminster Gazette.

By the Author of "Leaves from a Life."

MOST OF THE GAME

Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

When a Man's Married

By ROWLAND MORRIS.

"The conclusion of the book is, perhaps, the best thing in it, though most of it is good work, particularly the picture of John Owen, who is a fine fellow. . . . A very readable book."

—Morning Post.

The Wooing of Martha

By C. GUISE MITFORD, Author of "Love in Lilac-Land."

Ready on Thursday.

As He was Born

By TOM GALLON.

The Honest Trespass

By CONSTANCE COTTERELL.

A charming country tale, with the scene laid in the hop-gardens of Kent.

Ready on Thursday.

Penelope's Progress

By LADY ANGELA FORBES.
Author of "The Broken Commandment."

Ready on Oct. 26th.

The Fire-Seeker

By "IOTA."

EVELEIGH NASH, PUBLISHER, LONDON

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 495	Fiction 507
A Tribute 496	The Theatre..... 508
Villa d'Este 496	The Future of the Library 510
A Baseless Suggestion ... 496	Agadir and After 511
Commercial Literature ... 497	Music 512
La Veille de la Vierge ... 498	The Magazines..... 513
Tripoli and After 499	Some Indian Reviews..... 514
Some New French Books 500	The Brewers' Exhibition 515
Reviews—	New and Forthcoming
Views of a Revolutionist 502	Books 516
A Maharani as Autho- ress 503	Imperial & Foreign Affairs 517
Inexpertæ Pennæ..... 504	Motoring 519
Ingenious Bookmaking 505	In the Temple of Mammon 520
Shorter Reviews 505	Correspondence 521
	Books Received 523

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazines rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE contrast between the welcome extended to the National Insurance Bill before its scheme was thoroughly comprehended and examined, and the chorus of adverse criticism which it has recently drawn from all quarters, forms one of the most significant warnings against hasty and immature legislation which the country has ever seen. The recent series of articles from the pens of expert writers which have been appearing in our columns discussed the Bill from many points of view, and still, on all sides, it raises severe comments. From Mr. Lloyd George's speech on Saturday last the layman might regard him as the ineffable benefactor of mankind, and over Friendly Societies in particular were his protective wings outspread. What do the Societies themselves think? At the annual gathering of the St. Mary's Lodge of Oddfellows on Monday the Grand Master made some pertinent remarks. He pointed out that whatever desires any one man might have in the House of Commons, he was not entirely master of the situation, for forces and influences were there at work beyond the conception of the ordinary man; there were serious defects in the Bill, and to pass the Bill and amend the Act afterwards was simply ploughing the sand. Mr. George Cave, addressing a conference of Friendly Societies at Richmond, expressed himself as sure that, even with the suggested amendments, the Bill would have a very serious effect upon all such associations; that the small ones would be killed, and even the large ones would not survive for many years. On the pleasant "9d. for 4d." fiction he remarked that "on examination it would be found that people would get 5d. worth of benefits for 4d., and that the penny would in the end be found by themselves."

Unless the doctors, who held the key to the position, helped the Bill, continued Mr. Cave, it would be a failure. In THE ACADEMY of June 17th Dr. Milton Townsend clearly explained why the medical profession resents the "absolutely unacceptable conditions" which the Chancellor seeks to impose upon it. A storm of disapproval greeted the scheme when the doctors began to understand it, and the fine analysis of its provisions in our issue of July 29th exhibited its faults from the workman's point of view. We do not wish to condemn the Bill wholly; but obviously, when a number of highly important interests agree in opposition, the measure opposed is unsound in finance and hasty in construction—as happens with most of the matters Mr. Lloyd George proposes. We do not see for a moment why he should take upon himself to "stand or fall" by the Bill, and in any case it is a gross outrage on the Parliamentary system that any Minister should insist upon the passing of an important measure, affecting tremendous issues, in a time-limit which is fixed by himself.

Lord Rosebery's speech at the opening of the new Mitchell Library on Monday last, at Glasgow, was in his happiest vein of whimsicality—that whimsicality which contains more than "a grain or two of wheat among the chaff." He dilated humorously upon the terrible number of platitudes which must have been uttered on similar occasions, and went on to inquire "whether there were not 100,000 of the 180,000 books in the Mitchell Library which nobody ever asked for"—dead volumes, occupying space to no purpose. After a pessimistic improvisation on the theme of the "baffled ambitions, disappointed hopes, and crushed aspirations" represented by such a collection, Lord Rosebery went on to suggest the awakening China as a fresh field for Mr. Carnegie's vicarious literary enthusiasm. We note that the speech has been taken seriously by the librarian of Brixton, and the rosier aspect of the question is given by an interview quoted in the Standard. Not many "dead" books, according to his experience, find a place in a London suburban library, and the list of works asked for on a single day in the reference department, if at all typical, might reassure any one who suffers under an impression that the age is becoming less interested in intellectual affairs.

The new Opera House in the Kingsway by which Mr. Oscar Hammerstein has impressed Londoners will be opened on Monday, November 13th, with a performance of "Quo Vadis," by Jean Nougues, which is new to this country. On the Wednesday night Rossini's "William Tell," which has not been heard in England for many years, will be given, and on the Friday evening Bellini's "Norma," while the Saturday matinée and evening performances will be respectively "William Tell" and "Quo Vadis." Mr. Hammerstein intends to adhere to this system of five performances weekly during his whole season, Tuesday and Thursday remaining always blank days.

A TRIBUTE

O splendid soul! Into the battlefield
 You leap; upon your lips the songs of joy,
 Welcoming fearful conflict as a boy
 The pleasure that a sportive hour may yield.
 Great heart, what mighty weapon do you wield
 That victory follows always its employ?
 Had you no self-reared dragons to destroy?
 Always was glorious certainty your shield?

I too would follow where your steps lead on,
 I too would sing your praise by the camp fire,
 Defend the name envy would spit upon,
 Would hearten you to climb from high to higher,
 Be as the moon to sun when you are gone,
 Or as the wind to your Æolian lyre.

MAX PLOWMAN.

VILLA D'ESTE

Long walls are there of sable yews
 And monumental cypresses
 In unmolested avenues
 Like milestones of the centuries,
 And the great fountains through the night
 Fling up cold jets of moon-washed light.

There the deathless nightingales
 Sing unassuaged for evermore,
 And where the setting moonlight pales
 Dim throngs of trailing clouds deplore
 The perished years, like ghosts that late Steal from a place grown desolate.

Who shall assuage the nightingales
 Or quench the sorrow of that place?
 Its unaccompanied Spirit wails
 And covers up her sightless face:
 The waters of its founts and meres
 Are bitter with her quenchless tears.

Nor beamy dawn, nor kindling spring
 Shall dry the fountain of her grief:
 New suns and coming springtides bring
 New tears with each unfolding leaf.
 The sorrow of a withered past
 Shall last as long as grief shall last.

M. D. ARMSTRONG.

A BASELESS SUGGESTION

UNDER the leadership of Mr. Balfour the habit of occasionally calling the Unionist party together in conclave at the Carlton Club has fallen into desuetude. The memorable gathering at Lansdowne House in reference to the ill-starred Budget of 1909, was not an absolute equivalent. When one is under a hospitable roof, one is not very well placed for uttering doubtless wholesome but nevertheless unpalatable truths about temporary hosts. The atmosphere of the Carlton Club is free from such clogging conditions, and we think that Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne would have been more in touch with the sentiments of those on whose support they are dependent, if they had from time to time taken counsel with them.

After the astounding disaster of 1906 which was largely—if not mainly—in the nature of an individual and personal defeat for Mr. Balfour, the Unionist party displayed unexampled loyalty to him. Although the bitter fruit of years of laxness and avoidance of the fulfilment of pledges to which the party was in honour and in interest bound, had disgusted the Unionist party and extinguished every vestige of enthusiasm in it, Mr. Balfour's position was not challenged.

Hanging on to office long after those of his colleagues whom the country most trusted had left his Cabinet; replacing these colleagues with mediocrities whom nobody respected as statesmen, Mr. Balfour prepared the way with the utmost diligence and success for the shattering disaster which befel his party. We shall be told that such action was a tactical error; we think it was a strategical error of the first magnitude. The leader however was retained in command, and since has done much to justify the continued confidence reposed in him.

At the present juncture, however, the party is asked to do something more than to ratify the forgiveness and the clemency of five years ago. It is asked not only to blot out from memory the disastrous results of several years of leadership prior to the General Election of 1906, but it is also asked to condone—if it cannot forget—the débâcle of 1911—the end of the Constitution as the nation had hitherto known it.

Again forgiveness, again condonation will doubtless be accorded to a leader who has in the past rendered conspicuous services to the country and to his party.

We would ask however whether there is not a justification for the formation of a Club which is destined to prove a serious obstacle to such regrettable incidents in the future? Lord Halsbury has in his published letter made it absolutely clear that his Club is not actuated "by any disloyalty towards the leader of the party." We never for our part supposed that it was. The situation is different. No man—however gifted and however illustrious—is we think entitled to arrogate to himself the position of a dictator. Mr. Balfour does not, in our opinion, possess the attributes of such a character, but he has gone perilously near to asserting such a position for himself. No leader of a party in recent modern days—not even the aloof Lord Salisbury himself, has kept himself in greater detachment from the thought and the sentiment of his party than has the late Prime Minister. Even if a record of unfailing success could be claimed such an attitude is out of harmony with the spirit of modern parties.

A Prime Minister or a future Prime Minister is sure to gather round him colleagues or associates whose mode of thinking approximates to his own. Public appreciation of course in some cases forces upon him certain men who are not agreeable to him; but especially in opposition the leader can surround himself very much as he desires.

The formation of the Halsbury Club has its justification in the fact that it represents a school of thought which notoriously is not that which appeals to the mild and philosophic temperament of the leader of the party. That school is essentially militant. It may be somewhat poorly equipped in all the refinements of finesse and casuistry, and may even in some aspects present some of the features of a chop-logic. The fact is nevertheless apparent that the Club represents the views of a large—if not the largest—section of the Unionist party—a section which has been inarticulate too long, and the tenets of whose faith have consequently been inadequately appraised.

"One who served under Disraeli" observes that it is difficult to believe that Lord Selborne and Mr. Austen Chamberlain deliberately desire to ostracise Mr. Balfour, Lord Lansdowne, and those who have thought and acted with them. It would be monstrous to suppose that any such desire exists. The Halsbury Club is not designed to create a line of cleavage, but a rallying point for the promulgation of a united and energetic policy.

CECIL COWPER.

COMMERCIAL LITERATURE

THIS is an age of improving literature. Messrs. Shaw, Galsworthy, Chesterton, Kipling, and Masfield have already improved us considerably, and will no doubt continue to do so, and this is as it should be. But since a changeless diet of lesson-books is unwholesome for the literary student, we may allow ourselves now and again to rest our minds with that kind of literature that leaves us as imperfect as it finds us. French kickshaws are sweet to the palate after a surfeit of your funeral baked meats, and it is probably true that the demand for light fiction increases as our novelists grow more serious. I doubt whether I should have enjoyed my catalogue of bulbs so much if I had not just read that depressing masterpiece "Sister Carrie."

It supplied my mind with a bridge whereby to pass from autumn to spring without suffering from the fogs and east winds and rainy, muggy nights of our English winter, and fitly enough the cover was adorned with a spring-like picture of a pretty Dutch girl—the real article, and not the creature in a striped petticoat that prances gracelessly at English music-halls. Only the artist had not given her a large enough mouth to satisfy my craving for naturalism, for I have noticed that in the Low Countries even the pretty girls can make one bite of an apple. The photographs of flowers with which the book was illustrated were very satisfactory, for the beauty of hyacinths and tulips and daffodils depends on their form rather than their colour, and they lose little by being reproduced in black-and-white.

But even better than the photographs was the letterpress, which had evidently been written by a Dutchman with an equal enthusiasm for flowers and the English tongue. The merits of his prose can only be illustrated by quotation:—"The ubiquitous sparrow is the gardener's most inveterate enemy, for of good in the garden he does little or none, while of irreparable damage he annually does much. Sparrows strip our yellow crocuses of their petals. Notwithstanding the possibility of much of the beauty being destroyed by these marauders, it is indefensible to omit crocuses from the garden." In a similar spirit he cries, "Can any one imagine what our gardens, greenhouses and conservatories would be like in spring if we had no tulips? . . . The dull corner is enlivened by their presence, and the bright place is made still brighter." Moreover we can have "brilliant effects without putting our hand into our pockets to a very serious depth." How kindly and humanly and wisely he writes of miniature hyacinths:—

In comparison with the typical Dutch hyacinth it is fair to say that the miniatures are toys, and are not, therefore, worthy of serious attention. For one purpose they no doubt have a substantial value, and that is for children, who, while small themselves, may prefer a small rather than an adult bulb. This is a phase of bulb growing that might well be accorded much greater encouragement, for the production of really excellent miniature hyacinths is well within the powers of the little ones, whose interest in flowers is beyond question increased when they can watch the progress of their own nurslings.

With daffodils, as he reminds us, "there is a beautiful latitude in price." We can pay "thirty guineas for some highly extolled novelty, or we can have a thousand sound flowering bulbs for as small a sum as one and a half guineas. 'Common!' some one may say. Yes, but if planted in the grass in the wild garden or the woodland they will make a lovely display." It is difficult to stop quoting a man who can write of the leaves of a plant "showing signs of going to rest," of hardy spring flowers that "make their lovely appearance every year," and who can describe a flower

"amaranth red maroon stripes, and all tigered over with black." Let us leave him with his "chaste Poet's Narcissus, which is beloved of everybody. . . . Grow them by hundreds in the garden and by thousands in the grass of the woodland, and their beautiful flowers will never fatigue the eye."

Incidentally this last is a flower that I should recommend for the gardens of critics. In the course of my wanderings in this charming catalogue I have found other bulbs that should also appeal to the catholic student of literature. I shall search his garden next spring for the hyacinths named after Lord Macaulay, Charles Dickens, and Voltaire, for Alfred Tennyson and Sir Walter Scott their crocuses, and for John Davidson daffodils. His tulips must be none other than your "tall and stately Darwins," though perhaps a partial exception might be made in favour of those named after Thomas Moore. In this way flower-beds might be made as significant as a man's bookshelves.

It is strange how poorly an English catalogue compares with these enthusiastic pages from Holland. The home product is better printed and the photographs are better reproduced, but the letterpress is pedestrian, and lacking in that essential quality that the late Mr. J. M. Synge called "joy." It cannot be denied that the English tradesman has an extraordinary contempt for considerations of style. The moment a Frenchman has anything to sell he coins a phrase about it, and nine times out of ten the phrase is poetical. During the recent heat-wave a man who sold fans in the streets of Paris christened them the "little north winds," a flight of fancy of which a London street-hawker is certainly incapable. Nor does the catalogue of an English bulb importer remind me of Bacon's essay on gardens, as it very easily might.

Nevertheless there are not wanting signs to cheer the student of commercial literature. I do not greatly care for the newer kind of advertising that apes the impertinent familiarities of a deplorable school of journalism, but it pleases me that Messrs. Whiteley should persuade me to buy their rose-bushes with a quotation from George Herbert. It is even more delightful that the Underground Railways of London should invite me to visit Covent Garden or the Imperial Institute by means of a quatrain of Fitz-Gerald's "Omar." The application may not be obvious to any one who has not seen their subtle leaflet entitled "The Rose"—indeed, it may not be very clear to those who have—but the intention of this and similar leaflets is excellent. The man in the Tube should feel flattered at being approached in so cultured a fashion.

In the day when all our acknowledged writers shall have become preachers or philosophers perhaps the young men with a theory of beauty and no theory as to the economic conditions of the poor will be permitted to employ their perverse gifts in the preparation of catalogues. They will do it very well, forming new unions between adjectives and nouns, and ransacking their souls to find the true colours and shapes of things. The catalogue as an artistic form hardly exists to-day, but it is certain to make its appearance sooner or later. For instance, there is no reason why a catalogue of fireirons should not be as emotionally and artistically significant as a necklace of carved beads. It would touch on the natures of metals—how some metals are able to resist fire, while others preserve a polish and charm the eye. It would quote Mr. Max Beerbohm's essay on fire, the raging animal that we keep in cages in our houses, and point out the need for instruments with which to awake and control and feed this animal. It would examine the characters of men, how one man will want a poker like a sword while another will want a poker like a ploughshare—if such a poker there be. It would liken the tongs to the hands of a miser, and the shovel to a beggar's paw thrust out for alms. It would remind the elderly that the fireguard round the nursery fire is a lattice-window through which young eyes can see half the wonders of fairyland on winter nights, fire-ships and palaces of flame, lurid caverns inhabited by goblins with red eyes and bodies of smoke. Really, it would be great fun to write a catalogue like that.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

LA VEILLE DE LA VIERGE

It is the Eve of the Assumption. To-morrow all Brittany will go to Mass in the morning, and thereafter will take holiday. At Lanmeur, five miles away, there is a "Pardon." The roads will be black with peasants in their best—the men fluttering ribbons behind their hats, the girls with rich shawls and lace coifs nodding as they go. They will be dusty with the sweeping past of a hundred voitures bearing holiday-makers to the little Place in the centre of the village—normally as quiet as Sleepy Hollow, but now encumbered with stalls and shows and roundabouts, and roaring with a joyful traffic. The costumes and the dances, the merriment and noise, will be interesting enough in their way. But in these days every "Pardon" must have something banal: in Lanmeur, for example, the steam-organ has taken the place of the binou, the ancient Breton bagpipe. There will be a Procession with priests and banners, and girls in white; but in front of it there will be a tourist in knickerbockers, walking backwards like a captain of the Salvation Army, pointing his camera.

So to-morrow we will stay at Le Moulin de la Rive. We will let who care venture the dusty road and listen to the raucous voices of a thousand reeds blowing forth the comic airs of yester-year. As we cycled through on Saturday, we heard a rehearsal of part of to-morrow's concert. It was a French tune, I believe, but in English ears it is infallibly and irrevocably associated with the words of a horrible jingle:—

If I catch you bending,
I'll saw your leg off!

The threat lent wings to our toes and vigour to our thighs. As for us, therefore, to-morrow we will sit under the cliff and see the peasants bring the horses down to the flat beach to bathe, since the bounteous harvest is well in hand, and neither the noble beasts nor their masters will work.

To-night, however, by going no more than three hundred yards from our Mill, we may glimpse a bit of the true old Brittany. As we walk up the steep road the harvest moon is rising over the hills to the east, red in a sky of serene, perfect, velvety blue. But on every elevated point in all the country round the harvest moon, wide-eyed, gazes with astonishment upon rival luminaries. They glitter and flicker, now bright as silver, now red as the moon herself. It is the Eve of the Assumption, and, as on the Eve of La Saint-Jean, the peasants of Brittany hail the approach of the festival with joy-fires. Beam answers beam—one on the hill above us, another on Penennis Height, two to the west, many on the cliffs across the sea by distant Trebeurden, challenging the warning light of the phare which flashes near the Seven Islands. But these are other men's affairs. Nous autres, we of the little community at the Mill by the Shore must have our own feu de joie to celebrate the Feast of the Virgin. And so we build it by the cross-roads.

"Le meunier" is a bonhomme of the first water. Partly to shelter his little mill from the storms and partly to provide his hearth with fuel he has built a tall stack of dry gorse to seaward, and he will let us take toll of this.

"Qu'on apporte des fagots!"

The word of command is given by a large, dark-skinned, black-eyed youth, who tacitly assumes the mastery of ceremonies. Soon the swish of the furze faggots is heard on the road. Old men and youths, matrons and maidens tug at them, and with cries of triumph throw them on the pile. A girl advances from a circle of shadows, and, as she stoops over the little torch she holds, her brunette beauty, crowned with white lace, is seen in high relief.

"Voilà!"

The fire springs up, the blaze of dry brushwood mounts ten feet into the air, and sings high with a hiss and a crackle to the bourdon of the sea below. No fuel provides such a wealth of sparks as dry furze. The display recalls the scene of the gipsy-forge in the wood, described by George Borrow in a memorable passage, where he quotes the beautiful Romany metaphor of the sparks: "More than a hundred lovely daughters I see produced at one time, fiery as roses. In one moment they expire gracefully circumvolving." The sudden light is intense. It converts the ring of shadows into a circle of merry faces and shining eyes. A clatter of voices mingles the sharp-ringing, musical Breton with the smooth torrent of French. Those of us who have been to the State school talk both languages fluently.

"Balancez les enfants!" cries the Master of Ceremonies.

The victims are sought out with much hiding, chasing and laughter. Two great peasants, with broad features and enormous shoulders (who might, for every external appearance, be "bhoys" from County Kerry), cross and join their hands. The children are placed upon them, and they swing to a rhythmic chant:—

Un, deux, trois, quatre, Cinq, six, sept, huit—et Neuf!

but the last word is drowned by piercing shrieks, for the plunge which accompanies it is towards the fire. Our feu de joie is too big to swing the children across, but some adventurous youths fulfil tradition by leaping through the flames from one side to the other, as they used to do in my own land of Devon not so many years ago. Men and women, lads and maidens, too, all bring their fern-leaves and cast them into the fire, thus perpetuating (unconsciously, no doubt) the superstition against which the pious Naogeorgus protested these many centuries since, that herbs thus burnt on a ceremonial occasion give protection against malignant influences, which, as Naogeorgus declared, is "far other-wise than the nature of the Word of God doth tell."

It is to be confessed, however, that this evening we are assembled from motives of merriment rather than of observance.

"On va balancer Mademoiselle Marie!" is the next command. It is acclaimed with unanimous and frantic applause.

Mademoiselle Marie is a girl of the country, who has sought fortune and fame in Paris, and not in vain. She has the typical beauty of her race; she is veritably la Bretonne, serious, large, serene. With a gentle smile she comes forward from the hedge where she has been leaning.

"Ah, well, my children," says she, "you may try, but you will hardly swing me."

And the task does prove more than enough for them.

"Un, deux, trois!—Mon Dieu!" cry the two boys in one breath, as they drop her. "One would not have believed Mademoiselle Marie was so heavy!"

"'Tis Paris and a lazy life; 'c'est le flegme,'" she replies with a smile. "One does not know what work is there, Yves—is it not so? But, here!—I will dance for you."

The ring closes in. Mademoiselle Marie steps to the centre in the firelight. Her shadow flits upon the roadway as she moves, gently at first, singing quietly as she dances:

C'est la fille de la meunière,
Qui dansait avec les gars—
Jiboudi! Jibouda!
On dit qu'elle est malade;
Jiboudi! Jibouda!
On dit qu'elle en mourra!

Look well in the eyes of Mademoiselle Marie, and you will see a reflection, not of the fire at Le Moulin, not of the circle of her schoolfellows around, but of a crowded theatre, and she the central figure on the stage. Gradually her voice rises, her eyes sparkle, the pace of the dance quickens. She flits to and fro in the limelight, with a sea of faces in the dimness beyond:

Jiboudi! Jibouda!
On dit qu'elle est malade. . . .

The gods take up the refrain. She waves her hand to them. The whole house claps and shuffles its feet, and is worked into a frenzy of song.

Mademoiselle Marie dances till she is exhausted, then retires into the wings. The limelight dies away; the feu de joie of the Virgin shines again. The wings vanish. Instead are the dark hedges of furze and heather. In place of the gods in the gallery, behold Yves and his companions.

Another faggot to freshen the blaze, a ring around the circle of flame, a hundred feet twinkling and heads nodding in a whirling dance. Mademoiselle Marie has disappeared. Presently her voice is heard calling—

"Allons, mes enfants! Une retraite!"

The ring breaks up.

"Oh, but this is fine! See—the lanterns! Bravo, Marie! Follow Marie!"

Mademoiselle Marie appears, twirling an umbrella with four Chinese lanterns depending. Thus illuminated, she heads a march along the road in each direction as far as the glare of the fire extends, singing always, until sheer fatigue compels a standstill, and the last faggot is added to the pile. The night is wearing out.

"Yves va chanter!" cries the Master of Ceremonies.

The great boy with the bashful face and the curling brown hair steps into the circle, and in a gruff voice commences the Breton song, "Oh, my country!" —

Oh ma Mam-Vro! Me gar ma Bro,
Tra ma vo mor 'vel mur'n he zro. . . .

A sorrowful strain in the patriotic anthem, carrying some suggestion of the sadness of a small nation in course of gradual assimilation by a great one, leaves a certain quiet upon the assembly. It begins to melt away from the outskirts, with soft and gentle good-nights.

"Kènnavo!"

"Kènnavo, mes enfants!" says Mademoiselle Marie. But—

"Attention!"

The voice of the Master of Ceremonies rings out again.

"Il y a des Anglais ici. Chantons le Godsafzeking!"

A motor-car full of English tourists rushes down the hill on the way from Morlaix to Locquirec, and its passengers stand up to look back at the embers of the fire and to hear the strains of their National Anthem, not in the version familiar to modern ears, but precisely in that of an old copy which I possess, intitled "A Loyal Song: Sung at both Theatres," and published when Marshal Wade was marching against the Jacobites.

"Kènnavo! Bon soir! . . . Good-night!"

We leave the embers of the bonfire glowing.

And so we celebrated La Sainte Marie at Le Moulin de la Rive.

R. A. J. WALLING.

TRIPOLI AND AFTER

BY SUDANI

THE conflict between Italy and Turkey pursues its course. Italy has already landed an imposing army at Tripoli, and it is probable by the time these lines are in print she will have successfully occupied Tobruk and Derna and Tokrah, and the other miserable collections of hovels that are the coast towns. It is not likely that the landing of troops at Benghazi will be attended with any greater difficulty than those already effected. Possibly even, an expedition will have been made against the Turkish forces which have retired some twelve hours' march inland, where their strength is said to be under 5,000 men, with five batteries of artillery. The sooner this is undertaken the better, for the Turkish troops will quickly experience great difficulty in obtaining supplies, in which matter the Arab population is not likely to afford them much, if any, assistance.

The apparently gross act of aggression perpetrated by Italy will probably lose some of its more objectionable features as gradually the history of the many unnecessary and aggravating pinpricks inflicted by the Turks on Italian settlers in the Tripolitaine since 1881 becomes better known to the world. To Turkey apparently—unseeing as usual—Italy's action is an act of persecution as unwarranted as unexpected, and Turkey's greatest statesman and leader, Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, who is to all intents and purposes War Lord and chief ruler of the Ottoman Dominions, has declared that his country was prepared against every other possible enemy save Italy. It is more than probable that were this contention put to the proof it would be found to lack accuracy. It may be feared that if the announced decision of the Turkish Government to expel from her borders the very large Italian population they enclose be carried into force, events may arise that will cause more to be heard of the War Minister's boast.

Turkey, no doubt, has cause of grievance, but that is solely in consequence of her unreasoning shortsightedness. To every one who has studied the story of this stretch of the African coast since when, in 1881, the French took action there and bombarded Sfax and established at Bizerta one of the world's most formidable naval arsenals, it has been evident that sooner or later the power for expansion of Italy in this part of the Mediterranean must be asserted. No doubt the action of Germany in Southern Morocco offered to the statesmen of Italy their opportunity. This, however, was but the occasion of timely chance. It was inevitable that Italy should at the earliest convenient moment establish a permanent suzerainty over this strip of the African continent.

This much may be said to be now accomplished by the hoisting of the Italian flag on the forts and Government houses of the Barbary coast towns. Fighting no doubt will still continue for a time, but inasmuch as the Turkish soldiers have ever hated their sojourn in Barbary and have regarded their term of service there much as a sentence of exile or even death, the active opposition of Mahmoud Shevket's forces is not likely to be either keen or prolonged. The difference indeed between Turkey and Italy can quite probably be satisfactorily settled by a protocol in the course of a fortnight.

Here is where Italy's trouble begins, and not only the trouble of Italy, but of England and of France. It is an easy matter to bombard and conquer a mud-and-coral-built coast town equipped with antiquated fortifications and prehistoric artillery. It is an easy matter to assume ascendancy and dominion of a stretch of coast whose immediate populace has been for many years dependent for subsistence on the foreign settlers' support. The Arabs have from all time hated the Turks and resented the claimed ascendancy of Turkey's Sultan. They therefore will probably in the main welcome any accident which removes from them this obsession. But from that immediate knowledge of emancipation to a more fully developed sense of freedom, and therefore of power, will be but a small journey.

In Africa, and especially in Northern Africa, the greatest existing force is Islam, and Mahomedanism is and has ever been essentially missionary. We Christian peoples have spent countless millions of money and sacrificed innumerable valiant souls in the prosecution in the wild lands of the world of the teachings by which we hold faith. In the records of our praiseworthy missionary work which are annually given to the public the worth of these heroic endeavours is set forth in figures, and it can but be allowed that the balance in favour of Christianity is small. All the Christian countries of the earth have set themselves to inculcate in the minds of the vast fetish-worship races of the world (who are still more numerous than the votaries of any received religion) the principles of their faith, and all of them combined have failed to gain the number of converts that have been received into Islam.

The wide establishment of Moslemism, it may be said, encloses many more sects than are contained in Christianity, and among these Tarikhs, or sects, perhaps the most popular, most forceful, and widest-spreading throughout Africa is that of the Senoussi (or Wahabism). Since this Tripoli question has arisen it has been set forth in the journals that the Senoussi are a tribe inhabiting the hinterland of Tripoli. This of course is an error. The Senoussi have always been enemies of the Turks, and have never acknowledged the Sultan, but since the days of "Anastatius"—that marvellous epitome of Turkish manners, attributed to Thomas Hope—whose author gives a vivid account of his sojourn among the Wahabis, the sect has gained a vast number of converts.

There is not perhaps much danger of a descent in force by the Senoussi warriors on the stronger Italian garrisons of the coast, but it may be anticipated that for years to come the followers of the Senoussi Mahdi will fall upon and destroy the smaller Italian posts in the hinterland and the convoys and expeditions that may be passing between them. This, it may be urged, is a problem for the consideration of the Italians alone. But such is not the case. It has long been recognised that the main strength of the Senoussi movement is in its firm and fixed antagonism to European ideals and to Europeans in themselves. Hitherto they have not molested the Egyptian frontiers, although their influence is almost as paramount in the rich Lybian oasis of Siveh (twelve days distant from Cairo) as at Djeraboub, a chief stronghold of the Senoussi Emirs. The Senoussi were hostile to the Mahdi, and it was at one time expected that they would make an expedition against the Khalifa in the Egyptian Sudan. We used to hear how the Senoussi Mahdi, preparing for attack, was wont to parade each Friday his own body-guard of 4,000 horsemen clad in chain-mail.

The attack was not made, but when, after the victory at Omdurman, old campaigning friends who had seen together years of Sudan warfare were making farewell, the question on each man's lips was: "What is our next war hereabouts?" and the consensus of opinion—held, it should be said, also by Lord Kitchener, Sir Reginald Wingate, and Sir Rudolf Slatin, who may be called the most reliable authorities on African matters—was that the next great war that we should need to wage from Egypto-Sudanese possessions might be a campaign against the dominance and religious sovereignty of the Imam of the Senoussi of Wadai. Great Britain wants no such war at the present time.

The proselytism of the Senoussi is the most far-reaching Mahomedan influence that has absorbed Africa since the day when the Sudan Mahdi declared himself, or was declared, at El-Obeid in 1881. It is an influence that has been growing ever since the downfall of the Khalifa in 1898. It may be said indeed that it was throughout an influence antagonistic to that of Abdullahi-el-Taishi, and that even during his twelve years of misrule it had gained strength and position in the Western Sudan. Already the influence of Senoussi missionaries extends from Wadai to as near a point in the Lybian desert as Djeraboub and Siveh, which last is, after all, but a few camel-marches from Cairo.

The Senoussi, like all other Mahomedan sects, are eminently militant, and are consistently hostile to all European approaches. Until in 1898 the gallant Marquis de Maures and his little band of followers were murdered at a Senoussi outpost in the Bahr-el-Ghazal, only one other party of Europeans had ever attempted to penetrate the territory held by these savage fanatics, among whom the sinister veiled Touaregs are the Emir's foremost champions, and of that party none returned.

Italy's aggressive action in Tripoli should interest us in so far as she is concerned to the extent only that her warships may throw shells and her transports land eager and gallant troops upon the African coast, and that she will doubtless establish herself with more or less security upon that seaboard. Yet the tale of Italy's African enterprises is not encouraging. It is not possible for one who was at Erkowit in early 1896 to forget the great defeat at Adowa, and the way in which the Italians, who had lost nine thousand killed of their own kinsmen, sat down under that disaster and made no forward movement against the ill-armed and ill-organised Abyssinian forces massed against them. Nor could any man who witnessed later the embarkation at Massawa of the hapless, emasculated Italians who had been prisoners with the Queen of Abyssinia's army believe that at any time the forcefulness of Italian uniforms could prevail over Moslem stubbornness, fanaticism, and a lust of plunder.

In striking this blow at Tripoli, Italy, feeble and ineffective as always, has possibly wrought wide-reaching ill to the greatest Mahomedan Power in the world, which is Great Britain. We must perforce at least connive at Italy's action. We cannot, having our own vast interests in regard, do otherwise than condemn her.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

AMONGST the novels—many, too many, alas! mediocrities and trivialities—recently presented to us, one stands out above the rest, both in its conception and in its command of language. This is "La Maîtresse Servante," by Jérôme and Jean Tharaud (Emile Paul, Paris, 3f. 50c.). At first this work surprises one slightly by the contrast afforded by the excessively modern psychological problem it relates, and its old-fashioned, or rather classical, form and language. Indeed this stilted naïveté of style seems to have been worked out to its utmost extent by the authors, who, perhaps, wish to dissimulate under an apparent simplicity their very great knowledge of the science of writing.

The hero, who is also the narrator of the intimate drama related, is a young hobereau, which word corresponds fairly well to the English "gentleman-farmer." He tells us his own story, simply, concisely, calmly, and it is a story which arrests our attention by the very bitterness and melancholy which emanate from it. At eighteen years of age or thereabouts he goes to Paris, like so many other young provincials, in order to complete his education. He leaves behind him the beautiful Limousin countryside, the old family dwelling, his widowed mother, and all the simple, healthy interest of a châtelain's life. He spends several unprofitable years in the capital trying to persuade himself and others that there is no life worth living excepting that of the Latin Quarter, with its cafés, its vain talk, and its idle plans. In the course of time he meets the woman, his senior by five years. She is ordinary both in feature and mind, but he imagines that he loves her, and the inevitable follows.

When his mother calls him home to take up the management of the estate his one condition in obeying her is that Mariette, his mistress, shall accompany him, and live in an old farmhouse at a stone's-throw from the gentilhommière. At first his mother is obdurate; she is outraged by her son's proposition—the scandal the situation would cause appals her. But after a while she agrees to the terms stipulated by her son, for her shrewd brain has conceived a plan which will unfailingly detach him from the humble woman he loves. The hero of the story becomes gradually re-enthralled by the charm of rural life; all his bucolic atavism seems to awaken within him; he takes a renewed interest in the simple, healthy pleasures of the country. And Mariette, who is, so to speak, a living memory of the fruitless, artificial existence he lived in Paris, seems to recede from his thoughts and affection, and to occupy a more and more less prominent place in his life. His mother, thinking the time ripe for action, makes poor, neglected Mariette work for her, and even engages her as servant. She accepts this position gratefully, for, realising that her lover is becoming more and more alien to her, she is content to be able to live near him as the humble handmaiden of his mother. And thus the bourgeois prejudice, which had at first been ruffled by Mariette's advent, takes a cruel revenge.

The son marries, and the coming into the story of the wife furnishes the authors of "La Maîtresse Servante" with the subject of an original and strong psychological development. The mother becomes fiercely jealous of her young daughter-in-law; she resents her assuming the place of mistress in the family dwelling, and also the authority she exercises over her husband. At last, life having become unbearable for her in the old homestead, the mother abandons it, and goes to live in a neighbouring farmhouse which belongs to her. And, feeling lonely, she calls to her side Mariette, the rejected mistress, hoping to find in her an ally and a friend. Mariette thus becomes the much-loved servant who inherits the mother's small property at the latter's death. The hero of "La Maîtresse Servante" has the sorrow of losing his wife, to whom he was sincerely attached, for she was at the same time of his race and of his class. He continues to live in the grim gentilhommière with his children, and often he rides over to Mariette's farmhouse in an instinctive desire of companionship, to talk with her of the days gone by.

Some might qualify this book as being immoral; they would be in the wrong. It is a very precise, calm, unprejudiced description of divers characters, who all have one trait of resemblance—an intense egotism. Contradiction personified is the hero's chief characteristic. Like so many weak people, his dominant preoccupation is to appear both independent and free, and in order to give this impression he always hastens to oppose any proposition or suggestion made to him. The character of the mother is admirably drawn—hard, harsh, unforgiving, and authoritative, she is a very true type of a certain category of Frenchwomen of the country districts. As for Mariette, she is touching and sad; her great love renders her a curious if rather despicable example of the amoureuse, for humility to the extent to which she carries it ceases to be a virtue and becomes simply contemptible. Mariette had evidently never heard of Kant's remark—"Can he who makes himself a worm thereafter complain of being crushed?"

MM. Jérôme and Jean Tharaud's book is further greatly enhanced by their fine descriptions of the Limousin Province—of its picturesque countryside and of the life and psychology of its inhabitants. Some of these descriptions greatly remind us of certain of those contained in Madame Marguerite Audoux's "Marie-Claire" on account of their conciseness and intensity. The contrast existing between the eighteenth-century style, in which the authors of "La Maîtresse Servante" have written their work, and the very modernism and audacity of the subject treated may provoke criticism. But one must remember that, although the action takes place in our days, the outward appearance of the characters described, as well as the scenes and sites depicted, seem rather to belong to bygone times. It is precisely this sharp opposition between the form and the fond which gives to MM. Tharaud's remarkable work its very distinct savour and originality.

M. Albert Savine has collected in a curious little volume a series of interesting documents concerning French provincial prisons during the Reign of Terror ("Les Gêôles de Province sous la Terreur," Michaud, Paris, 3f. 50c.). The documents are in general the narratives left to posterity by some of the prisoners themselves, and M. Savine has patiently compiled and annotated them. We are thus initiated to the horrors which took place in the prisons of Chantilly, of Senlis, and also of Arras, where the hideous Joseph Le Bon reigned as supreme master, and introduced the Terror into that town. The revelations of the Arras Jail are written by Montjey and Poirier, two barristers of Dunkirk, who were arrested by order of Joseph Le Bon, and who were incarcerated for four months in the prison of La Providence. They owed their life only to the fall of the Terrorist party. This narrative is most curious, as it reveals the intense tribulations and humiliations to which all the victims of the Revolution, but more especially the women, were subjected. The chapter dealing with the prisons of Lyons is related by the Royalist, Antoine-François Delandine, and we think it may interest our readers to peruse the following passage, which describes the fearful end of sixty-nine young men condemned to a most unusual death by the Revolutionary Tribunal of Lyons:—

C'est de Roanne que sortirent pour aller à la mort soixante neuf jeunes gens, condamnés à un genre de trépas inusité. Le canon devait emporter leurs membres épars et les semer au milieu de nombreux spectateurs, amis de sang et de cette barbare nouveauté. Le lieu de cette scène lamentable fut la plaine des Brotteaux. Deux fossés parallèles avaient été creusés pour recevoir les corps des morts et des mourants. Une haie de soldats bordait chaque ligne en dehors des fossés, et menaçait de l'œil, du sabre et du fusil quiconque aurait tenté de s'écarter de la direction précise où il devait attendre le boulet qui devait terminer sa vie. Cette direction était le plan horizontal, large d'environ trois pieds, qui se trouvait entre les deux fossés. Là furent placés les condamnés, garrottés deux à deux à la suite les uns des autres. . . . Les jeunes gens offrirent de concert, et par un mouvement spontané, l'hommage de leurs derniers instants au bonheur de leur pays. Sans imprécations, sans se plaindre, sans montrer le moindre signe de faiblesse, ils firent entendre ce refrain courageux :—

" Mourir pour sa patrie Est le sort le plus beau, le plus digne d'envie."

A peine commençaient-ils à le répéter une seconde fois que l'horrible décharge vint l'interrompre. Celle-ci n'eut pas tout le succès qu'on s'en était promis. Elle ne tua pas le tiers des malheureux qui l'essuyèrent, mais presque tous en sentirent les cruelles atteintes et furent blessés. Dès lors des ruisseaux de sang se répandirent dans les fossés et les gémissements de la douleur percèrent à travers le bruit continu de la fusillade qui s'unit au canon pour opérer la destruction. Enfin les soldats traversèrent les fossés, et avec le sabre ils la complétèrent. Ces soldats, peu exercés à manier les armes, et la plupart égorgeant pour la première fois, restèrent plus de deux heures à consommer le massacre.

"Les Géôles de France sous la Terreur" contains many anecdotes of interest, and we have to thank M. Savine for having thus compiled for our benefit a curious recapitulation of one of the most exciting periods history has ever recorded.

Madame Marcelle Tinayre consecrates her talent to the almost exclusive study of feminine psychology. In her latest work, "La Douceur de Vivre" (Calman Lévy, Paris, 3f. 50c.), she represents the influence she believes milieu and climate may exercise on two emotional young women of essentially different natures. The problem she tries to resolve is perhaps interesting, but it is to be regretted that, in order to prove her theory, she has chosen as background and chief agent of her story the city of Naples and the ruins of Pompeii. It would have been preferable had she placed her heroines in a more exotic, or at least a less well-known environment; the reader would have been infinitely grateful to her, as really Naples has been rather over-rated lately, as a determining influence on the nervous systems of excitable young persons. We are all slightly blasés concerning Vesuvius, Santa Lucia, Sorrento, and the inevitable Neapolitan with blazing eyes and easy morals. "La Douceur de Vivre" contains nevertheless some sketches of the Archæological Society, which has fixed its headquarters amidst the mysterious old stones of Pompeii, which are interesting as being both unusual and curious. It is, however, highly improbable that it is simply the atmosphere of Naples which causes Isabelle van Coppenalle, daughter of the grey-skied Flanders, to be so forgetful of her conjugal duties. It is almost certain that even in Courtrai, where Fate has doomed her to live, she would have allowed her sentimental imagination to run unbridled. Young Flemish women do not, as a rule, require the aid of any climatic stimulants to awaken their naturally ardent and romantic temperaments. Who, indeed, could possibly blame poor Isabelle in thus transgressing, hampered as she was with so fearful a mother-in-law and so practical a husband. In any case, she will surely be sadly punished for her caprice, after having passed a few months with the captivating, unscrupulous Angelo, whose name sadly belies his character. "La Douceur de Vivre" is lacking in unity and is far from approaching in value Madame Marcelle Tinayre's other works, such as "La Maison du Péché" and "La Rebelle" which undoubtedly rank amongst the finest of modern French novels. But surely the author's next book, "Le Fruit de Cendre," which is already announced, will reassert for its creator the indisputable claim to real talent which has been assured to her by her previous works.

MARC LOGÉ.

REVIEWS

VIEWS OF A REVOLUTIONIST

The Record of an Adventurous Life. By HENRY MAYERS HYNDMAN. With Portrait Frontispiece. (Macmillan and Co. 15s. net.)

THIS book is exceedingly interesting in spite of the fact that it is not a book, properly speaking, at all, for a book has always something to do with a man's soul, whereas this volume is what its title proclaims it to be—merely a record of a man's life and the incidents of it. It tells us little or nothing about the man himself. One has to learn to know Mr. Hyndman, at second-hand, so to speak, by the lines of relation which he has drawn from himself to others; and these are not carefully drawn, but whimsically, with humour good and bad. In order to measure Mr. Hyndman we shall have to go of necessity first of all to his loves and his admirations.

Mr. Hyndman has met nearly every distinguished and able man in England, America, and France in the latter half of the nineteenth century; his book brings one to '89 or '90; the last twenty years or so are to be dealt with in a later volume. Who, then, are the men Mr. Hyndman admires in these countries? His warmest praises are given to a gentleman he calls Jack Williams. He contrasts Mr. Jack Williams with Mr. John Burns, and, while saying every contemptuous thing he can about John Burns, he lavishes all his praise on "the energetic, self-sacrificing, indefatigable agitator" Jack Williams, and takes shame to himself and his fellow-Socialists for not fully realising "the dignity and greatness of the indefatigable little figure," and finally he takes off "his hat to Jack as one of the noblest men who ever fought under the Red Flag." Now all this praise is boyish-inspiring; but it is hardly more convincing than the contempt and dislike shown to John Burns, who in his way is an even finer fellow than Jack Williams. Mr. Hyndman is a black-and-white artist: if you are his friend, or rather his supporter, you are all that is noble; but if you venture to disagree with him on politics your moral character is clearly to blame.

Mr. Hyndman admires too, on the whole, but with many reservations, a better-known man, let us say, than Mr. Jack Williams—Mr. William Morris, the poet. He is filled with admiration for Morris so long as Morris worked with the Social Democratic Federation. In fact, his account of some of the talks with Morris at Kelmscott House, Hammersmith, are the best things in the book. But Morris's virtue did not last long; after a couple of years Mr. Hyndman has to tell of "the deplorable split, which, arising chiefly out of a personal misunderstanding with myself, did the greatest possible harm to the entire Socialist movement and led to those unfortunate sectional combinations which have been and still are so prejudicial to the whole Socialist development in Great Britain." And then, of course, Morris's fame suffered a dire eclipse, and he vanished into what used to be called outer darkness—outside, that is, of the S.D.F.

William Morris reappeared, however, a few years later. When Mr. Hyndman went down to contest Burnley in 1892 Mr. Morris got on the platform with him and said: "In 1884 Hyndman and I had a great quarrel, and I have to say this—that he was quite right and I was quite wrong." Mr. Hyndman comments on this astonishing confession thus: "That was very noble of Morris. I believe it to be the precise truth;" no more characteristic stroke of self-portrayal could possibly have been made, and no more humorous stroke, though naturally enough Mr. Hyndman does not see the humour of it. Small wonder after this that some journalist wanted to know why Mr. Hyndman persisted in calling himself the Social Democratic Federation.

The American whom Mr. Hyndman elects for praise is William Henry Hurlbert—"one of the most brilliant men I have ever encountered." Theodore Roosevelt did not impress him—"an average American," merely; Mr. Hyndman lavishes all possible praise on Hurlbert, a man of extraordinary ability and a "profound knowledge of the world." Every one who ever met and knew Hurlbert will smile at the extravagant laudation. Among the Frenchmen Mr. Hyndman loves Jaurès best, though he devotes three or four interesting pages to Clémenceau, who is of course a far greater personality and a far abler man than the Socialist orator and whilom professor. But when Mr. Hyndman praises, it must be admitted that he praises wholeheartedly. He says of Clémenceau: "He was at one and the same time the best Leader of Opposition, the best debater, the best conversationist, the best shot, and the best fencer in France," and later he became "the best journalist." One only wonders how many talkers in France Mr. Hyndman has met; we can assure him there are infinitely better talkers or conversationists, if he prefers the word, than M. Clémenceau.

But the god of Mr. Hyndman's idolatry is the German agitator Liebknecht. Liebknecht is his ideal of a democratic statesman. He goes so far as to put him above Marx and Lassalle, for he "more than any other man was the founder of German political Social Democracy as we now know it." Yet no one has ever attributed a new idea of any kind to poor Liebknecht, who was, as Carlyle said of George Eliot, "neither wise nor witty, but just dull."

Now against all these pumped-up eulogies we find an even greater number of contemptuous disparagements in Mr. Hyndman's record; but one instance may suffice. Mr. Hyndman knew Bernard Shaw very early. He talks of him on one page as a member of the Social Democratic Federation—one of Shaw's chief claims to distinction in Mr. Hyndman's opinion; on another as one of the contributors to Justice; on a third as connected with Sidney Webb in the Fabian Society; and then sums him up and dismisses him as "a follower of Oscar Wilde," with less wit and a shallower view of life. Max could hardly caricature Mr. Hyndman more savagely than Mr. Hyndman depicts himself in such a grotesque misjudgment.

But it is the Fabian Society, even more than Bernard Shaw, which excites Mr. Hyndman's animosity. He writes mere journalism, but he is usually clear. When he mentions the Fabian Society, however, his speech becomes almost dithyrambic. In one place he talks about "their policy of permeation to that point of permanent effacement which they have pursued ever since;" immediately afterwards he declares them responsible for that failure "to bring about a fusion of Socialists which shortened William Morris's life." It is true to say that Mr. Hyndman can be measured by his love for Jack Williams and his contempt for Bernard Shaw. He has no power of measuring men whatever, or rather he has the little mind of the doctrinaire, who measures people by their importance to himself and their subservience to his vanities.

Had he had in the early eighties any of the personal enthusiasm or idealism of Lassalle or even of Jaurès, the Social Democratic Federation in England might have included all the Fabians and a good many other able men whom Mr. Hyndman managed to affront and insult. If any union of Socialists is impossible in England to-day, the blame is chiefly due to Mr. Hyndman himself. A Napoleon is known by the ability of his marshals. Mr. Hyndman disgusted all the ablest men he met, and stands alone now with his arms about Jack Williams' neck, and his eyes cast up in admiration to dull Liebknecht, his hero.

But if there is no revelation of a great and interesting personality in this book, there are nevertheless dozens of interesting pages in it. When political theories do not obscure his vision, Mr. Hyndman can see the difference between a giant and a pigmy. There is a page of frank admiration of Sir Richard Burton, and another page in condemnation of Stanley—both of which seem to us eminently true and well deserved.

There is one great advantage in coming into conflict with society and social ideals; you meet among the outcasts not only the ablest men of the time, but an astonishingly large proportion of able men, and you hear the new truths—the truths which will not be appreciated in society for a century or two. Mr. Hyndman has been compelled to profit by his position; he has a couple of pages about Marx which are extraordinarily interesting. He tells how Marx went to pawn some plate one Saturday night in London and how he was detained by the pawnbroker and arrested on suspicion and imprisoned as a thief till the Monday by "our much-belauded police." Marx, too, told of long conversations with Heine which have never yet been published, but which surely should be published.

Strangely enough, too, Mr. Hyndman once lit on a curious truth in a talk about Dreyfus. It was Liebknecht who gave him the cue; Liebknecht declared quite truthfully "that there is a secret but loyal understanding between all civilised Governments to the effect that if an innocent man is by accident arrested as a spy a notification is at once sent to that effect. I know positively, and as a matter of fact, that the German Government sent no such notification in Dreyfus' case. Why? Because they could not do so."

A very interesting book, we say again, in spite of its curious misjudgments of men, and its characteristic tone of invincible self-complacence.

A MAHARANI AS AUTHORESS

The Position of Women in India. By her Highness the MAHARANI OF BARODA and S. M. MITRA. (Longmans, Green and Co. 5s. net.)

If Indian ladies of the highest rank take to writing books, who can say that women are still backward in India? It is not long since the Begum of Bhopal published a volume of autobiography written by herself in Hindustani and translated by her Educational Adviser. The Maharani of Baroda has improved upon this precedent by bringing out a book of a remarkable character for the amelioration of the condition of her Indian sisters. In her enterprise she has admittedly availed herself of the assistance of her countryman Mr. S. M. Mitra, who has already made a reputation for himself in the literary world by his books and other writings; and, though no other assistance is acknowledged, it may be presumed that some scholar well acquainted with English and classical literature has furnished the numerous apt and ornamental quotations at the heads of the chapters and in the body of the work. These quotations cannot have been known to the Maharani, and some of them can hardly have come within the range of Mr. Mitra's reading. On the other hand, no objection need be taken to the Maharani's obtaining such help which is available to any extent in certain quarters of London, and is often utilised by busy men. The old maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se applies here in full force. The Maharani has supplied the motive power, and has doubtless "paid the piper," but, like other people in many walks of life, she has obtained skilled assistance to put her ideas into shape. We have heard that some thousands of copies of this book have been shipped to India, prepared in cheap binding, to be sold for a rupee each, which can hardly cover the cost price, even if the Maharani accepts the sale proceeds. She has therefore by her outlay proved the sincerity of her aspirations, and, as Indian purchasers prefer and patronise cheap editions, the circulation of this volume will be secured. Whether it will be fruitful of results is another matter. Time alone can show. No one book can regenerate all India. It will assuredly have some effect in a number of directions, and should stimulate action, which has hitherto been difficult to vitalise in the lethargic and contemplative East. It may also be presumed that the Maharani's husband, the Gaekwar, has approved of the issue of this volume, and will give its circulation every chance in his dominions. He is, it will be remembered, the Chief of the advanced State of Baroda, who was, from his village, adopted in 1875 and placed upon the gadi after the trial of his predecessor on serious charges, which led to his deposition and banishment. He received an excellent English education, has travelled extensively, and takes his place in the highest society. In education and other departments he has succeeded in making Baroda the leading State in India. Both he and the Maharani like to be surrounded in social life by persons of ability and culture. Whatever he may think or say of Constitutional Government, he is practically an autocrat, possessed of despotic power—more so than the Emperor of Germany or the Tsar of Russia, though in some respects he is amenable to the Paramount Power in India, a fact which is believed to gall him as it does other native Princes. He can truly say, L'état c'est moi! He cannot but be a supporter of the objects of this book. But we must turn to its contents.

The most remarkable thing about it is that, in spite of its title, the book hardly alludes to the present position of women in India. It refers incidentally to such institutions as the caste system, and seclusion of women behind the purda (curtain), without hinting at their abolition. "Notwithstanding the caste difficulty in India, advantage can be taken of the common kitchen system" is one of the Maharani's proposals. Writing of matrimonial negotiations being now conducted by women in Calcutta, in which they have, quite legitimately, ousted their male rivals, she points out that "if this proves anything, it shows that there is ample room for all sorts of women workers behind the purda." Mr. Mitra admits the discrepancy between the title and the contents. "The present volume," he writes, "gives an account, not of the present status of the female sex in India, but of some Western feminine institutions, the adaptation of which to suit Eastern requirements is likely to help Indian women to achieve a higher position in public life than they at present hold." The Maharani herself states that in her detailed discussion of the various professions open to women she omits practically all account of the stereotyped ways in which an Indian woman may get a living, while she considers other callings which the latter, by means of organisation, might divert partially or entirely to her own profit. In her travels in Europe and America she has noticed that the co-operation which exists between Western men and women in public affairs is practically unknown in India. In the hope that some of the organisations for human welfare which she has observed in the West might be adapted to the conditions of her native country, she, with this object, lays her experiences before her countrywomen, with a view to receive opinions and contributions from all parts of India. Her investigations into the employment of women in Western countries have been exhaustive. The information she has obtained has been systematically arranged in chapters under the headings (which may be quoted here, as the details are too numerous, though not all of equal importance) such as "The Woman Movement," "Professions for Women," "Agriculture," "Home Professions," "Arts and Crafts," "Intellectual Callings," "Philanthropic Work," "Hotels, Teashops," "Domestic Science," "Women Inspectors," "Matrons and Superintendents," "Co-operation," "Money-lending," "Charitable Organisation," "Thrift," "Anti-Sweating," "Rescue Work," "Women's Interests," "Women in Japan." This is, indeed, a formidable catalogue; it includes a comprehensive survey of women's occupations in the West, in every branch of human energy and efficiency. As it stands it will be very useful to all advocates of women's rights and aspirations throughout the world, and may often be quoted. The Maharani is not content to discourse on the feminine occupations of nursing, domestic service, social life: she carries the war, so to speak, into the domain of the enemy—man. Having thus described at sufficient length what women are doing for themselves in the West, the Maharani leaves it to her Indian sisters to decide which of the employments and interests mentioned can be adapted, with suitable modifications, for trial in India. Through the publication of her book she hopes that additional contributions and opinions from all parts of India may be collected and carefully edited, with the object of deciding what practical form women's organisation should take there. We may cordially concur with her hope that "proceedings with circumspection, something tangible may be effected to raise women's position in Indian public life." Education must be the basis of any movement; co-operation, confidence, capital must be enlisted in the cause. The Maharani's aim is high—the elevation of Indian women—and she may experience disappointments; but she deserves all encouragement from well-wishers of India, and the gratitude of her country for having taken the initiative and shown, for example and imitation, what women have already done for themselves in other parts of the world.

INEXPERTÆ PENNÆ

Between Two Worlds. By A. E. LLOYD MAUNSELL. (Alexander Moring. 5s. net.)

If this book is an authentic document, it represents the fruit of the enforced leisure of a man crippled in the prime of his youth. In a series of short essays or studies the author gives his impressions of a beloved world in which he can share only through his sick-room window, though now and again he allows his spirit to take flight and adventure where his body is denied. Occasionally some arresting human interest affords a living thread for several successive sections, and while the tragic crippled circumstance runs as a kind of sub-motif through the whole, it is not allowed to taint the pages with morbidity. The critic has grown somewhat wary of professedly authentic "human documents," but there are certain points about the present example which go to attest its genuineness. There is the wistful yearning of the earth-lover imprisoned, and the unmistakably minor theme of an actual problem of suffering. But the book is most successful and most interesting as a record of moods. Any one who has shared the common heritage of pain may catch again in swift recall the ebb and flow from fevered fancy to the peace of rare respite. One feels that even the exaggeration of the sick mood is there, as in the concluding sections wherein the author meets the fancied approach of death.

But when we come to consider the book as a contribution to literature some of these very qualities become vices, while there are others peculiar to the author's style. To begin with, he has adventured the most difficult kind of prose—the sensuous poetic prose of the Idyll and the Fancy. Mr.

Le Gallienne has employed it successfully; so has Mr. Kenneth Grahame; and in an example more nearly approaching what this present book attempts Michael Fairless has adorned it in "The Roadmender." This style of writing is very attractive, but its demands are far stricter than is apt to appear. The fluent, dreamy prose must not hide vagueness of idea; metaphor and fancy, while proper to it, must be restrained and natural; and above all the writer must beware of the easy pitfalls of archaism and inverted structure. Unfortunately, all these canons are transgressed in this book. Its pages are often obscure and vague; sometimes overladen with fancy to the point of incoherence; and the author's pictorial sense is apt to run away with his idea, so that the latter is vexed and dissipated by irrelevant detail. This is markedly so in the section entitled "Oblivion." The fancy is often extravagant, as in "The Waters under the Earth," and such passages as the following:—

Already the mists stir uneasily, as if choosing from among their sad people victims to propitiate their father the sun.

The soft cushions have seemed things of contempt, that would stifle me of their very placidity and smoothness—things that, Delilah-like, would engulf me, blotting life's sharper outlines from sight and touch, until my soul should be lost in a world unreal of their (?) weaving.

Moreover, the author is too self-conscious, obtruding himself into his fancies until one is driven to suspect a pose. In "Shadows and Depths" this is notably evident. He seems to be particularly vain of his wings, and pauses every few lines to call attention to their beauty, poise, or action. He is altogether too busy in the tragic scene which does not concern him at all, save as an ex post facto spectator. Grammatical affectations mar the style, particularly an irritatingly insistent use of adjectives adverbially—"the moonlight silvering intermittent the surrounding crags," and a kind of participial parenthesis—"and so, they swaying, the clouds cover them." Sentences are frequently clumsy, and the tense is repeatedly and abruptly changed between past and historic present. Yet there are one or two essays where the author sufficiently forgets himself and writes down a plain, simple idyll that gives the impression of the possibility of good work. The promise of the old Irishman's mystery is considerable, and the style and treatment good in "The Vigil," but it is wearied to death in the succeeding sections amid the ostentatious flapping of the author's wings, and "An Atonement" stands out by reason of its simple, unaffected diction. It remains to be said that the punctuation throughout is execrable, and the printer's reader has allowed a crop of misprints and misspellings to disfigure the book. The worst of these occurs in a passage which would delight Mr. Bernard Shaw:

. . . leaving me as one who swings a cenor before an altar which as yet the darkness hides.

Even the author's name appears on the back of the dainty cover as "Mannsell."

INGENIOUS BOOKMAKING

Modern Paris: Some Sidelights on its Inner Life. By ROBERT HARBOROUGH SHERARD. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)

NOT a day passes but we are struck with a sort of reluctant admiration for the marvellous ingenuity of professional pen-men. Undaunted at the sight of choked libraries and the ever-lengthening lists of "books received," an army of admirable writers seize, spider-wise, upon a small, ordinary fly, and spin round it a large, ordinary web. Sometimes the fly is so small and emaciated that the web completely hides it, and sometimes there is no fly at all. Mostly it is a fly which has become a kind of stock insect, a kind of institution, which has been passed from spider to spider a hundred, even a thousand times. The one most in use is labelled Napoleon. The Shakespeare fly is, however, very popular. Nelson, Lady Hamilton, Beau Brummell, the Four Georges, the Brontës, Oxford and Cambridge are well in the running. Sometimes these webs are spun with threads of gold, and the spinner is a writer who illuminates a subject, howsoever hackneyed it may be. Generally they are composed of strings of mere words, all very well chosen, all neatly put together, which go to make a web which is altogether unnecessary and superfluous.

Mr. Robert Harborough Sherard may be said to be a captain in the army of bookmakers. He does not belong to the non-commissioned ranks in which stand those pen-men who are not creative enough to break away from stereotype subjects. He writes of contemporary persons and himself, and it is when writing of himself that Mr. Sherard is well worth reading. "My Friends the French" and "Twenty Years in Paris" have just been followed by "Modern Paris: Some Sidelights on its Inner Life." In this new volume, which has for a frontispiece a very pleasant pencil-sketch of "Sherar" by a Polish artist, and for illustrations letters from the great Lord Northcliffe, Alphonse Daudet, Jules Claretie, and Emil Zola, and a photograph of Oscar Wilde, Mr. Sherard dramatises very skilfully a vast number of small incidents of his observant life in France, details very vividly a hundred snatches of conversation with notable and indiscriminate people, and draws a whole gallery of impressionist sketches of untrodden places.

Mr. Sherard is not only a complete Boulevardier. He is at heart a Frenchman, who, unlike the confirmed haunter of cafés, knows and loves the quiet, industrious villages of Normandy, Brittany, Provence, and the Midi. He has made friendships not only with notable writers, painters, actors, and dramatists, but with old fruit-sellers, and concierges and peasants. He has good things to say about such widely different people as Madame Sarah Bernhardt and "Lord Joseph" Chamberlain, Boulanger and Mr. Bottomley, Wenzel von Brozik and Mr. Chesterton, Esterhazy and Sven Hedin, Maeterlinck and Mr. C. Arthur Pearson, Edmond Rostand and Oscar Wilde. In short, as an example of highly ingenious bookmaking, "Modern Paris" is the best example that has come to our notice for a considerable time. It has, too, a great advantage over books of a similar nature in that the personality and character of the author are put before the reader without egotistical outbursts of introspective examination. In style the book is journalistic rather than literary, and is therefore more than a little careless here and there. That is, perhaps, the effect that Mr. Sherard desired to achieve. At any rate, the chapters read as though they were the verbatim notes of a quick-speed shorthand-writer and had been dictated by a man drawing almost haphazard upon a retentive memory. It may fairly be said that the result made the effort worth while.

SHORTER REVIEWS

My Vagabondage: Being the Intimate Autobiography of a Nature's Nomad. By J. E. PATTERSON. (William Heinemann. 8s. 6d. net.)

THERE are some natures to which romance is as the breath of life. Mr. Patterson's is one of them. From his cradle until the present day the author's life has been that of a rolling stone, and the amount of moss which it appears likely to gather until the time when it comes finally to rest is a negligible quantity. But rolling stones sometimes gather something better than moss, and we have before us an instance in the present work—full of much hard-won wisdom, offering many a glimpse into phases of humanity strange to the majority of us, and fraught with not a little pathos ever and anon. The author has throughout his life been gifted with an astonishing knack of dodging death and a no less remarkable aptitude for sitting down and composing a dozen stanzas upon the spot to celebrate the occasion. Among the many which appear in these pages we think those addressed “to certain Critics and Improvers of ‘the Mermaid’” are perhaps the most happily conceived.

Mr. Patterson’s road through life, whether high or low, has been undeniably rough, and the incidents thereof he tells with uncommon freshness and force. Probably few children ever survived such a wayward and adventurous childhood, or, having survived, so thoroughly cheated the gloomy prognostications of infallible prophets. Nail-maker, miner, deep-sea fisherman, able-bodied seaman, reporter, journalist, poet—such are a few of the callings successively, and more or less successfully, pursued by this versatile genius. And what though his Pegasus cast a shoe now and again? The consequent lameness but serves to show that the steed is something more substantial than a fleeting vision. In this book we find presented to us the living apotheosis of the penny “dreadful.” Here is a real boy who sees real ghosts—nay, more, feels them—runs away to sea, has hair-raising experiences in a god-house, fights with pirates—in fact does all that the penny “dreadful” ascribes to the youthful genius of its pages.

But the toughest proposition that our hero struck was the publishers. For some unfathomable reason those ogres refused to play the fairy godmother to Mr. Patterson’s literary productions. The loss of course was theirs. As for the critics—well, one is on dangerous ground, and must tread softly, like Agag, or suffer a fate similar to that of the unfortunate monarch. At length the unpublished author learnt the fell secret, and the sun of his literary fortune rose in dewy splendour, we trust not to set for many a long day. In case the eyes of any other struggling genius should light upon these pages, we feel in duty bound to give away Mr. Patterson’s little secret; and it is this:

Advertise, advertise, advertise—
Whether Bibles, or whiskey, or pies,
Cathedrals or huts, or political lies.
Remember this well,
Whatever you sell,
New ways to heaven
Or old ways to hell,
Advertise, advertise, advertise,
Or you’re sure to be left to the flies.

Five Centuries of London.—Cathedrals of England. (Constable and Co. 1s. net each.)

WE have here a couple of attractive booklets formed of illustrations only, which to some slight extent tell their own story. There are forty-eight in each, and those contained in the first, which we consider by far the more interesting of the two, have been reproduced from a variety of sources, such as old manuscripts, paintings, etchings and other engravings, lithographs, &c. The cathedrals, to which are added views of the ruins of several famous abbeys, are all reproductions of photographs. The little volumes are neatly got up, the illustrations being well executed and the paper and print all that could be desired. We cannot help thinking, however, that a more representative set of pictures might have been selected for the “Five Centuries of London.” The series starts with the well-known view of the Tower, circa 1418, when Charles, Duke of Orleans, was incarcerated there after being made prisoner at the Battle of Agincourt, and then jumps to the execution of the conspirators of the Gunpowder Plot in 1606 in St. Paul’s Churchyard. Thus the fifteenth century is only slightly represented, and, shades of Bluff King Hal, Bloody Mary, and the Virgin Queen! “whose smile was rapture and whose frown was fate,” the sixteenth not at all, which is a distinct slight to a very stirring period in the history of London Town. A list of the illustrations, which are full of interest, might with advantage be added, especially as each volume contains a blank leaf available for the purpose.

Poucinet, Conte Finlandais. By E. DE LABOULAYE. Adapted and Edited by P. SHAW JEFFREY, M.A. (Siepmann’s Primary French Series.)

Bataille de Dames, ou Un Duel en Amour. By E. SCRIBE and E. LEGOUVÉ. Histoire de la Civilisation en Europe. By F. GUIZOT. (Siepmann’s French Series for Rapid Reading.) (Macmillan and Co. 1s. each.)

THE Messrs. Macmillan have recently added these three volumes to their capital series of French educational works. The last to be issued is for the Intermediate and Advanced Section of the Series for Rapid Reading, and is an adaptation of the famous work of that distinguished statesman and historian M. Guizot. The same as preceding volumes, it contains a useful list of the more difficult words and phrases with translation, thus enabling the pupil to dispense with a dictionary, which should prove a great advantage. The Notes are both instructive and interesting, containing as they do short biographies of the principal persons mentioned and additional elucidatory information concerning many of the political events alluded to in the text. The volumes are well selected and ably edited, and should do much to foster the study of the French language in this country.

Das Verständnis der Oden Salomos. By WILHELM FRANKENBERG. (Alfred Töpelmann, Giessen. 5 marks.)

SOME weeks back an edition of the “Psalms of Solomon,” by Dr. Viteau, was noticed in THE ACADEMY. The present edition of the “Odes,” which have as little to do with Solomon as the Psalms, is of very different calibre. It consists merely of a Greek text, a commentary, and four pages of introduction, in which Herr Frankenberg dismisses questions of time and place as difficult, and in the main insignificant. Even the literary value of the work he considers as nugatory, the style being chiefly distinguished by pietistic mannerisms. He is disposed to place the composition at Alexandria, and to attribute it to a purely Christian source.

Fragmente einer griechischen Übersetzung des samaritanischen Pentateuchs. By PAUL GLAUE and ALFRED RAHLFS. Illustrated. (Weidmannsche Buchhandlung, Berlin. 1 mark 50pf.)

THIS is a fragment of a Greek translation of the Pentateuch, of Samaritan origin, as is proved principally by the reading “Garizim” for “Ebal” in Deuteronomy xxvii. 4. The Samaritan version exhibits at times important divergences from the Septuagint. A photographic reproduction of the newly-discovered parchment containing this fragment is given, as well as a transcription in ordinary cursive script and annotations. The whole brochure forms an instalment of the Göttingen work on the Septuagint.

FICTION

LOVE, POESY, AND WAR

The Song of Renny. By MAURICE HEWLETT. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

WE rise from reading this latest epic of Mr. Hewlett's favourite Land of Dreams with the sensation of having been lost in a wonderful forest of beautiful names. For hours we have been strolling on and on, coming across scene after scene in clear glades illumined by the deep golden glow of a leaf-shaded sun: a tourney, with flashing robes and shouting hosts; a poet-lover and his lady, with sestinas and rhymes royal trembling on the air; a king feasting, a monk fasting, a nun praying. But the names—they are magical. The Earl of Pikpoyntz, the Lady Mabilla, Renny of Coldscaur, Joyeux Saber, Lanceilhot Paulet, Marvilion, Cantacuta, Campflors, Minster-Merrow, Maintsonge, Barsaunter—with such people and such places surely an ordinary romancist could weave an extraordinary romance?

By these presents—it is not easy to avoid catching Mr. Hewlett's turn of speech—let all readers know that the times of "The Forest Lovers" have come to life again, with a "Brazenhead" in the midst of them; for the Earl of Pikpoyntz, hero and villain in one, is a most energetic person when there is any killing to be done. A blow of his fist is enough for some poor wretches; he is, in fine, a gentleman with whom it were well to agree quickly. We are introduced to him just as he has wiped out a whole family save one member, Donna Sabine de Renny of Coldscaur, a queenly little lady whom he saved for his own purposes, and who, when he really fell in love with an even more chill and queenly dame, proved to be rather an awkward possession. He married his love, who acceded for the sake of a crown, and became immediately a mawkish suitor for her favours, an abject slave; meanwhile, love was busy with the new Countess of Pikpoyntz and her pet poet Lanceilhot. Of the adventures of these two, and the wanderings of poor little Sabine and the lout whom she chose for mate, the story more particularly tells. To retell it in any detail would demand more columns than we have to spare. It is above all a tale of action, and, once fairly into it, no reader will easily set the book down.

Mr. Hewlett's ornate, and yet at times almost Biblical, style is especially suited to the undiscoverable country where his scenes are set, and its occasional extravagances do not offend us; some of the conversational sparring between various characters is charged with excellent wit and repartee. There are three apparent inconsistencies: Sabine seems to weaken considerably towards the hour of her trial; Pikpoyntz loses his grip of life and much of his essential grimness as soon as he sets eyes on Mabilla; and Mabilla herself, directly Lanceilhot's love wins her, changes from one of the strongest to one of the most sentimental creatures we have had the pleasure of meeting in the realm of good fiction. If we could have been "let down" in these matters a little more easily there would have been no reason to complain. However, not all readers will notice these slight flaws on a most entertaining story, and we can congratulate the author on this return to the delightful quality of his "Forest Lovers."

Thanks to Sanderson. By W. PETT RIDGE. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

WHY is it that the doings of very ordinary people, placed faithfully on record, become so interesting? The presumption is, of course, that we are all very ordinary people ourselves, and that quite naturally our fellow beings and their little adventures of joy and sorrow obtain, by the projection of our own personalities on the screen of Mr. Pett Ridge's cinematograph, an importance enhanced. At any rate, there is enough of sympathy and comprehension in most readers to make Sanderson, the railway inspector, and his family and friends exceeding good company. They live before us in these pages, at first somewhat lowly in station, since the hero at the beginning is only a ticket-collector; later on, in all the dignity of "society," since there is a daughter at the Academy of Music and a son who is "something in the City." The whole book consists of that queer mixture of humour and pathos which distinguishes nearly all the author's work. Alfred, the son, is more than half a prig, and is inclined to resent the facts of humble birth; he reproves and advises his father, and gets "taken down" gently but firmly on several occasions. Winnie, the daughter, who attains the dignity of paragraphs in the suburban papers when she accompanies songs at local concerts, is also a rather unsatisfactory person; she rebels, being determined to make her own way in the world, and the ending is not wholly happy. There is a touch of sadness about the steady eclipsing of the father and mother by the son and daughter. Sanderson, with his waggish ways, his unfailing good temper, and his pretty little deceptions to save his wife trouble, is the best character in the book. Mr. Pett Ridge is doing good work in showing how real both suffering and happiness can be in the hearts of people whom we are perhaps too ready to pass by unrecognised; and not many writers can accomplish this with such absolute freedom from sententiousness and such abundance of humour.

The Progress of Mrs. Cripps-Middlemore. By GERARD BENDALL. (John Lane. 6s.)

IN the company of Mrs. Cripps-Middlemore we are taken out to lunch and dinner at the houses of various persons of her acquaintance, and we do not find the entertainments at all uninteresting. Her circle, for the most part, consists of literary, artistic, and musical people, and although the conversation does not at any time touch upon very deep questions, there is sufficient humour and cynicism in the handling of the various situations to make one desirous of pursuing the fortunes of the Cripps-Middlemores as far as they are related in the present book. Perhaps the most amusing incidents occur when each member imagines that he or she has musical or literary gifts, and the results of all their efforts find their way by varied channels to their mutual friend Mr. Emeris, who, at the request of the bearer of each effusion, places the manuscripts in a large tin box, hoping that soon they will be forgotten, which, indeed, they are in the more distracting game of flirtation. No one takes anything very seriously, and on occasions of any excitement the men of the party are in the habit of embracing the women who happen to be nearest to them, a peculiarity which, at any rate on one occasion, leads to rather unforeseen results. The death of Mr. Cripps-Middlemore leaves his widow free to progress a little higher in the social scale and become the wife of Lord Childerditch, where we must leave her presiding in her charming and graceful manner over the household of this estimable nobleman.

A Blood Moon, and Other Stories. By IRENE OSGOOD.
(Everett and Co. 2s. net.)

"A BLOOD MOON" is a collection of short stories dealing with the wrongs of wives at the hands of their husbands, with their rather hysterical complaints and their occasional revenges. Some of "Irene Osgood's" pages are neatly written, but her descriptive passages are perverted by the use of sensuous imagery, particularly in the "Stories from Algiers." The book, however, is merely a long complaint in many keys, and lacks even common sense. The authoress' obsession with matters of sex obscures her outlook and robs her work of healthiness. The consequence is a feverish air, and an impression on the part of the reader that many of the stories were painful to write; which does not make them the more pleasant to read.

Essence of Honeymoon. By H. PERRY ROBINSON. Illustrated.
(William Heinemann. 6s.)

THE honeymoon from which this essence is taken lasted over a year, with the result that a great variety of amusing incidents are to be found among the component parts of the extract. These are mostly of the sort that usually befall young newly-married couples; but they are described with a verve which imparts to them such an entertaining freshness that the reader will not regret devoting some odd moments to their perusal. Autumn brides, and brides of all seasons for that matter, will, we feel sure, take a lively interest in Euphemia's first appearance as a British matron, and they might learn much from practical Mrs. Gorringer, especially with regard to birthdays "comin' edgeways-like."

THE THEATRE

A PROMISING PUPIL

THE microbe of the incompatibility of married temper seems to have entered into the brains of all the dramatists who have contributed to the theatre this season. Upon the heels of "The Ogre" there came "The Perplexed Husband," "The Man in the Stalls" (a little, somewhat unsavoury, wholly didactic thing produced at the Palace Theatre) and "The Honeymoon." Incontestably the last play is the best of them all. Mr. Arnold Bennett has brought to bear upon his work a spontaneity, a sense of humour, and a sense also of the theatre which the other plays, although written by old hands, do not, oddly enough, possess. It is equally incontestable that Mr. Bennett, whether consciously or unconsciously, has sat at the feet of Mr. George Bernard Shaw. To say that we wish that Mr. Bennett had given to his master the plot of "The Honeymoon" is not to say that Mr. Bennett has not made an eminently entertaining play. Only at one other theatre in London at this moment can there be found a play which provides so good an evening's entertainment. This is "Man and Superman" at the Criterion, to which, after all said and done, "The Honeymoon" cannot, good as it is, hold a candle. The latter is, however, witty enough, interesting enough, and occasionally surprising enough to be enjoyed thoroughly as it stands. It is only when we stop to think how much more ingeniously Mr.

Shaw would have treated a thesis so obviously Shavian that we miss his inimitable touch.

The very atmosphere of the first Act aroused interest. The best parlour of the one hotel on the sea front of a one-eyed place called Pixton appals and amuses. We knew that it would contain a prying and talkative Swiss waiter, with dirty cuffs. It did. We were perfectly certain that some of the chairs were covered with antimacassars to hide broken backs and the marks of recent glue. They were. The place was recognisable. It lived. We smelt the sea. We were almost reconciled to the oleographs, because the windows opened wide and let in the sun. But what did antimacassars and oleographs and a sad Kidderminster carpet matter to Cedric Haslam and the little attractive woman, who wore her clothes like a Parisienne and cooed like a dove? They were on their honeymoon, and the silver light of the moon that only shines once (sometimes twice, but then only in a silver-plated way) glamourised everything. She was the widow of a stockbroker, had met the Haslams, the celebrated Haslams—the mother was a novelist with a genuinely large sale, and the eldest son the best-advertised and most successful aviator—at a boarding-house at Matlock, or some such place. Flora Lloyd had never met celebrities before. How could she with a husband on the Stock Exchange? No doubt she found the round-faced Charlie Haslam, with his smart socks and tweezy little bow-tie and adoring, precocious eyes, none the less amusing because his mother and brother were household words. Then the great Cedric made a volplane, landed at her feet, and metaphorically grovelled. His income was nineteen thousand a year. His face and figure were too curiously like those of the tenor of a seaside glee-party or pierrot troupe, but they were to be found in packets of cheap cigarettes. He was, indeed, a famous man. He flew at her. He had all the habits of the aviator. He carried her away, and she found herself not only a willing passenger, but a woman passionately in love. Chacun à son goût. Here they were, these two, married that morning by a nice-looking curate, and here, at Pixton-on-Sea, they intended to hide themselves for one whole month. No Bond Street should call her, no aeroplane him. Again and again, and yet again, they made this promise; and again and again, and yet again, they stamped the contract with a kiss. The Stock Exchange and the Aerodrome had come together.

Here, if you like, was an ideal union. But the Swiss waiter, the unconscious instrument of a strangely sympathetic Nemesis, broke in upon the naturally somewhat Hampstead-Heathian couple, congratulated them upon being what they hated to appear to be—newly married—and presently drew the aviator's attention to an announcement in a halfpenny evening paper to the effect that a German rival was coming to England to win the £10,000 prize for flying over Snowdon, and departed with his tray. When the wife came back to kiss again with chuckles she did not find a man, she found an aviator. She found the professional flying-man, with the whirr of his engines in his ears and his greedy hands held out towards the gleaming sum which the German had come to snatch from his grasp. What of the honeymoon now? What of the promise, so much sealed, of a whole long blissful month on the terra firma of Pixton-on-Sea? The woman wheedled and argued and stormed, and naturally wept. The man talked about his career, of England's prestige. "Hang career and England. Do you think more of your aeroplane than of me?"

The situation was tremendous, the problem vital. What would Mr. Shaw not have done with them both? Up to this point Mr. Bennett had been more, far more, than a promising pupil. He had rivalled the master. But here, apparently frightened at finding himself face to face with truth, he tottered and fell into farce. It was admirable farce, but it was incontestably farce. He brought in the Haslam family. He lifted them out of their elegant detached mansion in, presumably, St. John's Wood, and plumped them down in Pixton-on-Sea. They were characteristically agitated, for they had discovered that the curate who had performed the marriage ceremony that morning was a practical joker, a student of new sensations, a bogus clergyman. Flora Lloyd and Cedric Haslam were not married. Sensation. The honeymoon contract was then, for all its kisses, nullified. What were they to do? The great novelist flung up her hands. The tweedy Charlie smoothed his kinky hair. The meek little husband-secretary-amanuensis put forward a timid plea for "masterly inactivity," and the curtain fell to a scream of laughter.

The same evening we meet all these people at the Reach, Haslam's elegant literary mansion. One other person is there—the Bishop of Chelmsford. In the drawing of this character Mr. Bennett descends still further into the realms of farce. He might have been the creature of the brain of a comic-minded Nonconformist. He was there, to the immense delight of Mrs. Haslam, to arrange for the wedding to take place in the morning. He would himself perform the ceremony in order that he might make thorough and complete reparation for the carelessness of the Vicar who was taken in by the experimentalist. Many exceedingly amusing scenes are included in this Act. Flora Lloyd, née Haslam, throws a bomb. Thank you very much, but she is not going to be married in the morning. Married or unmarried, Cedric considered his aeroplane before herself. She looks upon the bogus clergyman as a benefactor. Imagine the feelings of the pompous Mrs. Haslam. To her Flora's point of view is almost blasphemous. To marry into the Haslam family is an honour indescribably great. Cedric is photographed weekly, and can always be certain of more space in the halfpenny papers than is devoted to mere political and social crises or a comic-opera war in the Near East. A new novel by Mrs. Reach Haslam is a "great literary event," and it is reviewed on the day of publication by such eminent people as Mr. Douglas, Mr. Begbie, and the rest. The aviator is hysterical. It is the way of aviators. He stands about while the women have a most polite and most deadly quarrel, making a series of gargoylic faces, and giving exquisite imitations of an exhaust-pipe. The neat little old husband-father-secretary-press-cutting-collector is the only person in that perturbed house who is perfectly unruffled. Finally, Flora flounces out to pack, having completely floored Mrs. Haslam and her usually mid-air son. The curtain falls upon the great novelist dictating her impressions of Flora while they are still bubbling in her mind. Again there are shouts of laughter. This Act is almost as entertaining as the first, especially when there is added to it an incident wholly extraneous and wholly out of tune—an incident which lifts farce into high comedy. Mr. Trampington, the bogus curate, who has failed to get himself arrested at Vine Street, drops in quite quietly to apologise in his best Oxford manners for the inconvenience that he has unwittingly caused.

The third Act falls away. It lacks ingenuity, and simply marks time until the curtain falls on the honeymoon couple creeping away in the early hours of the morning to get married. It certainly contains many delightful lines and at least one exquisite touch of psychology, but it has very little movement. We see too little of the fascinating, shrewd, well-trained Flora, and far too much of Charlie and Cedric. For all that Mr. Bennett's play deserves to be seen. It is fresh, and alive, and gorgeously foolish. It is witty, and it has a touch or two of audacity which is quite French. It is also brilliantly played by Miss Marie Tempest, who has not been so well suited since she appeared as Becky Sharp. Only on the Continental stage are there actresses who can compare with her finish, her neatness, her rapidity, and her charm. She gets every ounce out of the part with a lack of effort which is hugely refreshing. Hers is the work of a very true artist. Mr. Dion Boucicault provided a delicious little sketch of an apparently overwhelmed husband. Every movement and intonation was right. Miss Kate Leycanton played with a pompous solemnity which was altogether invaluable to the piece, and by never showing that she understood and appreciated the cruel humour of her portrait proved herself to be possessed of the keenest sense of it. Mr. Dennis Eadie as the experimental curate proved again that as a character-actor he has few equals. Mr. Basil Hallam was not very good, and Mr. Graham Browne was all wrong. He got hopelessly on our nerves. "The Honeymoon" should, however, make the little theatre in Dean-street the centre of attraction.

THE LITTLE THEATRE

It was a happy idea of Miss Lillah McCarthy's to take up two of the plays that marked the last repertory venture in London at the Duke of York's Theatre in the spring of last year—"The Sentimentalists" by Meredith, and "The Twelve-Pound Look" by Barrie—and to join them to Granville Barker's "Rococo" for the purpose of a continuous series of matinées on Tuesdays and Fridays. A cluster of three such as this very nearly covers the gamut of comedy. It would only need the humour of Falstaff to complete the circle. Nevertheless, it can form very little occasion for surprise if "The Sentimentalists" is considered as the chief attraction of the programme.

At the Duke of York's last year the play only met some half-dozen performances, and so it might now be considered as a matter for new attention. It is but a short affair, however, and only a fragment at that. Astraea, wife for two months and widow for two years, has still the promptings of life in her, chiefly caused, be it noted, by one named Arden. But she conceives it her duty always to remain in that dedicated state on the principle of "once married ever married." She is helped to persist in this by the company with which she is cast, among whom there are only two who manage to retain the healthiness of life—Arden, as aforesaid, and her uncle Homeware. There is another vivacious exception, who can yet hardly be said to belong to the Astraea circle. This is Lyra, quick of wit and penetrating of speech. She has fled from her husband, whose fault is, not that he is something too little of a husband, but rather that he is something too much of a husband. Declares she: "Let no woman marry a husband twenty years older than herself. She marries a limpet!" "I like him, I like him," she cries, "but I want to breathe!" Meanwhile, round and about them floats the company of the sentimentalists, chief among them being Spiral, a professorial person who discourses to them on Life and Beauty.

It is this web that Arden, with his passion of love, has to break through, with Homeware, Astraea's uncle, to aid him as best he may. With excellent judgment Meredith has written the second Act in poetry. Plot there is none. The first Act is chiefly a conversation between Lyra and Astraea, with a background of sentimentalists; it takes place in the morning. The second is wholly a conversation between Arden and Astraea, and takes place at night. The first was in prose, Meredith's prose—that is to say, prose that flashes with some of the rarity of poetry. The second is in poetry—chiefly the poetry in which Arden endeavours to blow away with the rushing ardour of his passion—

Filaments,

The slenderest ever woven about a brain

From the brain's mists.

He does in the end succeed in doing so, and then they are discovered by Homeware, who informs them that they have all the time been watched by the sentimentalists from the house. Astraea, pushed to reality, falls back into sentimentality, and is horrified at discovery. She goes off to front the company, while Homeware consoles Arden with stoic philosophy. The play concludes with Arden gazing raptly at the house, and the hint is given us that Astraea will rise to the occasion, her love breaking through "the slender filaments."

Never have we in the theatre listened so intently and continuously. It was not that the demand was merely made on us: it was rather that we were excited to it. Yet we can very well understand why Meredith did not finish the play. For one thing the difficulty of any continuation of the subject was imperious; for another, even as it stands it is overweighted with words. A comparison of it with Molière will soon show the essential difference between a dramatic subject and a non-dramatic subject. It is a hard thing to say this, for the dialogue is often like the first draught of a fine dry champagne. But it is necessary to say it, for only by clearly recognising facts can any progress be made in matters dramatical. "The Sentimentalists" is admirable entertainment, but it is a fragment, and its fragmentary state is Meredith's own admission that it is not of the stuff of drama.

Beside it "Rococo" rang not a little coarsely. It is excellent farce; but, though it be laughterful, the laughter is rather too explosive after the earlier delicacy. Mr. Barrie's "Twelve-Pound Look" ran a full course at the Duke of York's, and therefore is not quite the stranger that otherwise it might have been. It would perhaps have been better had the first item in the programme been taken last, the other two standing in their present order; nevertheless quarrel cannot easily be found with the fare provided at these matinées—at least not on the grounds of a lack of plenty.

"PIETRO OF SIENA"

THE Drama Society, of which Mr. Robert Ross is the patron, gave at the Studio Theatre, 92, Victoria Street, on Tuesday afternoon, October 10th, its first item in the season's programme. This was the first performance of "Pietro of Siena," by Mr. Stephen Phillips. An appreciative audience entirely filled the theatre, while the absence of scenic effects permitted the drama and its exponents to rely upon their art for those constant ripples of applause which increased in volume till the final fall of the curtain. The Society is to be congratulated upon the success of its opening production, and the smoothness with which scene followed scene in space somewhat cramped, under difficulties which must have cost some pains and enthusiasm to surmount. We understand the same drama will shortly be produced at the Coronet Theatre, where London playgoers may more generally extend their acquaintance with the work of the author of "Paolo and Francesca."

In "Pietro of Siena" lines of supreme poetic beauty fall to Gemma Gonzaga, in which Miss Winifride Borrow is moved to excel both in passion and restraint. Gemma's brother Luigi (Mr. Charles King) has a difficult part which brightens towards the end, when a trace of manliness enters his character. A somewhat long and mellifluous speech in prison faintly suggests the anachronism of a morning postal delivery in old Siena, and could with advantage be curtailed.

Mr. Rothwell Wilson, as the principal character, Pietro Tornielli, rendered with dramatic force and clearness the varying moods between vacillation and devotion to love and high surprise. A subtle character of villainous aspect is that of Montano, whose delineation by Mr. W. Townley Searle is a strong outstanding feature of a play where none of the parts is weak.

"The Wild Duck," by Ibsen, is announced by the Drama Society as their next production on November 14th. Wilde's "Florentine Tragedy" and another play follow later in the season.

THE FUTURE OF THE LIBRARY

ANY one who dips into the newspapers connected with book-selling cannot fail to get an impression that there is something peculiarly distressful about the business. In the midst of courageous talk about "revival in trade" and "better times in store" there is an uneasy feeling that there is a radical weakness somewhere. The discussions about "net prices," the "even price," and other internal trade questions are marked with a note of anxiety which is significant even to the lay observer.

Every trade has its troubles; and the book trade, being exceptional in its character and its complexity, is therefore apt to have more troubles than the average. The adjustment of relations between authors, publishers, wholesale houses, retail buyers, libraries, and the public is obviously a very delicate affair, and one upon which the outsider must hesitate to express an opinion. But there is one aspect of this adjustment which the looker-on may perceive more clearly than those who themselves are part of the machinery of the trade.

This aspect is concerned with new works of fiction and those books on travel and biography which, along with fiction, provide the main contents of library catalogues. It does not relate, except indirectly, to those sixpenny, sevenpenny, and shilling works of fiction and general literature which are now being turned out in such overwhelming numbers.

The central feature of the trade in six-shilling novels and high-priced books is that it is artificial. In every other class of business we have at one end of the chain a public which is ready and willing to buy, at prices which make production worth while to the manufacturer at the other end of the chain. In the book trade (within the range indicated) it is the exception, not the rule, for the public to purchase in adequate numbers.

From this condition the Circulating Library took its rise. The library is an organisation for co-operative buying. It is almost on a level with the Feather Clubs which exist, or used to exist, among the girls of the London coster class. The only difference in principle between the two is that the Feather Club is not organised to make a profit.

In actual results, however, the difference is not very real. The Circulating Library is certainly intended to earn a profit, but there is great doubt whether it does so in the general run of cases. Very few libraries exist as independent businesses. The smaller ones are associated with the sale of books (mainly cheap editions), magazines, stationery, and fancy goods. Among the larger libraries we have one associated with the sale of drugs, another with a newspaper, and another with an enormous news agency business. The library, in short, is a parasite, not a self-sustaining organism.

This fact is so familiar that its effect upon the circulation of books is apt to be overlooked. People have assumed that because the libraries are in business to distribute books on loan, their effect must be to stimulate the distribution of books. In effect, however, this is not the case. Libraries do not prosper by opening the way for every new book to reach every subscriber. They prosper by inducing the largest possible number of subscribers to be content with the smallest possible selection of books.

Thus, in attempting to overcome an artificial element in the book trade, the libraries themselves have become an artificial organisation. They are artificial because their interests are opposed to the interests of their clients. Library subscribers expect to secure copies of every new novel and every new general work of importance within a reasonable period of waiting. But in practice they find it difficult to borrow both the books which are not popular and those which are popular. With regard to the former, such books are generally unknown to the librarian; every one is familiar with the peculiar smile with which the librarian remarks "never heard of it," in relation to a new novel by a new author who is being hailed by the reviewers as somebody worth reading. With regard to popular books, the libraries purchase just as few of these as will satisfy the clamour of their subscribers. They are forced to buy, and—as every publisher knows—they buy in reluctant dribbles.

So it comes about that the libraries, although practically the sole channel between the publisher and the public, are in the nature of a bottle-neck, which expands only under great pressure. Their selective action, moreover, is exercised against the works of new writers, and also those books which, although (or because) of high literary quality, do not happen to make the public insist upon having them.

The upshot of the system is that the average novel—that is to say, a story of ordinary attractiveness, written by a man who may be fairly well known—circulates to the extent of five hundred or a thousand copies in a country with millions of readers. The number is more often nearer the lower than the higher figure.

This condition of affairs is aggravated by the fact that the circulation lasts for only two or three months in the vast majority of cases—that is to say, novels are more like items in a series of publications than like permanent books. Their evanescent character forces the librarian to keep his stock as low as possible. He knows that if he can stave off the demands for a particular book which is not very prominent, it will be forgotten in a few weeks' time. The library subscribers who persist in getting the books they select from reviews must form a very small proportion of the total. Most readers take what is given them, and if they are dissatisfied they blame the author and the publisher, and talk about the decadence of modern fiction.

As time goes on the situation is likely to get worse. It is an open secret that libraries are not a good investment, even when they are run as a sideline to a profitable business. No one "inside" the trade would be surprised to hear of even some of the large library enterprises being discontinued.

It would be interesting to speculate upon the effect of a rapid reduction in the library business. The book-trade might be put upon a more natural basis. In any case there seems little doubt that libraries are in a retrograde condition, and will continue to be so unless they adopt a new policy. Two policies are open to them—first, to increase their revenue; second, to recognise the essentially serial character of fiction and general literature, and to adopt some means of disposing of their stock at earlier dates than are now possible.

As regards the first policy new subscribers would not serve the purpose, as they increase the demand upon the resources of the library and so aggravate the trouble. If the libraries could increase their subscriptions to a material extent the position would be greatly relieved. Even though the number of subscribers were to be reduced in consequence, the libraries would be much better off. Five hundred subscribers at two guineas would be a great deal more profitable than one thousand at one guinea, and it is possible that the five hundred would find the improved service well worth the increased fee.

The suggestion that novels and kindred literary books should be treated on a serial basis strikes deeper into the complexities of the trade. Although we have abandoned the three-volume novel, we have not given up the idea that every novel is a bid for immortality and should be treated as if it were going to live for ever. Yet 999 out of every thousand novels have no more claim to such treatment than the average short story. They are evanescent; but the whole machinery of the trade is inherited from the days when they were assumed to be permanent.

What is wanted, therefore, is some means of making the life of the average novel a merry and expansive one, as well as a short one. A step towards this would be the abolition of publishing seasons. After all, it would be about as sensible to publish all the magazines in the spring and autumn as it is to rush out the mass of novels and general books at these periods. Uncounted works of merit have been swamped in these floods. If, instead of issuing twelve novels in the spring and twelve in the autumn, a publisher were to produce them at regular fortnightly intervals, just as if they were numbers of a magazine or members of a series, the arrangement would not only be more welcome to the public, but more appropriate to the character of the publications.

A natural consequence of this treatment of novels from the serial point of view would be (as already indicated) some means of clearing library stock at frequent intervals. Publishers are anxious to maintain the full published price over as long a period as possible, but they must be well aware that, for the ordinary novel, three months will cover its active life. If the libraries are obliged to keep such books on their shelves for a longer period, orders for new books will be restricted in consequence.

The extraordinary development of cheap fiction might seem to indicate that in course of time the library may become superfluous. But all the novels published in cheap form (below two shillings) have been through the bottle-neck at a higher price, and have therefore proved their chances of popularity. The libraries will probably remain until we have publishers who will not issue any books except those which offer a fair speculation at an initial low price. This would have a beneficial effect upon output (as regards the number of new novels), and would also, it is argued, make it extremely difficult for a new author to find a publisher. Perhaps, however, the last state of the new author would not be much worse than the first. Under the present library system he may not have much difficulty in finding a publisher, but he has a great deal in finding a public.

A. G. W.

[We invite discussion upon this interesting subject.—ED. THE ACADEMY.]

AGADIR AND AFTER

[CONTRIBUTED]

GERMAN papers are not much read in Britain, though just now they would repay the reading. We learn from them that the expedition organised by the Herren Mannesmann to explore the hinterland has just returned to Agadir with excellent tidings: the Sus country between the two great ranges of the Atlas mountains is a rich country yielding not only milk and honey, but "great mineral deposits of lead, copper, and iron-ore," and something more than traces of a still more precious metal. The expedition has concluded treaties with the various Shaykhs, it is added, who were delighted to welcome the honest Germans and take them, so to speak, to their bosoms, and all goes merry as a marriage-bell. The German papers are not slow to hint that they have no intention of leaving this rich and kindly country, whatever the French or English may do.

Now before exciting ourselves over this news let us put ourselves in the place of the Germans for a moment and see how the business looks to them. The first argument that suggests itself is an extraordinarily weighty argument: "Here we are," they say, "a nation of nearly seventy millions of people, increasing more rapidly than any nation in Western Europe, doomed to see hundreds of thousands of our children emigrate year after year to build up foreign empires under the American or the English flag. We want colonies for our own children, our place in the sun, and no nation and no combination of nations shall hinder us in our legitimate ambition." Behind this argument is the belief first set forth by Treitschke and other Pan-Teuton Professors that all the riches of England come from her colonies, and the further belief, by no means so ill-founded as the first, that the Germans are the best educated, the most intelligent, the most moral and virtuous race now to be found in the world. Their land-hunger, therefore, should be satisfied—shall be satisfied if mailed fists are any good—and therewith punctum; as the German Bursch or Yunker is accustomed to cry—as who should cry—"Enough chatter!"

One might object to all this that the Germans, in spite of their obvious superiority to all other peoples, have not done much with the colonies they already possess. They have land in East Africa—fertile river bottoms, rich uplands, and noble forest domains—enough to support fifty millions of Germans; and yet the colony makes no progress comparable to the progress we poor benighted Britons are making on our side of the imaginary line. Nay, one might even point out that the ablest and most energetic Germans leave German East Africa and come to settle in British East Africa as if in derision of all Pan-Teutonic and God-approved German ambitions. Such an attraction have liberty and do-as-you-please over martial ordinances and military regulations. But such empirical reasons only anger the honest Germans; East Africa is tropical, they assert, forgetting the temperate plateau of the hinterland; we want a colony like Agadir, they say—and at the back of their minds is the belief that Agadir will be a thorn in the side of England, and, in case of war, a German outpost which, well fortified, might give them a real advantage in the desperate struggle they all feel is sure to come. This belief of theirs is now beyond dispute; why else have they already built up a Fleet which, in proportion to their sea-borne commerce, is more than twice as strong as ours?

It behoves us, then, to take stock of the situation very coolly, and to consider in calm earnest what a German Agadir will mean to us in case of war with Germany, and how the German occupation of Agadir should best be met.

First of all, Agadir and the great Sus Valley behind it is eminently suited to colonisation by Europeans. All travellers and explorers assert, too, that the foot-hills of the Atlas are rich in minerals, and even if the Germans prove incapable here, as in East Africa, of utilising these natural advantages, Agadir itself is the natural port of a rich country, and can easily by means of a mole be turned into an excellent harbour.

The place lends itself still more easily to fortification. As a coaling-station, dockyard, and place d'armes for German war-vessels its value in case of war with Britain is clearly beyond computation. It commands many of our great trade-routes; it cuts our road to the Cape, and to India, and Australia; cuts, too, our road to the beef-supplies of the Argentine. Agadir is not wanted by the Germans as a colony; it is looked upon as the robber-baron of the Middle Ages looked upon Ehrenbreitstein or any other castle perched above a river or great trade-route whence he might exact toll from peaceful trading-folk.

It is just as certain as anything can be that we must not allow the Germans to go on adding ship to ship and advantage to advantage till the moment comes when they may strike with fair prospect of success. For in this duel, as they see and say, we are the vulnerable power: they have all to gain and little to lose by the struggle, we have all to lose and little to gain. One defeat on the high seas, and we should be compelled to sue for peace and pay a ransom so extravagant that the German mouth waters at the bare idea. On the other hand, if we destroyed the German Fleet we could still do Germany no damage. It is the old combat over again, they assert, between Rome and Carthage: Rome can build a Fleet as well as Carthage, and once Carthage is beaten on the seas the end of her is in sight—"Carthage, therefore, must be destroyed."

What then should we do? We should simply insist that the Germans leave Agadir, and if they don't go we should send an English cruiser there to safeguard English interests and land Jack Tars if need be. This is the strong, simple, and honest policy, and no one could carry it out better than quiet, courteous, immovable Sir Edward Grey. We must not have the Germans in Agadir commanding our trade-routes to the Cape, to India, and to Australasia. That must not be, or some Conservative orator must begin rousing England with philippics.

MUSIC

WITH the retirement of Mme. Albani from the career during which she has delighted more than a generation of the music-loving in Great Britain and other countries, but more especially in Great Britain, where she made her home, another of the remaining links is broken which bind the present age of song to the past. Mme. Albani has had as honourable a career as any in the line of the great singers, and she has enjoyed, and deserved, a measure of personal affection and respect which can seldom have been exceeded from that class of Englishmen whose fealty is, perhaps, the best worth winning. Queen Victoria was the head of her people, but she was especially the representative of this great class, and by her well-known admiration for Mme. Albani's gifts, not less than by the pleasure which she unmistakably took in her society, she represented its musical tastes with perfect justice. There is a section of society which prefers brilliancy in the temper and talents of an artist to those more solid and enduring qualities which form the base of such a reputation as that of Mme. Albani. It likes its prime-donne to be petulant; the heroines of wondrous tales of dazzled monarchs flinging rubies into their ravishing laps; the angels of audacious love-stories; the cruel queens of passion and despair. Great personal beauty has always made great singers absolutely irresistible, and the magnificence with which some have marched through life has helped to place them on the topmost pinnacle of fame.

But the multitude in which the "great heart" of the people is said to reside, the multitude more easily surrenders to a combination of admirable qualities than to the fascination of genius allied to irregularity of conduct. Musical dictionaries and biographies may be searched by those who are desirous to inquire the names of the bewitching sirens to whom allusion is here made. We shall give no hint as to their identity. But we have no hesitation in affirming that in the opposite ranks—the ranks of singers who were acclaimed as Queens of Song, hors concours, because to their distinguished gifts as vocalists they added dignity, propriety, and the lofty aim of the true artist—the name of Albani may be added to those of Jenny Lind, Clara Novello, and Thérèse Tietjens. If kings ever caressed these ladies, it was under the watchful eye of Virtue, and with their consorts in presence. A Bishop laid his mitre at the feet of Mlle. Lind, and all applauded the action save a few wretched tea-table gossips in the episcopal city. A lady, known in history as sister to one who bore one of the greatest names in English literature, used to show to her friends a locket which never left her neck; it contained two portraits—on this side the Madonna, on that Thérèse Tietjens—"Greatest among women," she was wont to cry, as she snapped the spring. Many of us have lately read in Mme. Novello's lively pages about the great and legitimate honours won by her gifts and her character, and it is within the knowledge of the youngest of us that Mme. Albani has lifted many a scone to her lips from the tartan tea-cloth at Balmoral, while the doors of every palace and deanery from Barchester to Christminster have surely opened wide to let her in.

The story we like best of those which recount the enslavement of intoxicated princes to the whims of the prime-donne of the past is that which tells how my Lord Chesterfield sent an express of four horses from Bretby to London to fetch a bottle of Bordeaux of the brand loved best by Mme. Catalani when that goddess made a moue at the nectar offered by her host. Such deeds of courtesy are not common in this ruder age. They belonged to the nineteenth century, especially to its earlier years, when goddesses were goddesses and gentlemen were gentlemen. Last year the polite young King of Portugal telegraphed to Scotland for grouse to be brought to Cinton by the hand of a special messenger, the better to entertain the Ambassador who came to announce the accession of King George, it being the month of August. But even this delicate action cannot rival the coach and four from Bretby, and more attention, we fear, is like to be paid nowadays to an Ambassador or some great man than to a hard-working prima-donna. We might, indeed, imagine Mr. Carnegie sending to Edinburgh for some rare snuff, to come by post, for a librarian, but would he send an express to Montreuil for a peach for Mme. Melba? Young Trotter of the Fencibles may still occasionally ruin himself over some fair dancer from the musical comedy stage, though that is commoner among his kind in France or Italy; but the age when the supreme mistresses of song could mould the nobility of England as a potter moulds his clay, that brilliant day is done, and the age of common sense as regards the prima-donna is arrived. We criticise the prima-donna now instead of asking to be allowed to kiss her slipper. We admit that she dresses well, but there is something to be desired about her middle register; her high notes are exquisitely fluty, but the shawl she wore in the "Traviata" was impossible; her passion as Isolde was thrilling, but what a bad arm she has, and why is she always waving it about? This one is as feline as she is serpentine in "Salome," but she does not understand the proper curvature of Strauss's music in the least; that one warbles Juliet delightfully; but then she does not act, and as regards age were more fit to play the Nurse!

It was not so in younger days, even at so late a date as that summer when dear little Emma Albani first drew all the town to hear her fresh carolling in "Somnambula" at Covent Garden. These houris of the opera were all Fotheringays to the musical Pendennises. A few grumblers, like old Edward Fitzgerald, there must always have been, but the good sense of the majority looked at the pretty face and the slim figure, and the graceful ways, and listened to the enchanting nightingale or lark (Tietjens was like a thrush), without cavilling at this or that note, or the colour of the gown. In one way the change of attitude towards the efforts of the prima-donna is noteworthy, for, compared with the last century, the trees of music are but thinly peopled by the more glorious-voiced birds, and it might have been thought that the listeners below would have crowded in ecstasy, with no mind for depreciating, when they get the chance of hearing the rarer warblers. Are we cleverer in music than our fathers, or only more conceited and censorious? When Mme. Albani first appeared (we remember it well, though our age was yet tender, as well as Charles Lamb remembered Mrs. Blend in "Artaxerxes"), what a choir of singers there was! such a choir as the later generation can form no conception of. Patti, Christine Nilsson, Tietjens, Pauline Lucca, Trebelli, Scalchi, Ilma di Murzka, Sherrington, darling little Zaré Thalberg, all in London at the same moment; and if you went abroad there were great Krauss in Paris, and Materna and Thérèse Matten and others in Germany. What would the youngsters not think of such singers now, could one of them return, or an equal successor arrive? Yet did Albani take her place at once among these divinities, in right of her beautiful voice and unaffected charm. Later she undertook oratorio and succeeded immediately to the seat shared by Tietjens and Sherrington. Now it was that she began to take that firm grip of the heart of that Great Middle Class to which we began by alluding. But as her photograph came to decorate the chimney-piece of every parsonage drawing-room in England, so it began to disappear from the piano-tail of the Covent Garden stallholder. It is only the middle-aged who remember Mme. Albani as the operatic star, the Isolde and Eva to Jean de Reszké's Tristan and Walther, the Desdemona to Tamagno's Othello. Ah! those were days when the joys of the preceding decade were sustained by those unforgettable evenings, and, though it is not necessary to claim for Mme. Albani a place so high as that occupied by Jenny Lind, there were not a few good judges who regretted her change from the stage to the platform even as, thirty years previously, sighs had gone up when the Swedish lady set the example which the Canadian followed.

The future of both opera and oratorio in Great Britain is uncertain. Opera seems more likely to survive, but if it does, we may predict without much fear that its prime-donne will never again enjoy those special seats of the mighty, encrusted with jewels, and with a faldstool in front, which once were theirs. The party which prefers excellence of ensemble and regard for detail to the outstanding enchantment of one particular singer is growing in influence. The chef d'orchestre of to-day, and the musical manager, have no inclination to submit to the whims of a soprano. Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Percy Pitt would quickly show a prima-donna her place if she sought to impose her will upon them. We are sure that Mme. Albani never descended from the reasonable dignity of her position to set an intrigue on foot or add to the troubles of an impresario. She leaves behind her an unsullied reputation as a great singer and a good woman, one who thought of her art before herself, and ever studied that she might be the minister of music as a divine agency to the millions of honest hearts which it was her business and her delight to elevate and to charm.

THE MAGAZINES

WITH its present number the Hibbert Journal opens its tenth volume, and our congratulations are offered to our contemporary in very cordial terms. There have been few successes in journalism during the last ten years quite so remarkable as this of the Hibbert Journal. When one regards the nature of the articles it habitually offers, and the sometimes quite appalling technical aspect of them, the assumption would have been that such a journal was foredoomed to failure. Yet here it is, successful as few things have been, and with a success that increases steadily. While proffering our congratulations to Messrs. Williams and Norgate, the publishers, and to Mr. Jacks, the editor, we would include as a matter of special mention the contents of this present number. We are not at all desirous of seeming to be worshippers of mere names; but there are certain persons in literature who inevitably connote distinction of thought. And when a review contains, among others, such articles as "Creative Evolution and Philosophic Doubt," by Mr. Balfour; "Life and Consciousness," by Henri Bergson; "The Christian Mystery," by Loisy; "Greek and Christian Piety at the End of the Third Century," by Adolf Harnack; "The Apocalyptic Element in the Gospels," by Professor Sanday; "Is There One Science of Nature?" by Professor J. Arthur Thomson; and "Revelation and Bible," by Principal Forsyth—the mere mention of names and subjects is complete and conclusive.

Naturally the article that ranks chiefly is that by Mr. Balfour. There are politicians who would contend that Mr. Balfour is a mistake in the political field. There are also those who arrive at this same conclusion, and, with philosophic majesty moving in their veins, feel contempt for the basenesses inalienable from politics. Therefore to read Mr. Balfour in analysis of M. Bergson is stimulating. Some passages in this present article define the Bergsonian system, and place some of the leading matters that it lies to the responsibility of its author yet to resolve, as succinctly and as simply as any short study that we remember having read. M. Bergson's own contribution to the number is his lecture delivered at the University of Birmingham in May of this year. The other articles are, in their way, not less interesting, particularly that by Professor Thomson.

In the pages of the Quest there is almost the same surety of good things, though of an even yet rarer order, as in the Hibbert Journal. Mr. Conybeare has a detailed examination of the great Manichaean heresy in an article which he entitles "The Religion of Mani." Mr. H. A. Dallas, in his article "The Trend of Psychical Research," passes in review a number of instances of psychic agency of profound interest. It is one of the most extraordinary evidences of the restricting influences of modern—or rather, a nineteenth-century, and rapidly passing—science that well-established instances such as these should be refused a hearing. One may well consider many of such "supernatural solicitings" as an illicit intercourse; but that is quite another matter to scoffing at them. One of the most interesting articles from the literary point of view is that by Mr. Wicksteed on "The So-called 'Madness' of William Blake," which takes as its text some of the remarks by Mr. Chesterton in his recent book on Blake. And, speaking of Mr. Chesterton, there is an article by him in the little monthly, The Open Road, on "The Dulness of New Religions," which is worth reading, though we have read better things from the same pen.

In the Fortnightly Review we have the usual scissors-and-paste contributions by Messrs. Francis Gribble and Walter Sichel. Their ingenuity in finding subjects is certainly rather remarkable. Yet these are only the framework into which a good deal of much more interesting matter is fitted. Foremost among these is an article—the first, apparently, of a series on the same subject—on "Death," by Maurice Maeterlinck, who, by the way, we understand, is this year to receive the Nobel prize for literature. Beginning with a quotation from Marie Leneru, he proceeds to examine the nature of Death, and in the course of his study he, somewhat artificially, we think, yet perhaps for salutary reasons, disengages death from its frequent concomitants of suffering and terror. It is excellent to see him insisting, as all minds have found cause to insist, on the impossibility of personal annihilation. The late Universal Races Congress has stirred Lord Avebury into an article on "International Problems," which very largely resolves itself into an examination of the publication of the "Papers on Inter-racial Problems communicated to the First Universal Races Congress, held at the University of London, in July, 1911, edited by Dr. G. Spiller;" in his examination he maintains a very detached attitude. Probably, however, the chief interest will centre in Vernon Lee's article, "M. Sorel and the 'Syndicalist Myth.'" It deserves careful and intelligent perusal. Syndicalism is now actively invading England, and so is becoming a factor in social economy that cannot be neglected. But in England it is taking its own and independent forms. Indeed, it is clear from Vernon Lee's article that M. Sorel would somewhat emphatically deny that it was Syndicalism at all, although it is obvious that it dates from that source of thinking. Even as Socialism in England took the form of Fabianism, so the English Trade Unionist is endeavouring to translate—or rather subconsciously and without endeavour is translating—Syndicalism pragmatically. And it is not till one has read M. Sorel himself, or, failing that, this interpretation of him and his philosophy, that it is possible to realise how separate and distinct a thing it is.

In the Nineteenth Century the article that we naturally turned first to was by Miss Emily Hickley, boldly entitled "Glorious Robert Browning." It is a simple article, with neither distinction of style nor matter; yet its subject and the writer's enthusiasm lift it in a degree of interest that does not actually lie in its own capability. She declares: "It is not a very uncommon thing to hear cultured men and women say, 'Browning is the only poet I care for';" and how true this is may be proved by any one who cares to make inquiry. But the fact conveys a very salutary check to those who, in the face of all example, continue to demand of poetry that it be simply pellucid and obvious. "When Florence was the Capital," by Lady Paget, makes interesting reading; but a profoundly engaging article, perhaps the best in the magazine, is by Captain Mark Kerr, entitled "How Nelson's Memorandum was Carried Out at Trafalgar." It is illustrated with plans. On the same lines Dr. Fitchett has an article in the Cornhill, entitled "Waterloo as Napoleon Saw It," which picks out some of the salient features very deftly. In the same magazine Mr. A. J. C. Benson writes of Matthew Arnold in an article that adds nothing to our knowledge.

In Blackwood's, Miss G. L. Bell, of "Amurath to Amurath" fame, sheds a necessary and authoritative light on the present condition of Asiatic Turkey, under the heading, "Asiatic Turkey under the Constitution," and Moira O'Neill writes of "The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson." It is not often that one may discover a literary article in Mind though in a sense it is true that most of the articles are that. But "Aristophanes and Socrates," by Mr. Petrie, is decidedly of that colour, and deeply interesting withal. So also is Mr. Mackenzie on the relations of "Mind and Body."

SOME INDIAN REVIEWS

"THE MOSLEM WORLD"

THE Moslem World, the quarterly review issued by the Christian Literary Society for India, represents the highest modern thought of Missions to Mohammedanism, and the October number is, as usual, replete with articles which even the Bishop of London, who has lately enunciated his opinions on Islam, might study to increase his knowledge. Professor Buhl, of Copenhagen, writes on "The Character of Mohammed as a Prophet," a subject that has attracted many inquirers, and will occupy many more. It is a historic problem, as the editor says, concerning which there have been many conjectures and opinions. The system of Islam is based, he writes, not only upon the Koran, which, to Moslems, consists of the verbal revelation of God's will, but upon Tradition, which is the revelation of God's will for man by the example of the perfect prophet. Tradition interprets the Koran, and not the Koran Tradition; but religious and political factions are not above inventing traditions for party purposes. The apotheosis of Mohammed, based on later tradition, and giving him an almost divine character, compels all Moslems to defend every episode in his life, or to eliminate and ignore those of which they are ashamed. In the Koran and the earliest sources Mohammed is thoroughly human and liable to error. In a paper entitled "Islam not a Stepping-stone Towards Christianity," the antagonism between the two faiths is clearly demonstrated. "Islam has much to offer to the pagan, whose superstitions and heathenism have made him a slave to darkness, and a ready captive to lust." The difficulty experienced in India in converting Mohammedans to Islam is proverbial. "The Doctrine of the Unity in Trinity" is another paper, offered as a reply to Mohammedan objections, and an essay in Philosophic Apology. "A General Survey of the Moslem World," which formed the opening address of the Lucknow Conference, and is here reproduced, is an article of wide range, and valuable in several respects—statistical, political, social, and intellectual movements. The estimates of the total number of Mohammedans in the world vary between 175 and 260 millions, of whom ninety-five millions are under British rule (including sixty-three millions in India), whereas less than thirty-eight millions live under Moslem rule. In singling out the factors of the problem of Islam for each country the editor claims for India the opportunity to reach Islam. The reviews, notes on present-day movements, literature, and current topics are up to date, and most useful. This number completes the first annual volume, which all missionaries and many others will be glad to possess as containing a mine of information.

"THE HINDUSTAN REVIEW"

In the Hindustan Review for September, the article on "Energism in the Orient," by Professor Paul Reinsch, bears fresh testimony to the awakening of new national forces, and a great stirring of social life, not only in India, where Hinduism is becoming aggressive, but also in peaceful China, the land of non-assertion, which is fast becoming military; while the ideal of national energy, efficiency, and strength expresses itself in all public utterances. The literary evangel of the new national faith is found in the writings of Wang Yang Ming, the Chinese soldier-philosopher. A rejoinder by an Indian civilian to a previous article by Mr. Gokhale appears to admit the correctness of the four requisites of improved relations on an enduring basis between Europeans and Indians which that gentleman advanced. There ought, therefore, to be no difficulty in arriving at practical results. The article "Wanted: a New Policy in Egypt," by "An Egyptian," might be commended to Lord Kitchener for perusal. He would doubtless know how to treat it, and the writer (at present anonymous). "As an Indian Sees America," by Saint Nihal Singh, is as incisive and amusing as his papers often are. His observations are curious and minute. At a theatre he took out his watch and noted the duration of a kiss in a particular scene. He timed it as lasting four minutes and thirty-five seconds. If he ever returns to America one would like to hear how he is received. How can he know that "The American tosses and turns in his bed—restless; or, if he sleeps, his rest is disturbed with horrible dreams"? This is rather poor stuff. A long article on the new "Encyclopædia Britannica" appears rather late in the day. We lately called attention to the delay in this journal in the notices of books. This has to some extent been remedied. The "Topics of the Day" and "Criticism, Discourses, and Comments" afford glimpses of the Indian mind—to those who have time to read them.

"THE COLLEGIAN"

We have received the first number of The Collegian, "an All-Indian Journal of University and Technical Education," published in Calcutta on October 1st, to be continued fortnightly. Its avowed purpose is to furnish systematically the educational news of India, especially of the Indian Universities and higher education in general. The Editor designates it "a higher Education Gazette of India." It is intended also to be an organ of the student and the teaching community of India, and to contain articles and contributions from eminent specialists on education; it is also to publish selections from educational, literary, and scientific periodicals. The journal is well arranged under different headings—the Universities, Government Educational News, Colleges, Technical Education, &c. It gives notices of many educational matters of Indian local interest, and will be a convenient record of occurrences in the educational world of India.

Out of India the journal will be useful as showing in a compact form what is happening in education in that country, besides the tendencies of educational progress, reform, thought, and influence. Several interesting matters may be gleaned from this number. The Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University stated in a speech that Indian Universities are anxious to act as centres of stability, moral, social, and political; that they view it as a supreme duty to strengthen the bond which connects India and Great Britain. The extension of the Presidency College to accommodate Physical and Biological Departments and provide spacious laboratories will remove an old reproach. As the Mohammedans are establishing a separate Moslem University, so the Hindus are making great efforts to organise a Hindu University, to be erected at Benares, not only to teach Hindu and Sanskrit subjects, but also to promote general education and "the building up of character in youth by making religion and ethics an integral part of education." It is not stated whether the Government have allowed the project. The most welcome information is the account of the opening of the Bengal Government Agricultural College, near one of the principal country towns in a healthy locality. Its object is the dissemination of agricultural knowledge throughout the country, in the hope that the students issuing from the College will take to agriculture. They are to be eligible for service only in the Agricultural Department: there is already an indication of a desire to utilise it for admission into the higher Government service. Some variety is afforded by a paper on monastic education in Ceylon; and plenty of food for thought is provided in a disquisition on "The Philosophy of Religion," a stiff subject! The first number shows considerable promise, and is acceptable for the reasons above given.

THE BREWERS' EXHIBITION

A VISIT to the Brewers' Exhibition at the Agricultural Hall is calculated to open the eyes of the outsider who imagines that the brewing of sparkling ale is a rather elementary matter. From the wonderful machine that can wash 3,400 bottles per hour (shown by Messrs. Wannbacher), at one end of the Hall, to the enormous 800 barrel brewing-copper of Messrs. Ramsden and Son, at the other, modern science and chemistry of the most advanced description are called into operation. The whole area is a maze of complicated machinery, a revel of steel and brass beings, we had almost called them, alive with motion and performing actions that seem full of intelligence. Take, for instance, the amazing apparatus for putting labels on bottles, shown by the Purdy American Machinery Company. In a most uncanny fashion steel arms and fingers seize the label, lift the bottle, place the label in position, and stick it on with a final pat and caress—all in a second or two. Another machine at the same stand affixes capsules as quickly as the operator can feed it; with a couple of affectionate squeezes—an india-rubber embrace as it were—the capsule is forced tightly round the neck of the bottle, and directly the bottle is removed the machine stops dead. It is as though the instant the extraordinary thing caught a glimpse of its prey its jaws opened to devour.

Further along the Hall is the famous Pontifex chilling plant, with a capacity of 100 barrels a day: and when we remember that one barrel equals twenty-four dozen imperial pints the utility becomes obvious. The largest carbonating copper ever made is on exhibition—a formidable-looking affair for its kindly office, which is merely to suffuse the liquid with that sparkle and lightness so desirable and refreshing. Huge malt mills are displayed by the Seck Engineering Company, in action, and many quieter exhibits—such as the charming heather-adorned stand of the British Syphon Manufacturing Company—vary the attractions of the Hall.

And all this immense accumulation of ingenuity, this application of the latest discoveries in mechanics, in science, in chemistry, to cater for the thirst of the normal Briton! "He that can master his thirst is master of his health," says the French proverb; it certainly seems that with marvellously little trouble and expenditure, considering the thousands of pounds which these brewing plants represent, the most exigent craving of all might easily be mastered—even that "somewhere east of Suez" thirst of which Kipling sings. And if we are not yet experts in the art of concocting those weird drinks with unholy names which the modern Yankee is supposed to delight in—those throat-ticklers, bosom-caressers, and sudden deaths—we can at any rate make a good show on this side of the Atlantic with "refreshers" that are perhaps not quite as flamboyant, but are certainly more healthy and natural.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS

Our poets have been at work. This is good. We reviewed a volume by Lord Alfred Douglas last week. We have now to welcome a collection of the works of "The" Poet, as Mr. Alfred Trench is called by a select circle of admiring ladies. It is amazing, when we come to think of it, how congenial to writing of poetry is the atmosphere of a Government office. Mr. Trench was for many years one of the Examiners of the Board of Education, just as Mr. Austin Dobson is the bright particular star of the Board of Trade. At one time Mr. Dobson twinkled in the same murky firmament as did Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse. It is not generally known that the late W. S. Gilbert wrote many of his "Bab Ballads" on paper headed with the Board of Education stamp. He sat as a temporary clerk in a large, unmistakably airy room overlooking Whitehall with red tape, both metaphorical and actual, all about him. Men in such places as Government offices must be driven to poetry as a relief. They employ it as a safety-valve. "The Forest of Wild Thyme," by Mr. Alfred Noyes, published by Blackwood and Co., is particularly welcome. We look forward to the day, not far distant, when we shall have in our hands the amazing and versatile Mr. G. K. Chesterton's collected verses. If half a dozen of them are as fine and ringing as his poem called "Lepanto," which appeared in last week's Eye-Witness, it will be a well-thumbed book.

In Blackwood and Co.'s particularly interesting list we are glad to find novels by Mr. Ian Hay, whose "Pip" was excellent, Mr. L. Cope Cornford, who has a dozen stirring stories to his credit, Mr. Arthur Brebner, who belongs to the Stevenson school, Mr. E. Douglas Hume, and Miss Edith Sinclair. Mr. Brebner's title, "Patches and Pomander," is charming, and suggests high-heel shoes and sedan-chairs and link-boys and all the other appurtenances of the days of our Stuart Kings.

Appropriately enough, Mr. John Murray publishes "The Navy League Annual" on Trafalgar Day, and a very valuable and unique volume it will be found. The editor Mr. Alan Burgoyne, M.P., has not only included a complete record of naval progress during the past year at home and abroad and much information of the very latest ship designs obtainable in no other text-book, but full descriptions and plans of the newest Dreadnoughts and battleship-cruisers, protected cruisers, scouts, destroyers, and submarines. There will be also articles by Mr. Maurice Prendergast on "The Evolution of Ship Types," Mr. Charles Bright on "Imperial and Strategic Telegraphy," Mr. Frank W. B. Hambling on "The Aeroplane in Naval Warfare," and Commander Caius Crutchley, R.N.R., on "The Menace of Armed Merchantmen." Mr. E. B. Eyres-Monsell, R.N., M.P., writes on "The Declaration of London," Monsieur T. B. Gautreau on "French Naval Development," and the Hon. Gerard Fiennes on "Sensitive Points in British Sea Power;" while "The Future of Russia in the Mediterranean" is by Nicholas Portugaloff. Mr. Burgoyne is doing splendid work year after year by the compilation of this annual, and his own contributions on "Comparative Naval Strength" and "The Evolution of the Dreadnought Type" will be well worth studying.

"Partridges and Partridge Manors," by Captain Aymer Maxwell, who is, we believe, a son of Sir Herbert Maxwell (illustrations by Mr. George Rankin), is announced by A. and C. Black. To landowners and sportsmen there are few subjects more interesting than the economic value of partridge manors, the natural history and life of the partridge, the gradual evolution of modern methods of preservation, and the work of the gamekeeper throughout the year. Captain Maxwell goes fully into the tactics of driving and the ways of shooting the partridge. He further includes in his book a series of notes on preservation and management, written by many authorities from all parts of the country, which will form a very valuable summary of how shootings are managed under widely different conditions.

From A. and C. Black we recently received Mr. C. Lewis Hind's "The Consolations of a Critic," a sequel to his "Education of an Artist." "Claude Williamson Black" therefore reappears; no doubt to the secret satisfaction of all the artists who have already made his acquaintance he renounces writing for painting, his first love. A book of very great interest to all lovers of winter sports in the Alps is Mr. Reginald Clever's "A Winter Sport Book," which will contain a number of his best drawings. The Head Master of Eton has supplied an Introduction. It will be a new experience for a Head Master to be criticised. We have no doubt that we shall be able to give him high marks.

Mr. Ernest A. Vizetelly has chosen a new and curiously fascinating subject for his new book. Turning from Emile Zola, who was something of an anarchist in literature, he has utilised his observation during forty years of journalism of the revolutionary movements of political sects at home and abroad, and written a book called "The Anarchists: their Record and their Creed." It goes without saying that he has dealt largely with the teaching and efforts of Michael Bakunin, the Father of Anarchism. The deeds—the horrible deeds—are set down of all militant anarchists with historical precision, relieved by vivid anecdotal touches based on the author's personal recollections of one or other victim or assassin. Mr. John Lane is the publisher. From Mr. Lane we are to have a new novel by Mr. Arthur H. Adams, called "A Touch of Fantasy," a romance for those who are lucky enough to wear glasses. The title is a little suggestive of Mr. J. M. Barrie; but those who remember this author's "Galahad Jones," in which the podgy bank clerk was suddenly smitten with the forty feeling on his seaside holiday, will know that Mr. Adams belongs to no school.

How Mr. Hilaire Belloc finds time to write books is one of the great mysteries of the world. Not content with editing a weekly journal, much of which he appears to write himself, and all the rest of which he obviously inspires, he delivers addresses, sings his own songs, and argues for hours with Mr. Chesterton, and plays a fair game of billiards and writes poems. Nevertheless, he has added to his ever-lengthening list of printed volumes one called "British Battles"—the first of a series. He takes some of our famous battles, beginning with Blenheim, and treats them in monograph form, with maps, adding the political circumstances which led up to each one. They are to be published by Stephen Swift and Co., whose list becomes more and more stimulating.

Mr. H. H. Penrose's new novel deals with the difficulties of a young wife during the absence of her husband on foreign service, a subject which requires a tactful as well as a brave and sympathetic pen. The book is called "A Sheltered Woman," so we trust that, whatever may be the difficulties of other young wives in such circumstances, they do not put her to any great perturbation. Alston Rivers and Co. are the publishers.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS TROUBLED CHINA

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE situation in China is critical. At the time of writing it is impossible to predict with any degree of certitude what will happen in the future. Communications are interrupted, and so far no account worthy of being called a narrative of the events that led up to the revolution, or of those now taking place, has been received. It is known, however, that the insurrection is proceeding on a scale far greater than that of any previous rising in China of a similar nature; that the rebels are exhibiting a wise and far-seeing policy in doing all in their power to protect foreign residents and interests; that the widespread disaffection of the Army has given them military support; and that in consequence of the capture of the Hangyang arsenal they are for the moment well equipped with arms and ammunition. Nevertheless, it is still a long and hazardous march to Peking, and apparently the Imperial authorities hold the seven hundred miles of railway between Hankow, where the main forces of the revolutionaries appear to be now concentrated, and the capital. The recall of Yuan Shih-kai and his acceptance of high office is a dramatic development in the situation. Hitherto Yuan, in spite of tempting offers, has persistently refrained from lending his powerful aid to a distressful Government. Doubtless he anticipated that the time would come when the state of China would demand his return on terms he could himself lay down, and events have proved that he has not erred in his judgment. Whether he succeeds or not in the stupendous task which he has undertaken solely depends upon the loyalty of the troops at his disposal. It cannot be denied that the prestige of his name and personality will go a long way towards stemming disloyalty; but at the same time it must not be forgotten that he has been more than a year away from the scene of action, that from end to end the land is weary of Manchu tyranny and ripe for revolution, and that the rebels have already achieved substantial successes. Yuan is an ambitious man. Indeed, it was largely on account of fear of his growing power that the Government decided upon so drastic a measure as his summary dismissal from office. If he suppresses the revolution then it is not unlikely that he will relegate the Regency to the background and constitute himself Dictator of the Realm. In that event his record as an enlightened reformer promises well. But the question naturally arises as to whether Yuan the Dictator would be as progressive as Yuan the ambitious statesman intriguing for power and place?

YUAN SHIH-KAI.

Yuan Shih-kai was not of aristocratic origin, a fact which goes to show that conservative China has learnt the lesson of true democracy. We first hear of him as occupying the important post of Director-General of Trade and International Relations in Korea at a time when the disagreement arose between his country and Japan concerning their respective rights in the Peninsular Kingdom. This disagreement, it will be remembered, culminated in the China-Japanese war. But it is to the year 1898 that we must turn in order to find his real advent into the political destinies of his country, for it was then that he was placed in command of an army corps in the metropolitan province of Chih-li. Kuang Hsu, almost entirely under the sway of the Empress-Dowager, made a gallant effort to assert the Imperial authority. He summoned round him men who held advanced views, chief among whom was Kang Yu-wei—the "Modern Sage," as he was known to his countrymen. Under the influence of this truly remarkable man the young Emperor issued a series of edicts which, had they been promulgated, would have revolutionised the national polity. A Court, cleavage was the immediate result, and the Emperor, fearing active opposition from his Imperial aunt, who was, of course, supported by the whole of the reactionary party, sent orders to General Yuan Shih-kai to concentrate his forces in and around the capital. For reasons which to this day form the subject of argument, Yuan Shih-kai, disregarding these orders, revealed the Emperor's plans to the Empress, who promptly effected the famous coup d'état which gave her the supreme power, and reduced her well-meaning nephew to the position of a puppet.

During the Boxer Rebellion of 1900 Yuan Shih-kai again distinguished himself. At the time the province of Shantung, where the trouble originated, was governed by the notorious Yu-hsien, a Manchu of the worst reactionary type. His policy has led to the slaughter of large numbers of native Christians, and when eventually a foreign missionary was done to death by the Boxers, the diplomatic body in Peking insisted upon the withdrawal and degradation of Yu-hsien and the substitution of a more enlightened man. Although his degradation was not carried into effect, he was forthwith removed, and Yuan Shih-kai, probably as a reward for his action during the coup d'état, succeeded to the post. A piquant illustration of the manner in which the new Governor dealt with the insurrection was given by Mr. Charles Denby, at one time Consul-General for the United States in Shanghai:—

When Yuan (he said) went to Shantung to replace the previous Governor he took his foreign-drilled troops with him. He had had some experience as Chinese Resident in Korea, and he had gained from the China-Japan war some knowledge of the meaning of foreign methods and of the value to be attached to foreign goodwill. Upon his arrival at the capital of his province he was called upon by a committee of prominent Boxer leaders, who proceeded to explain their doctrines to him, and to impress upon the new Governor their claims to invulnerability. Yuan listened to them with apparent respect, congratulated them upon their supernatural powers, and ended by inviting them to dine with him, and meet some of the notable people of the province. It is needless to say that the Boxers were pleased with the impression they had made, and they promptly accepted the invitation. Before the feast was over Yuan had brought the conversation round to a discussion of the mysterious Boxer powers, and stated that a demonstration of their claims would not only be beneficial to the Boxers themselves, but would set at rest an apparent want of confidence which he had noticed amongst some of the leading people of his province. He then invited the committee to step out on to the parade-ground, where the demonstration would take place. The unfortunate committee were lined up against a wall, notwithstanding their protests, where they found themselves confronted by a squad of foreign-drilled riflemen from the camp at Hsiao-chan. The word "Fire" was given, every member of the committee fell dead, and it is stated that this demonstration of the Boxer claims was a material factor in keeping the province of Shantung in order throughout the remaining period of the uprising.

It must not, however, be supposed that in taking measures to suppress the uprising, which undoubtedly enjoyed Imperial sanction, Yuan Shih-kai alienated the Imperial favour. Herein he showed his astuteness. When the Empress-Dowager and the Court forsook the Forbidden City and fled before the allied forces of the Powers, Yuan Shih-kai succeeded in establishing communication with the Imperial fugitives and in supplying them with much-needed funds. That his attitude on this occasion had merited the highest approval was shown subsequently when, in 1901, he was appointed Viceroy of the metropolitan province of Chih-li. It was during his official residence in the Viceregal Yamen at Tientsin that a friend of mine met this great administrator:—

The occasion (my friend described) was the first reception which he had given to Europeans. Although we were a limited number of guests, there were not a sufficient number of carriages in the town to convey us to the Yamen. Consequently, while some went in 'ricshas, not a few cycled and walked. The route from the foreign settlement lay along a well-lighted and broad bund by the side of the winding Peiho. At intervals of every few yards gendarmes were stationed, and as we passed by, with true Chinese courtesy, they brought their rifles to the salute. After a drive of nearly two miles we crossed a bridge, and a few moments later reached the Yamen. There was nothing pretentious or palatial about the residence of the Viceroy. On entering the main gateway, a ponderous structure of wood, we were met by a number of attendants, who led us past a guard of honour and through a series of gateways and outer courtyards to the main reception-hall. Here we were received by a mandarin, who conducted us to the audience-chamber in the centre of which, seated on a plain blackwood chair, was the Viceroy. A thick-set, powerful figure of medium height, with a round bullet head from which shone a pair of piercing dark eyes, he gave one the impression of the old type of Chinese warrior rather than of the courtly statesman one is accustomed to meet in official circles in the capital. The Viceroy, although credited with some knowledge of the written language, spoke very little English. Consequently the audience was very brief, and in the case of those who were unable to speak Chinese was limited to a mere hand-shake. At one end of the chamber there was a substantially-built theatre, richly decorated with gilt and gorgeous hangings. During the whole of the reception a play was in progress to the accompaniment of weird Chinese music, the clashing of cymbals, and the beating of pigskin drums. The Chinese classics and the stirring deeds of Manchu warriors in past ages provided themes for illustration, and the parts of bearded knights and fair maidens were alike taken by youths whose ages ranged from twelve to sixteen. After leaving the audience-chamber we were conducted by mandarins dressed in richly coloured silks and wearing peacock feathers in their hats to another room, where the scene was in strange contrast to that which we had just left. Here from two long tables lavish hospitality was dispensed in European style. Subsequently in a terraced garden where pagodas loomed against the sky and quaint stone bridges cast their shadows on a lake silvered by the moonlight we witnessed a display of fireworks and listened to the melodies of the West as interpreted by a band of uniformed Chinese musicians, a band which was originally in the service of Li Hung-chang.

Many and far-reaching were the reforms instituted by Yuan Shih-kai during his residence in Tientsin as Viceroy of Chih-li, and his progressive influence gained rapidly in the capital itself. He established Universities at Tientsin and Pao-ting Fu, and engaged staffs of foreign teachers to fill the more responsible positions. In the former city he thoroughly reorganised the municipal government, and was directly responsible for such modern innovations as electric lighting, electric trams, waterworks, and sanitation. But it was not alone in the domain of civil reform than Yuan Shih-kai proved himself to be so capable an administrator, for he also established an enduring reputation as an efficient military commander and organiser. Under penalty of severe punishment he forbade his soldiers to smoke opium, thus improving their physique and morale; while by remitting their pay regularly, instead of transferring it to his own pocket—a time-honoured custom in China—he ensured their efficiency and loyalty. That he possessed an enlightened appreciation of the necessity for thoroughness, and, in this respect, a wholesome sensitiveness to foreign criticism, was shown during the autumn manoeuvres held at Ho-chien Fu in 1905, when he issued the following characteristic order to his troops:—

The degree of skill and completeness of each regiment will be recorded and preserved by the Board of War, and published to the world, and according to your forthcoming performances, will be the object of other nations' admiration or contempt. Let not these foreigners have occasion to laugh at us, or despise us for lack of military capacity. Do not you soldiers be the cause of your Government uselessly spending the immense sums necessitated by these manoeuvres. Any regiment or military unit making a spectacle of itself or causing the foreigners to laugh at them, will be severely punished, and the officers degraded. Take note of my instructions, and let them be carefully obeyed.

Yuan Shih-kai retained his Viceregal post in the metropolitan province until September, 1908, when he was summoned to the capital and appointed a member of the Grand Council and of the Foreign Office. During the term of his Viceroyalty Yuan Shih-kai, as the principal adviser to the Empress, was faced with the arduous task of endeavouring to reconcile the conflicting demands of the two great parties in the land. On the one hand he had to deal with the greed, the prejudice, and the corruption of the official reactionary party, opposed as it was to any policy of progress, and on the other he had to keep in check and at the same time to placate the ambitions of the Young China party—ambitions the real end and aim of which were the overthrow of the dynasty. It is little wonder therefore that when he was called to the capital he became immediately the object of sinister intrigue. In spite of all opposing influences, however, he succeeded in maintaining his ascendancy in the Councils of the State until the early part of 1909, when, at one stroke, as it were, death removed from the scene his Imperial mistress and her hapless nephew.

The Regent had not long assumed the reins of government when the long and persevering machinations of the Manchu reactionaries culminated in the downfall of Yuan Shih-kai. Since that momentous event, although new forms have been instituted, little real progress has been made in the methods of the Administration. In this respect the following extract from an article which I contributed to the Fortnightly Review as far back as March, 1910 faithfully depicts the position of affairs as it exists to-day:—

So long, however, as bribery and corruption prevail in the central Administration in Peking, it is clear that no attempt at serious reform can succeed. Meanwhile, the younger generation is rapidly acquiring enlightened views, and with this knowledge has come a widespread and genuine interest in the welfare of the nation. Whether or not the so-called progressive spirit that is undoubtedly manifesting itself among the masses will be directed along the lines of wisdom, or whether it will seek, while still condemning the incompetence and dishonesty of the Central Government, to lay the burden of the blame for the ills that afflict the land indiscriminately upon the shoulders of all foreigners, is a matter for deep concern. More than one authority acquainted with the situation has ventured to predict that the near future holds many disturbing elements, and are anxious lest these disturbing elements should manifest themselves in a revolt against the dynasty, a revolt, moreover, that might conceivably involve outbreaks of an anti-foreign nature. The jealousy of the Powers renders to-day as hopeless as ever any prospect of an international agreement that would save the situation. Great Britain, if she does not frankly subscribe to the policy of Japan, gives at least tacit support to that policy by her diplomatic silence. In spite of her reverses in the late war, Russia is still powerful in the north, and by building the Amur Railway is paving the way for a further increase of her prestige, if not of her possessions, in the Far East. The United States alone has raised her voice in favour of the maintenance of the Open Door policy in Manchuria, and all her preparations go to show that she is determined that this voice shall not be heard in vain. Sufficient has been written to show that the passing of Yuan Shih-kai from the scene at a time when China was in one of the most critical periods of her history has been followed by grave consequences, the ultimate end of which no man can foresee. Rumour has ascribed to the Regent an eager desire for the recall of the great statesman, but so far he has not been induced to emerge from retirement. For the past decade China has been in a state of slow transition. Wars, disturbances, and famine have clouded her reason, and men have risen and fallen. In a land where the ways of diplomacy are devious, it is not saying too much that Yuan Shih-hai the fallen of yesterday may be the uplifted of to-day.

MOTORING

It will be welcome news to motorists that at last there is to be a serious effort made by the Automobile Association and Motor Union to improve hotel arrangements where motorists are concerned. As is generally known, for several years every town of any importance in the country has contained hotels which have been dignified by official "appointments" from one or other of the big motoring organisations, but it is to be feared that such appointments have in many cases been conferred in a somewhat haphazard manner. However that may be, complaints from motorists of inattention, inadequate accommodation, and excessive charges at these establishments have been so frequent that the committee of the A.A. and M.U. have determined to at once institute a vigorous

A NEW FACTOR IN MOTORING.

The best is generally good enough for most people; but generally most people are lamentably unsuccessful in getting the best. How, for example, may the motorist get the best tyre? It is the matter of moment to him; but only the costly experiment will answer the question satisfactorily.

If he could exhaustively test every tyre on the market until the best had been determined; if his years of experience and an expert knowledge of rubber and its preparation, had given him ideas for improvement which he could incorporate in that best tyre, and again exhaustively test until he was entirely satisfied with the results, he would be able to claim that he had the best. Is that not so?

Then we have the best tyre because that has been our method. With entire liberty of choice we made our selection, incorporated our ideas, entered into a binding contract with the manufacturers (a firm of the highest reputation and experience), and produced—the VICTOR TYRE. Indisputably the VICTOR TYRE is the best.

The VICTOR VEST continues its extraordinary successful career. The VICTOR VEST is a new foundation, and a new life, for any old cover. It prevents punctures and bursts, and enables the cover to be run to its last shred of tread. We give a written guarantee that it will save 50 per cent. on normal tyre cost—£5 on every £10 spent on tyres.

These two make a new factor in motoring. With the VICTOR RETREADS (sound covers for unsound free) they make the most effective trio available to the motorist to-day. We shall be glad to prove that.

THE CHALLENGE RUBBER MILLS, EAGLE WHARF ROAD, CITY ROAD, LONDON, N.

Telephone—3497 NORTH.

West End Showrooms: 218, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE, W.

Telephone—3317 CENTRAL.

Manufacturers to H.M. War Office, Scotland Yard, India Office, Crown Agent to Colonies, H.M. Office of Works, &c.

campaign to secure a better order of things, and have voted £1,000 for the purpose. This is intended as a start only, and there will be plenty more money forthcoming should it be required. The Association's record shows that it is not in the habit of taking up a reform without seeing it through, and it is confidently hoped that before long the A.A. and M.U. official appointment of any hotel will be accepted as a genuine guarantee of excellence in such important details as cleanliness, courtesy, and good catering charges.

At the forthcoming Show one interesting feature which has characterised previous exhibitions at Olympia will be conspicuous by its absence—namely, the polished chassis which has hitherto constituted the sole exhibit on the Rolls-Royce stand. In its place will be three complete cars, ready for the road. The reason for this change of programme is that last year the general public had considerable difficulty in getting near enough to the chassis to inspect it, owing to its being constantly surrounded by young motor engineers and students engaged in sketching its salient features. Another departure is that in future Rolls-Royce cars will be distinguished by a series number instead of by the number of the year. This is due to the fact that the design of the engine and chassis undergoes improvements several times in the course of the twelve months, so that such descriptions as "1911" or "1912" type are not sufficient. We are informed that the current model embodies a number of improvements which may not be obvious to the casual observer, but which all tend still further to improve the running of the car. For special reasons the directors of the Company do not wish exact details of these improvements to be published at present, but it may be said that the latest chassis is more rigid and simpler in construction than its predecessors, that there are notable changes in the design of the engine, and that the suspension has been improved. In view of the success which has attended the policy of concentrating upon one model only, which was initiated by the managing director, Mr. Claude Johnson, some five or six years ago, it is almost unnecessary to state that there will be no departure in this respect.

Every experienced motorist knows how unsatisfactory and unreliable are the ordinary methods of repairing bursts in covers when the damage is at all extensive. When the burst is only an inch or so in length there is no difficulty in dealing with it effectively; but it is probably no exaggeration to say that at least 50 per cent. of covers are discarded before they are half worn out, solely because of bursts which are too big to be permanently repaired by the usual process. It is interesting to learn, therefore, that the Challenge Rubber Mills, of Eagle Wharf Road, N., have just introduced an entirely new method which enables them to guarantee to repair a burst of any dimensions so effectively that the damaged part becomes stronger than any other part of the tyre. It consists of firmly uniting the two sides of the burst by a special sailor's lock-stitching with sail-thread of great strength, backing with Egyptian canvas, and then rubbering in the usual way. The writer has examined the new process in its various stages, and is of opinion that it marks a great advance in the art of tyre-repairing.

At the Berlin Motor Exhibition, which was opened on the 12th inst. and will close on the 22nd, it is interesting to note that about 83 per cent. of all the cars exhibited are fitted with "Continental" tyres, the remaining percentage being distributed among nine different makes. It may be remembered that of the cars which took part in the recent Prince Henry Reliability Tour considerably over 50 per cent. were equipped with "Continentials."

R. B. H.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

FOR some days there has been a determined effort made to put prices better. The public are not in any of the markets. But the dealers are thoroughly sick of doing nothing. They are even unable to sell, for there is no one to buy what they offer. It is a curious fact that very few people except the really wise ever go into the market at the bottom. They always wait until the rise has begun. The average speculator invariably comes in at the top. The Stock Exchange knows this habit of the gambler and therefore marks up prices in the hope that the rise may lure people to the Stock Exchange. The pessimist is very unpopular to-day. By some peculiar method of reasoning he is made responsible for the misfortunes of the present year. One might as well make a yokel responsible for a thunderstorm because he remarked beforehand that there was tempest in the air. Optimism is an admirable thing in small doses. Taken in large quantities it probably produces a most dangerous condition of mind. The average Englishman always goes to extremes; that is why he seldom makes money by gambling. The Jew, on the other hand, has a very adaptable mind. He acts as an optimist one day, and the next day sells everything he has. And this without any sense that it is a disgraceful thing to change your mind.

As a matter of fact the quicker you change your mind in the City the more you will make. Plainly we have all had quite enough misfortune. But the question is whether our natural desire to see things better will have any effect upon prices. After the American panic Optimist Clubs were established in every town in the United States, and nine-tenths of the citizens of that great Republic wore little buttons with the word "Smile" engraved upon them. They also pledged themselves to smile whatever happened; and they went still further. They promised that, whether trade was good or trade was bad, they would continue to employ the same number of workmen and pay them the same wages. I need hardly say that these clubs had a short life, and that very few members carried out their promises. The application of the tenets of Christian Science to finance was a complete and hopeless failure. We are now trying a similar experiment in England. We are pretending that everything is very good, whereas, as a matter of fact, the foreign political outlook is extremely bad. There is this in favour of the optimist: trade in England is good, and the Englishman has not over-specified. His investments in foreign countries have increased enormously, and he is not re-investing the profits. Finance is, however, so interwoven one country with another that anything that is bad for America affects Germany, and anything that is bad for Germany affects France, whilst England, as the central money-market of the world, feels the slightest movement. Last week I called attention to the serious position that Germany had got herself into by over-speculating, but the Germans keep on declaring that their country is stronger than ever, and point to the ease with which the end of the September Settlement was arranged. "Methinks the lady doth protest too much."

MONEY.—Money is going away from London very rapidly, and some people are afraid that the Bank Rate will be put up. It is hardly likely to be advanced unless the Reichsbank first moves up its Rate. Then we should be compelled to follow suit. The rates of exchange are altering; undoubtedly the money position is becoming complicated. Great Britain cannot afford to lose much of the gold that comes from the Cape each week. At the moment the Bank position is good, but what is still better is the position of our great joint stock banks. These banks at the end of September showed a very high percentage of cash against deposits. The decrease in the total cash of eleven of the leading banks showed a fall of nearly two millions on the August figures, whilst the deposits showed an increase of two and three-quarter millions. Some of our banks are very well protected, the Union holding 34.79 per cent. of cash, Parr's 35.66, the Joint Stock 31.16, the London City and Midland 29.75. These are all very high proportions. On the whole it does not appear likely that we shall get any rise in rates. But it is a dangerous thing to prophesy.

CONSOLS.—Consols have been firm the whole week, mainly no doubt because there are more bears about than there were some months ago, and these bears are becoming nervous. If the Italian difficulty vanished we should see a very sharp rise in Consols. The efforts of the Post Office to sell Consols is also having an effect on the market. It is quite possible that our premier security will gradually get back to 80.

FOREIGNERS.—The Chinese rebellion has had a certain effect upon Chinese securities. But it is plain to every one that the rebels are composed of the most intelligent people in China, and that even if the Manchu dynasty is overthrown the foreign relations of the Celestial Empire will hardly be changed. In any case there is not the smallest fear of any repudiation. China is in a strong financial position, and if she secured the much-wanted currency reform and could do away with the exactions of the Governors she would be one of the most prosperous countries in the world. Every one wishes the rebels a successful ending, for they are actuated by the sincerest patriotic motives. Turks and Italians have been very steady, and there has been quite a boom in Perus. Some people go so far as to talk Peru Prefs to 50 on a marvellous report and a big dividend. But it seems to me that they are even to-day too high.

HOME RAILS.—The public is quietly picking up Home Railway stocks. I am not surprised. The Government has shown itself determined in the matter of railway strikes, and the investor now sees that public opinion is strong enough to control the agitator, or at any rate to prevent him from going too far. All our leading railways are quoted too low considering the security that they offer. The '89, '91, and '94 preferences of the Great Central have all been bought, and Dover A are still purchased. A big bull account must be in process of building up here, and long before the Kent Coal is marketed I expect a bad break.

YANKEES.—The latest news with regard to the American Tobacco Company is that the Government have agreed to this Trust being divided into three companies. But candidly this seems too simple a solution. The American Tobacco Company is a complicated affair, and it is hardly likely that the Government would allow it to be split up into three companies all under the same management, working in unison. Prices in the American market are low. But trade seems to hesitate, and reports from the West are not very satisfactory. Investors may disregard fluctuations that send a tremor through the speculator, and for those who wish to pay for their stock and put it away most of the leading American railways are cheap purchases to-day. It is unlikely that any boom will occur before the end of the year. The United States bankers have been helped continually by the big German houses, and they are now returning the compliment by financing Berlin. This in itself will prevent any rise being initiated. The politician has evidently made up his mind that he can obtain votes by attacking the Trusts, Unpopular as the Trusts are, the American voter is not so foolish as to be blind to the danger of persecuting the great corporations. It is absurd to say that these corporations are responsible for the rise in prices. They have taken advantage of the rise to increase their profits. But they did not initiate it.

RUBBER.—The rubber market becomes more depressed every day, and Linggis are now down below 35s. It looks very much as though this share had touched the bottom. But the prices of most rubber shares are still too high to tempt the investor. For example, the Singapore Para, which is quoted at 3s. 6d., issues a report showing a profit of only £9,200. It is silly to pay 1s. 6d. premium on a 2s. share when the dividend is only 10 per cent. Last year Sumatra Para paid a dividend of 12½, and it might pay the same dividend during the current year. This would make the shares an expensive purchase at 2s. 6d. The public realise the dangers of a tropical plantation and are quite determined not to buy any rubber share unless it will give a clear 10 per cent. The Daejan meeting was a very lively affair, and, indeed, most of the rubber meetings now are far from pleasant. Even in the best companies the yield to people who bought at the top of the boom is so small that holders become easily irritated. It is never pleasant to realise that you have made a fool of yourself.

OIL.—Mr. Henry has issued his massive volume on the Oil-fields of New Zealand. It is probably a preliminary to the prospectus of a New Zealand Oil Company. Lobitos have been boomed on official cables, and Nigeria Bitumen keep fairly steady, being helped considerably by Sir Boverton Redwood's report on the sample of oil from the deep well. The oil market was very good last week, but has slackened off the last few days. Although Maikop has turned out an unmitigated failure, such shares as Shells, Spies, Burmah, California are sound purchases.

KAFFIRS.—Kaffir shares do not move and the big houses only support the market very sparingly. There is nothing to go for, and prices will have to fall a little lower before the best shares can be considered an investment. They are still too high if we take into consideration the life of the mines.

RHODESIANS.—Tanganyikas continue to fall mainly because the Belgian speculators are being squeezed for money and have to unload. I cannot hear that there is anything seriously wrong at the property itself. I think the fall is due mainly to over-speculation on the Continent. Other Rhodesian shares are fairly steady. The Scottish Mashonaland report is very disappointing, and some nasty questions were asked at the Jumbo meeting, which, however, went off better than any one expected, thanks to the able chairmanship of Mr. Rowsell.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Omnibus shares have been bought heavily by three or four brokers on special information with regard to the report. But they seem to be rather top-heavy, and unless the report is extremely good might easily go back. Marconis have issued a circular stating that they intend to ask for further capital. They will give the shareholders an opportunity to make money out of the new issue, and this has made the shares very firm.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE COMPLEAT OXFORD MAN"—A REVIEW REVIEWED*

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Most books that attempt to portray the life and habits of the genus undergraduate are summarised by the victims of these dastardly attempts in a manner which is brief but very much to the point, as "rot." Indeed, the characteristics of this strange animal would seem to be somewhat elusive, seeing that a really successful likeness has seldom, if ever, been produced before. When, therefore, a book appears containing a minimum of "rot" and a maximum of truth it is all the more depressing to find that the reviewer—whose business it is, of course, to cavil at something—should light upon the very points which are particularly true to life as the objects of his censures.

Fond papas, we suppose, do not like to hear that their offspring not uncommonly indulge in Veuve Clicquot—a luxury which they themselves perhaps can afford but once or twice a year; while it is a great shock to the tender susceptibilities of that excellent lady Mrs. Grundy to learn that the ranks of the Church are often recruited from the more—shall we say?—spirited members of the Universities. So that these good people may not be pained, there steps forth the kindly critic to allay their fears, and to comfort them with the assurance that in these matters the author has undoubtedly “wandered far from fact.” It is none the less true for that, however, that the consumption of champagne is far from uncommon; and it is just at this period in his career that the newly fledged manling, in all the glory of his new-found manhood, insists, upon the least possible provocation, on giving this last convincing proof of his man's estate—which, though patent to himself, must be well impressed upon others—and orders up, with the most indifferent air that he can assume, a bottle of Bollinger or a pint of Pommery. Added to which there is no time in life in which one is more reckless in throwing about money than during the few glorious years that are spent within the precincts of Oxford. Hence even those who afterwards develop into the most careful of men, when at the 'Varsity stand not upon the order of their spending, but spend, and hesitate not to waste their substance upon the most alluring of liquids.

*The Academy, October 7.

As regards the lively gentlemen, “very often destined for the Church,” we must confess that Mr. Gibbs has given us the wrong type of rowdy man, and that the kind of man to whom we are referring could not be called a hooligan. Nevertheless it is undeniably the case (I know of three examples in my own college alone) that men who have gained a reputation for having the most exhaustive knowledge of the class of story that cannot be called questionable (for there is no question whatever as to its character since very little is left to the imagination) and who are renowned for the frequency of the occasions upon which they are seen to be the worse for liquor, not infrequently enter the Church. It is not suggested that they do not leave behind them all their wicked ways when they leave the scenes of their orgies, or that they make any the worse clergymen because of their youthful excesses. On the contrary, they probably turn out to be much better men for the work they have to do than the mincing type of curate who has ever cherished that virtue which knows no evil. Why disguise this fact—for fact it is? But these men are not hooligans of the kind described by Mr. Gibbs. In this I am convinced that Mr. Gibbs has just missed the mark; but he is a great deal nearer to the truth than his reviewer, who considers that there is much “wandering far from fact” in the suggestion that any other than the most decorous and priggish of men could ever aspire to the sanctity of Holy Orders.

Needless to say that the Oxford man Mr. Gibbs tells us about is not really “compleat.” But that is because it is absolutely impossible for any one man to know the Oxford man in all his phases. Of course, there is no reference to cricket in this book! The hero is a rowing man, and what rowing man knows anything about cricket at Oxford, except that a lot of men do play cricket somewhere or other, that the cricketers have a jolly good time in Eights Week, and that the 'Varsity Match at Lords is rather the thing to go to?

Mr. Gibbs has not told of the politician at Oxford—that enthusiastic person, convinced of the righteousness of his cause and the infallibility of his panaceas for all the ills to which the State is heir. This gentleman frequents political clubs, and reads “papers” to the members, who listen, intent upon smoking hard, drinking mulled claret, and, like raging lions, seeking what they may devour with their caustic wit, when they are called upon to discuss his paper.

Then there is the decadent, who is to be found surrounded by objects artistic—choicely bound volumes, and old prints. He is clothed in a wonderful dressing-gown and enveloped in a haze of tobacco-smoke. His cigarettes are Russian. Italy furnishes the quaint old oil-lamp which provides the only light. He is interested in the psychology of the Emperor Heliogabalus, and will discuss for hours with one of his kind whether the “katharsis” of the emotions, spoken of by Aristotle, was upon the moral or the artistic plane.

Nor do we find any description of Commem. or Eights. But the subject is inexhaustible, and the Oxford Man in his completeness is known to no single individual.

There are, it must be confessed, even in this book certain things that must come under the heading “rot;” such as the intimation that the girl-students of Somerville can make appointments to play golf with strange undergrads; or the suggestion (involved in satirising it) of the existence of a rigid caste system between the men of different years' standing in the 'Varsity. I must also repudiate with horror the allegation that Oxford helps to swell the ranks of the “Great Unwashed.” Indeed, I never knew a creature with a greater hankering after the delights of the tub than the undergrad.

But to counterbalance these temporary aberrations from truth, there are some particularly excellent touches—i.e., when mention is made of a crowd of “apparently” drunk young men. Nothing could be better than the opening chapter as to the feelings of the Fresher upon his arrival at Oxford; the chapter on “Cornstalking,” or that entitled a “Hard Morning's Work,” in which is shown how good intentions are oft rendered vain by the sheer glory of Oxford itself, which sometimes precludes the remotest possibility of work.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

AN OXFORD UNDERGRADUATE.

PLYMOUTH: FUTURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The able article on this subject in your issue of the 7th has interested me a good deal as a former resident of this station, as well as of Portsmouth and Malta. The concluding questions of your contributor are, I fear, not to be answered in a favourable sense with any great confidence.

Facts have, indeed, come lately to my knowledge from official sources which look very ominous as regards the future. Though Plymouth may not have been so hard hit by the falling birth-rate as Blackpool, Brighton, or Glasgow, I presume part at least of the slow but sure diminution in school attendances for the Western port may be attributed to that cause. As yet both Brighton and Plymouth show an increase of total population, which would lead to the idea that in both places a change is occurring which the Registrar-General has repeatedly referred to. I mean a shrinkage in the proportion of children to total population. This of course is a very serious matter, more especially when the reports of the local education authorities reveal to the careful inquirer that a certain number of attendances in both places are of those living outside the borough boundaries!

It is only fair to say that some of the diminution referred to—which is also taking place in the Commonwealth of Australia—is to be considered due to children under five being sent to school in fewer numbers. The Board of Education has mentioned this matter in the last Annual Report, but in a somewhat cryptic and hesitating fashion.

Looking at the problem of Plymouth from the standpoint of comparative geography, it occurs to one that what is stated as to the naval authorities thwarting the commercial growth of the port might be extended to apply to other harbours.

On the other hand, cases may easily be cited which would serve to show that commercial ports and naval stations can get no fairly well with a few miles (more or less) separating them. To take only a few examples, Southampton and Portsmouth, Havre and Cherbourg, Marseilles and Toulon, Trieste and Pola, Venice and Ancona, Cape Town and Simon's Bay, seem to suggest for one thing that commerce is not always inconsolable for a certain degree of absence on the part of torpedoes, mines, and submarines. Were I acquainted with any syndicate or group with £2,000,000 to spend on docks and so forth, I should be disposed to suggest, “Try Falmouth instead of Plymouth.”

STATIST.

AFTER THE CRISIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read the striking article by “Politicus” on “The Royal Position,” and I sorrowfully confess that it exactly expresses my own opinion. I have only to suggest that Republican aspirations were given an undue prominence in connection with the “advice” which was tendered to his Majesty.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, IMMO S. ALLEN.

October 14th, 1911.

W. B. YEATS AND J. M. SYNGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In his interesting review of Mr. Yeats' new book your contributor says:—“Mr. Yeats' account of the 1899 meeting in Paris is only available in an Introduction of Synge's “Well of the Saints," published some years ago by A. H. Bullen, and not very easily procurable now."

This is incorrect. This Introduction is reprinted in Mr. Yeats' collected works under the title Mr. Synge and his Plays, and appears in Vol. VIII., pp. 173-182.—Yours faithfully,

M. P.

Enfield.

THE LATE MR. CHURTON COLLINS AND ROBERT GREENE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In Mr. Frank Harris' appreciative review of the "Life" of my father, Professor Churton Collins, he misquoted a statement of mine by saying that Professor Collins searched the registers of forty-two churches in Norwich to find the date of the poet Greene's death—and found it. What I stated in my book was that my father searched the said registers to find the entry of Greene's baptism—and found it.

I would not have commented on Mr. Harris' obvious (to any Elizabethan student) slip had I not seen in this week's ACADEMY that a Miss (or Mrs.) Hester Brayne repeats the misstatement, and solemnly quotes it as an example of my father's "inaccurate, inept, and incoherent" scholarship. Dear, dear!—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

L. C. COLLINS.

35, Cavendish Mansions, West Hampstead, Oct. 14th, 1911.

THE FURTHER STRAND IMPROVEMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The years pass by and still the middle and eastern island sites in the Strand remain unoccupied. It is nearly nine years since the Further Strand Improvement Committee was instituted at a public meeting held in the Essex Hall, and the position of affairs with regard to the Strand is what it then was, with the exception that a small plot has been built on by the Government of Victoria, Australia. Private enterprise will not touch this land as now laid out on the terms demanded by the London County Council, although it is situate in what is perhaps the most frequented thoroughfare in the Metropolis. This is a serious loss to the ratepayers and a blot on the Capital of the Empire. Not only does the land remain unoccupied, but one of the buildings erected on the western island site—viz., the Gaiety Hotel and Restaurant—is closed.

Under these circumstances, after a decade of failure to get the land covered, it is not unreasonable to ask the London County Council to reconsider its policy in this connection. All parties on the Council are equally responsible for the policy adopted up to now, so that there should be no party feeling aroused by the reopening of the question.

The plan advocated by the Further Strand Improvement Committee has received the widest and most influential support, and the Press has been practically unanimous in its approval, while the only serious objection in the Council itself was the one of cost. The Council was advised that the land required to carry out the plan of the Committee would involve a loss in land value of no less than £239,400. The Committee has always taken exception to this valuation, and it has now obtained an independent valuation from Messrs. Southon and Robinson, the well-known surveyors of Chancery Lane, who put the value of the land required for the improved roadway and island pavement provided in the plan of the Committee at not more than £107,500, or no less than £131,900 below the estimate on which the refusal of the Council to adopt the plan of the Committee was based.

Messrs. Southon and Robinson's report is an interesting document, and certainly makes out a very strong case for consideration.—I am, &c.,

MARK H. JUDGE, Honorary Secretary.

Further Strand Improvement Committee, 7, Pall Mall,
S.W., October 10th, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

Red Revenge: A Romance of Caenopore. By Charles E. Pearce. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
God Disposes. By Pellew Hawker. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

Mister Piccolo: The Story of a Gipsy Boy. By Brenda Girvin. Illustrated by Horace Quick. George Allen and Co. 3s. 6d.
The Mystery of Golde Fell; or, Not Proven. By Charlotte M. Brame. Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.
Ethan Frome. By Edith Wharton. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
The Makers of Mischief. By Stanley Portal Hyatt. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.
The Pale Ape, and other Pulses. By M. P. Shiel. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.
Henry Cassland: His Personal Narrative of the Thames-Side Murder. Edited by Hubert Druce. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
Daisy the Minx: A Diversion. By Mary L. Pendered. Coloured Frontispiece. Ham-Smith. 6s.
Jacquine of the Hut: A Sark Story. By E. Gallienne Robin. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
A Thoroughbred Mongrel: The Tale of a Dog Told by a Dog to Lovers of Dogs. By Stephen Townsend, F.R.C.S. Illustrated by J. A. Shepherd. Simpkin and Co. 3s. 6d.
The Reason Why. By Elinor Glyn. Duckworth and Co. 6s.
The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club. By Charles Dickens. With Coloured Plates. Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d. net.
The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby. By Charles Dickens. With Coloured Plates. Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d. net.
A Touch of Fantasy; A Romance for Those Who are Lucky Enough to Wear Glasses. By Arthur H. Adams. John Lane. 6s.
The Following of the Star. A Romance by Florence L. Barclay. Coloured Frontispiece. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.
Between Heaven and Earth. By Otto Ludwig. Translated from the Original German by William Metcalfe. Gowans and Gray, Glasgow. 3s. 6d. net.
A Whistling Woman. By Robert Halifax. Constable and Co. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Jean de la Fontaine. By Frank Hamel. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.
The Coburgs: The Story of the Rise of a Great Royal House. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.
Autobiographic Memoirs. By Frederic Harrison, D.C.L., Litt.D., LL.D. Two Vols. With Portrait Frontispieces. Macmillan and Co. 30s. net.
The English Court in Exile: James II. at Saint-Germain. By Edwin and Marion Sharpe Grew. Illustrated. Mills and Boon. 15s. net.
The Trooper Police of Australia: a Record of Mounted Police Work in the Commonwealth from the Earliest Days of Settlement to the Present Time. By A. L. Haydon. Illustrated. Andrew Melrose. 10s. 6d. net.
Society Sketches in the Eighteenth Century. By Norman Pearson. With Portraits. Edward Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.
Etudes d'Histoire (4e Série). By Arthur Chuquet. Fontemoing and Co., Paris. 3f. 50c.
Giovan-Antonio Bazzi, dit Le Sodoma (Les Maîtres de l'Art). By L. Gielly. Illustrated. Plon-Nourrit and Co., Paris. 3f. 50c.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Rise of the Novel of Manners. A Study of English Prose Fiction between 1600 and 1740. By Charlotte E. Morgan, Ph.D. The Columbia University Press, N.Y. $1 50c. net.
A Tour through Old Provence. By A. S. Forrest. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.
The Roadmender. By Michael Fairless. 28th Edition. Illustrated by E. W. Waite. Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
Under the Roof of the Jungle: A Book of Animal Life in the Guiana Wilds. By Charles Livingston Bull. Illustrated. Duckworth and Co. 6s. net.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Literary Digest, N.Y.; Cambridge University Reporter; The Papyrus; The Bookseller; The Bodleian; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; The Publishers' Circular; Constitution Papers; Revue Bleue; La Revue; La Grande Revue; The Collegian, An All India Journal of University and Technical Education, Calcutta; Mercure de France; Oxford and Cambridge Review; The University Correspondent; The Church Quarterly Review; The Traveller's Gazette.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND
... THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
63-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON,
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Via the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.
PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,
JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout
the Year,
according
to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,
NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
125, Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C.2, LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1839).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17½.	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£10.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange. Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £5 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

BOORDITE RIFLES, .400, .500, .600 Bore.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 3022 GERRARD.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 527	Reviews (continued)—
Comrades of the Road ... 528	Shorter Reviews 538
"And speckl'd Vanity will sicken soon and die" ... 528	Fiction 539
At the War—I. 529	The Theatre..... 540
Walter Pater 530	A British Outpost in China 541
Reviews—	The Women of Shake- speare 542
A Bengali Author 532	Some Old Theatres of Paris 544
Crime and Chemistry... 533	The Revival of Printing... 545
A Spirit in Prison 534	Art 547
The Gaelic Spirit 535	Books in Preparation 548
A Faithful Servant of the Public..... 536	Imperial & Foreign Affairs 549
The Regeneration of Palestine 537	Motoring 550
History and Industry... 537	In the Temple of Mammon 551
The Author at Play..... 538	Correspondence 552
	Books Received 554

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s.6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Now that Mr. Asquith has disclosed the amount of time—"altogether eighteen, or possibly nineteen, days"—the Government propose to devote to the National Insurance Bill, the scandal of haste involved in its passing, to which we drew attention last week, will be obvious to all. "The programme the Government have suggested," said Mr. Balfour in his pungent speech, "is extravagant and impossible. . . . The right hon. gentleman considers that nineteen days is a generous and ample time to deal with the Bill; I call it a most preposterous and restrictive proposal." The various and incessant criticisms which this measure has called forth from every field of industry should give the Government pause, as indicating its inherent faultiness. Mr. Lloyd George doubtless is dealing with every objection brought forward to the best of his ability, but we have had so many queer samples of his "ability" during the past year or two that we beg leave to remain rather sceptical as to his virtues in this case; and it is clear that with so many hurried attempts at reconstruction the Bill may be even more objectionable than in its original state. Patches are being put upon it, as upon some torn garment, until it is almost unrecognisable—which fact alone should make the Government hesitate before forcing it through. A patched thing is always unsatisfactory. By far the most sensible course would be to submit this Insurance Bill to a Grand Committee during the period at disposal, there to be threshed out and possibly remodelled into a considered whole; then, at the beginning of the next session, to introduce it with time for a thorough discussion in the House. We are not dealing here with the question of whether the measure should be passed or not; we merely wish to emphasise the point we made last week—that to allot eighteen "or possibly nineteen" days to this hacked-about Bill is nothing less than a gross outrage on the Parliamentary system.

The controversy raised by Lord Rosebery in his speech at Glasgow on the question of the "dead" books that cumber the shelves of many libraries, to the exclusion of more useful material, still proceeds in various quarters. It is all very well to talk easily of burning thousands of negligible volumes, but the debatable point is what constitutes a "dead" book; as one paper acutely noted, even the least important novel of to-day may be a most entrancing theme for the students of three hundred years hence—if, that is, its paper and binding have not utterly perished. And there are few more interesting occupations than the investigation of the newspaper-files of a hundred years ago. How many of the treasures which are even yet to be picked up here and there on obscure bookstalls would have been in existence had a general holocaust of apparently futile literature been ordered? And what about the poor author, watching the conflagration from his shady corner on Olympus?—the word "shady" being used, of course, in no objectionable sense. Imagine his feelings as the thoughts which he deemed would move the world, the ideas for whose expression he lived laborious nights and days, were dispersed in columns of smoke instead of being dispersed in columns of type. It is a serious consideration whether his language might not entail united action on the part of the high gods—might not result, indeed, in the summary ejection of his perturbed spirit from the resentful, immortal fraternity. He might come to earth as an offended ghost, and haunt the libraries, searching vaguely and eternally for his own works; in which case "the future of the library" would have to be reconsidered. Let us hesitate, then, before we commit the ancient and honourable tomes to the ordeal by fire.

The Oxford English Dictionary "on Historical Principles" winds its slow, unfailing way from "Simple" to "Sleep" in the part which reaches us this month. To scan its pages is to realise how limited is the vocabulary of even the best of us compared with the riches of the English language. Not that it is desirable for the ordinary mortal to intersperse with his conversation a tenth of the uncommon words which exist; were he to do so he might very easily become unintelligible. "She uttered a skellock," for instance, is hardly a presentable equivalent for "She gave a short, sharp scream;" nor is "skreigh" as a substitute for "break of day" likely to commend itself to our prolific minor poets, in spite of the fact that Scott used it. However, as a standard record of the language "Murray's" is invaluable, and more philological curiosities are to be found in it than one could possibly suspect.

COMRADES OF THE ROAD

Only a little way
Our roads together run,
Just for a brief sweet day
Beneath the sun.

Only a little while
For you to ease my load
While I your cares beguile
Along the road.

Just for a summer day
Until the twilight fall,
Not as two lovers, nay,
Comrades—that's all!

When the Sun's glowing heart
Thrills like a rose on fire,
We will clasp hands and part
Lest either tire!

Clasp hands, press lips, cling close
One mad, sweet moment, so!
Then each a twilight path
Lonely must go.

Clasp hands, press lips, cling close,
Then, if you will, forget
That, comrades of the road,
We ever met!

WINIFRED SUTCLIFFE GREAVES.

"AND SPECKL'D VANITY WILL SICKEN SOON AND DIE"

MR. BERNARD SHAW has in a letter to the Times, in his vigorous way, summed up the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a "sentimental amateur." We have no fault to find with the definition, which is in fact a variant of the criticism which has appeared in these columns since the infamous Budget of 1909 made its ill-starred appearance. Mr. Shaw has now come into line, and the fact that his judgment is not a hasty one lends to it all the more weight. The amateur who produced the unconscionable "ungotten minerals" tax; who was guilty of the levity of predicting that prime articles of everyday consumption would soon be relieved of taxation as a result of his totally abortive, but enormously expensive system of land taxation; and who was responsible for the various absurdities in the original draft of the Insurance Scheme, some of which have now disappeared—to be probably replaced by others of the same character—has we think fully earned the descriptive label which Mr. Shaw has attached to him.

Ever harping monotonously, whether in a speech at Whitefield's Tabernacle or in a manifesto to the electors of Keighley, on the sentimental chord, Mr. Lloyd George exclaims:—

I would invite its [Insurance Bill's] critics to name any State in the world which has either carried or submitted to its Legislature proposals which are half as generous towards the working classes as those which are contained in the Bill.

All fustian! As a very careful and admittedly fair critic, Mr. George Cave, states on his responsibility, Codlin's generosity can be thus measured. For 5d. of benefit, the client whom he weeps over will pay 4d. to start with, and 5d. in the long run. Mr. Shaw presents a similar conclusion somewhat differently. "The friend's" generosity according to him can be measured by his proposal to compel a man who is worth 17s. 6d. a week in the labour market, to accept 17s. 2d. Tacitus wrote of Vitellius:—

Inerat tamen simplicitas ac liberalitas, quae, ni adsit modus, in exitium vertuntur.

There was this distinguishing trait however between Vitellius and the modern prodigal. The profusion of Vitellius was in the opinion of Tacitus likely to encompass his own ruin, the generosity of the Chancellor in the opinion of those who are its victims will surely encompass theirs.

In a recent article we pointed out that the epidemic of strikes arose almost simultaneously with the production of the Chancellor's scheme of insurance. There is no doubt that the word went round that a deduction from wages was a feature of the scheme, and the agitator set to work to point out that a deduction of 4d. would not matter very much to the man who had previously obtained an increase in wages measured by three to six times that amount.

Mr. Lloyd George is the fondest of parents for his sickly bantlings. Horace and Cervantes have both satirized this failing, which in a sense is doubtless a virtue. There is a kind of virtue however which oversteps all bounds. "La vertu n'irait pas si loin si la vanité ne lui tenait compagnie." This is the kind of virtue with which the Chancellor is afflicted, and it leads him to say various things and to do various acts which are quite reprehensible.

For instance, he took a very active and prominent part, for which he obtained much praise, in bringing the railway strike to a temporary conclusion. He brushed his nominal leader on one side, and prescribed a tribunal of inquiry on his own lines. It is obvious that he hoped that his own panacea would prove successful.

That result would have been pleasing to his vanity, and conducive to his advancement. Amour-propre, however, suggested to him that it would be well by means of a saving clause to provide a locus poenitentiae for himself in case his pet tribunal should not succeed in conciliating those who might otherwise regard themselves in the light of cossets. Therefore in the House of Commons the Chancellor spoke thus:—

I am still very sanguine that when the men come to realise the full character of the proposal of the Government, that it is intended to give them every fair play and every opportunity, and that it is not at all a mere attempt to lure out of their hands the great weapon of striking, but that it is merely an attempt for the moment to see whether we cannot arrive at the facts, which must alone be the basis of safe negotiations, to arrive at that promptly, to arrive at it without loss of time, and in such a way that if the men are not satisfied with the recommendations of the Committee they still could fall back on the very powerful weapon in their hands.

What other explanation may we ask except the most sensitive form of self-esteem would induce a man to discredit in advance the instrument which he had created? There is no other explanation than that failure is so abhorrent to Mr. Lloyd George that he will practically embrace any expedient rather than run the risk of it. If that explanation be correct, it is clear that cajolery supersedes candour, and faith in motive is eliminated.

CECIL COWPER.

AT THE WAR—I.

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

TRIPOLI, October 17th, 1911.

WAR is a horrible institution at any time; it breaks up so many human ties, it upsets so many homes, it ruins so many interests, and hopelessly deranges the commercial sequence of a nation's life. Many who set out may never return again, and many a mother and sister will mourn in silence the loss of the bread-winner; for they are the real sufferers, not those who fall by bullet or by disease facing the enemy in the field. These are sustained by the excitement of the crowded hour, and by the presence of thousands of others ever around them who are experiencing exactly the same sensations—hopes, fears, triumphs, sorrows, hardships, and occasional moments of glory and real happiness—the latter being produced by a belated wash or a hearty meal. But the war between Turkey and Italy is different from all others in its conception, declaration, and mode of carrying on. It is surely the most one-sided struggle which ever was, and up to the present the most harmless and bloodless. It has lasted nearly three weeks, and the only slain are one Italian who was shot accidentally by a brother sentry, four Turks, two of whom were killed in the bombardment and two shot in a night attack on the outposts, and about a dozen men, women, and children who were slain, or reported to be slain, by fragments of shell during the historic bombardment.

Poor Turkey did not even want to fight; but Italy first demanded a province, and then, instead of giving the Turks time to decide whether they would yield it, informed them that, whether they wanted to or not, they must fight, because the Italian Navy and the Italian Army needed some mild exercise. So Turkey found herself at war with no Fleet to fight with and no foe to get at except the odd fifty thousand Italian inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire, who so far have been left unmolested. The Italian Fleet sailed away; the Duke of the Abruzzi managed to waylay the third-class Turkish torpedo-boats, and is now in a position to reopen negotiations with Miss Elkins of Washington; Admiral Aubry and his squadron bombarded some old stone walls at Tripoli, which two hundred years ago might possibly have been described as forts; the remainder of the Italian Fleet is now watching the Dardanelles, where the Turkish Fleet is safely ensconced, and where it will remain until the war-drums once more cease their rolling, and the war correspondents—the only visible symbols of hostilities—have been recalled by their respective journals.

The sea having been cleared, the mighty armada sailed from Italy, and already twenty-five thousand men are concentrated in Tripoli, in that small oasis in a desert of sand, eagerly looking out for an enemy who so far has only been conspicuous by his absence. Now I have learnt for the first time why the expedition was decided on in such indecent haste, and why the Turks were given no time in which to make up their minds whether they would fight or whether they would accept an indemnity for the loss of a province. It will come as a surprise to many to learn that, as usual, perfidious Albion was at the bottom of the affair, and that it was her subjects who caused this bloodless struggle to break out just at a moment when every one thought the peace of Europe was again assured until the snows of winter had once more melted in the Balkans.

For some time past a local syndicate in Tripoli has been in constant negotiation with the Turkish authorities to obtain a concession for the construction of harbour works at Tripoli, the development of the docks and quays, the monopolising of the sponge industry, and the opening up of the phosphate mines—one of those general exploration syndicates, in fact, to which so many barbarous countries owe their first start in life amongst civilised Powers. The affair was almost completed; the terms of the concession were already decided upon and agreed to. The concessionaires had been in Europe and had obtained the support of the very tip-top Kings of Finance in London and Paris. In another fifteen days the concession would have been signed, sealed, and irrevocable, and no intervention of Italy at a later stage could have interfered with it. It would have been a fait accompli which only an international agreement could have upset. Now Italy wants Tripoli for commercial exploration, and for those very purposes which made it appear attractive to the capitalists of London and Paris. For many years the Italian Government have been counting the cost and saying to themselves, "Is the game worth the candle? Will the nation support us if we embark on a difficult and dangerous undertaking for very doubtful commercial recompense in the future?"

Now, when it came to the knowledge of the Italian Government that this great concession was about to be signed, sealed, and delivered, and that the most honoured names in haute finance were lending their support and backing it up with their millions, they were seized with a sudden alarm. The Government said: "If London and Paris are interested, the game must be worth the candle." Therefore, at all costs, the signing of the concession had to be stopped. That is why Italy delivered her mandate at a moment's notice, and, without even waiting for a reply, sent her Fleet to Tripoli and to the Dardanelles, and hastily prepared her army of occupation. Europe was taken completely by surprise, so unexpected and sudden was the move. Net result—Turkey has lost Tripoli, the concessionaires have lost their concession, and the Italians are saddled with an undertaking the magnitude of which they have never really estimated, and which will cost them an immense number of lives, an immense amount of time and trouble and expenditure, on which there can be absolutely no return for many years to come. That is the true inner history of the outbreak of this miserable little war. Now it has started Europe should do her best to end it as soon as possible. The sore is very mild and harmless at present, but there is no saying what it may develop into if it is not tended by the international surgeons in time. Nobody wants this war, and nobody has anything to gain by it. It is a blot and a disgrace, while it lasts, on Europe and on international morals, and it is extremely dull from the war correspondent's point of view. We all want to come home, as the process of watching nations corner sand in Northern Africa is now played out. England first set the example in Egypt, and now every other Power wants to follow suit, always forgetting that the only reason why it is of some value in Egypt is that the commercial children playing on the sands there have old Father Nile to dip their buckets in, whereas Tripoli has no Father Nile, and the commercial children here will soon grow tired of this make-believe game of building castles in the desert without any water to let into the moats, or in which to paddle when the sun is at its zenith.

The poor war correspondent, when a war breaks out, is hurried away from hearth and home at a moment's notice, and is told to get there before his rivals of the Press; if possible, to be on the landing-stage to greet the General and his staff when they land, and to point out to them any places of interest or of strategical advantage. The General is then photographed in every possible attitude; his name, the facts concerning his past, and his pictures, are sent to every newspaper all over the world, and he finds himself famous before a shot has been fired, and even before the troops have reached the scene of hostilities.

I left London at the outbreak of war, and made my way to Rome, where I immediately proceeded to see Ministers and officials with a view to obtaining the necessary laissez passer which enables one to go where one wishes, and to become at once on good terms with the chiefs of the Army and Navy. The policy of the Italian Government has been truly Machiavellian throughout in its attitude towards the Press. I was received by the War Minister and by the Minister of Marine as if I had been their friend for life. They could not do enough for me. Signor Giolitti wrote a letter to the Minister of War telling him to do everything in his power "to aid me in the accomplishment of my mission." The Minister of War received me personally, greeted me with an expansive smile, sat down at his desk, and in his own handwriting wrote a letter to General Caneva, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, telling him who I was, what interests I represented, and imploring him to do everything in his power "to aid me in the accomplishment of my mission." The Minister of Marine also sat down and wrote a letter to Admiral Aubry imploring him to do everything in his power "to aid me in the accomplishment of my mission." "This is going to be the softest job I was ever on," I said to myself as I left Rome. Never had I known the high officials so agreeable and so anxious to conciliate the European Press. How unlike the attitude adopted by the Japanese Government at the time of the Russo-Turkish War! What a relief it is to feel you are really welcome, and that your presence with the Army is desired and not regarded as an unwelcome intrusion! But what happened when I tried to turn these manifestations of friendship and goodwill to account I will relate in a subsequent letter.

WALTER PATER

By FRANK HARRIS

ALL baggage is impedimenta, as the Latins knew, and even when the object is fame, who goes light travels far. Sappho's renown rests on a dozen lines; Keats shines among the immortals by virtue of a handful of poems, and it looks now as if Walter Pater would hold a place in English literature because of his one page about Leonardo's Mona Lisa. At any rate it must be admitted that his prose is assuredly finer and rarer than the faded, colourless picture.

The famous description is one of the few pages in English which contains a new and important thought: the idea that every spiritual event, such as the domination of Rome or the soul-searching of Christianity, must have its effect in refining and spiritualising the beauty of women was both new and true, and Pater wedded it to astonishing form. He wrote many other essays besides that on Leonardo, notably one on Winckelmann, which I always think should have been his masterpiece; a long novel, too, "Marius, the Epicurean," but he never touched that description of the Mona Lisa—indeed, he never came near it a second time.

It may be worth our while to try to explain this solitary moment of unique achievement. Only the other day Walter Pater walked these London streets; surely he carried no secret with him beyond our divining. What manner of man then was he? A large personable figure, some five feet nine or ten in height, carefully dressed; nothing remarkable at first glance; but when he took off his hat the great forehead startled you. Someone has said finely that a large forehead in a man is like a great expanse of sky in a landscape.

Pater's face is best seen in a pencil sketch by Will Rothenstein—the strong outline frames a tyrannous huge forehead and large bony chin: the bare line with its reticence and economy haunts one, is filled with suggestion. The whole dark face is tantalising, mysterious, like a mask; the lips, hidden by the cascading, heavy moustache, excite curiosity. The eyes are not even indicated—one sees nothing but the eyelids; and yet, like the shuttered windows of a house, this secrecy is arresting; hints of enigma draw one to question. In life one disliked rather than noticed the heavy shutter-lids, the grey-green, lifeless, yet compelling eyes, with their occasional naked stare.

The jaws were strong enough to keep the desires in leash, and so the great dome of the forehead where thoughts had room to poise and swing on wings of rhythm came to mastery.

A curious contradiction was Walter Pater. He talked little just as he wrote little, and it was difficult to get to know him well. At first he kept to conventional, stereotyped phrases, dropped hesitatingly, almost timidly. But even after years of acquaintance and liking he never let himself go in speech, a fact which astonished me a little, though it made me notice that he never became confidential even when writing. If men learned anything of his faults and failings they did not learn them from him; he has left on record no weakness, however amiable, no shortcoming. He seemed to dread expansion of any sort. He never spoke of himself willingly, and as soon as you spoke of him he shrank back into his shell, so to speak, and answered guardedly in polite monosyllables.

If you pressed him he would tell of his method of work: how he went about for days writing and rewriting a single sentence on little pieces of paper till he had got it perfect. He would talk freely enough, too, on literature and art—boldly even if the audience were sympathetic. I remember after one dinner he declared that the scoriae in Shakespeare took away from the value of his product: "I can't bear the scoriae," he kept repeating; "I could do with less gold if the scoriae were absent: the scoriae—the scoriae . . ."

He shrank from life and gave his heart to literature and artistic accomplishment. Pater belonged by nature to the Fraternity of the Faithless. This world filled his horizon; he cared nothing for any other, and seemed annoyed when forced to admit the possibility of a life beyond the grave. This visible world all shaped to beauty was Pater's ideal. Like Gautier, he loved the figures of white youths swaying on marble horses without bridle and without saddle on a background of deep blue, as on the frieze of the Parthenon. He was a pagan of pagans, and sensual beauty satisfied his soul. He often spoke of Christianity as a disease, a white leprosy born of weakness and fear, a shining scab on the sore of the world. If men were all healthy and strong, he felt sure, Christianity would cease to exist. He had no notion whatever of its universal appeal: no conception of Love as the road we all must follow who would reach the Heavenly Kingdom. He looked upon its faith as inferior to Buddhism because less reasonable and in essence even sadder; he talked of the Day of Judgment as ridiculous, just as if every atom of stone and flesh in this world were not set to Justice and eager for judgment. He had no idea that the Judgment Day was to be found in his own careful pondered comparison of this church or picture with that, the balanced, cautious, æsthetic judgments he spent his life in making ever more precise.

What was the motive-power in him? What kept him to his work? He lived in Oxford for many years in comparative seclusion as a Fellow; the full stream of life did not tempt him greatly; even in youth he preferred his College backwater; but with the years he grew a little bolder and came to live in Kensington. His home life there with his two sisters was cloistral and correct to a fault; everything went like clockwork without even a tick to break the silence. Early Victorian primness lay on the house like a spell. There must, I thought, be some blood somewhere, some revolt; but all that was sub-conscious; decorum was Pater's gospel and rule of life. And yet his writing was sometimes sensuous, bold.

He talks of Leonardo as "the love-child of his father's youth, with the keen puissant nature such children often have. . . ." But it was in another portrait—that of Denys L'Auxerrois—that I found, or thought I found, Pater's confession. All of us who are "lovers of strange souls" should read that singular sketch of an artist-spirit. Not uncharacteristic is it that Denys, too, like Leonardo, was probably born out of wedlock, and that Pater dwells on the unhappy union:—

"There were some who connected his birth with the story of a beautiful country girl who, about eighteen years before, had been taken from her own people, not unwillingly, for the pleasure of the Count of Auxerre. She had wished indeed to see the great lord, who had sought her privately, in the glory of his own house; but, terrified by the strange splendours of her new abode and manner of life and the anger of the true wife, she had fled suddenly from the place during the confusion of a violent storm, and in her flight given birth prematurely to a child. The child, a singularly fair one, was found alive, but the mother dead, by lightning-stroke as it seemed, not far from her lord's chamber-door, under the shelter of a ruined ivy-clad tower. . . . Denys himself certainly was a joyous lad."

With keen delight Pater tells how the joyous boy Denys—they called him Frank among other nicknames—went to the great cathedral, joined in the solemn game of ball, and turned it into a wild romp—

Leaping in among the timid children, he made the thing really a game. The boys played like boys, the men almost like madmen, and all with a delightful glee which became contagious, first in the clerical body, and then among the spectators. The aged Dean of the Chapter, Protonotary of his Holiness, held up his purple skirt a little higher, and stepping from the ranks with amazing levity, as if suddenly relieved of his burden of eighty years, tossed the ball with his foot to the venerable capitular Homilist, equal to the occasion. . . .

Pater revels in the mad outburst—thanks to Denys, he says:—

At last a new spirit was abroad everywhere. The hot nights were noisy with swarming troops of dishevelled women and youths with red-stained limbs and faces, carrying their lighted torches over the vine-clad hills, or rushing down the streets, to the horror of timid watchers, towards the cool spaces by the river. A shrill music, a laughter at all things, was everywhere. And the new spirit repaired even to church to take part in the novel Offices of the Feast of Fools. Heads flung back in ecstasy—the morning sleep among the vines, when the fatigue of the night was over—dew-drenched garments—the serf lying at his ease at last; the artists, then so numerous at the place, caught what they could, something, at least, of the richness, the flexibility of the visible aspects of life, from all this. . . . And the powers of Nature concurred. It seemed there would be winter no more.

Pater's delight in the Bacchante revel, in that "great season," as he calls it, shows me the cloistral way to his wild human heart. Read how he tells of Denys' love of animals, of the earth-born creature with his rich bestiary (from which alone the owl of wisdom was rigidly excluded), which brought him the suspicion and then the hatred of the people.

Read, too, of his coarse "degeneration—the coarseness of satiety and shapeless battered-out appetite" (surely that curiously inapplicable "battered-out" in a man so scrupulous in epithet is in itself soul-revealing). The cruelty of lust goes to murder, and madness . . . "the wine had soured in the cup," and then the one illuminating sentence which no one but Pater could have written: "The Golden Age had indeed come back for a while: golden was it, or gilded only, after all? and they were too sick, or, at least, too serious, to carry through their parts in it." . . . "Denys became a novice." Am I wrong in italicising these phrases? I cannot think so. Pater to me is all in the mad revel, and the cold reasonable reflection—"too serious." He appears to me as a form of sensuality, a spasm-jet of temperament frozen to rigidity by an iron will.

But why this lava-crust of self-restraint, binding and constraining the volcanic fiery flood of an inordinate desire? The explanation is simple, purely physical. The man's heart was weak. Pater died of heart-failure at fifty-five in spite of a quiet, regular life. His shyness and recluse habits, his horror of contradiction or argument, his comparative disingenuousness—all cowardice, mere timidity. Had he been born with a strong heart, pumping hot, generous blood through his brains, he might have been a world-artist—another Goethe.

He seemed at times to half realise his own shortcomings. "Had I Se-and-so's courage and heart," he cried more than once, "ah, if —," and suddenly the mood would change, the light in the eyes die out, and, with a half smile, he would add, chuckling, "I might have been a criminal. He! he! he!" and then he would move with little, careful steps across the room to his chair.

The question remains: If not a great man, what is he? Has Pater a place in English literature? Did he withdraw himself from men, and give himself to writing with infinite care and an extraordinary sense of beauty, only to miss the supreme reward? I cannot think so. Most people will say it is his style which saved Pater; but I find nothing in his style which was not in his nature. The sensuality is there, the austere self-restraint, the precision, the timidity, the love of natural rhythm, the plain chant of a sober and sensuous imagination.

Walter Pater was no mere conventional lay figure; but a man whose influence was a liberating one. Out of the prison of Puritanism he helped to lead men into the sunlight and the daisy-starred meadows of life. He was not rich and bold; but it must be said of him that he was pathetically true to his ideal. He could not brave the open sea of life and its wild waves; he would not challenge "the suspicion and hatred of the people;" he would keep silence; but he would not lie or play the hypocrite. In his own quiet way he did his work and gave his message. He was an artist to the finger-tips, and his high sincerity transmuted his physical weakness even, into the artistic beauty of austere self-restraint which was the dominant note of his style and of his life.

REVIEWS

A BENGALI AUTHOR

A Study of Indian Economics. By PRAMATHANATH BANERJEA, M.A. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.)

It is always desirable to know what the advanced Indians are thinking and the line they are likely to take in controversial questions. This little book by Mr. Pramathanath Banerjea to some extent supplies this requirement. His name as an author or Professor of Political Economy was not previously known to the English public. But he should be treated seriously. His book is sure to have an extensive circulation in India, where anything in print is regarded as gospel truth, especially if it contains reflections upon Government measures or officers or their imputed shortcomings; it puts into shape many of the ideas which are floating in the minds of his countrymen. It is seldom that he attacks the Government openly and directly. He is much too clever for that. He poses as a scientific inquirer, free from political bias, attempting "to represent the different sides to every question in the fairest possible manner." But, under this assumed cloak of judicial fairness, he has some pretty strong remarks to offer:—

Now the question which suggests itself is, How far does this expansion of revenue furnish evidence of increasing prosperity? This question is answered differently by different individuals and parties. The officials would say that general prosperity has undoubtedly increased; some Indian patriots would, on the contrary, regard the increase of revenue as being due to the rapacity of the Government.

After dilating on the natural resources of India, the fertility of the soil, the abundance and cheapness of labour, he writes:—

The annual production is not at all comparable to that of any other civilised nation. The country generally is not in a prosperous condition. There are some who would go so far as to assert that the condition of the middle classes of society has decidedly become worse than before, while the poorer classes lead a precarious sort of existence from year's end to year's end.

In another passage he harps on the glories of previous ages:—

There was a time when India was one of the chief manufacturing countries of the world. Even as late as the eighteenth century she was on a par with Europe in industrial matters, and her manufactures found a ready market in many foreign countries. Until recent years Indian industries were always worked by hand labour.

And the old tale is told how—

In manufacture the Hindus attained to a marvellous perfection at a very early period, and the Courts of Imperial Rome glittered with gold and silver brocades of Delhi. The muslins of Dacca were famous ages ago throughout the civilised world.

It was, he avers, the industrial revolution of the eighteenth century in Europe that ruined Indian manufactures, and reduced it to the position of an almost entirely agricultural country. The hope for India lies in the improvement of her agriculture and the development of her industrial manufactures, though he offers no suggestions of his own as to the course to be adopted:—

The productive capabilities of India are great [so he summarises the position]. She possesses an abundance of natural resources and a plentiful supply of cheap labour; but she lacks capital, enterprise, and organisation. The defects are, however, remediable, and, as a matter of fact, attempts are being made to overcome them.

Yes, indeed, with European capital, energy, and skill. Mr. Banerjea has to recognise the fact that, through the want of Indian enterprise, the shyness and smallness of indigenous capital, the ignorance and apathy of the natives of India, the mining and factory industries and the more important of the industrial arts are mainly in the hands of Europeans; he is wise enough to see that India cannot do without foreign capital. "It will be a short-sighted policy to reject it on sentimental grounds;" it is "not necessarily harmful," but he considers it necessary to form a clear conception of the limits within which the application of foreign capital is beneficial, and, like the patriots of Japan, he would not allow the profits of industry to go out of the country. Railways afford, therefore, in his view, an instance of the right use of such capital. But, quoting Sir Vithaldas Thackersey, he adopts the extraordinary idea "that it would be to the permanent good of the country to allow petroleum to remain underground and gold to rest in the bowels of the earth until the gradual regeneration of the country, which must come about under British rule, enables her own industrialists to raise them and get the profits of the industries." Let us spoil the English for Indian interests, as the Israelites spoiled the Egyptians of old, is his principle.

Mr. Banerjea skilfully enumerates the economic characteristics special to India, such as the comparative immobility of labour, the domination of custom over free competition, the dependence of social distinctions upon the possession of intellectual and spiritual qualities rather than upon wealth, the advantages and disadvantages of the caste system (the former prevailing), the small proportion of the comparatively well-to-do classes to the entire community, the various opinions entertained as to the prospect of an industrial revolution in India, the want of trustworthy statistics, the liability to famine through failure of rainfall, the denudation of the forests, the limited knowledge of the cultivators, the abundance of raw materials other than wool, the want of organisation, and other facts of the whole economic problem which should be more generally recognised. His statements, however, cannot be accepted without reserve—when he states, for instance, that the conditions of labour which prevail in the tea plantations are so objectionable that educated Indians would rather see the industry die out than flourish. He omits to mention that some tea-gardens are owned and financed by Indians, and that many Indians find employment therein.

His book will be useful to students and politicians for the facts and figures which he has extracted from official publications, though there again his quotations require watching. For instance, the figures of Indian trade given by him (in 1909-10, total imports 154 crores of rupees, total exports 194 crores) do not tally with those given on a page immediately following—namely, imports 115 crores, exports 167 crores. He is doubtless correct in his main statement that the wage-earners have suffered loss, because the rise in wages has not kept pace with the rise in prices, but his examination of the causes of the rise is by no means exhaustive. The question is so difficult, indeed, that the Government have deputed a competent officer to investigate the extent and the cause of the rise in prices. Mr. Banerjea has summarised usefully the principles of direct and indirect taxation, bringing out the different theories and the chief maxims to be applied in practice, the commonplaces of political economy, which have often been enunciated. On taxation in the concrete he is not always so clear. With regard to the land revenue, which forms 41 per cent. of the total revenue, he has fallen into the old confusion between revenue and rent, and consequently writes with a want of certainty. The true case can be easily stated. From time immemorial a share of the produce of the land has been the chief source of public revenue in India. The share which the tenant pays to a landlord, or an intermediate to a superior landlord, is rent; the share which the highest landlord pays to the Government is revenue; where Government is the landlord rent and revenue become convertible terms. Mr. Fawcett and Mr. J. S. Mill, quoted by Sir John Strachey, regarded the whole process as justifiable land taxation, and there the matter may rest. But Mr. Banerjea's proposal that temporary settlements (of land revenue) should be made for fifty years, and not for twenty or thirty, is Utopian; no Government could afford to forego the increase which is justified by the general rise in the value of crops and the improved conditions of the country. It is not the only idea that Mr. Banerjea has borrowed from the late Mr. R. C. Dutt (whose views were exploded by Lord Curzon in 1902) and from the National Indian Congress. He follows that party in calling for the protection of India's fiscal interests, including protection against Great Britain itself. There have been indications that this subject will be warmly advocated in the Councils which have lately been enlarged, and strong feelings will be aroused. We have said enough to show that Mr. Banerjea's book is a remarkable one, though far from being complete or trustworthy. The Government of India will be well advised to examine it and correct its errors before they lead to serious mischief.

CRIME AND CHEMISTRY

Casanova and His Time. By EDOUARD MAYNIAL. Translated by ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE. Illustrated. (Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

Madame de Brinvilliers and Her Times, 1630-1676. By HUGH STOKES. Illustrated. (John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

"It is unfortunate that the wicked people are generally more interesting than the good," as Mr. Stokes remarks in the Preface to his entertaining "Madame de Brinvilliers and Her Times." We might add a rider to the effect that the good people are most interesting when they are engaged in frustrating the wicked. But wickedness is the essential, or if it is not precisely wickedness, it is something wrong with the ordinary course of the world; the daily newspaper is our witness, and its readers. The baser sort rush to the law and police news; the sadder, more earnest minds, batten on accidents and rumours of war. But to one and all "the patent bag comes out and prophesies disasters," and it is for such that they are ready to pay. Sir William Gilbert's "Sorcerer" found his "superior blessings" rather a drug; but as to his "penny curses"—why he "couldn't turn them out fast enough." Madame Tussand's could hardly continue to exist without the "Chamber of Horrors."

Whether Casanova ever really qualified for such a select society as the one we have just mentioned is a slightly difficult question to answer. He was a rogue and a vagabond—it would be unjust to deny him that—but he was never properly found out, and he lived in an age of brisk competition. Italian adventurers (especially from Venice) are one of the features of cosmopolitan eighteenth-century history; some were rogues, some were vagabonds, and many of them were both. Among those with whom we meet in M. Maynial's pages are Algarotti, Lorenzo da Ponte, and Cagliostro; a rogue of Casanova's own stature, with whom he had many a passage of arms, was the Comte de Saint-Germain, an extraordinary character, who professed to have lived for several centuries, and who dated one of his reminiscences by saying that it occurred when he was "dining with the Fathers of the Council of Trent." Casanova and Saint-Germain were rivals in the exploitation of Mme. d'Urfé, and subsequently they crossed each other's paths again and again. Some of their most baffling encounters, not yet fully elucidated even by M. Maynial, were connected with the famous secret diplomacy of Louis XV. Saint-Germain, in particular, seems to have first represented the unofficial diplomacy of the King, and then to have served Choiseul in England as a spy on the unaccredited envoys. Casanova's own mission in Holland was particularly mysterious. His specialities were occult medicine of the "stay where you are, and don't get older" type, alchemy, pure witchcraft, and freemasonry. He managed somehow to avoid a final catastrophe, and ended his days as librarian to the rich Count Waldstein in Bohemia.

Casanova's popularity in literature has largely depended on his adventures in the fields of gallantry. M. Maynial considers that his celebrated Memoirs constitute a serious historical document. His information has the unexpected quality of turning out, on examination, to be mostly accurate. The sincerity of his reflections over some of his knaveries, very much in the style of Benvenuto Cellini, give a hint of something of the sort; the corroboration of some of his conversations with Voltaire from the published works of that philosopher needs, perhaps, a little more checking to establish; but there is little doubt that the biographer is right in his main contention—that Casanova has a real historical importance, apart from his value as a mirror of the age. We regret that the famous episode of his escape from the Piombi prison is omitted from the narrative. Of his gallant adventures one specimen, the entanglement with La Charpillon, is given at some length, and others are hinted at. The work is conceived in a sober and scholarly spirit, and the translation is easy and pleasant to read.

If the Venetian quack was, on the whole, a fairly harmless villain (he did not actually kill Mme. d'Urfé, though his drugs helped Nature), Mme. de Brinvilliers was a ruthless and terrible one. She seems to have belonged to the type familiar to modern criminologists, of wrongdoers who have no sense of morality or humanity. She has her prototypes among the Faustinas and Messalinas of Imperial Rome and in some of the women of the Renaissance. It seems certain that she killed successively her father and her two brothers, that she made a determined attempt on her sister, and designed the deaths of many other persons who crossed her path, and that one of her last feelings was resentment against those who were punishing her for what she regarded as a venial error. She had some little excuse for this point of view in the fact that the crime of poisoning had taken deep root in French society, and was to lead in the following years to a series of startling disclosures. But her failure to realise the horror of her deeds is just that which makes her story so utterly grim and appalling. It is curious to reflect that the historical notoriety of this sinister Marquise is mainly due to the pen of the most charming and open-hearted of Marquises, Mme. de Sévigné. The contrast between the writer of the famous Letters and the subject of some of them makes the story of the crimes only the more lurid.

Mr. Stokes, in his work, makes no attempt at heightening the horrors; he is not concerned solely with Mme. de Brinvilliers; he has tried, and with a very large measure of success, to give an account of French society during the first years of Louis XIV., and thereby to provide a frame to his canvas. In fact we are rather led by his Introduction to gather that the frame is the important part of his portrait. In any case the picture of the "Grand Siècle is a very vivid one, though its partial dependence on a particular narrative produces at times a curious effect.

The story occasionally suffers. It reminds us of the method of Victor Hugo, in the "Travailleurs de la Mer" for instance, where Gilliat is left struggling in the embraces of "la pieuvre," while the author begins a new chapter, consecrated to a minute description of the habits and appearance of the monster. Mr. Stokes is at some pains to treat his thesis from the point of view of what we may call comparative morality. He collects manifold instances of offences against modern morality, regarded with tolerance in seventeenth-century France. Thus peculation, the universal acceptance of Royal mistresses, and even poisoning itself appear as phenomena not likely in themselves to shock severely contemporary opinion. Kings and Ministers were the people most interested in the repression of poisoning, and the Brinvilliers case was used by them as an awful example. Sainte-Croix, the lover of Madame de Brinvilliers, is the seventeenth-century adventurer, climbing to fame by the ladder of female influence, like his successors in Goncourt and Balzac, and using chemical aids, like Casanova and Saint-Germain, though for their quackery he substituted a more sinister quality. A knowledge of deadly drugs was at the command of any one who had eyes to read. Mr. Stokes seems to exhaust the material of this famous case, and his analysis of the trial leaves that impression of inconclusiveness that a well-handled legal business always gives to the lay mind. Without Madame de Brinvilliers' confession, a most unaccountable document, which she did her best to disown, we should have found it hard to convince ourselves of her guilt. Mr. Stokes has a very original and attractive style, and his frequent habit of citing "modern instances" gives piquancy without vulgarity. The illustrations, particularly Nanteuil's engravings of Fouquet and Colbert, are often delightful and generally well chosen.

A SPIRIT IN PRISON

My Own Story. By LOUISA OF TUSCANY, ex-Crown Princess of Saxony. (Eveleigh Nash. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE propriety of this book will be questioned by many readers, but its deep and abiding human interest cannot be denied. It is one of the most amazing pieces of self-revelation that this generation has seen. It would almost seem that some men and women were destined to unhappiness from their birth. If this be so, then assuredly Louisa of Tuscany is of their number. The midwife who ushered her into the world had the reputation of being a clairvoyante. Taking the new-born child into her arms she exclaimed: "This child is destined to wear a crown, but her future will be an unhappy one, and sorrows innumerable will be her portion." The prophecy has been abundantly fulfilled. Louisa of Tuscany is the victim of temperament and of heredity. The fatal blood of the Hapsburgs flows in her veins. A child of sunshine and of laughter, she has been fated to pass the best years of her life among the gloom and seclusion of a Court where both laughter and sunshine are unknown. A born rebel, she has failed to learn the lesson that happiness is best attained by submission to the inevitable. The result has been tragedy—and tragedy unrelieved by any gleam of hope.

At the same time, one cannot avoid the conclusion that many of the troubles of the ex-Crown Princess of Saxony have been of her own making. Beset by enemies, she has made no endeavour to convert those enemies into friends. She appears to be a woman of strong affections and of equally violent dislikes. Her language with regard to those people for whom she has conceived an aversion borders upon hysteria. It is difficult to believe, for instance, that the late King George of Saxony was the human monster that he is depicted to have been in these pages. Of one of the officials at the Dresden Court she writes: "He is only worthy to be termed a noxious reptile." Another unfortunate Court nurse is described as "an ugly, hunchbacked woman, whose mind is as distorted as her body." Little wonder that a woman who is capable of so expressing herself has succeeded in rousing strong and implacable resentments.

But—when all needful deductions have been made—it is impossible to read this book without a feeling of deep compassion for the writer. In any other station of life her lot might have been a happy one; but she was ill-fitted to sustain the restraints and restrictions that beset the wearer of a crown. She had the true temperament of the Hapsburgs—"that curious mental 'kink'" (to use her own words) "which has driven some to suicide, banishment, and self-effacement." It is an expensive idiosyncrasy, and Louisa of Tuscany has paid the full price.

She tells her amazing story without reticence and without remorse. No detail is hidden, no ugly fact suppressed. Never perhaps has the fierce light that beats upon a throne revealed so much that is mean and sordid and repellent. There is scarcely a man in the whole dismal chronicle, if we except the unhappy Frederick-August, for whom one can feel a shadow of liking, or even of sympathy.

Early in life she was wooed by Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria. She appears to have liked him, but her affection never kindled into love. Ferdinand, however, was a persistent wooer. He refused to take "No" for an answer, and carried his case to the Princess's mother, only to be told that "when once Louisa has made up her mind, neither God nor the devil will make her change it."

The same evening (proceeds the narrative) I sat next the Bulgarian Lord High Chamberlain, the Count de Bourbonnion, who was quite an interesting man, and, as Ferdinand had brought several smart young Bulgarian officers in his suite, the time passed pleasantly, and I chattered away to my heart's content. Ferdinand was in a vile temper, and when courtesy obliged him to drink my health he banged his glass savagely on the table, as if his one idea was to break it; he sulked, and hardly spoke at all, and gobbled bread incessantly. From time to time he sent vindictive glances in my direction as I sat making myself particularly agreeable to his Minister, with the somewhat malicious motive, I am afraid, of endeavouring to make the Count realise what a charming Princess of Bulgaria I should have made.

The general outlines of the story, which concerns the ill-fated marriage of Louisa of Tuscany to Prince Frederick-August of Saxony, are already public property. From the first the marriage appears to have been a tragic blunder. It is due, however, to the Princess to say that she never attempts to throw any blame upon her husband. "He is affectionate, upright, pure-minded," she writes, "and his fatal weakness of character in great crises is solely due to his inborn indecision of temperament."

The Court at Dresden proved to be a purgatory. Every natural instinct, every spontaneous outburst of feeling was suppressed, and the unhappy Princess was doomed to wear a life-long mask. It seemed that in electing to become a Princess she had renounced her right to be a woman. The etiquette of the Court, like an iron vice, held her in its grip. To keep Ten Commandments is difficult enough. To keep ten thousand must be almost impossible. The Princess found herself entirely out of sympathy with the intellectual atmosphere of the Court. It was, she maintains, narrowly religious, and the influence of the Jesuits was everywhere paramount. Louisa failed to adapt herself to her environment. She was looked upon with universal distrust—treated, as she says, "like a little girl who requires a very strict governess."

Once she succeeded in breaking through the rigid bounds of Court routine. She was to have attended the Opera at Dresden with the Royal Family, but she pleaded a headache, and begged to be excused. Then, with the connivance of her children's old nurse, she contrived to disguise herself, and stole away to the Opera House, where she witnessed a part of the performance from the gallery. The criticisms of the "gods" on the Royal Family, seated below them in a box, are retailed, not without malice.

So the years dragged on. In the meanwhile the Princess's calumniators had been at work. Every effort to discredit the unhappy woman was made, until, shortly before the birth of her last child, she was accused of having an intrigue with her son's tutor, M. Giron. Both parties indignantly denied the charge, but the King of Saxony was furious, and told his daughter-in-law that he would have her sent to a madhouse. There was but one way out of the difficulty—flight. "My baby must never, never be born in a madhouse," exclaims the distracted mother. So she goes cautiously to work. Her health, she represents, is giving way, and it will be necessary for her to go to her parents for a few days. Leave of absence is accordingly granted, and Louisa flies to Salzburg, only to be rudely repulsed.

Her brother Leopold then urges her to accompany him to Switzerland. She gladly consents, and on her arrival finds that Leopold is about to be married to a woman of the people! Deserted once more, her thoughts fly to M. Giron. Scandal had been busy with the names of these two. Let scandal do its worst. So, with the dread of the madhouse still uppermost in her mind, she summons M. Giron to Switzerland. "Looking back with matured judgment," she writes, "I can see that I was entirely misguided in my method of defying fate; but my explanation must be that my mind was then unfitted to judge of the real seriousness of my act." The narrative closes with a statement of the marriage of the ex-Crown Princess of Tuscany to Signor Toselli.

There is much in this book which had far better never have been written—much, we think, that the ex-Crown Princess herself will upon mature reflection regret. But as a study of a curiously baffling and complex personality "My Own Story" is a permanent acquisition to the literature of our time.

THE GAELIC SPIRIT

Mearing Stones. By JOSEPH CAMPBELL. With Sixteen Pencil Drawings by the Author. 3s. 6d. net.

The Mountain Singer. By SEOSAMH MACCATHMHAOIL. 2s. 6d. net.

The Gilly of Christ. By SEOSAMH MACCATHMHAOIL. With Three Symbols by ADA M. WENTWORTH SHEILDS. 1s. net. (Maunsel and Co., Dublin.)

WHETHER he elect to be known as Joseph Campbell or to pass under the Gaelic form of that name, there is a certain spirit in all his work that cannot fail to mark him as, above all, a Gaelic singer. It is something that cannot be mistaken once it is heard, and it marks both his poetry and his prose. There are those who speak of it in its purest essence as something uncanny, as something which transcends the ordinary processes of the intellect, and takes its way through the blue of the air above, or through the brown earth, or in the green grass, appearing suddenly with no path to mark its progress, known not in its passage, but to be discovered only in its arrival. In this way, tradition says, the ancient Gaelic poets, revered as sacred by the countryside, passed their way from village to village, and there is therefore the kinship of process as well as the intuition of the mind to account for the allegation. In Mr. Campbell's work may be seen both the intuition and the process in his poetry and his prose. One is as sporadic, as gusty, and as uncertain as the other. Both are whimsical; but while one is at its best pure and rare, the other is strange and wild. Yet the chief distinction is that, while the poetry is, with all its whimsicality and irresponsibility, in each of its units compact of one complete emotion, the prose is disjointed and suggestive.

There are more than traces in both poetry and prose of an influence quite other than Gaelic. Indeed, often the two are held in such a balance of parts that it is impossible to dis sever one from the other. The whole idea of "Mearing Stones," for example, is indebted to Nietzsche. The book starts thus: "In the mountains," says Nietzsche, "the shortest way is from summit to summit;" and one remembers, as one reads the book, that even as Mr. Campbell so also Nietzsche gave out his matter in a series of ejaculations, whether the ejaculations confined themselves to a single interjected sentence or occupied the length of a more laboured paragraph. In one as in the other the method is singularly appropriate. In "Mearing Stones" the sub-title is "Leaves from my Note-book on Tramp in Donegal." The notes are not framed into a whole; they are just given as they occur. Some of them are idle and trivial enough from the standpoint of the reader, who knows not the occasion that woke them in Mr. Campbell's mind. Others haunt the memory, like a sudden illuminating ray that throws out a startling picture from the darkness. Yet even in some of these one may trace the mind of a man thoroughly acquainted with Nietzsche. Take for example the following:—

I met an old man on the road, and his face as yellow as dyer's rocket. "Walk easy past that little house beyond," says he in a whisper, turning round and pointing with his staff into the valley. "There's a young girl in it, and she celebrating the festival of death."

Now there is something essentially Gaelic in this; yet sprawled across it one can see just where Mr. Campbell derived his phrase "The festival of death." It is permissible, even necessary, for an author to refine peasant speech into literature (though less necessary in the West of Ireland than elsewhere); and there is no doubt that a mind fairly familiar with the Irish symbolising and ritualistic way of thought, in the best and purest sense of that word, will be able to trace the essential truth of Mr. Campbell's relation; yet it is not hard to see that in this case at least the Gael has been a student of literatures other than his own. In the volumes of poems, similarly, it is obvious that the poet, to his own considerable loss, has sought to mimic a note as foreign as that of robust Walt Whitman. In title and product "A Thousand Feet Up" is such a poem. In other poems some critics would be quick to say that there is derivation from Blake; but here we differ. It must always be remembered that Blake himself was a Gael. He chose subjects that required to be delivered in a certain way simply because he was himself; and any other poet choosing a similar subject for an identical reason would find it necessary to deliver it in an identical manner.

The excellent, though limited, value of a book such as "Mearing Stones" is that in reading it through one hears, as it were, over and over again, the authentic life of Donegal. Take, for example, the paragraph entitled "Derry People":—

Donegal is what I call "County-proud." Speaking of Derry—the marching county—an old woman said to me the other day:—"Och, there's no gentility about the Derry people. They go at a thing like a day's work."

That is more illuminating than much talk about the Irish temperament, and the influence of the Scots in the north-east of that country. It is geographically illuminating too. In such a phrase as that Donegal takes its stand with Mayo and Sligo in emphatic opposition to Derry and Antrim. Nevertheless, in all his prose Mr. Campbell never succeeds in catching and expressing the spirit of the county of his travels as he does in the illustrations that bedeck the book. We have never seen anything that has so transported us to the place where the roads are stony, the bogs gloomy, the mountains tragic, the skies grey and louring, the huts broken and the people poor beyond expression, yet where a mystic beauty haunts both scape and people that is inexpressibly melancholy and inevitably attractive.

Still it is not for his graphic pen that Mr. Campbell is chiefly held in affectionate regard. He has written poetry, much of which cannot leave a permanent memory, however it may aid in the general body of his work; some few lyrics will certainly be remembered by any who have a regard for the subtle musics that wash the soul clean in the general soilure of a day's experience. There are some that, we venture to say, have even won their claim to permanent attention. Who, for instance, will easily permit the following to pass from memory?—

When rooks fly homeward
And shadows fall,
When roses fold
On the hay-yard wall,
When blind moths flutter
By door and tree,
Then comes the quiet
Of Christ to me.

When stars look out
On the Children's Path,
And grey mists gather
On carn and rath,
When night is one
With the brooding sea.
Then comes the quiet
Of Christ to me.

There are other poems that must be tenderly remembered, some of which carry in the rhythm of their words the musical air to which they were written; but nothing that Mr. Campbell (or Seosamh MacCathmhaoil, if he prefer it that way) has done can even rival the slow beauty of that.

A FAITHFUL SERVANT OF THE PUBLIC

Sixty-eight Years on the Stage. By MRS. CHARLES CALVERT.
(Mills and Boon. 10s. 6d.)

THE younger generation of playgoers who associate Mrs. Charles Calvert with comic old ladies will do well to read her simple, straightforward, unaffected, and modest story of a long and arduous life. They will not only be led by this grand old actress behind the scenes and discover a great many of the trials and struggles and disappointments which Providence deals out to people who are, as a rule, surrounded by the glamour of the footlights, but they will be rewarded by becoming acquainted with a very good, kind, brave, and sweet woman, who lived laborious days with cheerfulness and optimism, achieved fame and comparative riches without conceit and disillusion, was a good wife, a good mother, and one who cannot find a bitter or an unkind word to say of any man or woman. Also they will become acquainted with the great struggle that was made by Charles Calvert to raise the stage above the level of barn-storming and be able to draw intensely interesting analogies between the productions and acting of to-day and those of forty or fifty years ago. In a wholly chatty and unpretentious manner, Mrs. Charles Calvert adds very valuably to the history of the English stage in the English provinces, London and America, and paints many faithful pictures of the lives, aims, and characters of such people as Phelps and Booth and John Lawrence Toole, Henry Irving, Robert Buchanan, Madame Vestris, and Miss Mary Anderson, Arthur Sullivan, and George Bernard Shaw. Many other equally interesting persons flit through her pages, although, rightly enough, her book is mainly a detailed account of her own life and work.

Mrs. Charles Calvert tells us that she was, metaphorically speaking, born on the stage, and played in Shakespeare at the tender age of seven. While still in her youth she first toured in America, and then, in conjunction with her husband, made Manchester what it has become again (in the hands of Miss Horniman) the first city in England, dramatically speaking. She shows how hard-working and simple and commonplace were the private lives of stage favourites when she was young—how devoid of the pretence and snobishness and social ambition which are the bad features of the private lives of the leading actors of to-day:—

The work was hard, she writes, because in all the theatres the bill was changed every night—even Drury Lane and Covent Garden changed their programme each evening. An actress had to find all her own costumes, and as the sewing-machine was not then invented, the alteration and retrimming of dresses was a tedious and daily task. Added to this the salaries were miserably small, and it can be easily understood that the patrician young ladies and gentlemen of the time were not anxious to join the theatrical ranks, and that, therefore, the supply scarcely equalled the demand. . . . The life, after all, had its compensations. The employment was continuous, the lodgings were returned to again and again, until the landladies were like old friends (and second mothers to us children), and the scanty wardrobe of the actress was often supplemented by gifts from the fashionable ladies, who would stop in their carriages and leave a parcel with their compliments.

How much better and more interesting would be the stage of to-day if the same conditions prevailed! We should not then so often complain of the hopeless incapability of much-advertised stars, who spend most of their long leisure at well-known clubs or in expensive motor-cars when they should be learning how to act:—

Many a time did Irving accompany my husband home to share our bit of hot supper (which usually consisted of Irish stew). Sometimes the fire in our little parlour would have got low, when we would adjourn to the kitchen, where, with our feet on the fender, we would discuss Shakespeare, dramatic art and poetry, until the "wee sma' hours ayont the twal'."

To-day, actors who cannot pretend to the ability either of Irving or Charles Calvert have supper at the Carlton and adjourn to palatial houses in Mayfair, or pseudo-mediæval halls high up above their theatres for post-prandial discussion. But what would Calvert say could he see their glittering productions of Shakespeare and listen to their amateurish delivery of immemorial verse? Mrs. Calvert does not venture upon any criticism. Once or twice only, when writing of her engagements with modern managers, she hints at the inefficiency, carelessness, and timidity which are so obvious to the general public. Certainly one of her most entertaining recollections is that which deals with the first production of a Bernard Shaw play in London—"Arms and the Man"—at the Avenue Theatre in 1894. We were there, and well remember the amazement, bewilderment, and almost horror of most of the audience, and the half-hearted criticisms which appeared in the papers the next day.

The play was produced hurriedly [it followed an appalling and well-deserved failure], we were none of us too conversant with our parts, and, at times, the public failed to grasp the intensely clever things that were thrown at them, but the verdict was decidedly favourable; and when Mr. Shaw appeared before the curtain he received an enthusiastic reception, marred only by one boo from a man in the gallery. Mr. Shaw's clever impromptu is well known: "I quite agree with that gentleman up there, but what is the use of his opinion and mine if the rest of the audience think differently?"

We wonder if Mrs. Calvert ever imagined that Mr. Shaw would become a cult, start a school, and invest the English language with a new word? The book has given us great pleasure, a wonderful insight into the industry and perseverance of actors of the old school, made us see even more clearly some of the reasons for the decline and fall of the English stage, and added not a little to our respect and affection for its author.

THE REGENERATION OF PALESTINE

Zionist Work in Palestine by Various Authorities. Edited by ISRAEL COHEN. With a Foreword by DAVID WOLFFSOHN. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 1s. net.)

THE man in the street has but a dim and inchoate idea of the real meaning and object of the Zionist Movement. Occasionally at intervals of months he sees some reference to it in his daily paper, but the bare item of news which he thus receives, unrelated to anything else within his cognisance, conveys little if anything to his mind, and as a rule he is so slightly interested as to allow the matter to pass out of his mind by the time that he reaches the next paragraph on the page, and to remain thus dormant until, some months hence, it is revived for a moment by another brief reference in the Press.

The Zionist Movement, as is probably known to every one, relates to the Holy Land, and most civilised people, at any rate in this country, have at least a sentimental or religious interest in the land in which both Christianity and Judaism had their birth. From these, or at any rate from a large proportion of them, the book now before us should have a sincere welcome. It shows how the country, rendered ever famous by the great events which have occurred since the opening of history upon its soil, is at length awakening from the slumber of centuries, and stretching its limbs preparatory to taking its place in the grand march of the countries of civilisation. It shows also the part taken by the Jews, the descendants of the former owners of the land, who have been wandering in exile for two thousand years, in the revival of the country. Above all, it explains what the somewhat mysterious Zionist Movement really is, details its aims and objects, and describes the extent to which advances have been made towards them. The object of the Zionist Movement, as described in this little volume, is, in brief, to secure the settlement of Jews in Palestine with the view, not of the creation of an independent or semi-independent state, but of the securing of a home where they can unmolested live their own life. This haven is, of course, intended principally for the harassed and persecuted Jew of Eastern Europe, where at present he is a pariah and helot whose life is ever at the disposal of his brutal neighbour, and where he suffers under a system of organised persecution on the part of the Government whose duty it is to protect him, cynically admitted to be intended to eradicate the Jewish race from Russian soil. The condition of the Jews in Roumania is only one degree better than that in the neighbouring empire.

The volume under notice takes the form of a symposium to which a number of authorities write on the subjects on which they are recognised as experts. These essays all relate to the very modern Jewish revival in Palestine. The volume is in a sense unique, the only other in the English language approaching it in object and subject being Mr. Davis Trietsch's little book published a few years ago. The latter is, however, more of the nature of a guide-book, whereas that under notice consists of a series of essays treating of different aspects of modern Palestine each complete in itself. The Jewish Population of Palestine is dealt with by Dr. Lazar Grünbut, of Jerusalem; Vegetation in Palestine, by Professor O. Warburg, of Berlin, the recently-elected leader of the Zionist movement. Mr. Israel Abrahams, of Cambridge, writes on a University for Jerusalem; Professor Boritz Schatz on the Bezalel Institute—that wonderful school of arts and crafts which he has himself created at Jerusalem. From Dr. Hans Mühsam readers learn of the Hygienic Institute in Palestine; from Dr. Aaron Sandler, of the Health Conditions of Palestine; from Dr. Jacob Thon, of the Jewish Schools in Palestine, prominent among which is the Evelina Rothschild School at Jerusalem, supported by the Jews of England; and from Mrs. Sarah Thon, of Women's Work in Palestine. Dr. Heinrich Loewe writes on Libraries in Palestine, Mr. Aaron Aaronsohn on the Jewish Agricultural Experiment Station and its programme, Dr. Arthur Rupp on the Return of the Jews to Agriculture, Mr. David Yellin on the Renaissance of the Hebrew Language, and Mr. D. Levontin and Dr. Arthur Rupp on Commercial Topics. Finally, the Jewish future in Palestine is forecasted by Dr. Elias Auerbach, who, in agreement with Dr. O. Thon, another contributor to this volume, foresees that the Turks themselves will soon recognise the absolute necessity of a considerable Jewish immigration. Then "they [the Turks] will have to place a big premium upon Jewish immigration in order to secure an ample supply of the most productive, loyal, and cultured citizens."

The volume is illustrated by several photographs of persons and places, and its value is increased by an appendix in which the prospects of employment are indicated. A list of the Jewish colonies is also furnished, and official Zionism and its institutions are described.

HISTORY AND INDUSTRY

Peeps at Nature: British Land Mammals and their Habits.

By A. NICOL SIMPSON, F.Z.S. Illustrated.

Peeps at Industries: Sugar. By EDITH A. BROWNE. Illustrated.

Peeps at History: Scotland. By G. E. MITTON. Illustrated by J. Jellicoe. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d. net each.)

THEIR "Peeps at Many Lands and Cities" having met with well-deserved success, the Messrs. Black have been encouraged to adventure on three other series of "Peeps" produced on the same lines. The "Peeps at Nature," edited by the Rev. Charles A. Hall, so far comprise "Wild Flowers and their Wonderful Ways," "Bird-life of the Seasons," and "British Land Mammals and their Habits," the volume under review. Every lover of Nature will, we feel sure, peruse this little book with interest, and young people, who have a penchant towards the study of natural history, will find it fascinating reading. In addition to descriptions and anecdotes of British mammals as they exist to-day, many which are no longer indigenous to these islands receive a passing notice, as, for instance, the Brown Bear which provided sport for the ancient Romans, the Reindeer which is said to have been at one time more abundant in Great Britain than the Red Deer is at the present time, the Beaver, the Wild Boar, and the Wolf which survived in Scotland until the middle of the eighteenth century.

The "Peeps at Industries," which is a more technical series, aims at bringing the reader into a complete understanding of all the great industries of the British Empire and the world at large. The first volume is devoted to sugar-growing and sugar-making, and deals with both cane and beet sugar, the produce of British Guiana, the homeland of Demerara sugar, receiving special notice. The earlier volumes of the "Peeps at History" are allotted to Scotland, India, Canada, and Japan respectively. So far we have only received the first mentioned, and we cannot say that we are deeply impressed by it. Mr. Mitton tells the story in a simple, artless sort of way to a certain extent, but, presumably for the delectation of the "Unspeakable Scot," he indulges spasmodically in little distortions of facts to the prejudice of the despised Sassenach. This may be pleasing to the young Scottish mind, but it is not the way to teach history, which should be the object, we take it, of this series, and is the more to be regretted because it is so unnecessary and uncalled-for. Describing the dress of a Highland chief, Mr. Mitton says, "Only chiefs may wear the eagle's feather." Surely he must be aware that in these democratic and degenerate days, when sumptuary laws are a thing of the past, any Tom, Dick, or Harry may wear a whole eagle on his head, let alone a feather, if he can afford to do so.

The volumes are admirably illustrated and exceptionally cheap, but we cannot help thinking that it is a great mistake that the page plates have not been placed opposite the pages they illustrate. It is true that in the first two volumes the plates bear a reference to the pages describing them; but why in the name of common sense should the Red Deer plate be allotted to a page devoted to the Badger, and the Squirrel plate to the Red Deer section? In the "Scotland" volume the plates have no page references, so that we have "Queen Mary's Escape from Loch Leven" illustrating Wallace's victory over the English at Stirling, and the "Murder of Archbishop Sharp" the "Massacre of Glencoe," which is, to say the least, wondrous strange.

THE AUTHOR AT PLAY

A Farm in Creamland. By CHARLES GARVICE. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. CHARLES GARVICE has beaten his pen into a ploughshare. The fact, however, need not yet be hailed with joy by the less successful rivals of this very popular novelist. The ploughshare is merely an interlude of some 392 pages. Having delved into the soil and shown us its true ruddy Devon texture, Mr. Garvice will undoubtedly bring his cows and pigs beneath a pleasant fresh crop of fiction and romance. Not that romance is absent from his farm in Creamland. The book, as might be expected, is redolent of the West Country—of its humours, softness, and simple geniality. Here we see the author, freed from the cares of his multitude of heroes and heroines, in his rôle of land-owner. We see him mounted and on foot; we see him shooting pheasant, partridge, homely rabbit, and probably an occasional fox. We must admit that this latter deduc-tion is arrived at by subtle methods. It is based merely on the absence of any direct denial of this feat in the book! Mr. Garvice is to be congratulated in that, an experienced farmer, he has retained his enthusiasm for the art. Concerning the financial success of such an agricultural venture he holds no illusions. Nevertheless, we are glad that he is possessed of his farm, since from that source has sprung this idyllic book of his men, hearts, and acres. We suggest that Mr. Garvice should buy another farm, and write a second book of the kind. Here is a passage that must interest those concerned with the Devon tongue: it occurs at the end of a chapter on rustic wit:—

I have endeavoured to repeat the homely conversation in language as near to that which they used as I can; but it is impossible to reproduce the rich West Country burr, the curious inflection and intonation of the words, and the soft pronunciation which they give to the letter "u." I have seen words in which it occurs spelt in various ways in the attempt to give its sound, but the attempt is never successful. Take the word "due," for instance. They don't pronounce it "doo," and if you spell it "dew" (as I have seen it done) it only brings us back to the same sound; and though misspelt words may look funny on paper, they fail in giving us an accurate reproduction of a conversation. To spell cat with a "k," or me with two "ee's" may be very witty, but it does not alter the pronunciation of the words. The Devonshire people pronounce "u" as do the French, and no amount of misspelling will make it clearer.

These words might be noted with considerable advantage by those others who write of the West Country—not necessarily from within!

SHORTER REVIEWS

Madge Carrington and her Welsh Neighbours. By "DRAIG GLAS." (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

IN this story of light and pleasantly-told incidents "Draig Glas" follows up, in a rather more serious vein, the attack on the Welsh country folk which he made in "The Perfidious Welshman." The long succession of annoyances, proceeding from mere ungratefulness to poaching, the garden-produce, and heath burning, which Carrington's tenants and village folk inflicted on the exemplary landlord, make the land "Draig Glas" has the skill to make it to rejoice when Mr. Carrington becomes and turns his estate over to an agent, meanwhile. There are several neat chapters, including a most irritating Rector called and Madge, the squire's daughter, is in love affair with one Alec Murray proving in interest. We are inclined to think the scenery is too much insisted upon, as practice chapter begins with a couple of pages about the state of the vegetation. The best parts are its conversations. We know not if the author in his strictures on the Welsh, but he certainly is case entertainingly.

Mechanical Inventions of To-day. By THOMAS W. C. (Seeley, Service, and Co., Ltd. 5s. net.)

THE progress of applied science has brought into use, especially in our large cities, many intricate devices for the safety, convenience, and enjoyment of kind—devices of which the average man is ignorant, although he sees their effects and profits every day of his life. Take the case of a person on a short journey by the District Railway. On an i-screen the destination of his train appears as by magic; red lights change to green, green to red, without any visible human intervention; a dozen automatic appliances and clever instruments combine to ensure his arrival at his destination. How all this is accomplished Mr. Corbin lucidly explains in his book, with the aid of simplified diagrams and plentiful pictures; in fact the chapter entitled "Inventions on the Railway" is one of the most interesting imaginable. The colliery, the cotton-mill, the modern boiler and its adjuncts are all thoroughly treated; electric machinery, gas and steam and heat engines occupy many pages. Not often is the author to be caught tripping, but we notice one careless sentence: "There are several ways of burning oil in a boiler"—the meaning, of course, is obvious as referring to the oil-fuel of the furnace.

A valuable portion of the volume for those who do not profess a deep knowledge of engineering is that dealing with the turbine, and we have rarely read a more capable explanation of the action of steam in this essentially modern development of the steam-engine. Altogether, Mr. Corbin is to be congratulated on his book; in knowledge and in clearness of exposition it is far better than most works of a similar character and aim.

Caractères. By JEAN DE LA BRUYÈRE.

Miss Rovel. By VICTOR CHERBULIEZ.

La Chanoinesse. By ANDRÉ THEURIET. (T. Nelson and Sons, 1s. net each.)

RECENT additions to the excellent "Collection Nelson," consisting chiefly of masterpieces of French literature, are the volumes under notice, which show no falling-off both as regards quality and production, and compare favourably with their predecessors in the same series. La Bruyère was a most effective satirist who thought less of the taste of his age than of the judgment of posterity, and his "Caractères" contain not only shrewd attacks on dead celebrities, but also biting allusions to contemporary authors, which was somewhat audacious in the days of "Le Roi Soleil," when lettres de cachet could be had almost for the asking. Victor Cherbuliez was a cultivated man of the world who wrote both novels and political articles. "Miss Rovel," though not the most popular of his works, is nevertheless thoroughly typical of his qualities as a writer of fiction, and in it he very successfully depicts the English tomboy as she has been painted for us by the Misses Braddon and Rhoda Broughton. Theuriet's "La Chanoinesse" is an exciting story of the Great French Revolution, and is alive with historical truth.

The Regent's Park and Primrose Hill: History and Antiquities.

With Maps and Illustrations. By A. D. WEBSTER. (Greening and Co. 5s. net.)

PROBABLY not many of the thousands who visit the Zoological Gardens every year give a thought to the interesting history of the place and its surroundings. "Marylebone Park," the original name of Regent's Park, dates from the time of Henry VIII., and was much frequented by Royalty as a hunting-ground down to the days of Cromwell. Many curious and rare old pictures are reproduced in this handy little volume; Marylebone Church, for instance, is shown in the sixteenth century as a small edifice quite in the country—three miles, in fact, from the London of the period. Mr. Webster does not confine himself within narrow limits; he treats of the Regent's Canal, the Botanical Gardens, the "Zoo," and even the fungi of the district; the whole book is packed with information, and is a most valuable summary of both ancient and modern items of interest.

FICTION

Burning Daylight. By JACK LONDON. (William Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. JACK LONDON'S new novel, "Burning Daylight," is probably the best he has written. The first part of the story rings with the call to the wilds; the vigour and love of adventure of the pioneer are here, and Elam Harnish ("Burning Daylight") is the typical athletic and square-dealing man of the world that Mr. London likes so well. Nevertheless, while there is no lack of sincerity, yet that absence of sense of proportion and idea of perspective which characterises all American writing cannot pass unnoticed. Mr. London either does not possess the artistic ability to portray the changing moods with variation of surroundings, or, on the other hand, the artistic ability is swamped and stultified by unconscious exaggeration. "Daylight" appears to us as three distinct characters: first he is the hero of the Yukon; then we see him as the millionaire, relentless and grasping, in San Francisco; and, lastly, as the penniless lover and husband on the Californian ranch. There is no shading off from one phase to another: the millionaire does not feel like a captive bird in his office; there is no gasping after God's free air. One almost feels that art has been sacrificed in order that a happy ending may be successfully engineered. The only trait in Harnish which appears throughout is the desire to outdo every one, to be super-everything. Nobody can walk like Harnish; the stamina of the Indian race is as nought; he trails seventy miles in one day, dances all night, and is on his journey over the frosty, snow-covered tracks the next morning. He out-drinks his companions, lifts greater weights, is the biggest gambler, he fears but one influence—women. His luck is surprising: by hard work and fearless speculation he amasses a fortune of eleven million dollars in the gold boom. With this he leaves the wilds, practically without a regret, and settles down to gamble in California. Here arises the love-interest about which Mr. London appears to be as doubtful as does Daylight himself. One day his stenographer accidentally draws attention to a mistake in grammar, and this is the beginning. Miracles still happen—and Mr. London seems to believe in them. As a description of life and adventure in the snow and ice, and as a convincing criticism of American finance, the book has undoubted value. The literary skill, the intellectual conviction, the breadth of vision are here; but why does not Mr. London break away from American orthodoxy?

Dorinda's Birthday. By CHARLES LEE. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

THOSE who are acquainted with Mr. Lee's charming Cornish stories will be pleased to learn that "Dorinda's Birthday" in every way equals, if not surpasses, his previous descriptions of life in the Duchy he knows so well. The plot is slight, the story short, but still the spell of it all is irresistible. St. Hender's Feast Day, with the foregathering of the villagers at the annual revels, is all the material that our author takes from which to weave his tale, but every character is so well drawn that it is impossible not to see and know each one. We can hear Mrs. Barron, a withered dame of sixty with eleven—and increasing—symptoms call after the merrymakers as they leave Sunny Corner. We can see Mrs. Varco, who was "large," enjoying a chat with Mrs. Pedrick as she relates how on her visit to the sights of London she "stuck in the turnstile every time and no getting . . . for'ard or back'ard." The dear old lady, too, is there as she tries to read the paper "every week reg'lar," but, owing to failing eyesight and a poor education, drops six months behind, although as she says—

This old news I do find en more comfortable, like, than if 'a was raw-new . . . seeing 'tis all over and done with months ago—tears dried, proper new headstones put up 'pon the graves, wounds stitched up, handsome wooden legs provided for them that do require them—why, it do just touch the heart softly.

But perhaps the best sketched of them all is "boy Albert," a "short, scrubby, middle-aged man"—"put in with the dough and took out with the cakes"—as one of his successful rivals unkindly describes him. Albert is always missing his chances with members of the fair sex in spite of very great attention to the details of his toilet. This is Albert as he returns dejected and rejected to his mother's house on the afternoon of the Feast Day:—

A blue peaked cap was superimposed on a black tail-coat and fancy waistcoat, and those again on tight white flannel trousers and white canvas shoes; so that, looking him over from head to foot, you began your acquaintance with the mate of a coasting vessel, went on to a small country tradesman at a tea-party, and finished up with a cricketer arrayed for the field.

There is a fount of humour throughout the story which is always fresh, and provokes many a quiet chuckle as it ripples in and out the pages. We were very sorry when the time came to lay the book down.

The Price of Empire. By E. HOBART-HAMPDEN. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.)

If directness and conscientiousness of narration were the chief virtues of the novelist, then this novel would be a masterpiece. There is little to weary the imagination of the reader; every detail is carefully explained; curiosity is aroused only to discover whether the plot will follow the path we expect—and we are rarely disappointed. The author quickly exposes the cards he intends to play, and the slightest consideration shows that there will be little chance of an exciting finish. Lilian Sylvester, returning to India from England, is waiting to go ashore at Bombay, and to her are brought her letters by the young friend of the voyage, Allan Tremaine, who "was pleasant to look upon, not very tall, but well made, with grey eyes, set wide apart, and smooth fair hair." Lilian's brother writes of sedition in his district, and of the appointment of a Bengali of supposed anarchist leanings as Assistant Commissioner, while Allan, the young Civil Servant, has news that he has been appointed to the same station as the Sylvesters. In the streets of Bombay the carriage conveying Lilian and Allan is brought to rest adjacent to a native dressed in European clothes who had been, of course, a friend of Allan at Oxford, and whose brother is, of course, the new Assistant Commissioner. Truly may Allan remark: "What a curious coincidence!" It should be unnecessary to say that the Bengalis have a pretty, scheming sister—and that the novel tells of sedition, conspiracy, treachery, and self-sacrifice.

Can Man Put Asunder? By LADY NAPIER OF MAGDALA. (John Murray. 6s.)

We have here a novel of society in which the bad characters are monotonously vicious and the good characters are as dull as Mid-Victorian Sunday afternoons. Gee Gee, alias George Gascoigne, the wicked hero, has thirty thousand a year and is what one might call a cad. He marries Shona Barcaldine, the heroine, and treats her very badly, finally going off in his yacht with Lady Cyril Gorhamberry, a lady who uses too much scent and has other faults. We are also introduced to a scheming sister, a youthful prodigy, a kind-hearted duchess, and an exceedingly stupid artist. We attend several balls, have tea several times in luxurious style, and hear some of the fascinating conversation of country houses. If after such treatment we are not satisfied and grateful, it must be because we are afflicted with a small amount of literary taste and do not greatly care for high society in the manner of the Family Herald. The only sentiment, besides perfect boredom, which this book arouses in us is one of polite wonder at the limitless charity of the modern reader and the modern publisher, which puts the pen of the novelist into the hands of so many people completely devoid of any power to use it.

THE THEATRE

WASHINGTON IRVING AND VARIATIONS

WITH an orchestra playing special music in a sort of wood-clearing and upon a stage outlined with the trunks of specially massive trees, Mr. Cyril Maude has recently produced a special version of that irresistible old story with which "rare" Joe Jefferson was well content. There is, indeed, something too special about all this. Just as good wine needs no bush, Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle" needed no variation, no special treatment. It is a classic, and if a revival seems desirable, it should be treated as such. What, we wonder, would have been rare Joe Jefferson's feelings could he have returned to spend an evening at the Playhouse? Surely his opinion of modern theatre management would be worth hearing when he found that Mr. Maude was afraid to trust to the old direct story and so called in the aid of an adapter, of scene painters, of a composer of incidental music, and of Messrs. Maskelyne and Devant?

Apart from what is, in our opinion, a piece of special impertinence to the work of Washington Irving there is very much in this "entirely new version" of "Rip Van Winkle" that is very charming. From the point of view of scenic production it is very beautiful and imaginative, and the pictures of all the curious and Sime-like nightmares that run through the schnapps-soddened brain of the new Rip are quaint, alluring, impressive, and creepy. They are, perhaps, too creepy for the ordinary playgoer, who desires above all things to be made to laugh. We had no wish to find ourselves alone on some blasted heath in the dead of a moonlight night, while the recollection was upon us of the gnome-ridden place echoing with the wailing of lost souls in which Rip found himself. If the play had been put on by a Society for the Abolition of Strong Drink it could not have taught a better lesson. Never will we drink schnapps again. Once having seen that eerie spot in the Kaatskills, which was alive with hideously grinning dwarfs, who were under the control of a green-faced fiend armed with a lash, we shall give schnapps a wide berth. We are quite certain that if an unwary parent took a high-strung child to see the play he would regret having done so, not once but many times.

Mr. Austin Strong's entirely new Rip is an unmarried man. He is also an attractive, lovable, wheedling rogue, who is no one's enemy. He has been in prison for vagrancy, or some such offence, and comes back to the village with his pockets full of presents. Dominie van Schaiek has warned the villagers against the drunken ne'er-do-weel, but he soon has them all round him listening to his infectious laugh. Then the beautiful Minna Van de Grift comes out of her cottage, and we are somewhat surprised to find that she is in love with Rip. We find also that she is the daughter of the Van de Grift who disappeared years ago when thunder reverberated among the mountains, and is on the charge of the village. She hopes that Rip will now turn over a new leaf, one more final new leaf. He swears that he will, but Minna, who knows his character only too well, cannot rely upon him. She loves him, and is ready to marry and go into the mountains with him, but not until he has polished an old copper pan so that she may be able to see her face in it—a task which seems to Rip to be easy enough. Left alone he sits down and sets to work babbling of green fields, when out of a water-barrel creeps a nasty little green dwarf—the very materialisation of concentrated schnapps. With many signs and moustache-pulling this creature gives Rip to understand that he will undertake to clean the pan. Seeing his way to escape what appears to him to be entirely unnecessary labour, Rip gives up the pan, only to find that the dwarf has made it blacker than ever by setting some mysterious fluid alight in it. So he sits down again to be almost instantly torn away from his test task by his five senses. These dance round him in the form of very alluring and transparent maidens, who are experts in the art of dancing as it is expressed by the Prime Absolute of the Russian ballet. They lead him gradually to a bottle of schnapps, and compel him to drain it to the dregs, and it is upon a very drunken Rip with a still unpolished pan that Minna broken-heartedly comes. He has failed terribly. She does not realise this more acutely than he himself does. And when he has received his marching orders and pulls himself together to go out of the village to his beloved woods, the dwarf appears again with a small keg of his delicious poison, which he begs Rip to carry for him.

From this moment until the scenes fifty years later the play develops into a series of Sime-like nightmares. Woods ~~filled with~~ ^{filled with} strange, inhuman cries, ill-shaped gnomes with fungi growing on their ears and noses, and hands whose fingers are bulbous and distorted, bob up from behind grotesque rocks. The very moon, new-born and slim, seems to be set in a sky alive with ugly shapes, and shines down upon a hill set among forbidding, whispering mountains. Rip finds his own body lying in a drunken sleep beneath a tree whose branches have twisted themselves into grimaces. He stumbles upon a glorious keg of schnapps, which is like nothing so much as liquid moonbeams. At the wedding invitation of countless whimsical creatures he drinks and is possessed. Out from behind a rock comes a wailing creature, who pours forth a stream of incoherent pleadings. It is Minna's father, Van de Grift, who has been held a prisoner by this army of corpulent abortions. He implores the terrified Rip to utter a wish ("Wish, wish," go the gnomes from crannies and grottoes and peaks), so that his soul and body may be set free. Whereupon the frightened ne'er-do-weel, thinking more of the girl he loves than his comfort and peace of mind, offers himself up to the chief abortion, and Van de Grift flashes back into his own shape and rushes away.

Fifty years later, on a sunny day in autumn, several soldiers who have taken part in the war of 1812 are staggering back to their homes. They rest for a moment or two on the roots of a massive tree, which has shed its leaves in a great golden pile. They are sick of war and wounds, and long for home and peace. On they go, and when their footsteps have died away something stirs beneath the leaves, and there comes a faint sound, as of a man stretching himself after a long sleep. By twos and threes the leaves fall away. A foot appears, a ragged arm, a head covered with long white hair and cobwebs—it is Rip Van Winkle, who thinks that he has been sleeping since yesterday, the merry, irresponsible, light-hearted ne'er-do-weel, over whose sleeping head fifty autumns have passed, and upon whose ageing body fifty great golden piles have fallen. There is a squirrel fast asleep in his pocket, and at his elbow the copper pan, as old and battered as himself. Ah! now he will clean it and take it down to Minna in the village, so that she may see her face in it.

But when at last he totters down the snow is on the ground and on the roofs of innumerable houses that seem to him to have grown up in the night, and upon a number of strange factory chimneys which appear to have trodden down the trees. There is the old stream, however, and the inevitable fisherman and the little bridge, and there are many people with new faces and new voices and unrecognising eyes. No one knows this strange old man who cries out for his friends and Minna, and mentions names that belong to a time that no one can remember. "Where are my friends and my good dog Schnider . . . ?" The poor old man must be wandering in his mind. Men speak roughly to him, women draw away as he passes, and children titter. Dominie John Hutchinson, a good American citizen, does his best to find some sense in his childish babble. It is no good. He shall remain, however, and be made comfortable, and given fire and food. And it is upon an aged, bent, ragged, and weeping Rip that the white-haired Minna finally comes. "Rip! . . . Minna!" A gleaming pan is laid at her feet clean enough to make a looking-glass for a faithful face.

Whatever, then, we may think of the sacrilege that has been done to Washington Irving's story, we repeat that there is much that is beautiful and moving in this new version, and few things more beautiful and more moving than the meeting of Rip and Minna. This scene was played with the greatest economy of action by Mr. and Mrs. Cyril Maude, and would draw tears from a sphinx. Indeed, every scene in which Mrs. Maude took part was played perfectly, and if Mr. Maude was not quite all that we imagined Rip to be, he was not far short of it. His old, broken, wistful Rip was quite exquisitely conceived and brought to life. ~~Miss Margaret Maude as the young Minna~~ was Miss Winifred Emery when young—and it is not possible to pay her a higher compliment for beauty and ability. Among a long cast the names of Mr. Holman Clark, Mr. John Harwood, Mr. Shiel Barry, Mr. Andrews, and Mr. Daniel McCarthy (in two parts) must be picked out for congratulation. The incidental music by Mr. John Ansell was good, although a little uninspired. As to Mr. Austin Strong, who made this entirely new version of "Rip Van Winkle"—well, if he felt impelled to make an entirely new version he has certainly done so, admirably well.

A BRITISH OUTPOST IN CHINA

I WAS going to visit "the new territories"—the three hundred square miles of the mainland leased by the British Government in 1898.

A rickshaw with three runners was waiting for me at Kowloon when I stepped off the ferry steamer that had brought me from Blake Pier, on the island of Hong Kong. The inevitable roast pig glowed on the stall of a street vendor with a richness that brought to mind Giorgione's "Concert" and Pater's thread of gold.

Some fresh land was being reclaimed from the sea here by dumping truckloads of sand into the hollows at a place used hitherto as a typhoon refuge. Behind and across the harbour the peak loomed dark purple, but the valleys I was soon crossing were covered with green paddy-fields and vegetable gardens, while here and there a patch of hillside was devoted to the dead and set about with urns of human bones.

Gradually the well-metalled road ascended and the hill-sides began to be covered with young fir-growth. Sometimes it crossed deep clefts, down which lay black smooth boulders detached from the rock above. At Lok-lo-ha (ten miles from Kowloon), beyond the great railway tunnel, over a mile in length, which has been constructed for the lines between Kowloon and Canton, I left the rickshaw to continue my journey in a police-launch to Taipo. Clumps of graceful feathery bamboo varied the monotony of paddy-fields, and little villages appeared along the curving coast, one of which was entirely shut in by a stone wall and eight small towers.

Far out in the bay the police-launch appeared puffing towards the sandy beach, and when it arrived, left immediately for Taipo, which is really the name of a district in the middle of which is Taipo-Hou, meaning Taipo market. Out through a gap lay Mir's Bay, and beyond that Chinese territory; in the opposite direction rose the Pat Sin Ling, the range of the Eight Spirits, sharply cut and clefted.

The local magistrate gave me hearty welcome. He lived happily with several colour-prints by Utamaro, a complete edition of Renan's works, in many volumes, and a dog of extreme wisdom but doubtful origin which had been described by experts as "not too big and white." The white dog's master had had a curious case before him that morning. An old Chinaman had been up to explain that one of his sons had had serious bleeding at the nose. They had consulted the Chinese doctor, and upon examining the case he had decided the reason was that another grave had been made twenty feet from the grave of the man's father. This, the doctor had declared, had intercepted the pulse of the dragon, and unless the second grave were removed the nose-bleeding would continue till the boy died.

"Fungshe," or the great Science of Aspects, is a difficult matter to understand, but I was assured that a study of the great theologian's "Philosophic Dialogues" is no bad help in the solution of the daily problems of an English magistrate in China.

We walked through several villages that afternoon, including Pan Chung and Tai-wo-shi, where a waterwheel was causing a series of hammers to pound up the wood of which the joss-stick powder is made.

Several times we crossed a pretty tumbling stream by precarious stepping-stones, a stream with trees leaning over it, that reminded me of the Glaslynn in North Wales, and at Wun Yiu village watched a potter at work painting a row of little jars before glazing them.

The magistrate gave good account of the village people, declaring them quiet, well-behaved folk, rarely troubling the Indian police quartered at Taipo, though the latter are not always at peace among themselves.

A sergeant had recently preferred a charge against a constable of stealing the oil (nut oil) from his lantern to put in his curry. At the same time the constable preferred a charge against the sergeant of stealing a chicken while they were out on patrol together. The cockerel was produced in court, and the constable said he remonstrated when the sergeant stole the fowl, and that the sergeant replied to him: "Is it for you to say to me, a sergeant, what I should do?"

But all this had occurred a month previously, and when asked why he had not brought the charge before, the constable was ready with his answer. He said that every morning all the month he had asked the sergeant for leave to go in and report him and make the charge, and always the sergeant had replied: "No, I will not give you leave to go and report me." Of the oil-stealing there was no evidence but that of the sergeant himself. He declared that he saw the constable go to the back room, and, opening the bullseye lantern, empty the oil into his plate of curry. Now, the evidence appearing insufficient, the case was about to be dismissed when the sergeant said he had something to ask, and it was that he might have permission to go to Hong Kong and employ a solicitor.

"Very well," said the magistrate, "one hundred dollars down for your bail." The man put this down then and there in notes from his pocket. At Hong Kong he paid fifty dollars to a solicitor who came out and lunched with the magistrate. At lunch the magistrate said, talking of the case, "I was going to dismiss it for want of evidence, but the man wanted to employ a solicitor, so I thought that would be the most satisfactory way of fining him."

"Yes; but my dear fellow," said the solicitor, "I've taken his money and I must make a show for it—may I talk?"

In the afternoon the case was tried. That solicitor made a long, fervid, and impassioned speech, and the case was dismissed; the magistrate knew all along that it was a long-standing feud between the sergeant and the constable, and one day that sergeant found himself transferred to another place.

The next morning it was very beautiful at Taipo as I waited for the launch to come for me. A big square fishing-net hung in the air, with its vent open above the blue water. At the end of the wooden pier a little square lantern swung in the breeze, the sun glinting brightly upon it. A pale moon hung in the Western sky, and in the East, beneath the sun, was the wonderful curve of the Saddle-back mountain—just a shadow of colour—purple blue and grey. And to the north of the space of open water was the long line of the mountain of the Eight Spirits, soft and warm and riven by clefts, full of violet shadows leading to the sea. And on the right all along the turnings of the shore at the base of the hills appeared the buttressed and embanked line of the new railway that shall change China more swiftly than Labour Members can scratch the face of an empire.

A. HUGH FISHER.

THE WOMEN OF SHAKESPEARE*

MR. HARRIS' first book, "The Man Shakespeare," made nonsense of nearly all the books that have been written on Shakespeare and his plays. Even the gasping professors did not challenge Mr. Harris' knowledge, and he painted his portrait of the dramatist with a certainty of touch and a passionate sincerity more convincing than any arguments. Here at length was a Shakespeare who might have written Shakespeare's plays, and that was already more than could be said of the remarkable monster created by the critics in two hundred years of labour. The conventional picture of the British tradesman-dramatist who drew the supremest eloquence of passion from the shallows of a dispassionate soul could be at length relegated to the shelves of that literary chamber of horrors where the work of all the writers who have laboured without love shall meet at last. Mr. Harris' conception of Shakespeare the man delivered us not only from those cruel libels on our great poet, but from a deal of bad criticism of the plays as well. The commentators and emendators had bored us with their futilities till we began to associate Shakespeare with a condition of spiritual weariness. English scholars seemed to have determined to confine themselves to "textual criticism," when Mr. Harris, following or rather super-seeding Coleridge, showed that the only way to reach fine textual criticism was to consider the plays as works of art, and not as strings of broken, insentient words.

* The Women of Shakespeare. By Frank Harris. (Methuen and Co. 7s. 6d.)

"The Man Shakespeare" gave us a wonderful portrait of Shakespeare, an elaborate and convincing theory as to the subjective nature of his work, and incidentally some convincing criticism of the various plays; but naturally the book was in the main devoted to the portrayal of the dramatist, and the criticism of the plays was directed to that end: much, therefore, had to remain unsaid, not because it was not worth saying, but because the author was bound by his plan to consider chiefly those characters in which Shakespeare draws his own portrait.

In his new book Mr. Harris allows himself a wider range, and we certainly profit by his greater freedom. He has traced for us the likenesses not only of that "dark lady" of the Sonnets whose wanton love made Shakespeare a great tragic poet, but also of Shakespeare's mother, of his wife, and of his favourite daughter, Judith. In addition, the author renews and strengthens his arguments in favour of the relative innocence of the Sonnets, and, even more important, traces Shakespeare's hand in many passages that have not previously been ascribed to him. Here, surely, is debatable matter enough for one volume.

In this book Mr. Harris has drawn the likeness of the dark lady, Mary Fitton, with full detail, showing how Shakespeare gives us "a realistic snapshot of her in Rosaline in 'Romeo and Juliet,' a superb photograph of her as Rosaline again in 'Love's Labour's Lost,' idealistic, happy impressions of her in Julia, Juliet, Portia, Beatrice, and Rosalind; passionate full-length portraits of her in the Sonnets and as 'false Cressid,' and finally a triumphant living, breathing picture of her in 'Cleopatra'—a world's masterpiece. Lady Macbeth is a mere sketch of her imperious strength and selfwill; Goneril, a slight copy of Lady Macbeth, with lust emphasised." Volumnia in "Coriolanus" is a portrait of Shakespeare's mother; Marina, Perdita, and Miranda are idealised sketches of his younger daughter, Judith. (Arthur in "King John," as Mr. Harris showed in his previous book, is probably a portrait of Shakespeare's son Iamnet, or at least a picture inspired by him.)

As for Mistress Anne Hathaway, the wife whom Shakespeare married against his will and virtually deserted while he achieved his fame in London, the wife for whom he was unwilling to pay a debt of forty shillings, the wife to whom he bequeathed his "second-best bed," Mr. Harris finds "an extraordinary spirit-photograph of her, so to speak, as Adriana in 'The Comedy of Errors,' her furious temper forces itself to view again where ill-temper is utterly out of place in the raging, raving Constance of 'King John,' and again in Katharina in 'The Taming of the Shrew.'" With such a companion—and possibly the elder daughter took her mother's part—Shakespeare's last years at Stratford can hardly have been so peaceful as sentimental critics have tried to make us believe.

The methods by which the author arrives at these conclusions will be familiar to those who have read "The Man Shakespeare," or the brilliant series of articles in "The English Review," now expanded to form this book. But there is a sense of freer judgment, the author's confidence has stronger wings in the new book than it had in the old. There it was necessary to argue and prove every inch of the way; it was road-maker's work, as the Germans call it. Now Mr. Harris evidently feels that the greater part of his audience is convinced of the general truth of his reading of Shakespeare's poems and plays. We should say that, outside the remote intellectual fastnesses of the academic professors, this startling theory of Shakespeare's personality and love-story has met with very little opposition, while Mr.

Harris deals robustly enough with the extraordinarily insignificant attacks that his book drew from the pedants.

The new book is more interesting than the previous one; for Shakespeare's love-story is here narrated fully, followed indeed with extraordinary delicacy and sympathy into the remotest folds and fibres of personality, so that we know not only Shakespeare and Mary Fitton and Lord William Herbert, but their mutual relations and their reactions so to speak each on the other.

A new and most interesting identification is that of Herbert with Bertram in "All's Well that Ends Well." We cannot follow here the close reasoning by which Mr. Harris proves the relationship between Shakespeare's "faithless friend and rival" and the worthless object of Helena's affections, but the fact is important as throwing light on the difficult question of the Sonnets. It may be said at once that the difficulty would be less if Englishmen were less mealy-mouthed. It has always been easier for writers to hint at Shakespeare's guilt than for Shakespeare's true lovers to prove his innocence. For our part we accept Mr. Harris' theory that Shakespeare addressed his Sonnets to the high-born young man because Lord William Herbert was a great and influential nobleman. It is infinitely easier to believe that Shakespeare was snobbish than to accept the hideous alternative.

Not the least astonishing section of "The Women of Shakespeare" is that in which the author forsakes what we may call his biographical explanations, to comment on the ascription by scholars of certain portions of the plays undeniably written by Shakespeare to other hands. Who would venture to say that any of the following lines could have been written by any one but Shakespeare?—

These eyes, like lamps whose wasting oil is spent,
Wax dim, as drawing to their exigent. . . .

—"I Henry VI." II. v.

See, where she comes, apparell'd like the spring,
Graces her subjects, and her thoughts the king
Of every virtue gives renown to men!

—"Pericles" I. i.

This is the state of man: to-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope, to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honours thick upon him:
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost,
And, when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a-ripening, nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do. . . .

—"Henry VIII." III. ii.

. . . all my glories
In that one woman I have lost for ever:
No sun shall ever usher forth mine honours,
Or gild again the noble troops that waited Upon my smiles. . . .

—"Henry VIII."

Yet these are passages that not one of the professors, but all the professors, and all the poets, in fine all our modern authorities have denied to Shakespeare. Mr. Harris is justified in saying that the "critics are unanimous in rejecting not Shakespeare's vulgarities and inanities, but the gems of his thought," the most fragrant blossoms of his poetry. If Mr. Frank Harris had done nothing else but restore these jewels and dozens of others just as priceless to their lawful begetter, we should still have sufficient reason to be grateful to him. How can any one write the truth about Shakespeare who cannot hear his voice? Mr. Harris, it may be noted, recognises the hand of the master dramatist on nearly every page of "Pericles;" he restores to the master the whole of "Timon," nearly all the "First Part of Henry VI." and much of "Henry VIII." It is to be hoped that he will take up the question of the doubtful plays at some future date. Why does not some publisher issue a complete Shakespeare, edited and annotated by Mr. Frank Harris? The Shakespearean Memorial Committee might do worse than take this work in hand for Shakespeare's tercentenary.

We are whole-hearted believers in Frank Harris' conception of Shakespeare the man, and we think that the foundations of our belief are solid. In the first place, any one that is at pains to master his method and his principal arguments will find the plays so many eloquent witnesses on behalf of his theory. He has given us a human Shakespeare, and we know that our dramatist must have been intensely human. He shows him at grips with a mastering and enduring passion, and we know that such passion alone can make a man creative.

The really notable feature of Frank Harris' discovery is its simplicity. He did not search the thickets of Stratford-on-Avon or burrow among the parchments at the Record Office for news of the poet, but he looked for him and found him in the plays themselves. After all, it seems, Shakespeare did not wholly fail in the supreme art of self-expression. Mr. Harris read Shakespeare as no one ever read him before—with passionate devotion seeking for the man himself, without reference to traditional prejudices or conventions, and the result was "The Man Shakespeare." He reads him again and gives us "The Women of Shakespeare," a book no less fascinating and instructive in the best sense of the word. There should be other books.

It will be some time before the general mind discovers that criticism that is not imaginative impoverishes rather than enriches the spirit; and therefore we fear that years must pass before Frank Harris' Shakespeare, or a version of it, will be taught in schools in place of the tepid falsehoods of Dry-as-Dust. Nevertheless Mr. Harris has the consolation of knowing that his seed has not fallen on stony ground. Every book on Shakespeare henceforward will certainly derive from his, though it appears that their authors will not always give him his due of acknowledgment. We are sure that he does not need it. "Criticism," he writes, "is an act of worship, a dedication of the spirit in love, and an interpretation of the divine, the result of intimate communion of soul. As such an interpretation I put forth 'The Women of Shakespeare.'" Can I say more than that these words seem peculiarly applicable to this book?

R. M.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE PORTE ST. MARTIN: I.

It is a curious history, that of the theatre of the Porte St. Martin, for it has taken a most active part in the forming of the French stage. Since its foundation in 1764 all the most varied and dramatic styles have been rendered in this vast theatre, which offers the possibility of creating colossal scenic effects by some of the greatest artists. The Porte St. Martin thus ranks in importance immediately after the théâtres subventionnés, and we will endeavour to give a brief but comprehensive résumé of its history.

In order to do so satisfactorily let us glance through the records of the Opéra since the Porte St. Martin was built in view of becoming the French Opera-house. It is rather amusing to trace the vicissitudes which caused the "Académie Royale de Musique" to select residence on the Boulevards. Ever since the foundation of the Opéra in France by Pierre Perrin (who, though but a poor poet, possessed much initiative) and Robert Cambert (a musician of undeniable talent, to whom is due the first real French opera, "Pomone"), the new style of performance had met with great favour, both with the Court and the public in general. When several years later Lulli obtained from Louis XIV. the privilege of creating a Royal School of Music, the Opéra was appreciated more and more. For Lulli, being a man of great intelligence, besides an indisputable genius in his own especial art, engaged the greatest singers of the time. Soon courtiers and townsmen knew no greater pleasure than that of spending their leisure moments at the Opéra, in spite of all the biting criticisms which were lavished upon it by some of the leading spirits of the time, such as La Bruyère and La Fontaine. It is worth noting that amongst the cantatrices most appreciated by the public figured Mademoiselle de Maupin, the bewildering and alarming heroine of Théophile Gautier's immortal work.

After Lulli's death the Opéra continued to enjoy the same vogue under the direction of Rameau and Glück. But twice already disastrous fires had destroyed it; it had been forced to seek new homes, and in 1763 the building in the Palais-Royal, which it had occupied since 1673, was in its turn burnt. The Opéra was obliged, for the time being, to settle itself in the Théâtre du Château des Tuileries while a house was being erected for it on the Boulevard St. Martin. In less than three months the architect, Lenoir, achieved the extraordinary feat of creating a new temple for the followers of Euterpe and Melpomene. This building was intended to be only temporary, but after the Opéra had deserted it to seek a more congenial neighbourhood, it continued to exist for ninety years, and would, no doubt, be still standing if the Commune had not destroyed it in 1871.

When the Opéra abandoned the theatre in 1794 it remained closed until 1802, when it reopened under the name of the Théâtre de la Porte St. Martin. Five years later the famous decree issued by Napoleon, limiting the number of Parisian playhouses, obliged it to close its doors again. Until 1808 the only theatres of the city duly authorised were the Français, the Feydeau (with the Italiens as annex), the Odéon, the Vaudeville, the Variétés, and the Ambigu. But the Porte St. Martin soon received permission to reopen with its name changed to that of "Les Jeux Gymniques." Its spectacles consisted chiefly of pantomimes and ballets; it soon reverted, however, to its former style of plays—vaudevilles and melodramas—and it resumed definitely the title of the Porte St. Martin. It became famous for the luxury of its staging, whilst the plays given there, by glorifying episodes of the Imperial triumph, attracted all the theatre-lovers of the capital.

A few years later this playhouse became a regular battlefield on which were engaged some of the most ardent contestants in favour of romanticism. Victor Hugo, Dumas, and Casimir Delavigne acted as commanders-in-chief in this war of ideas, and were valiantly supported by such artists as Frederick Lemaitre, Bocage, and Madame Dorval.

Since the beginning of the century a desire to be liberated from the ancient traditions had animated all branches of thought and literature—a desire very closely associated with the then dominant idea of political Liberalism. But this new aspiration met with a desperate resistance when it tried to influence the drama. And had it not been for the onslaught of many strong wills, all united in the one purpose of bringing about a proscription of the hackneyed conventionalism which then reigned triumphant on the French stage, classical tragedy, "that Bastille of Ancient Art," would perhaps still remain standing, impassive and victorious. The innovators, or romantiques, met with violent opposition by the partisans of the ancient formula—the classiques—and it is interesting to note that it was a series of Shakespearian representations given at the Porte St. Martin by an English troupe which was the determining cause of the conflict.

For many years the Porte St. Martin was devoted to the staunch defence of romanticism. In 1831 Alexandre Dumas triumphed there with "Antony," having as principal interpreters Madame Dorval and Bocage. On seeing the fine creations these great artists made of his leading characters, Dumas was overjoyed that he had withdrawn his play from the Comédie Française, where Mademoiselle Mars and Firmin had been studying their respective rôles with evident bad grace and indolence.

Bocage was indeed a wonderful artist, and no greater praise could be bestowed upon him than the following appreciation in Heine's "Lettres sur la France :"—

Bocage est un bel homme distingué, dont les manières et les mouvements sont nobles. Sa voix métallique, riche en inflexions, se prête aussi bien aux éclats les plus tonnants du courroux, qu'à la tendresse la plus caressante des murmures amoureux. Bocage n'est pas autrement organisé que le reste des hommes ; il se distingue seulement d'eux par une plus grande finesse d'organisation. Ce n'est point un produit bâtard d'Ariel et de Caliban, mais un être harmonique, figure élevée et belle comme Phoebus Apollon. Son œil a moins de valeur, mais il peut produire des effets immenses avec un mouvement de tête, surtout quand il la rejette dédaigneusement en arrière ; il a de froids soupirs ironiques qui vous passent dans l'âme comme une scie d'acier. Il a des larmes dans la voix, et des accents de douleur tellement profonds qu'on croirait qu'il saigne intimement. S'il se couvre les yeux avec les mains, on croirait entendre la Mort dire : "Que la nuit soit !" Puis quand il sourit, c'est comme si le soleil se levait sur ses lèvres.

It is therefore hardly to be wondered at that with such a protagonist Dumas' "Antony" scored its colossal success—much to the surprise of the director of the Porte St. Martin, who did not believe the play would produce so much effect. Dumas relates in his amusing Memoirs that whilst the third Act was being read the director tried to "stave off sleep," and during the fifth Act he "openly snored." But both Madame Dorval and Bocage were fervent partisans of the new school and took pride and joy in devoting their remarkable talents to the cause of romanticism. Only four months after their creations in "Antony" they appeared in Victor Hugo's "Marion Delorme," which was given at the Porte St. Martin in 1831.

"Marion Delorme" had passed through many exciting vicissitudes before appearing there, however. Victor Hugo's play was to have appeared at the Comédie Française, but the censorship forbade its production, and although Hugo himself obtained an audience from Charles X. and pleaded most eloquently its cause, the King refused to permit the representation to take place. Thereupon the author, infuriated, carried his MS. to the Porte St. Martin, where it was warmly welcomed. But "Marion Delorme" continued to provoke ardent discussion, and the first night was characterised by whistling, stamping, and shrieking.

THE REVIVAL OF PRINTING

I. THE HARBINGERS: THE DANIEL PRESS

MANY years ago William Morris pointed out in one of his addresses that the first requisite for the existence of beautiful articles in our daily life was not the artistic education of the man who produced them, but that the user—the purchaser—must choose his wares to be of the kind he wished, and that the maker of these wares must agree with his choice. This was only a new way of stating a familiar truth—that an educated public is essential to the existence of good art, and that wares must be produced by craftsmen for the use of persons who understand craftsmanship if they

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

N.B.—Mr. Heinemann will have ready Tuesday next: (1) Dr. NANSEN's new book, IN NORTHERN MISTS; (2) The concluding volume of Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung," SIEGFRIED AND THE TWILIGHT OF THE GODS, beautifully illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM; and has ready now (3) Two new books, beautifully illustrated in colour by CHARLES ROBINSON—(a) THE SENSITIVE PLANT, SHELLEY's fine Poem; (b) THE SECRET GARDEN, a novel by Mrs. HODGSON BURNETT, Author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy;" (4) A new Popular Edition of THE LIFE OF J. McNEILL WHISTLER; (5) The 2nd Edition of "INDIA UNDER CURZON, AND AFTER," by LOVAT FRASER; the demand for it is extraordinary; (6) GEORGE MOORE's new book, HAIL AND FAREWELL.

DR. NANSEN'S NEW BOOK.

IN NORTHERN MISTS: Arctic Exploration in Early Times. By Dr. NANSEN. Fully Illustrated. With Maps, Plans, &c. 2 Vols. Small crown 4to., 30s. net. [Ready Oct. 31st.]

MR. RACKHAM'S NEW PICTURES.

SIEGFRIED AND THE TWILIGHT OF THE GODS. The Ring of the Nibelung, Vol. II. (combining the two concluding two days). By RICHARD WAGNER. Beautifully Illustrated in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Crown 4to., 15s. net. [Ready Oct. 31st.]

INDIA UNDER CURZON, AND AFTER.

By LOVAT FRASER. (2nd Imp.) Royal 8vo., 16s. net. Viscount MILNER, in The Times:—"The book is, indeed, much more than a biography of Lord Curzon as Viceroy. The author ranges widely and boldly over the whole field of Indian politics. . . . Presented in a more complete form, or with greater candour, than by any previous writer."

LIFE OF J. McNEILL WHISTLER. By E. B. and J. PENNELL. Cheaper Edition, with New Matter and Illustrations, 100 Full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

ILLUSTRATED IN COLOUR BY CHARLES ROBINSON.
THE SENSITIVE PLANT. By P. B. SHELLEY. Profusely Illustrated in Colour by CHARLES ROBINSON. Introduction by EDMUND GOSSE, LL.D. Crown 4to., 15s. net.

THE SECRET GARDEN. A Novel by Mrs. HODGSON BURNETT, Author of "The Shuttle," "Little Lord Fauntleroy," &c. Illustrated in Colour by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large crown 8vo., 6s.

THREE NEW AUTOBIOGRAPHIES.

MY VAGABONDAGE. By J. E. PATTERSON. Demy 8vo., 8s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph:—"Stamped with the impress of genius—more than the success of the season taking its place among the more remarkable intimacies of literature."

HAIL AND FAREWELL. By GEORGE MOORE. Crown 8vo., 6s.

ONE OF THE MULTITUDE. By GEO. ACORN. Preface by A. C. BENSON, M.A. Crown 8vo., 6s. "A vivid and enlightening picture of the slums."—Times.

CATHEDRAL CITIES OF ITALY. By W. W. COLLINS, R.I. With 56 Plates in Colour. 16s. net.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF JOHN GIBSON, R.A. Edited by T. MATTHEWS. Illustrated. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

THE EMIR OF BOKHARA AND HIS COUNTRY. By Prof. OLUFSEN. With 250 Illustrations. Royal 8vo., 21s. net.

MASKS AND MINSTRELS OF NEW GERMANY. By PERCIVAL POLLARD. Crown 8vo., 5s. net.

ON THE WALLABY: Through Victoria. By E. M. CLOWES. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 6s. net. "A bright description of life in Australia."—Times.

THE RAILWAY CONQUEST OF THE WORLD. By FREDK. TALBOT. Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 6s. [Ready Nov. 2nd.]

LITTLE BOOKS ABOUT OLD FURNITURE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 2s. 6d. net each. Now ready: (1) TUDOR TO STUART; (2) QUEEN ANNE.

THE GREAT ENGRAVERS. 2s. 6d. net each. Now ready: (1) DÜRER; (2) MANTEGNA; (3) J. R. SMITH; (4) WATTEAU.

NEW 6/- NOVELS

A LIKELY STORY (Nov. 2nd)	...	WM. DE MORGAN
ZULEIKA DOBSON	...	MAX BEERBOHM
JUGGERNAUT	...	E. F. BENSON
LOVE LIKE THE SEA	...	J. E. PATTERSON
ESSENCE OF HONEYMOON	...	H. PERRY ROBINSON
JOHN CHRISTOPHER IN PARIS	...	ROMAIN ROLLAND
A PORTENTOUS HISTORY	...	ALFRED TENNYSON
MRS. DRUMMOND'S VOCATION	...	MARK BYCE
HER HUSBAND'S COUNTRY	...	SYBIL SPOTTISWOODE

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

are to be really artistic—and nowhere has its truth been better exemplified of late years than in the general revival of printing, due in no small measure to William Morris's efforts. The older among us can just remember the age of the horse-hair dining-room, the Berlin-work drawing-room, and the coal-scuttle with a Landseer picture on the top, an age which at its best sacrificed qualities which make for usefulness and comfort to a mistaken ideal of elegance; our own memories carry us back to a time when the ideal of the printed book was a volume printed on a fabric of china clay in a type of elegant tenuity, each line separated from its fellows by a wide space of white, each page of printing in the geometric middle of the paper, its illustrations vignettised into odd corners of the type. All this is now changed. The taste for fine printing, nurtured by costly masterpieces, has reacted on the ordinary trade productions. The purchaser has realised that while he cannot expect in a shilling book to have the same quality of paper and ink and excellence of composition and presswork as in a two-guinea volume, there is no reason why beauty of type and design of the page of the cheap book should be ignored, and when a choice is offered him, in increasing numbers he prefers the better-printed book. In this movement the collector of fine printing plays no small part. His shelf of privately printed books is an education to the eye of every one to whom it is shown and a constant pleasure to himself, with the not inconsiderable advantage, if he has bought judiciously, that their value can only increase as time goes on.

Though the chief credit for this change is due to William Morris, it could hardly have come about if the ground had not been prepared for the reception of his teaching. It so happens that printing is an art which has always appealed to the educated and often to the well-to-do classes. More than a few lovers of literature have succumbed to the temptation of setting up a private press under their own supervision or worked by their own hands, to print a few favourite books for themselves and like-minded friends. The distinction between the private press before Morris and after is this, that he inaugurated the fashion of designing his own materials, type, ornaments, &c., while they accepted those in use at the time, confining themselves to the tasteful use of such materials as were attainable in the ordinary way of business. The Daniel Press stands midway between these private presses of the old type and those with modern ideals. It is distinguished among other ventures of the day by its aloofness from any suspicion even of commercial aim. Its books are purely amateur productions: the type was set up and the books were printed by the printer-editor himself, the Rev. C. H. O. Daniel, the venerable Provost of Worcester College, Oxford, or by members of his family, for their own delight or for the pleasure of their friends in the books themselves. The earlier productions of the press were given away as presents by Mr. Daniel, and the price charged for later issues has never been commensurate with their value.

Mr. Daniel's youth was spent in a West-country vicarage and his whole later life in Oxford, and, as is but just, the works issued from his press reflect his personality, his likings, even his limitations. Many of them are first editions of poets of the Oxford classical school, charming, severe in style, exhaling through every page the feeling of restful well-being, of fine surroundings, of high thought, which mark English University life. The little library of some sixty volumes was the favoured mode of publication for the exquisite poetry of Robert Bridges, and contains first editions of Laurence Binyon, Margaret L. Woods, Francis Bourdillon, and others. A pleasant flavour of antiquarianism has been given to the series by an occasional revival of forgotten fragments of old-world literature or selections from the great poets, and every now and then a more intimate touch has been added to it by the publication of a "Garland" contributed to by a circle of poetic friends, or some booklet printed for a celebration of the moment.

Mr. Daniel's interest in printing dates from his boyhood use of a toy printing-press in his father's vicarage at Frome Selwood, in Somerset. Here, in the 'fifties, he produced some little duodecimo pamphlets, which are treasured by their fortunate owners as more precious than their weight in banknotes. Among them is a collection of hymns written by a cottager, and printed by him to give her "the pleasure of possessing them in a more durable form than in her own handwriting." But though trifles of this sort were produced at intervals, it was not till twenty years later that he began to take a serious interest in printing, and, bringing up his toy-press to Oxford, printed in his college rooms at Worcester twenty-five copies in duodecimo of a catalogue of pamphlets in the College Library (1874). Appetite grows with what it feeds on, and Mr. Daniel, seeking help from the Clarendon Press, disinterred from its stores some old-fashioned type and ornaments which had been put aside as out of accordance with the fashion of the times. The type was one of those procured for the University by Bishop Fell, one of the benefactors of the Press in the seventeenth century, the Dr. Fell of the well-known quatrain of Tom D'Urfey: that it is now a familiar one is not a little due to Mr. Daniel's use of it in his books. This was in 1877, and in 1882 the workmanlike type forced him to get a press capable of bringing out its qualities to better advantage and to discard the toy he had hitherto used. From that time to quite recently a new volume has appeared annually with few exceptions. A list of the issues up to 1902 was drawn up by Mr. Falconer Madan and published some years ago, and a more complete bibliography will soon be available.

The Daniel Press was a forerunner of the modern revival of fine printing, and, like many another harbinger, is consciously opposed to the ideals of the movement for which it prepared a way. Mr. Daniel is animated by the spirit of late seventeenth-century models, as is but natural considering the type and ornaments he has chosen for his work. Regarded from the point of view of the ideal book he falls short in several particulars. By systematically "leading" the type he gets too light a page, one that is, too, rather difficult to read unless the eye is used to bad printing. The page seems to be designed as a single unit, whereas the opening of two pages is the proper unit of design: the eye looks at one page, it is true, but it sees two pages. The merits of the series, apart from the subject-matter of the books which gives them a quality of their own, lie in a certain old-world charm, as of thin music, derived sometimes from Mr. Daniel's delicate grouping of ornamental woodcut devices, sometimes from the hand-drawn initials in red painted in by Mrs. Daniel, from the paper, and from the sentiment of loving care which one feels has informed every detail.

The collector in search of a quarry might take up many a less agreeable and profitable one than the acquisition of privately-printed books. The merit of some of them is their rarity, and only by some extraordinary piece of good fortune can he ever possess them, while others quite as rare are disregarded altogether by dealers. He will find himself on an uncharted sea, and discoveries lie before him. No complete collection of privately-printed books exists, not even an accurate list of private presses, so that the humblest of book-buyers may hope to inscribe against some title in his catalogue the coveted formula, "unknown to bibliographers." Space forbids more than a summary indication of some of the private presses of the early part of the nineteenth century that may still be obtained.

The eighteenth century set the way with the private presses of Horace Walpole and John Wilkes. The large quarto series of Chronicles printed between 1803 and 1810 by Johnes at the Hafod Press in Cardiganshire are the first privately printed books of the nineteenth century. About two hundred of each volume were printed. A much rarer press of the time is the Frogmore Press at Windsor, which printed some verses and small books from 1809 to 1812 for Miss Knight under the patronage of Queen Charlotte. Copies of the publications of the Lee Priory Press of Sir Egerton Brydges (1813-1823) are not uncommon, though they were printed in relatively small numbers—of the first of them, the Poems of the Duchess of Newcastle, only twenty-five copies were struck off. They have fine woodcut initials and ornaments. The Middle Hill Press of Sir Thomas Phillipps (1822-1872) is devoted in large measure to genealogical subjects; most of the works printed there were issued in twenty-five copies only. The Prittlewell Press (1823) and the Great Totham Press (1831-1847) are quite unimportant, but their productions are very rarely found. The latter is devoted to broadsides and satirical verses. Books printed at the Beldornie Press (1840-1844) of E. V. Utterson are both rare and valuable. His reprints were issued in twelve copies only, and are much coveted. Another Press dear to collectors is that of Gaetano Polidori (1840-1850), grandfather of the Rossettis, from which issued the first work of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, "Sir Hugh the Heron" (1843), and the first poems of his sister Christina in 1847. The omnivorous collector will also wish to have specimens of the Bampton Press (1848-1855), founded by the famous Dr. Giles, the Rochester Press (1858-1872) of Edwin Roffe, the Heath Press, and the Parkstone Press, not to speak of Presses which only issued a single book, the most desirable of these being Miss Alice Sargent's "Crystal Ball," printed by Mr. Sargent in 1894 at Tite-street, Chelsea.

ROBERT STEELE.

ART

ARTHUR RACKHAM'S DRAWINGS AT THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

THE drawings for "Siegfried" and "The Twilight of the Gods" are a disappointment. It is almost the first time that Mr. Rackham's drawings have seemed laboured and not quite true, and to any one who has followed the course of his beautiful work and who goes round the gallery where these are hanging, knowing that the book for which they are the illustrations is a sequel to that produced last year, an explanation comes which may, or of course may not, be the right one. It is that Mr. Rackham has signed some sort of contract by which he is to illustrate a part of the "Nibelungen" year by year, so that the work has in a sense been done under compulsion. We know that it was of the artist's own choosing, and that last year the choice seemed to have been altogether good, yet in these drawings there is a sort of weariness of hand and head, as though the heart of the artist were not always in them. It is the old difficulty of the illustrator, always having to contend with somebody else's thoughts, and the worst of it is that it is so apt to lead people into easy but unsatisfactory criticisms. That the "Awaking of Brünnhilde" and Siegfried gazing at himself in the stream have failed altogether to realise the ideas of these strange, grand old tales, as people think of them—or as one supposes they think of them—really matters less than that, as cannot be doubted, they have failed to express the artist's ideas. For when one has been most moved by Mr. Rackham's beautiful fantasies—and there are some of the real ones here—the DUCKWORTH & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

A Year of Strangers.

Sketches of People in Flanders, Italy, Russia and Persia.

By YŌI PAWLOWSKA. Demy 8vo., 5s. net. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. [November 2nd.]

"I have just finished a year of my life, during which I have seen only strangers and no one whom I had known before. These are some of the strangers who have become my friends. Though I have headed each sketch by the name of one of them, I do not, of course, mean these pages to be in any way an account of their lives or personalities, but only an impression of a few of the moments which we have passed together."—Extract from Foreword.

The Works of Man.

By L. MARCH PHILLIPPS.

A survey of the creative art of the world. Selecting some of the great periods or creative epochs in the art of the world, the author has endeavoured to deduce from them the distinguishing qualities, limitations, and points of view of the races which produced them.

Large crown 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

AN INTERESTING VOLUME OF LIGHT ESSAYS.

The Critical Attitude.

By FORD MADOX HUEFFER.

An interesting volume of essays by the Founder and First Editor of "The English Review." Light in tone and style, they are interesting throughout, and will provoke serious thought.

5s. net.

A NEW EDITION, ILLUSTRATED IN COLOUR.

The Roadmender.

By MICHAEL FAIRLESS. With Eight Coloured Plates reproduced from Oil Paintings by E. W. WAITE. Mounted, with Decorative Borders. The text has been reset for this Edition. Cover design in gold. Extra cloth, gilt top, in box, 7s. 6d. net.

* A Large Paper Edition on imitation hand-made paper will also be issued, limited to 350 copies. With Illustrations, mounted on vellum and borders in gold. Bound in white buckram, in slip case, 15s. net.

The various editions of "The Roadmender," as follows are still supplied. Crown 8vo. Illustrated by Line Drawings, 5s. net; velvet calf yapp, 5s. net; limp lambskin, 3s. 6d. net. Cloth, with designed End-papers, 2s. 6d. net.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Pilgrim Man.

By WILLIAM SCOTT PALMER, Author of "The Diary of a Modernist." Dedicated to the "Roadmender" and all Travellers who lift up their eyes unto the hills. Fcap. 8vo., with designed End-papers, cloth, 2s. 6d. net (postage 3d.). [Uniform with "The Roadmender."]

A NEW BOOK OF ANIMAL LIFE BY

CHARLES LIVINGSTON BULL,

Illustrator of "The Kindred of the Wild," &c.

Under the Roof of the Jungle.

A Book of Animal Life in the Guiana Wilds. With 60 Full-page Plates and many other Drawings from Life by the Author. Uniform with Charles G. D. Roberts's "Kindred of the Wild," "Red Fox," &c. 6s. net.

THE Popular Library of Art.

Very fully Illustrated.

The entire Series, Twenty-one Volumes, in a new style, stiff boards, gilt, gilt top, 1s. net, with an Illustrated Wrapper.

The Series can also be had in limp leather, 2s. 6d. net a Volume; and in cloth, 2s. net a Volume.

Also some Vols. in the popular persian yapp binding, 2s. 6d. net.

A NEW SERIES.

The Reader's Library.

Copyright Works of Individual Merit and Permanent Value by Authors of Repute. Cloth, crown 8vo., 2s. 6d. net a Volume. Twenty-four Volumes now ready. A selection can be seen at any good booksellers.

A full Descriptive List will be sent post-free on application.

DUCKWORTH & CO., Covent Garden, London.

laughing limbs of the Rhine maidens, the weird waving tree-branches and the wild skies which are his own, one cannot help feeling that if they were said to have been prompted by the "Nibelungen" it would have been truer and they would have been more perfectly appreciated. For what after all does it matter whether the story of these things has ever been written in words? And the outcome of this seems to be that the tales are somehow not tangible enough for illustration, and the drawings too intangible for the tales.

Hanging in the St. George's Gallery in New Bond-street are the originals of Mr. Maxwell Armfield's illustrations for "Sylvia's Travels," a fairy-tale by Constance Smedley Armfield. One sees them first across the room as beautiful decorations—which one knows must make exquisite colour patterns on the book's pages, and then one finds that the colour patterns are such stuff as children's dreams are made of. There is the strangeness in them which is the essence of faërie. They have succeeded in creating new places and new things, as though the quaint life of some old manuscript had awakened in a modern world.

Who is Sylvia?

Come and see,

For children all commend her is the inscription on an exquisite title-page.

BOOKS IN PREPARATION

THE King has commanded Messrs. Williams and Norgate to publish all his speeches and addresses on Imperial subjects. It is hoped that the volume will be ready before Christmas.

In the meantime Constable and Co. are hurrying forward a book called "In the Shadow of the Islam," by a lady with the picturesque name of Demetra Vaka. The book is of topical interest, as it gives a series of vivid first-hand pictures of the complicated political situation in Turkey to-day. These form the background of the love-story of a young girl and a leader of the Young Turk Movement.

A new history of Scotland has been written. The author who has been plucky enough to undertake a work requiring such an immense amount of research is Mr. Robert Rait, who has already made himself a specialist in Scottish matters. Beginning with the ethnological questions and the tribal kingdoms up to the emergence of a United Scotland in the eleventh century, Mr. Rait then points out the process of Anglicisation which went on from the marriage of Malcolm Canmore to the War of Independence, and follows on with the effect of the great struggle with England on the civilisation of Scotland. After the Reformation the restoration of English influence in place of that of France is dealt with and is followed by the Covenanting Movement, the Revolution, the Union, the Jacobite Rising, the Settlement of the Highlands after Culloden, the Revival of Trade and Learning, and the story of the Ecclesiastical Disputes. The illustrations have been brought together with great care, and the portraits have, in most instances, been photographed from original paintings in private collections. The book will form the first of a series entitled "The Making of the Nations," which A. and C. Black intend to bring out from time to time.

Readers of the Contemporary Review will have noted the interesting articles on various phases of the history of the Eastern Empire, and will be glad to hear that the writer from whose pen they emanated has placed with A. and C.

Black a new history of the Byzantine Empire, which is now in the press. Mr. Edward Foord—"for such," as Miss Elinor Glyn would write, "is his name"—does not hesitate to express opinions of various rulers that will be found to differ very considerably from those which have been generally accepted, and to declare that Byzantine cruelty is largely a myth. The author has further prepared a series of maps, and there are to be a large number of illustrations from photographs which have been obtained with no little trouble, which will probably correct many inaccurate ideas as to Byzantine art.

Mr. Alban G. Widgery has translated into English the much-discussed work by Professor Rudolf Eucken, of the University of Jena, called "Life's Basis and Life's Ideal," the fundamentals of a new philosophy of life. There are, it would seem, many new things under the sun, and hardly a month passes without its contribution to an already long list of these new philosophies. Professor Eucken is, however, quite undaunted, and by giving a careful analysis of extant conceptions of life—such, for instance, as those of Traditional Religion, Absolute Idealism, Naturalism, Socialism, and Æsthetic Individualism, and a sympathetic "inner" criticism of these by a consideration of their own implications, endeavours to show their inadequacy, the necessity for a newer conception, and the direction in which, according to him, this must be sought. It seems to us just a little curious that all the writers who put forward new philosophies of life, and who devote so much deep thought to Idealism, Naturalism, Socialism, Individualism, and the rest, forget altogether that common or garden "ism" which, if practised daily, makes philosophy almost unnecessary—Optimism. And there is one other philosophy—to call it by a term which might make it more interesting to certain minds, which these discoverers of "new" things quite forget—perhaps because it is so old. We mean faith.

Mr. Edward Arnold is shortly to publish Mr. Norman Pearson's new volume called "Society Sketches in the Eighteenth Century." The eighteenth century has been delved into by so many bookmakers that it seems impossible to write anything new about it. Mr. Pearson claims, however, to have discovered several features and figures which have hitherto escaped detailed treatment—the Virtuosi who founded the Royal Society; the Wits and the Macaronies—some of whom may be compared with the upper middle-class hooligans of to-day.

Mr. Heinemann really will positively bring out Mr. Max Beerbohm's novel "Zuleika Dobson" at once. There can be no further delays. We all heard about this book some years ago. The title was given out to an expectant world, and people who make a habit of being early at the station, and who take a savage delight at waiting in long queues at theatre doors, rushed to the library to name the book. Whether Mr. Beerbohm was drawn away from his desk by a passionate desire to make Mr. George Bernard Shaw resemble on paper an Arab card-sharp, history does not relate. The fact remains that no book appeared. Again, later, further rumours went forth. "'Zuleika Dobson' is in the press!" was the excited cry, and a flutter ran through the artistic circles of North Kensington or Wormwood Scrubbs and West Kensington, which is Hammersmith. The Savile Club perked up and went about on tiptoe of expectation. But still no book. People, even genuine Beerbohmiens, began to think that all this was a subtle sort of joke, that there was no such thing as "Zuleika" at all. Cynics hinted at new forms of advertising as cynics will, especially those unpractical cynics who have failed to make themselves acquainted with the rudimentary fact that without advertisement no book can sell, and that, after all, books are not written to give away. We now have it from Mr. Heinemann himself that the hour—the great hour—is at hand. To-day is the day. To-morrow all the world will know whether Mr. Max Beerbohm is the new Thackeray, the new Corelli, or the new Charles Garvice. These are vastly exciting times, indeed.

It never rains but it pours. It appears that Stephen Swift and Co. have a Max Beerbohm book as well. It is not a novel, however. It is a further collection of caricatures reproduced in colour, and is officially described in the following words: "These drawings constitute what might well be called a John Bull series, and although their satire is directed against political situations and national characteristics rather than against personal frailties, they yet retain that quality of mordant personal criticism which is so prominent a feature of this famous artist's work."

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

CHINA—THE STIRRING OF THE WATERS

THERE is still a complete absence of detailed information from the scene of operations in China. Attachés and correspondents have not been allowed to join the forces, and we are therefore dependent for news upon wholly unsatisfactory accounts transmitted via Peking and coast ports. Nevertheless, it is abundantly clear that as each hour passes the situation becomes increasingly grave. All the important towns in the Lower Yangtze Valley are in the hands of the rebels, under the leadership of General Li-Yuan-Hung, who received his military training in Germany and Japan. Perhaps the most significant indication of the seriousness of the crisis is to be found in the refusal of Yuan Shih-kai to come to the rescue of the Manchu dynasty. It is a distinguishing feature of this great statesman's career that he has never been known to take the losing side, and on the present occasion it would seem that his attitude is that of "waiting to see." Before many days have passed a decisive battle must be fought, and should the Imperial Army suffer heavy defeat, the insurgents, if they press home their advantage, will find the way open to Peking.

In some quarters there has been considerable speculation as to the part played by Japan in instigating disquiet in China. Stress has been laid upon the extraordinary circumstance that the arrival of the Japanese admiral and military attaché on the scene coincided with the outbreak of the revolution. Removing from the mind suspicion occasioned by incidents of this kind, the undeniable fact remains that the rise of Japan to a position of prominence among the Powers of the world has produced a widespread effect upon the peoples of all Asiatic countries. Asia is no longer slumbering. In the vast territories that stretch from Peking to Teheran signs are to be witnessed that the real awakening is at hand. Nor is it an awakening that will pass with the hour. It is an awakening that means that the East is standing upon the threshold of a new era, an era that may be destined to witness a reshaping of the map of the world. In other words, after centuries of dull sleep the East is now undergoing the process of revitalisation. And Japan leads the van in the march of Asia towards the attainment of her ideal—the recognition of equality with the nations of the West. The civilisation of Japan may be superficial, but it is essentially a militant civilisation. The danger to the West lies in the existence of a state of indifference which may find unpreparedness when the time arrives for the inevitable conflict with the nations of the East.

By this I do not suggest the likelihood of a Yellow Peril in the sense that there may come a military combination of Asiatic races. For these peoples, like ourselves, have their own jealousies and their own quarrels. But there will come a time in a future that is not so far distant when, unless the West awakens to the imminence of danger, the predominance of the white over the yellow races will cease for ever. Education is the great force at work. With education will develop the national spirit, and this national spirit will manifest itself in many directions. There will be keen commercial strife. In countries now prospering under alien guidance demands for self-government, and eventually for autonomy, will be insisted upon. And unless the Powers are virile enough to combat such movements, they will lose their possessions one by one. To retain them there can be no combination among the nations of the West. To regain them there can be no common action among the nations of the East. International jealousy is alike strong in both spheres. But the nations of the West will be at this disadvantage, that whatever action they may take will be directed from a base that is far distant, while at the same time they will be called upon to combat peoples possessed with all the fervour of newly-awakened races. Japan has become the guiding-star of the East. The knowledge she is imparting to others may not be of the deepest kind, for she herself is as yet groping in darkness, only illumined by a few shafts from the light of true civilisation. But this knowledge will be sufficient to inspire effort and to sustain ambition. And it will tend to give to peoples fresh from the sleep of ages that burning desire to fight and conquer in all fields of human activity. Time and experience will do the rest.

The Japanese view of their mission in Asia has been well represented by one of their leading publicists, Dr. Shiratori:—

It is important to observe (says this authority) that within the past few years a marvellous change has come over China. Japan's success in the struggle with Russia taught the Chinese what an Asiatic nation supplied with Western weapons and appliances can do against an old and strong European Power, and there are numerous indications that China will before very long follow in Japan's steps. She has already descended from the lofty pedestal of self-sufficiency and aloofness on which she has stood for so many centuries. To the people who for so long were designated the Eastern Barbarians, she has been sending thousands of students. She seems to perceive that she can only save herself from absorption by following in the wake of Europe to the extent Japan has done. Perhaps she begins to see also that this can be done without involving the loss of the mental and moral qualities which she holds in such high esteem. . . . The nation is held together by common customs, common religions, common instincts, and common interests, and by a past which all Chinese revere. Among the peoples that inhabit the continent of Asia the Chinese will certainly be the first to free themselves from the shadow of the white peril. They have still left the love of autonomy, national solidarity, and self-respect necessary for the inauguration of the new policy which the political exigencies of the times demand, and they will carry it through.

For the purposes of bringing about mutual intercourse between Eastern races the Japanese have formed an association which has for its direct object the promotion of uniformity in the scripts of China, Japan, and Korea. Already a dictionary of six thousand ideographs, comprising all those in common use, has been compiled; and from time to time strenuous efforts are made to enlist the support of the Chinese and the Koreans in the movement. In many other directions Japan has taken an active part in the educational process that is at work among the nations of Asia. Fifteen years ago the first Chinese student arrived in Tokyo. Gradually the number swelled until at one time there were fully 13,000 Chinese taking advantage of the educational facilities of the country, and it was thought that the total would soon reach 100,000, if not more. Before long, however, doubts arose concerning the wisdom of sending such large numbers of students to Japan. Many of the youths, freed from the restraint of home ties, led dissolute lives. Moreover, their minds were utterly incapable of assimilating the knowledge imparted to them. Its effect was not to enlighten them, in the true sense of the term, but rather to produce a strong sense of individualism which quickly developed along dangerous lines. On returning to China—a land where the customs of ages were still deeply rooted—they sought to assert a personal freedom both in thought and action that was altogether opposed to the spirit of the times. They became the ready instruments of the anti-dynastic faction, which found its organisation in secret societies, and for a time were active leaders in a movement that was characterised with some violence. Eventually the authorities realised the necessity for imposing restrictions upon students wishing to go to Japan, with the result that the number gradually dwindled until at present there are only a few thousand attending the various educational establishments. The political differences which have lately arisen in an acute form between the two countries have tended to diminish the popularity of Tokyo as a centre of learning for the Chinese. The same cause also led to a reduction in the number of Japanese employed in the various departments of State in China. Not long ago more than a thousand Japanese found occupation in schools and colleges, in the army and police, in the law and in prison administration, in agriculture, and on railways. That total has diminished to a few hundreds, and it is an open secret that as many of the contracts with the Japanese expire they will not be renewed.

In all directions there are substantial indications that Japan's adoption of Western civilisation will have a tremendous effect upon the destinies of China. Whether or not she herself has attained to such a degree of competence that she can be trusted with the task of reforming other Oriental nations is a matter open to grave question. So far, it must be confessed, experience does not justify any sanguine prophecy in regard to the immediate future. China realises that Japan's entry into the comity of nations has not tended to smooth the path of her progress. Whereas formerly she was pressed by the Powers of the West, she is now compelled to submit to the additional humiliation of paying heed to the insistent demands of a strong Power lying, as it were, at her very gates—a Power, moreover, like herself, Oriental and having as much in common as in conflict with herself. The rise of Japan into prominence has provided China with her strongest object-lesson. Suspended from the walls of many houses throughout the land are to be seen lurid pictures of the Russo-Japanese war, representing the blowing up of Russian ships and the scattering of Russian armies. The education in the schools is directed towards reviving the military spirit, and among the subjects taught, in a very elementary stage of course, are the construction of warships and the evolution of the modern gun.

China has not forgotten those bygone ages when she undertook, with results that have added lustre to the pages of history, a civilising mission in Japan similar to that which Japan is now endeavouring to assume on her own account in China. In short, China looks upon the Japanese as an upstart race. And whatever else the future in the Far East may hold yet another war between China and Japan to decide Oriental predominance in the Pacific is as sure as fate.

MOTORING

ON Friday next the biggest, most representative, and most important of the world's motor-car Exhibitions will open at Olympia, and remain open until the following Saturday week. The time has long gone by when the visitor could expect to find at the Show novelties in the shape of drastic departures in either engine, chassis, or body-work. The innumerable "freaks" which every Exhibition contained in the early years of the industry have finally disappeared, and experience has evolved what is to all appearance a permanent standard design. But the possibilities of minor modifications and refinements calculated to increase the general efficiency of the automobile and enhance the comfort of the users appear to be unlimited, and the forthcoming Show will contain an exceptional number of such departures and devices. Those who have sufficient time, enthusiasm, and knowledge to read and understand the mass of technical details which will be launched upon the public in connection with the exhibits will find all they want—and probably more—in the bulky volumes issued on these occasions by the technical motor-press; but all that is possible in a journal like this is to present a bird's-eye view of the Exhibition as a whole, and describe briefly in non-technical language what we consider to be the principal objects of interest. This we shall endeavour to do in our next issue.

The inadequacy of Olympia, big as it is, to hold a really representative collection of all that is interesting in the motor industry is becoming more and more evident with every succeeding Exhibition. Every year an increasingly large number of would-be exhibitors are excluded through sheer lack of space, and as priority is naturally given by the management to the leading and old-established firms, the public is unquestionably deprived of the opportunity of seeing much that is novel and valuable. The exceptional pressure on the available space this year is strikingly indicated by the fact that it has been found impossible for the Society to find room for the stand which for the past six years it has been in the habit of allotting to the A.A. and M.U. The proprietors of several of the motoring journals have, however, come to the rescue by consenting to receive applications for membership at their stands, and no doubt either Mr. Stenson Cooke himself or his assistants will be constantly in evidence for the purpose of giving all information to inquirers respecting the objects of, and advantages offered by, the Association.

Apparently the recent further reductions in the prices of the leading tyre manufacturers have been rendered possible by the simple process of practically halving the discounts allowed to the "trade" off the list prices. Thus the manufacturers themselves lose nothing, or next to nothing, by the concessions of which they have—quite naturally—made so much. If it had not been for the complaints of many of the retailers with regard to the price-cutting practices of some of their competitors, it is not very likely that the further reductions would have been made at all, so that the motorist is really benefiting by the grievance of one section of the trade against the other. This consideration will not, however, trouble him very much, especially as he has long felt that the middleman was taking an exorbitant margin of profit.

We suppose that by this time there can scarcely remain a single disbeliever in the coming universality of the motor-car as a means of transport, but if there is such an obstinate sceptic in existence he will surely be convinced against his will by a perusal of the Government Report issued on Tuesday night. This document shows that during last year the number of licences taken out for private motor-cars rose from 53,169 to 75,617, those for taxi-cabs and motor-omnibuses from 24,466 to 33,199, and those for motor-cycles from 36,242 to 48,857. Licences for private horse-carriages have fallen off from 92,572 to 77,900. Simultaneously with the publication of these figures appears the significant announcement that the last publicly-owned horse-omnibus has finally disappeared from the streets of London to make way for the all-conquering motor.

R. B. H.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE talk is still of optimism. I mean the talk around the Stock Exchange. Perhaps this is not surprising, because the members of the House are in the habit of taking very short views. Their profession compels this. When they see a market bare of stock they prophesy a rise. Now all the markets in the House are as bare as the palm of one's hand. But, as I have pointed out once or twice before, this does not mean that there is no bull account. It only means that the banks and moneylenders have relieved the bulls from their position, and in doing so have become bulls themselves, in the sense that they will get rid of stock as soon as there is a rise in the market. All that has happened has been merely a transfer of credit. The credit of the bulls was not strong enough to stand international shocks. The credit of the banks has stood these shocks fairly well, and most of our big credit institutions are quite able to go on holding their securities for an indefinite period. But they will not lend more money or increase their credits. We saw how the Bank of Egypt, by over-trading and careless finance, was compelled to shut down.

This failure has been a lesson; it has had a bad effect upon everything, and on Monday the Bank of Mytilene suspended payment. On the Board of this Bank are such well-known financiers as Zarifi and Zervudachi. This bank held about £60,000 worth of Bank of Egypt paper. It had over-traded in every sense of the word, and, notwithstanding the strength of its Board, it was compelled to shut down. It had a large number of depositors. It did a trade throughout the East, and was a large competitor of the Bank of Athens, who will probably make some arrangement to take over the depositors, and should benefit by the collapse. The Bank of Mytilene had been negotiating for some time with German financiers with the idea of enlarging the scope of the business. It does very little business in London, but throughout the Levant it was considered an important undertaking. These perpetual bank failures, of which we have had during the present year so many, are making depositors very uneasy, and wild rumours are going round the City with regard to many of our banks. But the public do not seem to realise that the Birkbeck Bank and the Yorkshire Penny Bank failed simply because the deposits they received and on which they paid interest were invested in gilt-edged securities, the depreciation on which has been enormous.

For example, if I had entrusted a thousand pounds to the Birkbeck Bank in the boom days, and that Bank had re-invested my thousand pounds in Consols at 112, on my requiring my money back some years later when Consols had fallen to 80, it is easy to see that the Bank would have been paying me $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for a number of years, and losing money steadily the whole time, whilst the final loss would have been £320. The joint stock banks are not in the same position. A large proportion of the money that they receive carries no interest. The banks use it and make from 3 to 4 per cent. on it when it is costing them more than the ordinary office expenses. Therefore people should not compare the management of two entirely different classes of banks. The Bank of Egypt, again, lent money on real estate—a very profitable and safe method of business as long as you always keep sufficient margin to meet a run. What this margin should be is a moot question. Probably in the case of a bank loaning money to an Oriental 40 or 50 per cent. The Bank of Egypt did not keep 10 per cent. Canadian banks are not allowed to lend money on land at all. When this law was framed every one had in mind the collapse of the Australian banks which were ruined because they locked up the whole of their assets in land, and could not realise when the pinch came. English banks try to spread their loans over a wide field; but even English banks are apt to get tied up. A large number of them prefer to lend money on stocks and shares in preference to discounting trade bills. The discounting of trade bills requires constant personal supervision and the most minute acquaintance with every branch of trade. The fact that London joint stock banks work under books of rules which tend to deaden the capacity of the employees has forced the discounting of trade bills into the hands of bill-brokers, who do the work that should be done by the bank, and share with the bank the risk and the profit. Although the more or less mechanical methods of the modern joint stock bank foster honesty and increase safety, they are not altogether ideal methods, and the strenuous competition of the foreign banks is now becoming serious.

MONEY.—At the moment it looks as though money would remain at its present level right through to the end of the year. But there is no certainty about it. If anything should compel the American banks to withdraw their loans to Berlin we might see a sudden stringency on the Continent. Money in Paris appears cheap, but the French banks are only lending from week to week, and although the supply of short-loaned money is prodigious, there is no money for more extended operations. No doubt if the political atmosphere cleared, confidence would be restored, and the hoarding of the banks cease. But at the moment one can only say that the banks, though talking in a very optimistic fashion, are behaving like pessimists.

CONSOLS.—Consols and all other gilt-edged securities are steady. After all, these gilt-edged securities are actually safer and more marketable than anything else in the world. English credit is far away beyond any other credit, and therefore the securities of Great Britain have a tendency to be absorbed even in troublous times, and indeed by reason of the troublous times. Prices may whittle away, but the Consol market is as firm as a rock, and any slight fall always brings in buyers. India $3\frac{1}{2}$ are an admirable investment, and so is Irish land stock. People will soon begin to see that these high value yields are illusory. At the moment it is the fashion to seek investments yielding a high return. This fashion will die out, and then Consols will go up. No one should sell any gilt-edged stock at the present time.

FOREIGNERS.—In the whole foreign market everything is strong except Chinese, and even in this market there has been very little selling. Russians have been steadied. Probably if everything goes well, the Russian Government will make another railway loan, and in any case Russian securities are not likely to fall. Turkish and Egyptian have been remarkably strong. This is the more curious because one would have expected a slight weakness, especially as the Bank of Egypt had some big blocks of both Turks and Unified which must be realised in order to provide money for the depositors. There is a steady demand, however, for Egyptian Unified, and the Germans probably support Turkish Bonds, as they still have a portion of their loan to place. The buying in the Peru market goes on, and those behind the scenes are extremely confident, although, on paper, Peru prefs are over valued to-day. The Tinto bears are still buying back, and it is more than probable that copper will rise a few pounds. This should make a good deal of difference to a big mine like the Tinto.

HOME RAILS.—The jobbers in the Home Railway market have come to the conclusion that the Railway Commission Report will excite the Labour party to immediate action, and as a result most of the stocks of our leading companies have been weak. No doubt the Report of the Commission was too good. But what most of the dealers seem to have forgotten is the fact that the Government have given their word that in the event of the companies being compelled to pay higher wages they shall be at liberty to recoup themselves by advancing rates. There is not much profit on passenger traffic, and if passenger fares were advanced it would prevent people from travelling, and thus still farther reduce the profit. The goods traffic is what the railways make their money out of, and an advance in rates here would prove an admirable thing. Therefore I am quite unable to see any bear point in the Labour Report. Traders would of course kick at any advance in rates. The noise that they would make would be incomparably smaller than the uproar that would be raised if passenger rates were advanced. Millions travel every day on the railways, whereas customers for freight are only numbered by thousands. It is seldom that one gets an opportunity of buying 5 per cent. stocks as cheaply as they can be purchased to-day. There is not a single line that is likely to reduce its dividend for the current half-year. Admittedly the strike has stopped any chance of an advance in dividends, but prices are now back at pre-boom levels. The bull party in the Dover A market evidently find no difficulty in financing their purchases. They talk in the wildest manner of a gigantic coal output from the Kent collieries. Options on all the Southern stocks are bought and every preparation made exactly as though Dover had become a second Newcastle-on-Tyne. I do not know how many tons of coal have yet been raised, but it is quite clear that it will take many years before any appreciable amount can be won from the Kent seams.

YANKEES.—The Yankee market is terribly dull, and the American finance papers are gloomy reading. Deep depression still hangs over Wall-street. The Chesapeake report was seriously bad. But it was offset by that of the Atchison, which was quite good enough to justify the optimism of President Ripley. However, to-day is not the moment to speculate in American Railways. Prices may rise a little before Christmas to enable the big banks to show a better balance-sheet, but no activity need be looked for.

RUBBER.—Hardly any business is done in rubber shares. But the jobbers in the market sell Linggis whenever they can find a purchaser, and optimists talk of an organised bear movement against this share. The Federated Malay States Rubber Company proposes to make a big issue of 6 per cent. preference shares, which will be exchangeable into ordinary shares at the rate of one ordinary share of 50f. for two preference shares of 200f. each. This is valuing the ordinary shares at 400f. each. The exchange can only be made between June 1st and December 31st, 1915. It is a very curious arrangement, but the issue has been guaranteed, and although the rights of conversion do not appear particularly valuable to-day, there can be no doubt that the 6 per cent. dividend is well secured. The profits for the past year are 1,613,000f., and the dividend 60 per cent. Malaccas have been heavily bought in Paris. They appear to me very much over-priced.

OIL.—Kern River proposes to write down its capital to half, and it will accept the offer of the vendors. This will give the Company ample funds, and Kerns seem to me a cheap purchase. Other oil shares are weak, and there is very little business in this market. The oil reports as they come out appear most disappointing, most of the companies having been formed on a boom basis without any idea that bad times would ever fall upon them.

KAFFIRS.—Evidently there is more trouble in Paris, for Kaffirs have again slumped. Wild stories are going round, and on Tuesday afternoon it was confidently asserted that the great Solly Joel had sold 2,000 shares of every single mine on the Rand. This is of course mere rubbish. The selling was due to forced liquidation, on a big account being closed. No one in his senses would go a bear of Kaffirs at their present level, least of all so astute an operator as Mr. Solly Joel. But any rubbish is good enough to talk when the market is in the depth of despair.

RHODESIANS.—The Rhodesian market is steady compared with that in Kaffirs, and there has been a fair rise in Cam and Motor. When these shares were underwritten the underwriters got stuck with about 50 per cent. at 27s. 6d., so that we may expect the price to hang round about that point. Although the market is more or less a made market, I understand that the mine looks well. Tanks continue to drop, and no doubt within the next week we shall get some official statement with regard to the smelters. The Financial News is responsible for a story that Mr. Robert Williams has got rid of his holding; I do not know that any one can speak definitely on this point, because, of course, Tanganyika shares are largely to bearer. But I am certain of this, that Robert Williams is the greatest optimist the City has ever seen, and such people are incapable of selling shares in companies that they are so closely connected with. I therefore do not believe a single word of this tale. In London we do not quite understand how seriously the Morocco question affected both the Paris and Brussels markets and how urgent was the necessity to realise all speculative holdings. All big accounts have been closed, and Tanganyika suffered like all other mining shares.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Cement report was moderately good, and although the shares fell, they have since recovered. As soon as the old contracts have expired the company will be in a position to take advantage of the present prices, but competition is still keen, and it does not appear to me that the ordinary shareholders can hope for a dividend until some sort of amalgamation or agreement has been entered into. This seems difficult business. Omnibus stock keeps very steady. But bulls here will have to take their profit sooner or later, and if by any chance the board should be seized with qualms of remorse and behave according to the tenets of strict accountancy we might see a heavy fall.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

Large transactions are going on in the shares of the well-known manufacturers of margarine, Van der Berghs, Limited. The carry-over for last year equalled a further 40 per cent. on the whole of the ordinary share capital, after paying 17½ per cent. The £1 shares, fully paid, are still standing at about 46s., and the London Stock Exchange are talking them to 60s., on the basis of the bigger dividend for the current year.

The potentialities of the Oceana Development Company are being much talked of in the market. The recent diamond discoveries in the locality are accountable for this, but the assets of the company are of the estimated value of over 10s. per share. The shares can be purchased round about 7s., and are fully expected to go to 20s. or over in the very near future.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE COMPLEAT OXFORD MAN"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As the author of "The Compleat Oxford Man"—a quite humble effort to show at least one phase of undergraduate life as I have seen it—it is both instructive and amusing to read the curiously different points of view of the various critics—none of whom, incidentally, has perceived the would-be humour of the title, with the exception of Canon Hutton.

"An Oxford Undergraduate," whose letter in your last issue was most gratifying to me, points out that my Oxford man is not really "compleat." He says that I have made no mention of the politician or the decadent. But, surely, each one of these types is a "compleat" Oxford man, just as I have declared my rowing man to be "compleat." Every undergraduate, of whatever type he may be, is "compleat" in himself. Such, at least, was my contention when baptising the book.

On opening the Morning Post some days ago, judge of my intense delight at finding a long, long notice of the book, signed by Robert Ross. A neophyte to the world of letters, I am still naturally at a loss as to his identity and status. My judgment had to be formed from his writing, and I therefore came to the inevitable conclusion that his point of view was not that of an Oxford man, a Cambridge man, or any other sort of University man. It was rather that of one whose whole outlook had been formed in the Battersea Polytechnic—of one who had sat, albeit unsuccessfully, at the feet of Mr. H. G. Wells.

He was shocked to the depths of his being to be told that Oxford was not peopled by men who scented themselves and carried lilies, who read Nietzsche, and assumed the pose of Socialism. He found it gross beyond measure, altogether unbelievable, that there are undergraduates human enough, healthy enough, and consistent enough, not only to be attracted by a pretty face, but not to be ashamed to confess it. He labelled such men "Putney," and wrote in a would-be bitter manner of Putney High Street. It was all very funny. He was loyal to his Polytechnic by holding a brief for Ruskin Hall, which is, as everybody knows, merely the training place of the professional tub-thumper. Then followed the eulogistic notice in the columns of THE ACADEMY by Canon Hutton, whose knowledge of Oxford, both ancient and present, is not to be fathomed. Unlike Mr. Robert Ross, he knows the undergraduate, to say nothing of the Don, in all his moods and tenses, and, having judged my book by that knowledge, he argues that "The Compleat Oxford Man" is a true picture of the undergraduate of to-day—a very photograph.

From the femme incomprise feeling that Mr. Robert Ross gave me, I was naturally overjoyed by Canon Hutton's understanding and appreciation. Conceive my surprise, then, on opening the last issue of THE ACADEMY, to find that a real undergraduate, a compleat Oxford man—if he will allow me to hold that opinion of him—thinks that Canon Hutton's notice was not all that it might have been! What would he say were he to read the concentrated Putney of the Robert Ross aforesaid?

Such are these three points of view—one of the man to whom Oxford is unknown, another the record of a man who knows Oxford backwards but who is no longer there, and the third of that lucky individual who can still sign himself "An Oxford Undergraduate." May I, then, be allowed, through the medium of your columns, to express my gratitude to all three writers for the unique opportunity they have afforded me of studying that, to me, surprising question—point of view?—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

A. HAMILTON GIBBS.

THE LATE MR. CHURTON COLLINS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been called to a statement in Mr. Frank Harris's review of the Life of the late Professor Churton Collins in your issue of October 7th.

It is stated that from Carlyle he (Professor Churton Collins) hears that "Christ was a world historical humbug." This is evidently a misconception of the passage in page 45, which tells us that Carlyle spoke with great severity of Strauss not having made use of that expression.

Trusting you will kindly publish this correction of a rather serious mistake, I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES WHITE, M.A., Chaplain of Bromley College.
Bromley College, Kent, October 20th, 1911.

THE LATE MR. CHURTON COLLINS AND ROBERT GREENE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is surely rather unreasonable for Mr. L. C. Collins to expect that a mere student of Elizabethan literature should be able to see that when Mr. Harris, an expert in these matters, wrote "Greene's death" he did not mean "death," but "birth." How, in the name of common sense, could one be certain that this new fact was not one of the many discoveries in literary history for which the late professor was justly famous? Was he not privileged to reveal Shakespeare to us as diligent reader of Plato in a Latin version? Did he not track his finest thoughts to their source in the plays of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, or even to the fragments of these dramatists which the busy actor-manager playwright conned in his favourite pocket volume, the Loci communes sacri et profani of Joannes Stobæus? It is hardly credible but these and similar wonderful discoveries had the very curious effect of driving many an intelligent waverer into the camp of the Baconians. He also discovered that a certain scene in the "Taming of the Shrew" was plainly borrowed from the "Trinummus" of Plautus, and not from Gascoigne's "Supposes." In less important matters his extraordinary care in verifying his references enabled him to date Maginn's articles on the "Learning of Shakespeare" two years earlier than their supposed first appearance in Fraser's Magazine. And his bibliographical skill brought to light an edition of Thomas Drant's version of the "Epistles, Satires, and Art of Poetry" of Horace eleven years earlier than the one in the British Museum. In view of these brilliant finds I fancy I ought to be excused for taking Mr. Harris' statement as literally true.

For the last week or so we have had it dinned into us by every irresponsible reviewer that the late Mr. Churton Collins was a paragon of accuracy, and his extraordinary care in verifying every assertion has been set before us as ideal of scholarship. How such a legend could have grown up heaven only knows. His attack on Mr. Gosse may have had a good deal to do with it. Mr. Gosse had always treated facts in the cavalier, the Don Juan fashion of a poet and man of genius, and in this way laid himself open to the attack of a man who, whatever his qualifications as a professional literary detective and academic mandarin, could never have been mistaken for a genius. The likely thing is that both critic and reader accepted him then at his own valuation, as apparently many of them do now. It is to be wished that the critics who praise his carefulness and accuracy would take the trouble to examine his statement of the case for the Shakesperian authorship of "Titus Andronicus," and after that give some of their time to Mr. J. M. Robertson's masterly analysis of the evidence for and against it. They might also note his wilful and contemptuous neglect of Herr Arnold Schroer's "Ueber Titus Andronicus," by the help of which he might have got more substance into his essay. In fine, if the gentlemen who are so ready to testify to Mr. Collins' accuracy and care really want an object-lesson in editing, let them work through the "Plays and Poems" of Greene, a book which Mr. Collins assured us he spared no pains to bring to perfection, and afterwards take up Mr. R. B. McKerrow's edition of Nash.—I am, &c., HESTER BRAYNE.

October 23, 1911.

THE ONLY WAY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Now that the nation's free powers to absolute demand have been instituted by the Parliament Act, it is as well to make inquiries as to her free powers to absolute supply, since the former must be wholly dependent upon the latter. You may take from those who have in order to benefit those who have not as the present Government is bent upon doing, but when you have systematically exhausted the resources of your victims where are your further supplies coming from? This will prove to be the dynamic crux to the Parliament Bill—the obstacle to the Act itself—the great fact which, apart from all moral protest on the part of the Die-Hards, must come as the physical test of the Government's policy. It may or it may not be slow in coming, but its advent is nevertheless sure, because the very process by which you give or distribute wealth is the very process by which you take or consume it—a mere sifting process. For instance, the Government is consuming and distributing national wealth, but not producing it. "Oh!" cries your demagogue, "it is not a Government's duty to produce wealth, but only to see that it is properly (?) distributed." Now this has always been the Alpha and Omega of your democratic ideas of government. One has never heard of a democratic ideal where the policy of government is to produce as well as to consume wealth. Yet the former is the first essential of real economy. A democratic policy of consumption or distribution must ever prove disastrous apart from a democratic policy of production.

Now we are all acquainted with the Government's methods of consuming and distributing capital. In other words, it is all-powerful as a consumer and distributor, but by no means all-powerful as a producer of wealth. This is its fatal flaw—a flaw, be it said, which will ultimately bring all parties to their senses; for, as sure as the national ground of wealth depends on a national basis of industry, so sure will a national policy of consumption and distribution which ignores sources of production bring ruin.

The national ground of wealth, like the individual ground of wealth, has nothing to do with capital. The latter is simply a speculative ground of wealth, and as such is a ubiquitous ground—common to all nations and individuals alike. The national ground of wealth is a ground of production—a labour ground—and this ground of wealth, unlike a speculative ground, is not ubiquitous, since, apart from the national surrender of industrial interests, it must always remain a characteristic source of wealth.

Now you cannot speculate with economic forces unless you are absolutely certain of success, since a losing game spells economic disaster. A nation must stick by its means of producing wealth, otherwise, with all its art of speculation, it can have no solvent basis of wealth—no means for guarding against the evils of false speculations. So long as the primary policy is one of production so long will its methods of wealth-making be economic methods. Where its policy is one of positive supply, a Government need not be troubled by any form of positive distress, any labour problem. But it is this problem, above every other problem, which is paralysing us. Nothing, as far as the salvation of the country is concerned, can be done before this problem is solved. Economy, obviously, has been too long a matter of speculation on the part of successive Governments for any immediate economic adjustment or relief to be made. But though the country, in the form of taxation, must perforce find the means to alleviate the evils of its past errors of policy, the form of taxation should not merely be a speculative form of obtaining wealth.

Your method of taxation should be positive, not negative—that is to say, it should have a basis of production, and not of consumption, of wealth, otherwise you are not adjusting things, but merely putting off the evil day—the day when your goose, the ratepayer, has been over-exploited.

It is this sequence of events which will give dynamic force to the present moral resistance of the Die-Hards, and the fact that option was, after all, but a matter of dying hard or soft (like the poor goose) will be a lesson that the voter will not soon forget, no matter what party he may belong to.

How, then, can taxation be made positive—be made to produce as well as consume wealth?

The answer is by making production the ground of wealth. For instance, our present policy is one of industrial freedom. Now this is absurd, as all industry is dependent upon the production of raw material. If, therefore, you are going to buy your raw material instead of produce it, you are going to stand at an initial loss. That is just as we stand, since, by the importation instead of the production of raw material, we have systematically generated a national waste of labour.

It is foolish, and by no means economic, to assume that a nation's real ground of wealth consists of what it purchases and not of what it produces. Apart from the raw material which it produces, a nation's industrial resources of wealth have industrial limits. By the importation of raw material Capital and not Labour becomes the industrial source of wealth. By taxing capital, therefore, you are drawing upon something which, from its ubiquitous nature, is liable to sudden flight. On the other hand, by taxing raw material you are drawing upon something which constitutes an absolutely certain ground of wealth, since, apart from it, no kind of industry can be carried on and no capital created.

Now, to make it harder for capital to take flight—that is to say, to hold in check its ubiquitous tendencies—is surely a wise rather than an unwise policy, since by its use in the purchase of raw material at home instead of abroad you maintain your national ground of industrial independence, which, after all, is the real ground of freedom. Surely our national structure of financial independence should rest upon our own national ground of industrial independence, and not upon other nations' grounds of industrial independence? Indeed, it may well be asked where our own financial independence is if it is merely a matter of foreign substance. That we have no real ground of national independence is a fact which I trust I have made clear elsewhere (see Economic Review for this month).

Now, apart from national fitness or substance, we cannot be nationally solvent. Our situation, at any given time, may therefore prove to be an alarming one, in that it would involve financial panic, and our statesmen, instead of being allowed to speculate blindly with affairs of State, as they are doing with all the force of their powers, should be forced to do their business or else resign.

The limits of a letter are distressing at times, but one must consider with respect the privilege offered by an editor. I feel I must conclude with this remark. As raw material constitutes the wealth basis of production, all land which is unproductive of raw material is a productive form of productive waste. It is for those statesmen who desire a cure for the unemployment evil to bear this in mind. It supplies them with the key to the only way.

Apologising for the length of this letter, I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. C. DANIEL.

Loughton, Cherry Hinton, Cambridge,
October 23rd, 1911.

THE FUTURE OF THE TERRITORIAL FORCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to Colonel Quin's letter in your issue of the 12th inst., may I be permitted to say that, fine as is the spirit displayed by the Territorial Force, and splendid as may be the National Reserve movement, they do not effect the purpose required—that is, to give us a reliable Home Defence Army to take the place of the Regular Army on its departure for overseas war. We can only obtain such an army by compulsory service. All other ways are in truth mere makeshifts, that yet swallow up money, and threaten to swallow up more and more.

Colonel Quin writes of the "attendant disadvantages" of compulsory service. Would he kindly state what he considers them to be?

NATIONAL SERVICE.

October 18th, 1911.

 Other letters referring to "The Future of the Library" and current topics are unavoidably held over owing to pressure on our space.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS

- The Cheerful Day.* By Reginald Lucas. Arthur L. Humphreys. 5s. net.
- Love Letters of an English Peeress to an Indian Prince.* By Mrs. M. Chan Toon. Digby, Long, and Co. 6d.
- The Letters of Peter Lombard (Canon Benham).* Edited by Ellen Dudley Baxter. With a Preface by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Portrait Frontispiece. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
- The Art of Effective Public Speaking.* By Ernest Pertwee. George Routledge and Sons. 3s. 6d.
- The Critical Attitude.* By Ford Madox Hueffer. Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.
- A Motor Tour Through France and England: a Record of Twenty-one and a Half Days Automobiling.* By Elizabeth Yardley. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.
- South America To-day.* By Georges Clemenceau. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.
- A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles.* Edited by Sir James A. H. Murray. Simple—Sleep. (Vol. IX.) By W. A. Craigie, M.A., LL.D. Double Section. Henry Frowde. 5s.
- The Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty: a Warning.* By James Thompson. John Ouseley. 6d. net.
- The Fledglings.* Sketches of Child Life by Henrietta Home. Elkin Mathews. 2s. net.
- Death.* By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. Methuen and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
- Undiscovered Russia.* By Stephen Graham. Illustrated. John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.
- Things Seen in Northern India.* By T. L. Pennell, M.D., B.Sc., F.R.C.S. Illustrated. Seeley, Service, and Co. 2s. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

- The Life of S. Bernardino of Siena.* Translated from the French of Paul Thureau-Dangin by the Baroness G. von Hügel. With Illustrations after the Old Masters, selected and annotated by G. F. Hill. Philip Lee Warner. 10s. 6d. net.
- Chats on Postage Stamps.* By Fred J. Melville. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.
- Chawton Manor and its Owners: a Family History.* By Wm. Austen Leigh and Montagu G. Knight. Illustrated. Smith, Elder and Co. 21s. net.

Masters of English Journalism: a Study of Personal Forces. By T. H. S. Escott. Frontispiece. T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

FICTION

- The Sacrifice.* By Wilmot Kaye. W. J. Ham-Smith. 6s.
The Widow Woman: a Cornish Tale. By Charles Lee. Illustrated by Charles E. Brock. J. M. Dent and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.
One of the Family: Another Comedy Without a Plot. By Keble Howard. Illustrated. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
A Queen of the Stage. By Fred M. White. Frontispiece. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
Paul the Minstrel, and other Stories, reprinted from "The Hill of Trouble" and "The Isles of Sunset." By Arthur Christopher Benson. Smith, Elder and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
The Lotus Lantern. By Mary Imlay Taylor and Martin Sabine. Illustrated by F. Vaux Wilson. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Promoter's Pilgrimage, or the Engineer's Revenge. A Tale of London and Mexico. By C. Reginald Enock, F.R.G.S. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

JUVENILE

- Happy Hearts: A Picture Book for Boys and Girls.* Edited by Harry Golding. Ward, Lock and Co. 3s.
Wonder Book: A Picture Annual for Boys and Girls. Edited by Harry Golding. 3s. 6d.
Nancy and her Cousins. By L. E. Tiddeman. Illustrated by Oscar Wilson. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.
The Cave of Hanuman. By Mrs. Hobart-Hampden. Illustrated by Oscar Wilson. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.
First Voyages of Glorious Memory: Passages from the "Principal Navigations of Richard Hakluyt." Selected for Young People by Frank Elias. Illustrated by Norman Wilkinson, R.B.A., R.I. A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d.
The Life Story of a Lion. By Agnes Herbert. Illustrated by Harry Dixon. A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.

VERSE

- Homer's Odyssey.* A Line-for-Line Translation in the Metre of the Original. By H. B. Cotterill, M.A. Illustrated by Patten Wilson. George G. Harrap and Co. 21s. net.
Under the Swedish Colours: A Short Anthology of Modern Swedish Poets. Done into English Verse by Francis Arthur Judd. With a Preface by Edmund Gosse. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

- "All Hail." Simple Teachings on the "Bible." By Baroness Freda de Knoop. With Illustrations from Old Masters by Annie Thynne. Arthur L. Humphreys. 21s. net.
Mystics and Saints of Islam. By Claud Field. Francis Griffiths. 3s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

- The Edinburgh Review; The Eugenics Review; The Quarterly Review; The Bookseller; Cambridge University Reporter; The Parsi, Bombay; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Manchester Quarterly; Atlantic Monthly; The Modern World, Madras; International Journal of Ethics, Philadelphia; Publishers' Circular; Revue Bleue; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Everybody's Story Magazine; London University Guide, 1912.*

Two Volumes.

Price 10s. net.

By the Way of the Gate

BEING

The collected Poems and Dramas of

CHARLES CAYZER

Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co., Broadway House, Carter Lane, E.C.

FROM

WATTS & CO.'S AUTUMN LIST

THE SOURCE OF THE CHRISTIAN TRADITION:

a Critical History of Ancient Judaism. By ÉDOUARD DUJARDIN. Translated by JOSEPH McCABE. Cloth, 323pp., 5s. net; by post 5s. 4d.

In this work M. Dujardin, a distinguished French writer and close student of Hebrew and Syrian affairs, puts forward a theory of Judaism and the Old Testament which will arouse keen discussion. He holds that the Jews had no literature and no civilisation until the fifth century B.C., and sets forth a remarkable theory of the prophets. It is probably one of the most revolutionary books yet written on the Old Testament and Jewish history, but it is written with a thorough command of the subject. The translation, by Mr. McCabe, especially aims at preserving the high literary quality of M. Dujardin's work.

THE GREAT SECRET; being the Letters of an Old Man to a Young Woman. Cloth, 250pp., 3s. 6d. net, by post 3s. 10d.

These letters are thoroughly readable, and take us much closer to the heart of things than many more pretentious utterances. They are like the easy conversation of a man who has seen much and done much. Their most charming feature is their perfect frankness. There are several books which are recommended for people who have lost touch with the old creeds and are in search of fundamental ideas. "The Great Secret" deserves to be added to the list.

SELECTED WORKS OF VOLTAIRE. Translated, with an Introduction, by JOSEPH McCABE. (R.P.A. Cheap Reprint.) Cloth, 128pp., 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.; paper cover, 6d., by post 8d.

BRAVE CITIZENS. By F. J. GOULD, Author of "The Children's Book of Moral Lessons," &c. With Preface by G. P. GOOCH. Cloth, 160pp., 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.
 Stories of heroism in humane causes.

CAPTAIN KLEK: a Romance of Marseilles. Cloth, 246pp., 2s. net, by post 2s. 4d.
 A new novel of remarkable interest and power.

THE R.P.A. ANNUAL FOR 1912. Containing Articles by EDEN PHILLIPOTS, ARNOLD BENNETT, A. W. BENN, Prof. L. C. MIALI, JOHN M. ROBERTSON, M.P., JOSEPH McCABE, and others. Cloth, 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.; paper cover, 6d. net, by post 8d.

Complete Catalogue, with copy of "Literary Guide" (16 large pp.) free on receipt of card.

London: WATTS & CO., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

By Special
Appointment to

His Majesty
the King.

MACKENZIE & MONCUR, LTD.,

Heating, Ventilating, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineers and Ironfounders, and Hothouse Builders.

HOUSE WARMING.

We are specialists in Warming Apparatus for Mansion Houses, Villas, &c., and we design and fit up complete apparatus in any part of the country, devoting particular attention to its introduction with the least disturbance and inconvenience. By our system a healthful, summer-like temperature can be maintained in all weathers with the minimum of labour and expense. Schemes and estimates prepared from Architect's plans. Surveys by arrangement. See our list of recent Heating, Electrical, and similar Engineering Contracts.

LONDON OFFICE—

GLASGOW—

8, Camden Road, N.W.

121, St. Vincent Street.

EDINBURGH (Registered Office & Works)—

Balcarres Street, Morningside.

Telegrams—"Treibhaus, London," and "Hothouse, Edinburgh."

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND ... THROUGH CANADA. ...

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-68, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON,
E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street,
Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's
Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE TO SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

VIA the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,

JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRISOL.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year
according to season

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,

NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programmes on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
200 London Wall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1830).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 21.	Every Thursday Fortnightly.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17.	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£10.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR.

A Weekly Review
of Politics, Art,
Music, Literature,
and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY
of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers
for 6s. per annum (post-free)
or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 559	Reviews (continued)—
Song 560	Fiction 571
The Literary Fop 560	A Great One-Act Play ... 572
Pitt and the French Revo- lution 561	The Theatre..... 573
With One Voice 562	Foreign Reviews 574
The Motor-horn 563	Delhi in Earliest Times ... 576
Reviews—	Conversational Misers ... 577
Religion and Religious 564	Music 578
Metternich 565	Some Old Theatres of Paris 579
The Revival of Poetic Drama 566	Art 580
The Post Office and its Story..... 567	Imperial & Foreign Affairs 581
An Island Idyll 568	In the Temple of Mammon 583
A Hustling Holiday ... 569	Correspondence 584
Shorter Reviews 569	Books Received 586
	MOTOR SUPPLEMENT i.-iv.

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE parrot cry "Your food will cost you more" if Tariff Reform won, was a favourite fabrication on the part of the Radical-Socialist combination during the General Election of 1906. There can be no doubt that the cry exercised a considerable influence on the minds of certain classes of the electorate. They were promised cheap food, cheap clothing, cheap rents, and as much more as possible in the shape of bonus out of the resources of those who have been and are the mainstay of the prosperity and stability of the country. Every one of these promises has been falsified. The prices of commodities and necessities have risen so alarmingly that the Government have been obliged to promise an Inquiry. There is no reason to suppose that the Inquiry will have the slightest effect upon prices. The policy of the Government is at the root of much of the trouble. The blind manner in which they have driven and are driving capital out of the country cannot tend to cheapness, because enterprise is stifled and production is checked. The volume of employment is restricted by the feeling of insecurity on the part of the capitalist, and the output of commodities is also restricted; prices in consequence maintain a high level.

Concurrently with increasing dearness, the policy of Ministers tends directly to produce scarcity of wages. The people in a dim sort of way seem to be realising these facts, and are therefore engaging in struggles to secure higher wages. High wages do not, however, spell prosperity, since the increased burden on enterprise inevitably tends to restrict it. It is curious to observe that the Government which arrogates to itself special championship of the more necessitous classes is still so blind to existing facts that it desires to make a serious inroad on their diminished resources. We refer to the scheme to compel these classes to insure themselves in a way which they do not desire and which has never been proved to be advantageous to their interests. We have often endeavoured to insist that the true interests of the nation and the people will never be secured whilst the field of policy is viewed piecemeal, and ambitious Ministers are permitted to put forward for their own glorification proposals which are not designed as part of a cohesive and coherent whole, but rather as opportunist sops to the least instructed classes of the community, who are little able to detect their inherent viciousness.

The sweeping and absurd assertion made by the Rev. R. J. Campbell in Philadelphia to the effect that "no successful business man in modern times can be honest" has brought down upon that gentleman's devoted head the scorn of clergymen and business men alike. To any experienced merchant or manufacturer a dozen instances of strict integrity combined with success will occur; and, by the way, is not the Rev. R. J. Campbell a successful man in his own way, and honest withal? The worst of indiscriminate generalisation from incomplete data is that it leads to such tempting opportunities for sensational speeches. Competition does not necessarily mean dishonesty or unfair dealing, though it may mean sharpened wits, and the speaker must have been exceptionally unfortunate in his relations with the average English business man if they led him to the extraordinary cynicism implied by his latest public utterance.

One great event of the week in maritime circles has been the decision of the Eastern Sea Fisheries Committee on the Homing Instinct in Crabs. It seems that a year ago 2,000 East Coast crabs were labelled carefully—age, height, weight, &c.—and returned to the sea with instructions to report progress, as it were, if they felt moved to explore an alien soil. Results tend to show that the crab is of an affectionate, home-loving disposition, shy of straying far from the land—or sea—of his birth; also that he prefers Cromer to other watering-places. The amiable crustaceans of Weybourne, Sheringham, Beeston, and Runton nearly all sidled towards Cromer, although one absolutely reckless individual clawed his weary way as far as Yorkshire, while a Lincolnshire gallant, bored to death with Mablethorpe, wandered distractedly to Norfolk. Evidently there is more in the crab than we suspect when we consider him merely from the gastronomic point of view.

The London Institution opened its winter season on Monday last with a lecture by Mr. Oscar Browning, M.A., on "The Study of History," and the list of fixtures up to the middle of February is extremely interesting. Next Monday, at 5 p.m., Dr. H. Charlton Bastian, F.R.S., will lecture on "The Origin of Life Question," and among the subjects to be taken between now and mid-December which seem of exceptional promise we note "The Meaning and Importance of Decorative Art," dealt with by Professor Selwyn Image; "A Frenchman's View of England," by M. Emile Lesage; "Bells and their Harmonic Tones," by Mr. W. Starmer, F.R.A.M.; "Oddities in Parliament," by Mr. Spencer Leigh Hughes; and "Breakwater Building," by Mr. A. E. Carey, M.Inst.C.E., one of our own contributors.

SONG

I built a little cage of song
To hold my thought,
And through a golden summer long
I patient wrought.

The love-built staves I meant should be
So faëry-fine—
That they should prove how artistry
May grow divine.

But ah! no craft has power to hold
An essence fled—
Within its little cage of gold
My thought lay dead.

JAY F. FOREST.

THE LITERARY FOP

THERE is a type of literary person, known to all periods, who bears something of the same relation to literature as the fop bears to manners. As the fop lives only to indicate certain poses and gesturings of life, so the exquisite of literature writes only to extract quaint flavours and essences which are accidental to Art, and not of its true spirit. Like the beau, he is apt to be a leader of fashion; like the beau, he is a stranger to the multitude, and a bugbear to simple, intelligent folk, and possesses an exquisite sensibility in matters which are unimportant. So great is this sensibility that he resents the carelessness of those whom he vaguely knows to be his betters; so regardless is he of the deep questions that lie behind all Art that he cannot understand any preoccupation save that with the superficial. A writer lax in his periods, though of sublime imagination, is to the literary fop like a person in a shabby coat. He may be a good fellow at heart, but it behoves him to change his tailor before seeking the society of gentlemen.

The literary fop is perhaps most common in times of mild and not unpleasant reaction—the less vital a literature the greater its refinement. When not under the necessity of fighting at the barricades, it can afford to loll in rose-gardens and toy with Watteau fans. Then is the hour of the fop. He mimics the battles of heroes with a toy sword; he repeats the declamations of fierce orators in silky tones and sentences of luxurious elaboration. He refines over and over upon the technique of the masters, because technique is his entire preoccupation; he overcomes the gods at decorative games because they play them with careless eyes and minds pondering on other things, while to him they are the sum of existence. He lays down the canons of a minute art which might possibly amuse the Olympians on an idle afternoon, but can have no real connection with the business of a laborious world. In the end, as often as not, he dies lamenting the coarseness of the world's most cunning craftsmen. Thus he is apt to be a pessimist—self-taught, condemned to seek in vain, as the one light of life, what the wise discard as will-o'-the-wisps of intellectual debauchery.

Like all pleasant and unimportant things, the creed of the literary fop moves much in fashions, from courtly love-song to chivalric romance, from pastoral heroics to symbolism, from the recondite conceits of sonneteers to high-flown analysis of exotic religions. No doubt these fashions have been largely the backwash of true schools of art; at any rate, we hear little of them in the most detailed histories of literature. Since they are not so easily and emphatically distinguished from vital movements as, for instance, extravagant fashions are from the natural evolution of clothes, and are not, on the other hand, accepted, like the costume of past ages, as matters of antiquarian interest, they have lacked their special historian. We know little of them beyond our own memories, though we seem to detect them broadcast in our reading, and may argue for ever as to where they begin and end. We hear their echoes and feel their dim and not always unwholesome presence throughout all literature, but they are seldom more than ghosts, far too vague for classification. They have cast many a false glamour over learning, and made the reputation of many a superfluous poet or critic.

But if we distinguish the literary fop with difficulty in the past, we can observe him at our leisure in the present. His work is all about us. In fiction he is powerful, in belles lettres he is all but supreme. We can see the touch of his hand in half of the output of eclectic journalism; he is responsible for many tones in latter-day criticism; poetry is all but entirely beneath his sway; he holds in his hands most of the canons of the complete essayist. Even in humour, which was not always his strong point, he has obtained firm footing. But this spreading of his reign in an age which, in spite of its faults, is not so much decadent as reactionary, is due to another cause. As he was once the product of refined idleness, he is now, paradoxically enough, a phenomenon of the sheer hard struggle for life among the appallingly numerous people who are authors without any particular justification. When men have no message which they burn to utter, and yet find themselves compelled to write day by day, they speedily develop those idiosyncrasies of outlook and manner which are the hall-mark of the literary fop. Being without any true originality, they make some unneeded refinement their substitute, offering half-tones instead of colours, forms instead of ideas, verbiage instead of words, and moods instead of theories. They sweep up the dust of big movements and display it as stuff of their own minds. They catch the unconsidered trifles of current philosophy and twist them into tremendous mysteries. They are often plagiarists, and not seldom thieves, but they work as hard for their meagre output as the most laborious of true artists for their masterpieces. The harm they do is in the futile complication of literary craftsmanship, and in the bewilderment of simple folk in search of truth. It might be added that they bar the way of better writers than themselves, but that is true of the second-rate in all departments of life.

What will be the end of them it is impossible to say. They have seen the fall of more than one Empire, but it does not follow that they will see the fall of yet another; the modern world has a miraculous power of absorbing cranks. In the meantime they help to make the consideration of contemporary literature an impossibility to busy folk; they employ the publishers and they madden the casual, sensible reader. They have done their best to make authorship commonplace and art a matter of formulas. Their declamations fill the market place, and turn Grub Street into a Tower of Babel. It is curious to reflect that their predecessors were once indolent triflers in drawing-rooms.

R. T. C.

PITT AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION*

By H. BELLOC

THERE is always a sense of insufficiency (to put it mildly) or, to speak more truly, of hopeless inadequacy in the reviewer who takes up, for the purpose of a brief notice, a great historical work; and it is with such a preface that I must apologise for undertaking these few lines upon Dr. Rose's second and concluding volume of his great monograph upon Pitt.

The time in which we live is remarkable for the production in historical literature of two kinds of books. The first are books of the lightest possible sort (lighter than any fiction), written rapidly to a publisher's order to meet the new and very satisfactory demand which the public is showing for studies of individual lives and short periods; the second are deliberate monographs upon persons and subjects of permanent historical interest. These latter are no less a peculiar feature of our time than the former, for though such exhaustive monographs are to be found throughout literature, the number which have appeared in the last fifteen years in England is exceptional and peculiar to our own day. The two categories do not merge. It seems to be in the nature of such work that it is either wholly secondary and accomplished with no pretence to thoroughness, or that it is final. And though the first sort somewhat injures, in the eyes of the general reader, the authority of the second, yet the verdict upon our time will certainly be that it has produced more detailed, masterly, and conclusive special historical study than any other.

Dr. Rose's work stands very high in the second category. It stands the higher from the fact that he prepared his reputation in it—if one may say so with respect—by a series of lesser books which attracted the attention they deserved, but did not give the author the place this exhaustive work will give him, for the life of Pitt will never be written again. There is a certain quality in detailed and minute historical work which gives to the workman in any particular department of it a monopoly. The labour is so vast, the concentration necessary so strained and so prolonged, that of the very few competent to undertake it a small proportion again will discover the necessary energy and the tenacity, and of these a yet smaller proportion will bring to their task the synthetic power without which their work would be unreadable. Dr. Rose, therefore, can rest assured that he has written the one great monograph upon the younger Pitt upon which all future work will repose.

The last fifteen years of William Pitt's life challenge four great questions. First, the nature of the rupture with France; secondly, the union with Ireland; thirdly, the second outbreak of war in 1803; and finally, Pitt's judgment of the situation at the moment when he was struck down.

The last point is of great importance to history, because we can obtain in it a kind of self-revelation on the part of Pitt by which to conclude how strong was his power of weighing the real forces of his time. An analysis of it would demand far more space than so brief a notice as this can pretend to. The Irish aspect of the life—all the minute description of the Rebellion and the Act of Union—I must also leave upon one side for another pen, and I will take as sole examples of Dr. Rose's monograph his account of the two outbreaks of war with France.

The cause of the declaration of war of the 18th of May, 1803, was the condition of English opinion at the moment: nothing more and nothing less. In the preceding ten years the original motive and purpose of the Revolutionary War in Europe had evaporated from the English mind. It was perfectly clear to any rational observer that the overwhelming superiority of England at sea could be indefinitely maintained. It was further clear—not indeed to any rational observer, but to the few who knew how to appreciate reality in such matters—that the English was—at that time—the only society in Europe with large and increasing reserves of mobilisable wealth. England could subsidise Europe, and England could hold the sea. Add to that the fact that in the popular mind the struggle was now regarded in the simplest possible fashion as a struggle for national existence throughout Europe against a new international force, and you have the dynamic conditions which compelled the rupture to take place.

Dr. Rose admirably describes the net of personal relationships between Addington and his set on the one hand, and the nominally private member, Pitt, on the other. The picture as it appeared to observers in London is admirably drawn. The reader has some right however to note the absence of the European standpoint, for in a monograph of this conclusive kind students will eagerly look for a judgment upon the main historical question, and they will hardly receive it.

It is true that the biographer of Pitt, with his pen closely following the details of an individual life, must think of 1803 rather in the terms of Pitt's exile from office than of the great conflict in which Pitt was but a unit. Upon p. 488 the author gives as good a summary as would anywhere be found of the effect of Pitt's great speech upon May 23rd. That speech, of course, has not come down to us even in the artificial forms in which the great speeches of Parliament have been handed down to us from times before the beginning of modern reporting; but we get in such a page as this the atmosphere of the speech and of its effect upon the governing opinion of England. And on this page we have in a sense the answer to the major question. It may be briefly put thus: Pitt did not make war, but he would have made war.

The consequences of that war need not be followed here. It is possible that if the peace had been kept in 1803, the political creed of revolutionary France would have remained a national thing, and, even within the boundaries of France, a thing perpetually in jeopardy. As it was, the second phase of the Napoleonic wars carried that creed throughout the Germanies, made the great Continental national groups, founded united Italy, and recast the whole of European society.

In his description of the second point I have taken, the first outbreak of war, Pitt himself being at that moment the master of English destinies and possessing in its fullest power that edged and driven instrument of mind which made his work the strong and single thing it was, his biographer has full scope for an exact analysis, and that analysis has never been better performed. These first hundred odd pages of Dr. Rose's second volume must have presented a task of peculiar difficulty. Every writer and even every careful reader of history must know what it is to have to go over once more a field beaten hard by the feet of a thousand predecessors, to resurvey it, to eliminate detailed error, and to fix new details of truth. It is perhaps the hardest of all tasks connected with letters.

This task Dr. Rose has here triumphantly achieved. It is not too much to prophesy that these first five chapters, introducing the conflict of England with the Revolution, and following the first months of the war to the occupation of Toulon, will be used as a text in the Universities of the Continent. It would be impossible to set higher a piece of modern English historical work.

The reviewer, as he follows these pages, is particularly struck by the accuracy of detail and the sense of proportion observed where military affairs are described. The two pages (140 and 141) which touch on the critical moment when the new levy of the summer of '93 cleared the north-eastern frontier, are as exact a summary and as useful a one as has yet appeared. Nor is Dr. Rose afraid of establishing the true version of the outbreak of war simply because that version is now hackneyed. He has enlarged it and given it precision, but he has not, as the specialist in history is so constantly tempted to do, attempted to reverse or even to deflect in any degree the general and popular judgment—which happens to be here historically most sound. Pitt did not desire that war. It is remarkable that he could so long delay its outbreak. He saw more clearly than any other man in Europe, save possibly Talleyrand, the confusion of the allies. He approached his task with caution, precisely because his vision was so lucid. His judgment of the immediate future was at fault—but so was every other man's. Dr. Rose, it may be noted, wisely rejects the unproved and improbable story of an attempt to save the life of Louis XVI. by bribery, and he wisely emphasises the pivot of the whole business, which was, of course, the Scheldt and the neutrality or independence of the Low Countries.

* William Pitt and the Great War. By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. (G. Bell and Sons. 16s. net.)

Were there space to digress in so very brief a notice of so extensive a study, one might discuss the effects that would have attached to a better choice of diplomatic methods, not by the French Government, but by two or three French individuals in the autumn and early winter of 1792. Chauvelin was not the man for his task, and it is the opinion of the present writer that if French military organisation had permitted at that moment the presence of a dictator, if Dumoriez had been more consistently ambitious, or Danton more concerned with personal power than with his country, a proper envoy to London could have saved for France the neutrality of England. But Chauvelin's note of December 27th made that impossible, and it was Chauvelin's inadequacy quite as much as Pitt's refusal to deal with him that opened the sluice and let in the flood of the war.

A commentary so very brief, and dealing with but two single points of all those contained in these six hundred pages, needs a reiteration of the apology with which it was begun. But it is quite impossible in the first mere notice of so complete a work, and within the narrow frame of a short article, to do more than pass the general judgment already given. Dr. Rose's monograph on Pitt, completed in this second volume, gives to our historical literature its standard biography of the chief Englishman of the Revolution. This is the place which Dr. Rose's work will certainly fill, and which it still more certainly deserves to fill.

WITH ONE VOICE

BY SIR WILLIAM BELL

THE October number of the Oxford and Cambridge Review, excellent throughout, has a claim to especial consideration by virtue of the article by Mr. F. E. Smith, with which it opens. The article is in the main an analysis of recent Unionist policy, and the analysis is powerful, caustic, and candid. But, before following it out, one may well draw attention to the important profession of political faith in relation to social reform which shows Mr. Smith in complete accord with the Leader of the Unionist party. Last week in Edinburgh Mr. Balfour reminded his hearers that the Conservative party is by tradition pledged to reform of this supremely important kind. He referred to his earliest years in public life, and said, "Then as now we stood for the great cause of social improvement and social amelioration in the home." He pointed out that Tariff Reform is the necessary condition and concomitant of social reform, and he laid stress upon the fact that the principle known as laissez-faire was of Radical origin, and that the régime of unrestricted competition was a product of Liberalism:—

It cannot be too strongly insisted (says Mr. F. E. Smith) that the complement to Tariff Reform is Social Reform. The two policies go hand in hand. You cannot improve—as we are determined to improve—the condition of the working classes as long as they are exposed to the promiscuous competition of inferior industrial strata. It is dishonest to pretend that the Conservative Party is, or has been, antagonistic to social reform.

It is the parable of Beaconsfield which Mr. Balfour and Mr. Smith have repeated; in the last sentence quoted we have one of the most famous contentions of the great leader who educated his party in the remembrance and application of their ancient principles.

Mr. F. E. Smith emphasises his point:—

There are still to be found in happy England the most revolting slums in Christendom, and hundreds and thousands of our fellow-subjects live under conditions which render civilisation a mockery and morality a name.

Moreover:—

No political truth is at once more poignant and more profound than this: that you have no right to expect patriotism towards a country which fails to provide industrious citizens with the means of a decent and tolerable subsistence. Let England afford to Englishmen who are prepared to work a fair share of the humble amenities of life, and the heart of England will be proved in the supreme moment of trial to be as true as that of Canada; but let the proletariat be once convinced that the Unionist Party is the party of the classes and the mouthpiece of privilege, and it will undoubtedly spue them forth from its mouth. And it will be right to do so.

This declaration shows that the writer of it has detected the cuckoo's egg in the Unionist nest and is determined to extrude it. How the Radical party, as the true parent of the laissez-faire policy in Britain, succeeded in depositing that ungainly fruit of its fertility in the birthplace of Conservative policies is a mystery; equally mysterious is the dulness of instinct which for long permitted Unionist eyes to regard the monstrosity as a product in natural environment. The days of complacent blindness are ended, and those who cannot even now clear their minds of a brooding affection for the uncomplimentary gift which Radicalism added to their treasures must be commended to the consolations of fortitude and resignation. The egg is in the latter state of Humpty Dumpty.

Mr. F. E. Smith is convinced that it is the vocation of Unionism at the present time to put forward a strong constructive policy; the Unionist Party must not rely upon criticism and opposition alone. Moreover—

The ultimate victory can only be won after battlefields even fiercer than those in which we have been engaged during the last five years, and they can only be won if it is realised that no great object, none worthy of achievement, is practicable without the exhibition of resolute qualities, without the readiness to run great risks and incur great sacrifices in the hope of a success which, under human conditions, cannot be pronounced certain.

It is evident that Mr. Smith is prompted to judge severely those in whom he thinks he sees a tendency to yield to the Laodicean disposition, and it is necessary to bear this estimate of duty in mind in considering his analysis of recent party history.

Mr. Smith insists that the predominance of the Unionist Party during twenty years prior to 1906 was "not directly asserted on a strict appraisal before the forum of democracy of the competing merits of the two great parties in ordinary matters of domestic controversy." It was due in the earlier phase to the strong recoil of the English electorate from Home Rule and in the later phase to the patriotism aroused by the South African war. The Government which concluded that struggle incurred resentment, rightly perhaps, says Mr. Smith, but certainly with unfortunate results, by passing beyond the range of popular expectation in order to tackle the problems of Education and Licensing. Error marked the Unionist Administration for its own at the inception of the Tariff Reform campaign:—

We had to choose between Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Ritchie. Posterity, I think, will be a little perplexed to understand our decision, for the Cabinet not only lost Mr. Chamberlain—bold in conception, matchless in prestige, skilful and experienced in council—but it lost also most of the Free Traders who were worth keeping.

Before the ensuing appeal to the ballot-box came, a series of by-elections had demonstrated "not only that the country was tired of us, but that it had commenced to loathe us."

Yet the Unionist Party showed a most remarkable and encouraging recovery after 1906. Then Mr. Lloyd George took upon himself to save Radicalism. Tariff Reformers, by an exposure of our unsatisfactory social conditions, had shown that "the blessings of Free Trade" were a delusion. Discontent had been aroused, and, to understand its consequences, one must "fully appreciate the lesson of the successive Reform Acts":—

The practical effect of this legislation was to place supreme political power in the hands of the masses. For quite a surprising number of elections the proletariat was content to vote upon party issues largely obsolete, and bearing little relation to their own material interests. . . . And thus the great fact was for many years obscured that legislative power, involving the power of taxation, had passed to the classes who possessed little or nothing, and that, failing recourse to ultra-constitutional methods of resistance, the wealthy classes were at their mercy.

Those who imagine that the demands of the wage-earning classes can be smothered by a display of preremptory impatience and then ignored may well be recommended to read and re-read the foregoing extract till they have mastered its significance completely.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer resolved to introduce the Budget of 1909 with its well-known advertisements:—

All the eulogies of our national prosperity were forgotten or torn up. The triumphant demonstration that our working-classes were more prosperous than those of any other country in the world were abandoned, and Mr. Lloyd George determined to involve the House of Lords, if it were possible, in a conflict with those very aspirations and discontents which had up to that time constituted the strength of the Tariff Reform movement.

Mr. Smith neither praises nor condemns the Peers for referring the famous Budget to the people, but he remarks that the aggressive position which the House of Lords took up "was only possible to those who were prepared to face the future with the wary and constant prudence of a man who, possessing bitter enemies, knows that there is no weak joint in his armour." Moreover, those whose counsels the Peers followed—

Knew, or ought to have known, that their decision was putting to the hazard the whole existence of the hereditary constitution of the House of Lords. They may have been right to play with stakes so high, but they were not right unless they were prepared to play the game out to the bitter end, and upon stakes equally high, and even, in a supreme moment, to be doubled.

The intelligence of readers will supply the application of that criticism. But it will be generally admitted that very nice points are raised in the delicate matter of judging when stakes should or should not be doubled.

Mr. F. E. Smith faces the future of Unionism with that bold and sanguine spirit which should animate the party. The working classes, he says, "do not care a brass farthing for Home Rule," and when they discover that it implies additional taxation their indifference will change to acute dislike. And "as long as the Liberal party confines itself to carrying out its purely political pledges to its supporters so long it has lost, and it will lose, ground." Those pledges involve an attempt to resuscitate the Licensing and Education Bills, which perished unlamented among the earlier progeny of the Radical régime. Moreover, the "People's Budget" of 1909 has been a failure, and, in Mr. Smith's view, the blighted expectations to which it gave rise have been among the principal causes of the recent strikes. Mr. Smith, like Mr. Balfour, sees that the fortunes of Unionism are becoming ascendant once more.

And when all the opportunities of power are again presented to the party, what is its policy to be? Social reform, as we have seen, must be the mainstay of Unionism, and the first plank of Social Reform is Tariff Reform:—

If I am right in my view that there is a profound conviction—by no means altogether unwarranted—in the minds of the working classes that they are not enjoying what the German Emperor would call their "place in the sun," it is certain that no party will gain office, or, if it gains it, can continue to hold it, without a programme sincerely believed and strenuously prosecuted, which aims at alleviating the conditions under which so many of our fellow-subjects live their laborious and uninteresting lives.

There are other contributors to the Oxford and Cambridge Review in whom is a bold and hardy spirit. The writer of an article on "The Education of Study" dares to say that in English society "the female element wields an influence unknown on the Continent of Europe, and woman worships money." It is laid to the charge of the attractive sex that they have banished into chilly shade the estimable scholarly class in so far as it cannot maintain a display "only possible to men of considerable means." Consequently "outside the four walls of his University the Master of a College, if a poor man, has an inferior status to that of a Bond Street tradesman." And yet Social Reform has its opponents! Another writer makes a smart attack from the economic side upon the advocates of small holdings. The Oxford and Cambridge supplies us with substantial fare, but there is no insipidity about it.

THE MOTOR-HORN

BY EDWARD THOMAS

At the end of a long day's walking I entered Newmarket by the Norwich road. I thought it must be a clever town, for at the last milestone a child came running up to me to ask if I had found a penny among the beeches—a brilliant variation from straightforward begging which does credit to local education. As I came into the town before dark, but after the closing of shops, the long, wide street and a strange breed of men standing or slowly walking about on its pavements made me feel that scarcely after a dozen reincarnations should I be at home in Newmarket. The man who discovered that we are "all God's creatures" had an uncanny eye for resemblances, and I often doubt the use of the discovery, without disputing its accuracy. Every one was talking of horses except those who preferred lords and professional golfers. I saw some caddies industriously swallowing temperance hot drinks instead of beer, in the hope of earning as much as James Braid at some distant time. As for the horsey men, they seemed to understand lords as well as horses, so well as to illustrate the saying, "To know all is to pardon all"—nay, to go beyond that, to admire all. I can quite believe that to be a lord is very different from being able to imitate one after a glass of ale. There can be little doubt that to the influence of lords or horses, perhaps of both, we must attribute the brilliant beggar at the last milestone.

A Scotch baker directed me to a place—"It is not very elaborate, but it is clean"—where I could get a bed such as I could afford. For some time I lay awake listening to the motor-cars. Most of them rushed through the town; a few came there to rest and silence; others paused for a minute only with drumming suspense. I thought I should not easily tire of these signals from unknown travellers. Not that I spent much time on definite and logical conjecture as to who they were, whence they had come, and whither and why they travelled. I was too sleepy, and at any time such a labour would have been irksome. No; I was more than content to let these noises compose a wordless music of mystery and adventure within my brain. The cars could bring together lovers or enemies or conspirators so swiftly that their midnight alarms suggest nothing else. At night it is hard to connect their subjugated frenzy with mere stupid haste. The little lights steal through a darkness so vast that the difference between a star and a lantern is nothing to it. The thing is so suitable for a great adventure that straightway the mind conceives one. On a winter's night the sound and the idea are worthy of the storm and in harmony with it:—

Hark! 'tis an elfin storm from fairyland,
Of haggard seeming but a boon indeed. . . .

It was easy to imagine myself the partner in magnificent risks quite outside my own experience, and to feel the glory and even the danger with no touch of pain, while I lay as careless as the friendly near neighbourhood of sleep could make me. The touch of arrogance in the voice of the motor is to its credit by night. In a measure it revives the romantic and accepted arrogance of horn and trumpet. It gives a bravery to appearances which has long been dropping away from drivers of horses. I do not disparage the sound of hoofs and wheels and the private voice of a solitary traveller on the dark roads, but there is something melancholy in it, and more endurance than enterprise. The sounds of the motor-car have added immensely to the London night, at least for good sleepers with minds at ease. Formerly to those out of the market routes the only sound of night travel at all provoking to the mind was the after-midnight hansom's clatter, which challenged conjecture more often than imagination; I pictured most likely a man with bleared eyes and a white shirt who had let his cigar out, at most a man whose achievement was behind rather than before him; and certainly I was always very well content to be in bed. But the motor-horn is turbulent and daring. Even if it is coming home there is a proud possibility of distance left behind, and either it seems that the arriviers have not returned for nothing or the sudden stop and end suggest a sublimity of dejection from proud heights.

As to the car setting out in darkness, it gathers to itself all the pomps of setting out, as we have imagined or read of them in stories of soldiers, travellers, or lovers, as we have experienced them when children, and as we still fancy they would be were we ever to advance towards adventures. I suppose also that the speed of a motor-car always, to the outsider, unconsciously suggests a race, with rivalry, uncertain ending, and an unknown prize. These thoughts and the far better mere listening to the horns and machinery occupied me and led on to sleep in such a manner that I ignored a man next door imitating a gramophone quite busily, and in less than half an hour I was asleep and out of the market in a dream.

REVIEWS

RELIGION AND RELIGIONS

Croyances, Rites, Institutions: Tome I.—Hiérogaphie, Archéologie et Histoire Religieuse. Tome II.—Hiérologie, Questions de Méthode et d'Origines. Tome III.—Hiérosophie, Problèmes du Temps Présent. By COMTE GOBLET D'ALVIELLA. (Paul Geuthner, Paris. 3 vols. 22f. 50c.)

Adonis und Esmun. Eine Untersuchung zur Geschichte des Glaubens an Auferstehungsgötter und an Heilgötter. By WOLF WILHELM GRAFEN BAUDISSLIN. With 10 Plates. (J. C. Hinrich, Leipzig. 24 marks.)

THE rules of most well-regulated debating societies, in England at any rate, exclude from the category of topics that may be discussed Politics and Religion. Experience has taught that both of these lead to strife, janglings, and ill-will, and tend to defeat the object of club promoters, which is generally the furtherance of social intercourse and general amity. There is, it is true, one very notable exception, that of the Assembly which, by a wild inversion of the usual order of things, excludes all subjects but Politics from the field of its debates; but this exception is due to an obscure tangle of historical causes, and the results are not of such a kind as to encourage imitation. Count Goblet d'Alviella, the author of these three substantial volumes, evidently considers Politics à l'amiable as an extravagant dream, though he believes in a religious concord for the future; possibly the reason for his hopefulness may be found in the fact that most of his religious disputes have been conducted on paper, or that, at the worst, he has had to do his fighting in a lecture-room, free from the necessity of immediate reprisals. At any rate he regards the study of comparative religion as a grateful labour, almost as a pastime. "When," he says, "one is actively engaged in the struggles of the political factions of one's country there is a certain delight in transporting one's self into a calmer and serener atmosphere, where one can express one's self without the partisanship and the reservations that Parliamentary and electoral contests demand." We may remark that it is possible to be equally detached in dealing with politics, given certain conditions, as existence in a different land or century from those under discussion. Comparative religion, as understood by M. d'Alviella and by most other writers on the subject, is never in want of some such saving conditions; the interesting stage of all religions is to be found in prehistoric or very early historic times, or else in some tract of the globe that drives us to the index of our atlas. It is true that M. d'Alviella occupies himself in his last volume with "Problems of the Present," but for this he thinks it necessary to justify himself before other comparative religionists and before the world.

In this connection we will say something about the plan of the work. It is divided into three volumes, of about equal size, styled respectively "Hiérogaphie, Hiérologie, Hiérosophie." We understand that these names were coined by the author, and that they have still to gain recognition from writers on religious science. The sub-titles explain themselves better—"Archæology and Religious History," "Questions of Method and Origins"—and, as we have already indicated, "Problems of To-day." It is this last that is the least firmly established. In some ways it provides the most interesting part of the work. Apart from M. d'Alviella's answer to Brunetière's article on the bankruptcy of science—a piece of controversy that would have won our hearts at the beginning if it had happened to be the first thing to catch our eye, for it castigates with honest scorn the worse than spiritual pride of such scientists as M. Ribot who considered a reply as beneath their dignity—there are some most suggestive chapters on recent developments in Brahminism and Buddhism, and a great deal about England and America. The religious life of the former country is for M. d'Alviella of absorbing interest. One of our greatest living preachers said the other day: "The Jew is our expert in religion;" the author of this work might parody this into: "The Anglo-Saxon is our expert in religion." The volume begins with a "Visit to the Rationalist Churches of London," and one of the visited ministers, Mr. Moncure Conway, is the subject of a subsequent chapter. Cardinal Newman supplies the theme of another essay. M. d'Alviella seems to regard the Anglo-Saxon race as trustees for the religion of the future.

The volume of Hierology contains some particularly serious work, including a lecture given at Balliol in the Summer School of Theology in 1909, a presidential address, as head of the "Method and Scope" of the Congress of Religions at Oxford in 1908, and a review of Mr. Frazer's "Golden Bough." The first volume, "Hiérogaphie," is chiefly remarkable for some excellent essays, generally in the form of reviews, on certain historical problems, treated with all the synthetical brilliance that we associate with the historians of the Latin race. The chapters on the last days of Paganism, on the causes of the Decline and Fall, and on the Worship of Mithra are very much more than mere articles from a review. The purely archaeological articles are directed, or we think they should be, to the historical or religious specialist. They deal mainly with "curious" points—we use the word in its broadest sense, for the kind of information that is designated by this word in second-hand booksellers' catalogues, and that appeals to certain minds, is conspicuously absent—and have little value except as material. Sporadic curiosity is a mental malady, and has little to do with the search for truth.

M. d'Alviella tells us that he himself was accused of "dilettantism" when he first came forward as a teacher of Comparative Religion. Though we readily acquit him of the charge, we believe that he has suffered for the faults of others. The two besetting sins of rationalist historians and inquirers are, paradoxically enough, intolerance and, more grievous still, because insult bars the injury, easy patronising scepticism. Neither of these crimes can be imputed to M. d'Alviella; if he is intolerant, it is for the eighteenth-century philosophers; if he is flippant, it is for the solemn wiseacres whose imagination cannot admit "imponderables." The "imposture" and "credulity" of Voltaire's friends, the slavish "fear" of Lucretius have no mercy from him, and he would never have endorsed the bitter cry of Flaubert's St. Anthony at the mournful procession of the vanishing gods: "Où êtes-vous maintenant, pauvres âmes tout altérées d'espoirs qui ne furent pas assouvis?" He believes above all in "Science for Science," but he admits that there is an art as well as a science of religion, and we can conceive of him as laying aside at certain seasons the pontificals of science, and joining in a cry of purely religious significance of "Art for Art"!

Count Baudissin belongs rather to the analytical than to the synthetical school. "Adonis und Esmun" is an expansion of an earlier work of his on the same subject. Definite conclusions are few, and hypotheses are stated with the utmost modesty. The central thesis is the reconstruction of the demigods Adonis and Esmun, their origins, their myths, their worship, and their significance. On to this thesis is grafted a secondary one, the comparison of various Oriental legends dealing with resurrections of gods and with gods who had remedies against death and disease. A close connection is discerned between the two Phœnician half-gods and the Semitic Tammuz on the one hand and the classical Asklepios-Aesculapius on the other. A less direct relationship is discussed for the Phrygian Attis and the Egyptian Osiris. The general system of Semitic, and especially Phœnician, religion is treated with great breadth and clearness in the introductory chapters. A kind of Phœnician Trinity is adumbrated, varying from place to place, but with Baal, Astarte, and Adonis as the types. Baal is found by his nature and attributes to fall practically outside the thesis, but the connection between Astarte and the youthful god is all the more insisted on, as indicating the type of nature-worship that lay at the bottom of Semitic religion. Count Baudissin's theory runs to some extent parallel to the thesis which is so admirably expounded in "La Cité Antique" of Fustel de Coulanges—the dual source of the ancient thegony—the city gods and the forces of Nature.

The corner-stone of Phœnician religion, according to Count Baudissin, is the conception of life; it is this conception that distinguishes it from the other Semitic systems; the Jews and Arabs relegated it to a secondary importance, and Babylonian theology was more complicated, and contained other equally important ideas. It is a conception of life that admits continuity or resumption into its connotation. The vital interest of the Phœnician religion, still according to Herr Baudissin, is that it is probably the oldest of all the tremendous religions of the Semitic race. The reason given for this theory is ingenious and unexpected—the Phœnicians were really a non-religious race, and therefore did not develop, but kept to primitive forms. The momentous question of the relationship between the Phœnician and Jewish religions is treated of in various places the conception of "the Living God" occupies some important chapters. Among other Old Testament subjects that recur from time to time are the brazen serpent, and the vision of Ezekiel, both highly relevant to phases of the discussion. The author claims to have said the last word on many aspects of his subject, as research has come to a standstill with regard to Phœnician religion, and the excavations now being carried on in Asia Minor can at best only throw sidelights on the matter.

METTERNICH

Metternich. By G. A. C. SANDEMAN. With Ten Illustrations. (Methuen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

To the accomplishment of successful biography two requisites are indispensable: charm and accuracy. There is indeed the third requirement of a need for the biography; but that is presupposed; and it certainly may be assumed in the present case, for, as Mr. Sandeman says, Metternich "has undoubtedly suffered from a lack of impartial biographers, and indeed of any English biographers at all." And, again, "there is no adequate English biography of Metternich." Therefore, the need of the book being assumed, it is only necessary for Mr. Sandeman to prove his claim both to charm and accuracy of presentation. In fact, he claims the latter requisite in his Preface, speaking there of his book as one "which, without pretending to produce any new facts or to expand any original theories, seeks in a comparatively brief space to give a trustworthy outline of Metternich's life from the domestic as well as from the official side." Leaving the question of charm aside for the moment it will be necessary to see how far he justified this claim of his.

At the outset it must frankly be said that by some of his remarks Mr. Sandeman arouses an attitude of cautious scepticism that is little apt to induce a permanent spirit of confidence. For instance, surely a very elementary knowledge of geography should have obviated such a sentence as the following:—"A festival was held at the Wartburg, the Grand Duke's castle at Weimar, to celebrate the Battle of Leipzig and the tercentenary of the Reformation." Similarly it is difficult to imagine precisely what the following sentence means. He is speaking of the Czar Alexander's death, and the likelihood "that the Grand Duke Constantine would succeed to the throne of Russia." Instead of which the succession passed to the Grand Duke Nicholas, as Nicholas I. of Russia, and concerning him Mr. Sandeman says: "The change was not to Metternich's taste, for Nicholas was known to regard him with aversion and to favour liberal doctrines." One wonders what gave Mr. Sandeman to think (much less to write) so strange a thing as this. Nothing could be further from the trustworthiness that he claims. What he has done, of course, is to describe Alexander, the dead Czar; yet, even so, it is mystifying, for he has just recorded his death.

Matters such as these (and others could be given if space permitted) do not arouse confidence in a reader. In fact they indicate a lack of knowledge, and, what is more, a lack of historical certitude on the part of the author that is particularly disconcerting in a study such as the present. It would be difficult to imagine any subject where surety was a more indispensable requisite than the life of so intricate a diplomatist as Metternich. There, of all places, it is necessary to know precisely the bearings of every step taken and every decision determined, because, so tortuous and perplexed was the procedure of his mind, that an indecision in one part is doomed to throw a very large part of the adjacent machinery out of gear. Perhaps this is the reason that Mr. Sandeman makes so unsatisfactory a guide through the intricate matters that engage the attention of Metternich. In matters such as those already given above it is possible to discover him tripping over definite historical or geographical errors; but in the long story of diplomacy, intrigue, and quasi-statesmanship that engaged Metternich from 1803 to 1848 it is not so much that we can detect positive errors as an uncomfortable feeling that he is merely, and rather perplexedly, following the outward course of known facts, instead of perceiving their relation one to another, and illuminating that relation by expounding the central point of view to which they may all be referred.

As may be expected, this is particularly the case at the most crucial moment of all Metternich's history. In the network of decisions and indecisions all around the Congress of Prague, before Austria joined the Allies and opened the war that ended in the banishment to Elba, Mr. Sandeman gathers the facts with some certainty under his control, though even here he fails to elucidate much that is complicated. But directly the Congress of Vienna is instituted he loses all control of the various perplexities and complexities. The questions the Congress opened, and Metternich's persistent attitude toward them (the attitude of the intriguer and diplomatist rather than that of the statesman) make thrilling history; they demand fascination of treatment; but in Mr. Sandeman's hands they are not only very near being flat and uninteresting, they are often positively annoying and irritating. Deeply important questions are slurred over; dramatic moments are missed; effects are put before causes (as when the Mainz Commission takes precedence of the Carlsbad Decrees), and generally, in the mind of the reader, the initial chaos is made more chaotic, instead of being reduced to order. The result is that the whole of Metternich's struggle with the growing Liberalism in the German States is difficult to follow in Mr. Sandeman's pages, simply because the basis of negotiation, as resolved at the Congress of Vienna, is not made intelligible.

It is a pity, and it is with considerable reluctance we are compelled to find fault with the book in this way, for Mr. Sandeman has certainly the faculty of writing with charm when, as in the more intimate relations of Metternich's life, he is more sure of his ground. It seems as though the trouble arises from the fact that Mr. Sandeman has undertaken more in this book than he could ever have hoped to achieve within its limits, both of space and the period of its accomplishment. The biography of Metternich is truly the history of Europe from the autocracy of Napoleon to the days of Canning (whom Metternich once described as his "Crucifix") and Palmerston, and to the early dawn of Cavour and Bismarck—all men who, in one way and another, aided the ruin of the ascendancy that Metternich had so carefully and tortuously built up for Austria after the ruin of the Napoleonic Empire. Such a scheme is obviously not one that could be achieved within the margins of such a book as this, for, despite its imposing appearance, it is but short. It is a scheme for a lengthy and detailed history.

Therefore, perhaps, it is rather to the private side of Metternich's life that one turns in the volume. And here there is no doubt that the author has done far truer justice to his subject. The early portrait of the indolent pleasure-seeker provides a clue that solves many a perplexity in the course of the later career of the famous defender of an obsolete feudalism; and the closing account does not fail to convey the sadness of the fall from glory. "The last years of Metternich's control of Austria's foreign policy are melancholy reading," says Mr. Sandeman; and to say that he does not fail to do justice to the melancholy is to say that he enters the lists to clear Metternich from the charge of too great a bigoted adherence to the past; wherein he is no more than just. Yet it is a justice that is requisite.

THE REVIVAL OF POETIC DRAMA

By COSMO HAMILTON

Experiments in Play-writing, in Verse and Prose. By JOHN LAWRENCE LAMBE. (Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. 5s. net.)

IN a long, earnest, and eloquent Prefatory Essay Mr. John Lawrence Lambe puts forward a passionate appeal for the revival of Poetic Drama. "The overwhelming testimony of the past twenty-four centuries acclaims verse," he cries, "the form of utterance midway between speech and music, as the fitter medium for the expression of passionate thought and feeling." And yet at the present moment "there seems to be a strong tendency both with critics and public in the land of Shakespeare to regard the Poetic Drama, which in the past has been universally accounted the highest form of art, as an out-grown garment, incapable of adaptation to the modern stage." With extreme respect for an author who is not only an enthusiast but a scholar and something of a poet, we have followed him through his arguments and read every line of the plays which he modestly puts forward under the heading of Experiments. Sympathetic as we are, we cannot help coming to the conclusion that Poetic Drama will remain an out-grown garment, incapable of adaptation to the modern stage, until that great and distant day when another Shakespeare shall arise in the land.

Drama, as Shakespeare well knew, does not consist of the conduct of a slow-moving story by a set of vague characters who deliver long-winded speeches about life and death and the great hereafter at those frequent moments when an audience is naturally impatient for something to happen. Under no conditions can we conceive the possibility of a revival of Poetic Drama in which there is neither drama nor poetry. The only excuse for long speeches in a play is that they are not only full of memorable lines, but that they carry on the action. If the same good plot were given to two dramatists of equal ability, and the one wrote it in swinging pointed English with never a word too many, while the other carried on the story in verse that was excellent without being inspired, there is no question as to which of the two plays would give the greater pleasure. In drama there is nothing both so artistic and so necessary as the economy of words. Action is the thing. The clash of temperament, the swift movement of unrelenting fate are the two factors which go to make a play successful. There is nothing so tiresome to an audience as to be compelled to listen to a scene demanding no more than a dozen terse lines which is dragged out by and weighed down with one long speech after another full of lines which, however poetic, have very little to do with the subject under discussion. Nor can we see that anything except bathos is achieved by making characters say such lines as these:—

DOMENIC: Did you think
That I could be deceived? How easily
I lay my finger on the tender spot,
Which your profound astuteness thought to hide.
Vain foolishness to treat me like a child,
When both your manner and your speech give shape
To those dread spectres, direful fantasies,
Which throng my bursting brain. Lorenzo, speak!
I will be told. Think not to thwart me thus.

LORENZO: I will not and I dare not tell you more.

DOMENIC: You shall—you must!

LORENZO: Peace, peace, you will go mad!

Take an alternative. Throw all this into such lines as could be written by the merest journeyman dramatist:—

DOMENIC: I tell you I am not to be deceived. Everything you say makes me more horribly anxious. Tell me the truth.

LORENZO: I can't.

DOMENIC: By God, you shall!

LORENZO (uneasily): For Heaven's sake, man, keep your head.

No man, greatly moved, could be either so self-conscious or so artificially self-confident as to be able to utter such roundabout sentences as those quoted from Mr. Lambe's play entitled "Covered Fire." "Think not to thwart me thus" would surely move the most sympathetic audience to unholy laughter. It throws the whole scene into the spirit of burlesque. And that is the great danger of "Poetic Drama." The genius of Shakespeare, who was not only a poet but a master-dramatist, makes such unfortunate lines impossible, but even in Mr. Stephen Phillips' "Paolo and Francesca," admirable as it is, there are several scenes which would have been far better in economical prose. Even Tennyson must have wished that he had never attempted poetic drama when he heard the Homeric laughter of a first-night Lyceum audience which greeted the remark of his distracted father:—

The bed has not been slept upon. The chamber Is empty!

We agree whole-heartedly with Mr. Lambe's contention that present-day audiences are capable of enjoying serious drama, and that "a good tragedy in its after-effects is infinitely more exhilarating than the most amusing farce." We see for ourselves, as all men can see, that frivolity, vulgarity, and timidity are bringing the London stage lower and lower every year. We believe, however, that serious drama can be better served by plays that are written in the prose of Sir Arthur Pinero, Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr.

Masefield, Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. Haddon Chambers, and the like, than in the laboured and uninspired poetry of present-day writers. We are afraid that Mr. John Lawrence Lambe has failed to prove his contention. Let him, however, comfort himself with the reflection—uncomforting as it is to those playgoers whose love of Shakespeare's plays draws them to the theatre—that even if he had succeeded and found himself produced there is only a small handful of actors who are intelligent enough to deliver verse, and these would not be in his plays, because they are buried in the provinces.

THE POST OFFICE AND ITS STORY

The Post Office: An Historical Summary Published by Order of the Postmaster-General. (His Majesty's Stationery Office. 9d.)

The Post Office and its Story: An Interesting Account of the Activities of a Great Government Department. By EDWARD BENNETT. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 5s. net.)

THE former of these volumes is an official publication, and is not, therefore, to be judged from the literary standpoint. The more's the pity, for the story of the British Post Office abounds in romantic incidents, and more than sufficient material must be available in the archives of St. Martin's-le-Grand for the construction of a volume which, entrusted to the proper hands, might be made absorbingly interesting, and at the same time subserve the ends for the attainment of which it is presumed the present book was created. This Historical Summary is, however, for the most part severely official, and, in accordance with the canons accepted in official circles, the authors—for the work, although nothing is said on the point, is obviously a composite production—have for the most part mirrored their style on that adopted in Blue-books and other official publications of a similar description. The result is that a considerable part of this work reads as if it had been taken bodily out of the Post Office Guide, and is thus to the general reader as unreadable as that doubtless most valuable publication. Another defect which calls loudly for criticism is the apparent absence of all editorial control over the contributors. It would almost appear that each individual clerk performed his allotted task and sent it independently to the printer, who, when he had collected all the sections, proceeded to print them seriatim without any attempt at correlation or dovetailing. The result is that the various parts seldom fit neatly into one another, and the careful reader finds more than one instance of overlapping. Whenever a second edition is decided upon the authorities would do well at least to delegate to some one the duty of bringing the several contributions into line, and he should be instructed to consign to an appendix much of the statistical information now to be found in the body of the book.

It has been said that the writers have for the most part striven earnestly to attain to the ideal of the professional Blue-book compiler with fatal results to the attraction of the volume for the general reader. This lament, however, does not apply uniformly to all the sections. Those devoted to the Packet Services and Foreign and Colonial Posts, and the Overland Mails, are in quite a different category from the remainder of the company in which they find themselves. Here the romance of the Post Office indeed finds itself, although restrained by the uncongenial company into which it has fallen. Moreover, there is some literary style about these pages. Some pleasure is derived from the mere perusal, apart altogether from the matter which they contain. One feels that in reading of the foreign relations of the Post Office one is reading literature, and one grieves all the more that the others should fall so far below them in standard. If we might hazard a guess at the authorship of these sections we might attribute them to Mr. A. H. Norway, who, we believe, is still in the service of the Post Office, and whose "History of the Post Office Packet Service," published sixteen years ago, is such attractive reading. It is in the style of this work that the history under notice should have been written, and it is a pity that the duty of compiling the history in its entirety was not entrusted to him. Apart from the deficiencies alluded to, this little book has much to commend it. If it is not the attractive history of the Post Office which would be welcomed by many, this "Summary" is the mine out of which much of the raw material for the popular history which is to come will be hewn. If it will not be read itself it will necessarily form the basis of its more fortunate successor. It is illustrated by a well-chosen selection of reproductions from contemporary prints, and useful lists of the Postmasters-General since Colonel John Wildman in the seventeenth century, and Secretaries to the Post Office since Willboyl of the same period, are furnished in the Appendix. We have, however, detected one error in this list. The first Marquess of Salisbury is made to hold office for two days after his death.

The official Post Office History will appeal merely to officials and historians. Mr. Bennett's book, on the other hand, is little likely to appeal to either of these classes. It is quite at the other pole, and, written in a popular, chatty style, will find its public among the regular readers of the Strand Magazine and similar publications. It is not a history of the Post Office, nor does it pretend to be one. It discourses lightly and pleasantly of the numerous and various activities of the remarkable institution which Mr. Bennett has taken for his theme, and interspersed in his narrative are many Post Office anecdotes, humorous and otherwise, some of which have, as far as we know, not hitherto appeared in print. One matter stands out in Mr. Bennett's book. A comparison of it with the official publication shows in parts such curious parallels that the reader is led inevitably to the conclusion that Mr. Bennett must have had access to the official records, even if the proofs of the official publication were not placed at his disposal. This is noticeably the case in the chapter entitled "Money Orders and Postal Orders." Among the most interesting of the chapters is that on "Ocean Mails," in which due acknowledgment is made of Mr. Norway's work on the Packet Services, mentioned previously in the course of this notice. This book will probably be widely read, yet without filling the gap due to the absence of a reliable and readable history of the Post Office. So far as it goes it is satisfactory. The principal complaint against it is that it does not go far enough.

The word "Interesting" probably crept into the title by accident. Its use is not inappropriate, but it should come from the reader, not the author.

AN ISLAND IDYLL

My Tropic Isle. By E. J. BANFIELD. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

'How quaint seems the demand for details of life on this Isle of Scent and Silence!' is the exclamation with which the author opens his book. "Lolling in shade and quietude," he continues, "was I guilty of indiscretion when I babbled of my serene affairs, and is the penalty so soon enforced?" We will begin at once by entering upon a little quarrel with

Mr. Banfield. These questions are foolish; but they are the only foolish things in the book. That the public should thirst to read, and publishers to print, further descriptions of his lovely hermit isle, is the inevitable consequence of the author's former work. What Mr. Banfield has done is in reality this. Lolling, as he says, in shade and quietude, he fashioned at his leisure a literary gem from the purest natural elements, and tossed it carelessly across the oceans into the crowded and noisy haunts of men. Having gone so far as this, he must not be surprised at the clamour for more. In fact, we insist that he should throw us this second work without even a preliminary grumble.

After this we may remind ourselves that it is the reviewer's duty to dissect a book rather than to quarrel with its author. But "My Tropic Isle" is as difficult to dissect as is a green leaf, or as anything else of closely-welded atoms of vivid life. It is a book that holds many dangers for the conventional reviewer. He would point out contrasts, would snatch a piece here and there from the main body for the purpose of quotation, and in the end would pass judgment in the unembarrassed fashion of his tribe. None of these things is possible here. The author himself has left no room for further contrasts; to pull out a fragment here and there would be as futile as to wrench a single scale from a brilliant fish and to hold it up as an illustration of the entire body; while as to passing judgment, how can man criticise an island? And this book is the island. It is the breath of the palms, the hue of the flowers, the deep blue of the sea, the movement of beasts, fish and birds—all contained within the ordinary binding of commerce.

As to the island itself, it is a spot where—

All is lovable—from crescentic sandpit, coaxing and consenting to the virile moods of the sea, harmonious with wind-shaken casuarinas, tinkling with the cries of excitable tern—to the stolid grey wells and blocks of granite which have for unrecorded centuries shouldered off the white surges of the Pacific. The flounces of mangroves, the sparse grassy epaulettes on the shoulders of the hills, the fragrant forest, the dim jungle, the piled-up rocks, the caves where the rare swiftlet hatches out her young in gloom and silence in nests of gluten and moss.

All, says the author in his expression of a rhapsody the flow of which has stood the test of years, are his to gloat over. Who would not own a beach where "the wavelets glide up with heedless hiss and slide back with shuffling whisper scarce moving the garlands of brown seaweed which a few hours before had been torn from the borders of the coral garden with mischievous recklessness"?

It is from a haunt such as this that the author gives full play to his philosophy. There he has enjoyed an intimacy with nature to a degree that Nature permits to very few. He has followed the loves, sports, and battles of weird and beautiful creatures with a comprehension that leaves the reader amazed, and, incidentally, he has a similar tale to tell of the black natives of the neighbouring lands. We have action in plenty here; but the pages abound with far more than this. We have said that no mere chance quotation can do justice to the book; a few sentences nevertheless cannot come amiss if from no other reason than to exhibit the quality of its matter. Here is a scene where blue waters and shining sands meet:—

It being far more blissful to lounge in the sea than on the verandah, I sat down, steeped chin deep in crystal clearness, warmth, and silence, passively surrendering myself to a cheap yet precious sensation. Around me were revealed infinitely fragile manifestations of life, scarcely less limpid than the sea, sparkling, darting, twisting—strong and vigorous of purpose. Tremulous filaments of silver flashed and were gone. No space but was thickly peopled with what ordinarly passes as the invisible, but which now, plainly to behold, basked and revelled in the blaze-products of the sun . . . Thus musing, the sorcery of the sea became invincible. My thoughts drifted, until I dozed, and dozing dreamt—a vague, incomprehensible dream of floating in some purer ether, some diviner air than ever belonged to a wormy earth, and woke to realities and a skate—a little friendly skate which had snoodled beside me, its transparent shovel-snout half-buried in the sand. Immune from the opiate of the sea, though motionless, with wide, watery-yellow eyes, it gazed upon me as a fascinated child might upon a strange shape, monstrous though benign, and as I raised my hand in salutation wriggled off, less afraid than curious.

Passages of the kind require no comment. They abound in the book. Their own eloquence suffices. It is a glorious thing to own a tropic isle: it is a pleasant thing to possess a speaking pen. When a man has both, added to a fitting temperament, he is a thrice-blessed being. Fortunately Mr. Banfield has not been selfish. We are grateful to him for sharing with the public this delightful Isle.

A HUSTLING HOLIDAY

A Motor Tour through France and England. By ELIZABETH YARDLEY. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

BETWEEN the dates of August 17th and September 14th the indefatigable author of this book sampled France and England, and, though she evidently enjoyed herself, and on many occasions succeeds in imparting that pleasure to her readers, she unfortunately omitted one important item from her luggage—a manual of grammar, composition, and punctuation. True, the book “was originally started as a diary,” but that is no excuse for slipshod writing; it is rather an additional reason for care, since the diary is to reach the dignity of print and a possibly wide circulation. No prefatory apology can palliate such sentences as the following, for example:—

. . . the grounds may be visited only after midday. As we were too early for the latter privilege we contented ourselves with the view of the house which presents an imposing appearance pitched high above the borders of the river, with its massive round pepper-box towers, with thick counterforts, which give it a formidable but inelegant appearance. . . .

Our exit was made down the winding stairs of one of the towers on to the stone curtain enclosing the garden and once again we crossed the drawbridge and took the road to Azay le Rideau, along which, at little ponds were the brown peasant women pounding their snowy linen, and down little alleys between the rows of cottages we caught glimpses of tiny green gardens. . . .

We had a wet ride to Angers but preferred a soaking rather than enclose the car in curtains and forfeit a view of the dampened landscape. . . .

This method of writing spoils the book for any reader with a sense of style; and unhappily it is not the only fault we have to find. The author was in too much hurry even to verify her French; the word “enceinte” is used at least three times, and spelt “enciente” on each occasion; “liqueur” becomes “liquor;” “Auxerrois” is given as “Auxerois,” and so on. Trifling matters such as badly-split infinitives we need hardly do more than mention.

We emphasise these things because they were so easily avoidable, and the book, apart from style and composition, is crammed with interesting historical notes. Not very many good accounts of motor-travel are accessible in compact form; Edith Wharton’s “Motor Flight through France” was one of the best, and might serve as a model of style in spite of its haste. Here the hurry is obvious. The author visits York, but “no time remained for a walk about the city walls for we had to reach Bowness by night.” There is no objection to a quick rush round when time is limited and a motor handy; but the impressions so gained are hardly worthy of gathering into book form. Luckily, in this volume the scanty personal impressions are overwhelmed by an astonishing amount of information. From town to town the untiring motor flew, and while waiting for lunch, dinner, or bed its occupants seem to have spent the minutes, pencil in hand, taking frantic notes of local history. It was “called the King’s Chamber, because Louis Fourteenth slept there” . . . “they were given to Diane de Poitiers by Henry Second” . . . “It is said that on snowy nights the phantom of the King may be seen” . . . “here Milton wrote his ‘Comus’” . . . “the memory of Harriet Martineau is indelibly linked with this village.” . . . So the story goes on, and the reader is in a whirl.

In conclusion, we must say that this compilation would certainly make an excellent guide-book for any one proposing to take a trip over the same ground. All the most important “things to know” about each place are grouped, and here and there comes a flicker of scenery when the chauffeur can be induced to pull up the car between the morning and evening hotels. The photographs—many of them new—are beautifully reproduced, and will inspire in the least enthusiastic reader a wish to visit the districts which are thus illustrated.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Sea-fishing. By C. O. MINCHIN. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. MINCHIN has produced a most useful and compendious little book, which should be in the hands of all sea fishermen. It is a multum in parvo of information and instruction, eminently practical, well arranged, and quite up to date. From it the would-be angler may learn when and where to fish, what he may expect to catch, what tackle he ought to use, and how to distinguish and name his fish when caught. It is illustrated with charts and diagrams, and furnished with an Index.

Sea-fishing with a rod is by no means a modern departure. Homer tells of the fisherman who angles from a promontory with a long rod—ἀλιεύς περιμήκει ῥάβδῳ—and the old fisherman of Theocritus who caught a golden fish in his dream was spinning his bait from a rock with rods when he hooked the monster.

The first book, addressed solely to the sea-fisherman who angles with a rod, seems to have been Bickerdyke’s “Angling in Salt Water,” published in 1887. Since that date the popularity of this form of sport has increased by leaps and bounds; the rod has quite taken the place of the handline amongst amateurs, until at the present day, besides large societies and clubs in London and other important places, there is hardly a watering-place on our coast without its local association and its competitions.

It is little wonder that this should be so; the sea offers splendid scope for anglers who are in search of the amusement which is daily becoming more costly and more scarce in our lakes and rivers; and the sea-angler, whatever he may suffer from wind and waves, is not tossed to and fro between the Scylla of flood and the Charybdis of drought, as is so often the fate of the inland followers of Walton.

Many people will be surprised to find how much there is to be learnt before they can hope to acquire proficiency in this branch of sport. “Sooner or later they learn that fishes will be present at any particular place only when they have a reason for being there, and that the seasonal movements of fishes month by month, day by day, or hour by hour, are, like all other phenomena that come within our cognisance, simply matters of cause and effect." Many fish are extremely "local" in their haunts, and a knowledge of the exact "marks" is very advantageous. More than once Mr. Minchin alludes to the ignorance and obstinacy of our Long-shore boatmen; "admirable as boatmen, they are simply deplorable as fishermen—or, to speak more accurately, as hookers." Doubtless this will soon be changed, as boatmen will find it more and more to their advantage to have a reputation for showing sport, and so will be obliged to apply intelligent reasoning to their experience, and to move with the times in the matter of tackle and baits.

The following hints, selected from a number, are the outcome of Mr. Minchin's experience. Pay a good price for your tackle. Bait your own hooks. Do not go out with a boatman who gets the worse for liquor. Pay no attention to the clock or to mealtimes, but be very respectful to the tides.

The Letters of an Englishman. (Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE columns of the Daily Mail were enlivened, dignified, and made valuable from time to time by the insertion of a series of essays under this heading. It is difficult quite to know why such a heading was chosen. In no sense of the word are they letters, and they might have been written equally well by a sympathetic, observant, and civilised Scot or Irishman. We take it that the title was chosen as all Daily Mail titles are chosen—with an eye to journalistic effect. Be that as it may, it is a pleasure to find these pleasant and gentle essays put together in a well-printed, nicely-bound volume. They were worth rescuing from that curious place to which it is generally supposed the Daily Mail is eventually consigned—the butter-tub. A variety of subjects, from "Celtic Glamour" to "The Tyranny of Golf," from "John Bull and his Rivals" to "Practical Joking," are dealt with, neatly, wisely, and with a certain sense of style and humour.

A thousand writers could very easily put together a volume of a precisely similar character in which the same subjects would inevitably be dealt with and they would be no worse. Certainly they would be no better. They cannot, it is true, be accused of possessing either the annoying brilliance of Mr. Shaw or the brilliant annoyance of Mr. Wells. They are the letters of an English gentleman, penned at a correctly-furnished table in the window of a literary and social club in St. James's Street or Piccadilly. They would be more aptly called "The Wares of Antony Autolycus, Esq., M.A." There is nothing in them to make the blood run faster, or to cause the person with an itching pencil to write "how true" in the margin. They contain no new thought, no epoch-making phrase, no prophecy, no startling summing-up of a period or a career. Their criticism is genial, their tendency optimistic. Hitting is done in the regulation boxing-glove conscientiously above the belt. It is possible for them to be read aloud by a maiden lady to a bevy of girls well under seventeen. In a word, they might have been, and perhaps were, written by Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson in the intervals of looking from his window. Nevertheless they were, as we have said, worth rescuing, because they are not mere examples of stereotyped journalism, of sensational word-making. They are free from the easy inverted paradox, the split infinitive, the imitation epigram. Flippancy finds no place in them. They are sincere even if they are mediocre, and their great quality is their well-turned-out, gentlemanlike point of view. No sane man could disagree with their argument and rise from them with indigestion. They make an essentially well-cooked dish, and may be recommended with mild enthusiasm.

Dysentery and Liver Abscess in Bombay. Report of an Inquiry carried out by MAJOR E. D. W. GREIG, I.M.S., and CAPTAIN R. T. WELLS, I.M.S. (Calcutta: Superintendent of Government Printing. 3s.)

IN December, 1908, an inquiry into the causes of dysentery in India was undertaken by the Central Research Institute at Kasauli, and an investigation was commenced in the hospitals and laboratories at Bombay. This scientific memoir contains the results attained; it opens up questions for further examination, which will doubtless be continued. The number of cases of bacillary dysentery was small in Bombay, so that the study of the various problems connected with this type was limited; but very many cases of dysentery associated with amœbæ were observed, so that this variety and its liver complications were studied in detail.

There are many ailments and diseases which can be openly discussed, but there are others involving the use of technical terms and language which should be limited to scientific treatises and the medical profession. The subject of this memoir is one of the latter class, so that little can be said of it. The amœbæ referred to are apparently the simplest-known animals, consisting of a nucleated mass of protoplasm, densest on the outside, but without a distinct cell-wall; they change their shapes by protruding portions of their bodies, called pseudopods, and have other recognised characteristics. Their presence in this type of the disease has been minutely examined, cultures of them have been obtained, information regarding their morphology, life-cycle and distribution has been acquired, including their seasonal prevalence and its relation to temperature and humidity, for amœbic infection shows a marked seasonal variation, closely associated with variations in humidity. Many experiments were made with monkeys and definite conclusions formed; but a further detailed study of the life-cycle of parasitic amœbæ of men by trained protozoologists is admittedly required, as also the determination of the relationship of hepatic disease, apart from hepatitis and liver-abscess, to amœbic infection. The administration of ipecacuanha in certain cases is the only treatment suggested. The memoir will be useful to the medical profession, and has been very carefully prepared, so far as it goes, but it can hardly be regarded as the last word on a very difficult subject.

The Cheerful Day. By REGINALD LUCAS. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 5s. net.)

POSSIBLY because so many people seem rather shy of tackling a book of essays, Mr. Reginald Lucas has this time published his volume in the form of a diary, although the material contained therein could very well have been set out in a series of articles. As is becoming so frequent in the books which are published at the present time, very many subjects are wrapped thickly round a very slight story. Sir John, the writer of the diary, is a very interesting person, and we could wish that he had set forth more of his own ideas about things in general and less of those of other people. There are few matters with which he does not grapple; but, instead of stating his own ideas, he gives us various quotations from past and present authors who have had any on the subject under discussion. This is all very well in its way; but all such information is second-hand, and cases has probably been perused in extenso by the reader himself. Not that the extracts so proffered are dry or uninteresting. Our author has taken care to select some of the best and most applicable, and in many cases gives both sides of an argument; but all the same we think it would be preferable to have had more of his own opinions (particularly as when they are stated they are worth recounting) and less of those of the noble army of celebrities. In spite of all, however, "The Cheerful Day" is well worth reading, and as Sir John allows the lady of his choice to be led to the altar by another man, because he is too shy to suggest that he would be happy to undertake that little journey himself, we suppose that he must not complain if, in his great humility, he prefers to offer other people's thoughts in place of his own.

Œuvres Complètes de Victor Hugo:—Les Misérables. Four Vols. With Coloured Frontispieces. (T. Nelson and Sons. 1s. net each.)

EMBOLDENED, no doubt, by the gratifying success they have achieved with their popular "Collection Nelson," formed of specimen works of the best French authors, Messrs. T. Nelson and Sons have just started another series similar in form and price which is to consist of the complete works of Victor Hugo, the great French poet, novelist, and historian. It opens with the author's famous novel, "Les Misérables," in four volumes, each adorned with a frontispiece in colour by an artist of note; and this will be followed every month by two additional volumes of his remaining works until the set is completed. This will enable admirers of Hugo to obtain a handy, uniform edition of the whole of his writings at a trifling cost, and we anticipate a considerable demand for these daintily produced little volumes, any one of which can be conveniently carried in the pocket.

FICTION

Love on the Happy Hill. By VIOLET PEARN. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

A Weaver of Dreams. By MYRTLE REED. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.)

THERE is a certain amount of similarity in the plots of these two novels in so far as they both deal with the complications and unhappiness arising, in the one case from a man being united to a girl whom he married after a very hasty courtship, and in the other from an engagement which began to pall on Mr. Carter Keith after he became infatuated with Margery, a pleasant little girl, but in no way to be compared to Judith, his fiancée.

The character of Gerald Dymock in "Love on the Happy Hill" is very well and carefully drawn, although, taking into consideration Gerald's naturally bright and happy disposition, and, previous to his unfortunate marriage, his cheerful outlook upon life, twenty years seems rather a long time for him to take to regain his old self and cease to be the cynic who tries to live his life henceforth without love, and with no thought but for the mental development of himself and his children. This seems all the more unnatural, as his wife died after three years of married life, and Edith, his old comrade and childhood's friend, is so often at hand to cheer him. There are many other interesting persons in the book, and the peep into Devonshire in the second part of the story, under the hospitable roof of Jabez Copley, where pretty Isolde, Gerald's daughter, is courted and married by Michael, the son of Jabez's old friend Leigh, is well worth the journey.

As Gerald stands out as the most prominent figure in "Love on the Happy Hill," so Judith Sylvester is certainly the most striking character in "A Weaver of Dreams." Probably it was on account of her very perfection that Carter preferred the younger Margery to the more sedate maiden to whom he had plighted his troth. The sentiment in the book is laid on with no very sparing hand, and many little pieces of philosophy pop up here and there. The description in parts is pretty, and Miss Cynthia, Judith's aunt, a charming lady who has a penchant for dainty shoes and stockings, the indulgence in which sometimes leaves the rates unpaid, adds greatly to the interest of the story, as also does Mr. Chandler, Margery's guardian, and we may add that the young people's love affairs are not the only ones in the book.

The Protector. By HAROLD BINDLOSS. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THAT favoured portion of the Empire, British Columbia, is again the scene of Mr. Harold Bindloss' story, and there is no gainsaying that the author is on familiar ground. His vivid account of the sloop threshing up the sound, of the terrible hardships of the trail, his description of the stupendous beauty of that delectable coast are all in the author's best vein; but with his hero and heroine we must plead guilty to a feeling of dissatisfaction.

Wallace Vane, the young Englishman who has practically adopted Canada in place of the Old Country, while possessed of many fine qualities, is distinctly handicapped by an obstinacy and pig-headedness amounting to muleishness. No matter whether his own interests only suffer, or whether he involves the life of his true chum Carroll, or the welfare of the shareholders of his copper-mine, he holds upon his way and invites disaster. Out of the kindness of his heart he succours two girls in the nicest way possible, but sufficiently obviously to raise grave doubts in the mind of Evelyn, who, on the most correct grounds, refused him on his trip home, but on her arrival in Vancouver, on a visit, is disposed to reconsider her decision. The visit to the Fell country is the weakest part of the book, Mopsy, Evelyn's younger sister, being the only natural character portrayed. Vane's protection extends to her, to her ne'er-do-well brother, and even to her father, who is in low water.

On his return, to oblige a dying pioneer and his daughter, he makes three Quixotic attempts, amid fearful hardships, which his friend Carroll shares as a matter of course, to find a timber area. He succeeds only to discover the spruce burnt out, and is left with a broken leg to fend for himself while Carroll goes for help. Evelyn is not the only one who appreciates the attributes of this young man, and Jessie Horsfield, whose father is mixed up in the mine, does her best to capture him, and finding from a stolen letter that Vane's heart is Evelyn's—why it is somewhat difficult to see—succeeds, out of revenge, in breaking up the Copper Company. Mr. and Mrs. Nairn, who believe in Vane, are a well-drawn couple from Scotland; but after "Hawtrey's Deputy" "The Protector" is disappointing.

A South Sea Buccaneer. By ALBERT DORRINGTON. Illustrated. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

WE have here a collection of short stories, the hero of which is a certain Captain William H., or "Bully," Hayes, a native of Cleveland, Ohio, on p. 163, and a "white English lamb" on p. 195. Beyond certain piratical instincts, and a convenient disregard of the ethics of meum et tuum, there is nothing much in common between this buccaneer of modern times and his prototypes of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries who preyed upon the Spaniards along the Spanish coasts of America. Among other things "he had worked in unclean ships and rat-ridden schooners; had breathed and fought in the Shanghai stews of Sydney and Valparaiso without profit;" and had also lived "for seven unholy weeks" on a cargo of Chinese tank-eggs when becalmed on the Equator. The scenes of the various thrilling happenings forming these stories are laid in either Oceania, the China Sea, or India, and, of course, this amazing sea-dog invariably comes out on top. In the last story he is happily married to Varæ, a half-caste, which is a fitting termination to the volume; but the other stories appear to have been arranged somewhat carelessly, as "Off the Great Barrier Reef," the eleventh, was evidently intended by the author to introduce the captain to the reader. There is something strange, too, about the arrangement of the illustrations, several bearing references to pages with which they have nothing to do. These peculiarities in the make-up of the book, however, will be easily overlooked by the reader who only dips into it at intervals, and read thus it will afford him many an exciting half hour or so.

God and the King. By MARJORIE BOWEN. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

WITH "God and the King" Miss Marjorie Bowen has now completed the third and last volume dealing with William of Orange. The passage of history chosen in the present instance is the time of William's sovereignty over the English people, and, probably because of the more prosaic nature of the period, the story lacks something of the glamour of the stirring times in "I Will Maintain," when the young Prince was fighting and overcoming all obstacles in his endeavour to save his country. William's love for and devotion to his wife are brought out very strongly in the book, as is also his great grief at her death. There is always a certain feeling of sadness in reading about the declining years of a man's life, especially so when those years are lonely and spent amid surroundings which are in no way congenial, as was the case with William III., for he was not a popular Monarch. Miss Bowen has expended a good deal of earnest thought upon the characters in her trilogy, and together they show the result of painstaking and indefatigable labour.

The Yacht of Dreams. By FRANK MORTON. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

A NOTABLE collection of flights of fancy—exceedingly free—from the base of an American millionaire's yacht, which suddenly comes into being at Singapore during the said millionaire's honeymoon. Three guests on board—Lenton, a love-stricken, impecunious journalist; Mortimer, erstwhile also a scribe, but now, thanks to a gold-mine, rich and fat; and the charming Nesta, a resident of Colombo, and supposed to be engaged to a member of the Council—these, but chiefly the male members, become the sport of the gods, mostly through the medium of one Banerjee, and Srina, his other half, who have "lived the life" for thousands of years. Through their agency the millionaire and his two friends are precipitated into the ethereal blue, and not content with a look in at Mars, get as far as Jupiter, where man is just emerging from the ape stago. In some of the episodes the author rises to some really fine flights. Thanks to Banerjee, he comes to very close quarters with the gods on Olympus, and it is with a feeling of regret that just as things seem to be coming right with Lenton and Nesta, the yacht and her party disappear tragically from the scene. One feels inclined to suggest that as a means to the end a bolt from Jove would have been more appropriate than the torpedo of the Turkish destroyer, as from what one hears of the Turkish Navy one would feel disposed to bet on the greater efficacy of the Jovian bolt.

A GREAT ONE-ACT PLAY*

By FRANK HARRIS

It is our modern habit of mind, or, if you will, modern science and scientific methods of analysis and description, which have given a realistic character and method to most of our modern fiction; yet the form of a book has little or nothing to do with its worth. Shakespeare never depicted the England of his own day directly; he went abroad or to the past for his subjects, and was as romantic in this sense as Walter Scott. He chose the most beautiful antique or foreign vase that he could find, and filled it with the blood-red wine of his own passion. Balzac, on the other hand, usually selected his subjects from the life about him; he took the ordinary glass jug of his time, so to speak, and filled it with the purple, scented vintage of his romantic imaginings. Both methods produced masterpieces; Lear is hardly greater than La Cousine Bette; the form is romantic in the one case and the passion realistic, while in the other the method is realistic and the passion extraordinary, romantic.

There is yet another form of story which neither Shakespeare nor Balzac essayed, which yet in its way is even more interesting than either the romantic or realistic. The symbolic form found an excellent example in the Parable of the Sower. Cervantes, too, employed it in his Don Quixote again and again with extraordinary effect; the Don's attack on the windmill is perhaps the finest instance of symbolic humour in literature. Symbolism was brought into modern work mainly, I think, by Hans Christian Andersen, and some of his fabulous tales are still among the best of their kind—masterpieces indeed. Every one will remember the king who discarded his clothing; the courtiers of course admired his new attire; but a child, I think it was, cried out that he was "naked"—a great short story or apologue with a sharp, acid moral.

Now I want to talk about a stage-story which is also symbolic, Lord Dunsany's one-act play given at the Haymarket by Mr. Herbert Trench. It was far and away the most interesting dramatic experiment I have ever seen; for the first time in my life I understood how the terrible realism of the stage could be employed triumphantly, used so as to make the unlikely probable and to clothe the fantastic with vivid life.

I had not then read Lord Dunsany's book, "The Gods of Pegana," and I am inclined to congratulate myself on the fact, for, in spite of the imaginative and beautiful illustrations of Sime, "The Gods of Pegana" have no existence for me. Let us leave the book, therefore, to some better guide, and turn to the little play.

The story of the play is extraordinarily simple. When the curtain goes up we see some beggars lying without the walls of an Eastern or Southern city; they complain of the miseries of their lot, and incidentally they tell of seven gods throned afar off among the mountains. To them comes a beggar of genius—what our forebears would have called "a masterful knave"—with a boy attendant who is never tired of proclaiming his talent and singing his praises.

* "The Gods of the Mountains." By Lord Dunsany.

After giving a specimen of his craft, he persuades the beggars to personate the gods and enter the city with him. After many qualms they lend themselves to the imposture, and the citizens, in spite of doubts and suspicions, accept the beggars as their gods, but send off on the quiet an embassy to find out whether the real gods were still in their ancient seats.

Meanwhile difficulty after difficulty is overcome, doubt after doubt on the part of the citizens is exorcised by the masterful beggar; but at length the real gods arrive clothed in what is supposed to look like mediæval armour, and with uncouth gestures give the usurpers death and turn the beggars into a marble group.

The whole of this ending appears to me worse than silly; it ruins the fine symbolism of the story just when it lends itself best to high symbolic treatment, and it debases the imaginative with the coarsest theatricality. Who is responsible for the grotesque finale I don't know; Mr. Herbert Trench and Lord Dunsany must share the responsibility between them. Let it be ours to remould the latter part of the parable and bring out the eternal significance of the theme.

The acceptance of the beggars as gods by the citizens shows weakness of invention; but such is the power of the stage-realism and the magic of the triumphant personality of the chief beggar that we glide over impossibilities and are delighted to welcome the beggars in their new rôle as gods. But their difficulties do not cease with their apotheosis. Naturally the citizens fall into two parties: one party believes in the new deities, the other party is sceptical. The two might agree in demanding some signs, some proofs of the gods' power and goodwill, such as the safe arrival of a caravan and a timely rain to end a drought. The chief beggar-god prophesies vaguely; but the caravan arrives and the faith of the citizens is strengthened; the rain however is withheld; but the citizens are forced to admit ruefully that, sinful as they are, they must not expect perfect beneficence.

So far so good. But at length a real difficulty must be faced. The embassy returns with the news that the seven gods of the mountains are still in their ancient seats; these new gods then must be impostors!

The masterful beggar rises to the occasion. Before he is informed by the citizens of the return of the embassy, which he knows has been sent, he calls the chief citizens together and admonishes them:—

"O ye of little faith," he cries, "is it not easy for the gods to be in two places at once or in ten, just as easy as it was for them to bring the caravan in answer to your prayers? Who are ye to limit Our powers? Why will ye be faithless when belief alone can bring you happiness and the peace that passeth understanding?"

A worse trial follows. The citizens honour their gods with all good gifts, and one of the beggars dies incontinently of a surfeit. How to explain the death of a deity!

The masterful beggar uses the difficulty boldly as a stepping-stone to greater power: he seizes the opportunity to rid himself of his chief antagonist, the leader of the sceptics in the town. When the unbelieving citizen sneers and asks how a god came to die, he declares that utter unbelief kills even the gods—"that is why the gods die"—and he calls on the citizens to do summary justice on the sceptic if indeed they wish to prolong the benefits of the divine rule. Forthwith the citizens fall on the infidel and drag him off to the place of execution. Their faith is thus confirmed by their own act; they will not again question what they have sealed with blood.

At length the worst happens: the masterful beggar himself dies and his colleagues cower together in abject fear.

How can they save themselves without genius? How explain the death of their greatest, now that all the citizens believe in them and honour them?

The boy-attendant boldly puts on the garment of his master; he will play chief god. The others will not hear of it: he has no genius; he will be detected at the start. How will he explain the death of their spokesman?

"Easily," he retorts, "any explanation will do now. I will just say he has gone back to heaven to prepare a new era of happiness for this beloved city, and the hope will keep the citizens true to us."

"At first, I'll admit you, it needed genius to persuade men to accept us beggars as gods and rulers, but now it's perfectly easy; the citizens are all committed to the imposture, the unbelievers have been executed. We have custom on our side and reverence and faith, and these are the virtues that create gods and keep them in power in spite of doubts."

"Any one can play the game now. We are in possession, and that's everything. It's easier now for us to play gods than it was formerly to play beggars, and much more pleasant."

"Leave it all to me; no explanation even is needed of our 'Shining One's' death. The citizens themselves will find good reasons in their greeds and fears. Men are ruled by custom, and not by reason."

And the beggars all nod their heads convinced, and accept the new guidance, for they all feel and say—"It is indeed easier now to play gods than it ever was in the old days to play beggars, and much more pleasant." (Curtain.)

These new inventions and this natural ending bring out, it seems to me, the underlying, indestructible truth which shines through this extraordinary apologue. How comes it that the man who conceived the superb story should handle it tamely and drown its meaning in theatrical mock tragedy? Lord Dunsany should really consider this treatment of the theme. On the stage the effect would be certain.

THE THEATRE

EPIGRAMS AND MISREPRESENTATION

WE had never seen "Lady Windermere's Fan" before. We confess that it filled us with amusement and boredom in equal proportions. It seemed to us that Wilde must have written all the easy epigrams and inversions with a most ponderous seriousness, and all the serious, sentimental parts of the play with his tongue in his cheek. Apart from these epigrams and inversions, upon which Wilde thrived, "Lady Windermere's Fan" might have been written by Mr. William Le Queux. We say this because of the manner in which the characters address each other even in the bosom of their families. Lady Windermere, for instance, although married two years, had not discovered her husband's Christian name. During the whole of the first Act she called him and referred to him as Windermere. Afterwards, when many outbursts of artificial emotion made her careless, she undoubtedly called him Arthur several times. Lord Darlington's rooms, too, were particularly Queuxian; the one we saw reminded us horribly of the waiting-room of a dentist's in Mayfair, except that it lacked the usual large collection of Punches.

The story of the play, well known as it is, remains utterly unbelievable. Two words from Windermere to his stupid wife would have settled the matter without further fuss. Allowing Wilde the usual stage licence, however, we refuse to believe that even these second-hand dummies would have thought anything at all of there being a woman in Darlington's rooms. First of all, she was old enough to be his mother, and there were a dozen excellent reasons why she should be there, the best of them all being that, so far as we could gather, she had never met Lord Darlington. How perfectly proper everything must have been under the circumstances! The character of the Duchess of Berwick is amusingly drawn, and some of her remarks are unforgettable, but if "Lady Windermere's Fan" had been submitted to a London audience without the name of Oscar Wilde attached to it, it would have been laughed off the stage.

All the same it proves not only that Wilde knew nothing of the people of whom he wrote, but was successful chiefly for that reason. We can imagine Windermere and Darlington and Lord Augustuses going over and over again to see the play and crying with laughter at the things they were made to do and say. And yet the remarkable part of it is that even now, because of its misrepresentation, the play may have another huge success. The pit is still very shocked when it is asked to believe that a house is ducal which is not provided with double doors. It demands the powdered flunkey, who flings them open and announces his Grace the Duke of Berwick to an empty room. It asks no questions about the eavesdropping tendencies of these highly-trained creatures, who invariably appear almost before the bell is rung, knowing nothing whatever, so far as we may judge, of the family secrets which have been discussed in loud, firm tones by her Grace and her ladyship. We are quite certain that Wilde studied society from an eighteenpenny stall in the Surrey Theatre, and from a long course of the novels of Mr. Le Queux. Mrs. Glyn came after his time, or she would have given him very many valuable tips, the Tiger-skin among the number.

Not having seen the original performance, we cannot, of course, make comparisons. Miss Marion Terry, in her own part of the bad mother, looked utterly unlike even the best of bad women, although she made her pedantic speeches possible and sometimes convincing. It was delicious to watch the ripe, old-fashioned manner in which Miss Terry conducted her big scene in the third Act. Mr. Dawson Milward, as Lord Windermere, quite astonished us. He was so pleasant and natural that, in spite of all temptations, we believed in him. He convinced us that he was not a joke, and in his outburst at the end of Act III. he caused as much commotion as the falling of a large portion of ceiling in the mummy-room at the British Museum. Oddly enough, Mr. Eric Lewis as Lord Augustus Lawton was all wrong. The more he tried to be comic the less he succeeded. It was not his fault. Lord Augustus Lawton belongs to musical comedy. It is a Teddy Payne part without song and dance. Mrs. G. Kemmis, on the other hand, was perfectly delightful as the Duchess of Berwick, and so was her daughter Lady Agatha, played by Miss Dorothy Fane. The Lord Darlington of Mr. Norman Trevor was to us the one great joy of the evening. Looking precisely as though he had been paid off from Aldershot with a perfectly clean sheet, his hair was "Tommy," his clothes were "Tommy," and his voice was "Tommy." Determined to be a peer to the life, Mr. Trevor had procured a most beautiful curly wig which rippled over his forehead, and in the face of plain facts he was never to be seen out of a very pristine tall hat, black tail-coat with gent's trouserings to match, a very stiff white shirt, whose cuffs he shot with Bisleyan accuracy, and a waistcoat-slip. He was indeed frightfully the little gentleman, and he delivered two pages of La Rochefoucauld as though he were aiming them at the forts of Tripoli. He was unconsciously exactly what Mr. Pelissier would have been in a potted version of the play. Mr. Ernest Thesiger and

Mr. Owen Nares had very little else to do than to utter Wildisms, and this they did as to the manner born. The scenery was excellent, and represented rooms it is not possible to discover nearer civilisation than Maida Vale.

FOREIGN REVIEWS

"DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU"

THE October number is too full of interesting matter for us to attempt to deal with it exhaustively. There is, for instance, an article on Germany's future and military education, by Field-Marshal von der Goltz, full of wisdom and observation. He would seem to hint at the organisation of an educational movement such as that associated with General Baden-Powell. Then there is Baron von Maltzahn's judicious contribution on Sea-law and its recent developments. He demonstrates that naval warfare is essentially more lawless than other warfare, and that rules are very difficult to make and impose. Herr Raschdau uses documents of Dr. Busch to show us Bismarck at his office-desk—crusty and capricious. Herr Richard Garbe's parallels from the Buddhist Jataka to the legends of SS. Christopher and Eustace, with his inferences, are interesting and generally convincing. An account of the late Empress-Regent of China by Charlotte Lady Blennerhassett makes an admirable synopsis of the modern history of that country.

"LA GRANDE REVUE"

The clou of the two numbers before us is a series of letters of Tolstoi to his relation, the Countess Alexandrine Tolstoi, and others. The writer was twenty years old at the time of the first letter, and the editor, M. Halpérine-Kaminsky, claims that the correspondence will throw much light on his spiritual development. Some of the letters were written from the front, some notably from Sebastopol. Naturally the great preoccupation of his youth—nay, of his whole life, the state of his soul, is perpetually before us; we will quote one observation out of a hundred—"et surtout, c'est la vie chez moi qui fait la religion, et non la religion qui fait la vie." The letters are, however (many will understand the qualification), full of freshness and real interest. They are to be continued in future numbers.

For September 25th Senator Cicéron discusses colonial banks in the French East Indies, M. André Véra gardening fashions, and Colonel Gouin the officers of the Reserve, who are defended from the sneers of the Regular officers, while the shortage of them is deplored. M. Henri Schoen finishes his explanation of "Why the Germans Want Colonies"—"over-development" is his answer put shortly. M. M.-T. Laurin tells us of a lingering offshoot of miracle-working Jansenists at Farein on the Saône.

For October 10th Senator Humbert has a luminous exposition of affairs in Madagascar—"Notre grande Colonie d'attente." Under-population is the difficulty, and heroic attempts at immediate development are to be deprecated. The Mayor of Lyon, M. Herriot, contributes a kind of commentary on the section of the Turin Exhibition illustrating the history of Franco-Italian relations. M. Yves Scantrel, in the course of some remarks on the various Don Juans, emits what, coming from a Frenchman, sounds like a stupendous paradox—that Byron's works are "fausses pour tous les siècles." M. L. Bruneau has an admirably clear explanation of the increased cost of life—the inevitable "rançon du progrès." He deals particularly with the French meat-market, but his remarks have a wider application.

"MERCURE DE FRANCE"

A newspaper may often be known by its advertisements. The Mercure has in this respect clients of a doubtful respectability; some of the literature advertised would fall under the ban not only of the Spectator, but also of the English Review, whose cause the Mercure has championed with considerable vigour. A touch of gauloiserie is generally to be found in this review, though perhaps the prevailing note would be better described as one of "modernity." M. Remy de Gourmont's "Epilogues" are always a great feature; their chief ingredients are wit and cynicism, seasoned with a most seductive style. The general tendency is also exhibited, as far as the first October number is concerned, by a translation of the extant fragment of Oscar Wilde's "La Sainte Courtisane," and by a fulsome panegyric by M. E. Gaubert of M. Octave Mirbeau. An interesting item is a series of letters (1814-1816) from Mme. de Staël to Lord Harrowby; her comments on and complaints of the treatment of France by the Allies are just and informing.

M. Marcel Coulon's "Introduction à l'Étude de J. H. Fabre," in the second October number, will particularly interest readers of Mr. Frank Harris' "A New Columbus and a New World," which appeared in some of the August numbers of THE ACADEMY. The comparative neglect into which the great naturalist fell is well explained. M. H. D. Davray discusses Mr. Wells' work in relation to his latest book. The controversy that raged about French music in the eighteenth century is resuscitated by Wanda Landowska, and it is shown that French methods and productions were held in high esteem by German masters of the period. M. Émile Magne has a splendid piece of romantic writing—literary history in the Dumas style—on the youth of Voiture. The picture of the Hôtel de Rambouillet is admirably drawn.

"LA REVUE"

In the two October numbers M. Lucien Alphonse-Daudet gives a character-sketch and several reminiscences, often gathered at first-hand, of the Empress Eugénie. For October 1st M. Fagnat estimates M. Barrière's work, of which the latest specimen, "La Dernière Épopée," was recently noticed in THE ACADEMY. M. L. de Norvins gives a short life of Mr. Pierpont Morgan. M. Alfred Droz has an exceptionally interesting account of the relations between one of the daughters of Calas and the nun Anne-Julie de Fraisse, who became in some sort her guardian after the execution of her father. This nun became convinced of the innocence of Calas, and had as great a share as Voltaire in his rehabilitation. Her letters are a monument of Christian charity and warm-heartedness.

In the second number for the month M. Arthur Chuquet publishes some letters of Lady Burghersh from the Austrian headquarters during the campaign of 1814. They are strongly pro-Bourbon, and full of strong personal views. They are excellent reading. M. Charles Simond criticises sympathetically Mr. Dawbarn's recent book on "France and the French;" he also notices Admiral Sir Edward Seymour's book of recollections. M. Jean Finot opens an inquiry on the alleged physiological inferiority of the female sex; so far his conclusions are strongly in favour of sexual equality. M. F. Jourdain discusses "Le Snobisme dans l'Art;" we have at last learnt to translate "snobisme" by "the cult of fashion."

"LA REVUE BLEUE"

In the number for September 23rd we find the diary of a journey "De Moscou à Shanghai," sparkling with wit and observation, and sometimes reminding us of Mr. Kipling's "From Sea to Sea." The author is M. Ed. Ducoté, and the notes are continued in the three following numbers. This and the next numbers also contain "Les Étudiants de Kyushu," educational experiences in Japan of Lafcadio Hearn, translated from the English by Marc Logé. M. Paul Bonnefon edits a letter of Edmond Rousse, the brave advocate who remained at his post during the Commune. M. Virgile Pinot has an excellent article, based on new material, on the literary relations of Queen Christina and La Rochefoucauld. M. Lucien Maury, à propos of a translation, analyses Mrs. Oliphant's "Beleaguered City."

For September 30th the editor, M. Paul Flat, denounces latter-day dramatic art, its rupture with true French tradition, and its fatal effect on the national reputation. M. Ed. Driault has a good article on "l'Europe et l'Avènement de Napoléon (1804);" the part about Turkey is amusing as exhibiting the permanence of national characteristics.

In the October 7th number we will only notice some newly-discovered letters of Montalembert to Didron, dealing with personal and archæological matters; they are to be continued.

For October 14th M. Gabriel Monod discusses Michelet's attitude towards Natural Science, as shown in his correspondence with Geoffroy-Saint-Hilaire. M. Maury eulogises the style of Mme. M. Tinayre. M. Flat discusses "l'Art pour l'Art" and Théophile Gautier. M. Dauphin Meunier deals with one of the Bussys—poet and "catin" of the later eighteenth century.

"REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE"

In the three numbers before us there are several important contributions by M. Maspero. For September 30th he reviews "Historical Studies," by Mr. M. W. F. Petrie and others. Two theories discussed by him with guarded approval are connected with the temples of the Nile-god, and with Egyptian chronology as based on the risings of Sirius. For October 7th he appreciates the official work, edited by Mr. Wallis Budge, on "Hieroglyphic Texts from Aegyptian Stelae, &c., in the British Museum." For October 14th there are two important subjects, Mr. Alan H. Gardiner's "Papyrus Anastasi I. and the Papyrus Koller"—accused of too great deference to Erman's Egyptian Grammar—and Sir Herbert Thompson's edition of a new Coptic text of certain books of the Bible. M. Maspero regrets that the work has not been made definitive. In the September 30th number two monographs on Anglo-French Literature are discussed by M. Baldensperger—M. Francis Barton's "Influence of Laurence Sterne on France in the Eighteenth Century" and Mr. A. B. Thomas' "Moore in France." For October 14th a very important work by M. F. Sagot, on Roman Britain, is appreciated by M. Cagnat, and Mr. Edward Browne's "Persian Revolution of 1905-1909" is considered by M. Biovès to be rather warped by Liberal and European prepossessions.

"FEUILLES D'HISTOIRE DU XVII^e AU XX^e SIÈCLE"

This periodical is one of those edited by M. Arthur Chuquet, most prolific and accurate of historians. His contribution to the October number is called "La Conquête de la Cerdagne en 1793." It is an unexplored corner of the Revolutionary wars, and illustrates the close relations that existed between the Government, its ideas, and its military forces. Another contribution refers to Spanish campaigns under Napoleon. Indeed, the whole review might not inaptly be rechristened "Revolutionary and Napoleonic Military History." Hoche is the subject of two short studies. Dealing with later times, M. Lehautcourt severely criticises M. Émile Ollivier's Apologia, especially with regard to the latter's conception of preparedness for war. One of the most piquant contributions comes from M. A. de Tarle, who gives the reply of the executioner Sanson to some criticisms; he declares that it revolts his "délicatesse et sensibilité" to enter into details.

"L'ŒUVRE"

A magazine dealing exclusively with the affairs of a particular theatre is rather a rare and curious phenomenon; yet, if we are to believe the indications of the cover, the August number for 1911 forms part of the third volume. Articles on the director, M. Lugné-Poe, and on the leading star, Mme. Suzanne-Desprès, are typical of the fare. It would be rude to describe the contributors as a mutual admiration society with a few select honorary members, but this description would contain a partial truth. "L'Œuvre" is a kind of dramatic Ishmael, where they cater for the "advanced" and "emancipated," and where the "Français" is anathema. It bears a close resemblance, in certain respects only, to our "Incorporated Stage Society." The present number of the Bulletin de l'Œuvre is remarkable for its attractive get-up, and for its many witty or beautiful illustrations.

DELHI IN EARLIEST TIMES

[In view of the forthcoming visit of the King to India for the Coronation ceremonies, we are publishing a series of articles on Delhi and the Durbar which should appeal to all who are interested in that portion of the Empire.]

WHEN it was stated some months ago that the King-Emperor would proceed in the late autumn to India to announce there personally his assumption of the Sovereignty of England, it was added that the ceremony would, according to the precedents of 1877 (Lord Lytton's Imperial Assemblage) and of 1903 (Lord Curzon's Coronation Durbar), take place at Delhi. The Calcutta newspapers made an effort to have the ceremony transferred to Calcutta as the capital of India, but their attempt proved unsuccessful; a kind of compromise was, however, effected, so that his Majesty will visit Calcutta and there also receive the homage of his loyal subjects. As Delhi, then, is to be the scene of the ceremony, it will be of interest to examine its history and its claim to the further honour to be conferred on it. It is a matter of common knowledge that Delhi was the old capital of the Mogul Empire, but there is much more to be narrated of this famous place and its neighbourhood than is conveyed in this single sentence.

According to one authority Dilli is the old Hindu form of the name: Dihli is that used by Muhammadans. Old travellers wrote of Dehli, Dihli, Dili, Dilli, Dali, Dely, Delly as they pleased. Another authority gives Dilpat as traditionally the name of the Dilli of Prithoi Raj (of whom more will be heard), dil being an old Hindi word for eminence, and pat a termination common to the names of many towns. This has been regarded as probably the etymology of Dilpat or Dilli. Firishta the historian has a tradition (it is said) that the town was founded by a Raja Dhilu, before Alexander's invasion of India, 327-325 B.C.

Our knowledge of the origin of Delhi in Hindu times depends chiefly upon the traditions embodied in an epic poem which itself grew, no one knows how, in early ages. Long before the name of Delhi was known, there stood, in the immediate neighbourhood of its present site, the ancient city of Indraprastha (Indra, the King of heaven: prastha, a plain—easily reducible to pat), said to have been founded by the early Aryan immigrants who made their way into India from the north-west between 2000 and 800 B.C. Two of the tribes were the Bharatas, who settled near Delhi, and the Panchâlas beyond Agra, in the direction of Kanonj. On the site of that city Indraprastha still stands the fort of Indrapat, or Indarpat, also called Purana Kila, or old fort, about two miles south of modern Delhi. The tradition encircling the name of the founder Yudhishtir is based upon the ancient Hindu epic, sometimes called the Indian Iliad—namely, the Mahabharata of Vyasa (not the Rama-yana epic, as one principal authority on Delhi has written), which describes the war of the Bharatas. It was composed originally about 500 A.D., but the war described is believed to have been fought in the thirteenth or fourteenth century B.C. The triumph of virtue and the defeat of vice form the high moral basis of the poem. With its accretions it contains, in its present shape, more than ninety thousand couplets, about seven times the length of the Iliad and Odyssey combined.

From the first Bharata was descended Kuru, and from him came King Pandu and his elder but blind brother Dhritarashtra. On Pandu's death, Dhritarashtra, with a large family of a hundred sons, called the Kaurava Princes, succeeded to the kingdom of the Kurus, situated along the upper course of the Ganges. Of Pandu's five sons, called the Pandavas, Yudhishtir was the eldest. They were brought up at their uncle Dhritarashtra's court at Hastinapur, an ancient city on the Ganges, sixty miles north-west of Delhi. To avoid ill-treatment from their Kaurava cousins, the five Pandavas were sent into exile; they retired to the forests, and lived as Brahmins. When the Princess Draupadi, daughter of Draupad, King of the Panchâlas, was about to choose her husband, by the ancient ceremony of swayambara, the Pandavas heard of it and attended the tournament. The Princess chose one of them as the victor, and became the wife of Yudhishtir principally, but also of the other brothers in common. On the demand of the Pandavas, Dhritarashtra assigned to them the western portion of the Kuru kingdom on the Jumna, keeping the richer eastern portion, with the capital Hastinapur, for the Kauravas. Yudhishtir cleared the forest and built the new capital Indraprastha, near the Jumna river: one modern writer gives 1450 B.C. as the probable date of this act. Thereupon Yudhishtir had the Rajasuya Imperial sacrifice performed: both he and Draupadi were crowned, and he assumed the Imperial title over all the kings of ancient India who recognised his supremacy and attended the sacrifice. But Yudhishtir was a gambler, and lost his kingdom and all to Duryodhan, the eldest Kaurava: the Pandavas became bondslaves of the Kauravas. Dhritarashtra released them from slavery, but they again went into exile for twelve years. This term having expired, they returned with an army, with the Panchâla subjects of King Draupadi, Yudhishtir's father-in-law, as their allies, and claimed the restoration of their kingdom, including five towns named Indrapat, Panipat, and three others.

On the plains of Kurukhetra then took place the prolonged battle of eighteen days, described at length in the Mahabharata, the Pandavas and Panchâlas on one side against the Kauravas on the other, all being descendants of the first Bharata. Prodigies of valour were performed. The death of Duryodhan and many other warriors closed the war; the five brothers resumed their residence at Indrapat. Yudhishtir was crowned king of the Kurus at Hastinapur, and performed the asvamedha, or horse-sacrifice, to expiate the sin of the carnage of the war. This sacrifice was, by ancient custom, performed by kings exercising sovereign powers over surrounding kings. So Yudhishtir resumed his Imperial rule. Finally the brothers and their wives retired to the Himalayas and disappeared, Yudhishtir alone proceeding to heaven in a celestial car. The reason alleged for the abandonment of Indrapat by Yudhishtir is that one day, when the cover of a dish was removed, the king found a fly on the food, which he regarded as a hint that the glory had departed.

This brief outline shows the connection of the epic with the traditional foundation of Indraprastha. In the absence of evidence the tradition cannot be ranked as history, though the war of the Kauravas and Panchâlas is stated to be a historical fact. The tradition would be handed down by the bhats, said to be contracted from bharatas, the bards or minstrels common in early India. From the foregoing narrative the sentiment attached by the Hindus to Yudhishthir's ceremonies at Indraprastha in connection with his assumption of Imperial rule can well be understood. The connection of the Muhammadans with Delhi, the capital of the Imperial rule of the Moguls, will be fully told. Thus both Hindus and Muhammadans look to Delhi and its neighbourhood as the scene of assumption of Imperial power; in its neighbourhood several pitched battles were fought for dominion over India. No such prestige, no halo of Imperial sway, belongs to the modern cities of India founded by the English in the seventeenth century for purposes of trade. If the sentiment of 315 millions deserves consideration, there is only one place in India for the celebration of an Imperial ceremony, which proclaims the fact that King George V. has succeeded to the Imperial power exercised throughout India by Hindu and Muhammadan rulers of ancient and comparatively modern times.

Between the traditions recorded in the Hindu epic and historical times there is an interval of which no record remains beyond the ruins of buildings and mounds of débris to which no date has been assigned. The Greek historians who accompanied Alexander on his expedition to India do not mention Delhi; nor do the Chinese pilgrims who visited India, Fahien in 399-414 A.D., and Hsien-Tsang in 629-645 A.D. There is a tradition that the site of Indraprastha was abandoned for 800 years before it was repopled. But archaeology (if spared by economy and decentralisation) may still come to the rescue. The "seven cities of Delhi" will appear in the story of later Hindu days and the times subsequent to the Hindu period as it is unfolded.

CONVERSATIONAL MISERS

BY RICHARD MIDDLETON

IN our experience modern writers do not shine in conversation as did, if we are to believe their contemporaries, the great men of the past. Nowadays the great novelist speaks drily about copyright and censorship, the great poet talks about his dinner, and after an evening spent in their society we must fall back on Stevenson's essay "Talk and Talkers" if we wish to preserve the conviction that conversation can be an art.

Our modern Johnsons make whale-like noises only in their articles, and our modern Goldsmith—but we have no modern Goldsmith—would talk like poor Poll in recurring volumes of reminiscences. To sparkle in conversation is now the mark of literary mediocrity, and our great men unpack their hearts in words in their notebooks and in their private diaries written for publication. Perhaps they are not so lavishly provided with good things as their illustrious forebears, and cannot afford to be generous; perhaps they are afraid of appearing arrogant to lesser minds that may not sparkle; but it is certain that the present-day hero-worshipper must expect to find his hero reticent. Possibly if washerwomen could read shorthand they would find the souls of these thrifty giants expressed on their cuffs; we who have spent an evening in their unimpressive society can only say that we have heard no word of them.

Of course there are rare exceptions, but we fancy that few people would be found to contend that this is an age of accomplished talkers. Yet, if we are not strangely inferior to our ancestors, we must suppose that the spirit that they expressed in talk now finds another outlet. Perhaps every other man we meet is a mute and glorious Pepys, or it may be that the modern taste for writing works of fiction marks the thankless doom of our lost conversationalists. At all events, in support of the theory that men and women write the things that once upon a time they would have been satisfied with saying an agreeable piece of evidence lies under our hand.

It takes the form of three fat red notebooks filled with the handwriting of a man who prided himself, we should infer, on its almost painful neatness. He was a schoolmaster, one of those luckless schoolmasters who do not find boys sympathetic, and wander, the dreariest of exiles, through the wastes of school-life. Throughout this mass of unconnected notes—for his respect for form did not extend beyond occasional phrases—his references to his pupils are almost without exception gloomy. He finds his boys lazy, ill-mannered, snobbish, and normally so untruthful that he repeatedly makes the fatal mistake of disbelieving their assertions when they happen to be true. Because of this lack of justice the boys called him Jeffries behind his back, and he notes the fact without comment. Yet, like many people who do not like boys, he was evidently passionately fond of children, and sweetens his pages with strange little notes of their ways. "Babies eat their bread-and-butter upside down, in order to taste the butter." "When children are sent to bed early they make up their minds not to go to sleep; when they are lying awake in bed they try to see how many they can count." "When it is snowing the children walk along with their tongues out to catch the flakes." "Nelly hoards her new pennies until they are quite brown and spoiled; this is the true parable of the talents." "I have to win the affections of children with sweets and little presents. Others can do it without this." Against these we can only set one human observation on his pupils: "There is an oddity in boys: Simmons played truant yesterday to play schools with his cousins."

It will be seen that our schoolmaster cuts a not unamiable figure in his notebooks, in spite of the fact that as a master he clearly erred on the side of severity. He was, we may venture, a lonely sort of man separated from his fellows by a gulf of shyness, certainly disillusioned and certainly possessed of vague literary ambitions. Probably his notebooks were intended to provide materials for some half-conceived masterpiece, for here and there we can see him striving after the finished phrase. Yet often enough he has merely jotted down the heads of his thought, the roughest outline of his impression, so that we who lack the key seek in vain for his meaning. Even when the sense is clear, we feel sometimes that a link is missing between the writer and the written word. "After a certain age it is very necessary that our dreams should be good to eat," is a superficial cynicism that hardly fits his character as we have conceived it. And this: "When we found him in the snow his clothes and hair were stiff with frozen beer; when we lifted him it sounded as though his bones were breaking;" is it a reminiscence or the climax of a tale? We scan the next item on the page for an answer, and find only the poignant cry, "How can I stop the barber blowing down my neck?" As an artistic form these notebooks are perplexing.

The most coherent section, nearly a whole notebook, is devoted to his notes of a holiday in Paris; but he has hardly escaped the conventional discoveries that reward all inexperienced travellers. Here and there, however, his individuality crops up. He saw a blind man in the street "who looked as if he saw strange sights in another world," and a drunken man in a café, who raised his hat before the bar "as before an altar." He examines the Monna Lisa, and decides that she is not smiling, and allows the Venus to convince him of the ugliness of human arms. "To travel abroad," he notes, "is like visiting the houses of a number of people whom one does not know very well—a trial for a shy man." "The motor-cars pass this hotel like a roaring wind," he writes conventionally enough and then gives us an astonishing portrait of the proprietor: "His thick lower lip gleams like a wet cherry between his moustache and his beard." There is a picturesque touch about the grisettes "struggling with great bundles of linen as with drunken lovers," and then we come on an impression that lacks the revealing word: "The people in the windy streets are like heroes on Japanese prints." Doubtless he had seen something, but he has not told us what he had seen.

Very few of his notes are concerned with literature, but evidently he read a few French books while he was in Paris. He suggests that Dumas modelled the famous escape from the Château d'If on Casanova's equally famous escape from the prison of the Plombs, and on Zola's "Oeuvre" he writes:—"It would seem that the clearer the artist's vision the more certain it is that he will never do anything permanently satisfactory to himself," which goes to confirm the theory that he himself has literary dreams. It is typical of his method that he follows this reflection with the note, "To-day I saw a man whose waistcoat-pockets were so large that his hands disappeared in them entirely." We are possibly wrong, but it is difficult to avoid the impression that the odd abruptness of his journal reflected a certain mental incoherence. On one page we find a quotation from Isabelle Eberhardt on happiness, a memorandum that the Charing Cross-road smells of raspberry-jam and hot vinegar, a paradox on cowardice—"a man may be afraid of blows yet his moral cowardice may set him fighting with a stout face"—and the extraordinary comment, "P—— hates me because I challenge the luxury of his grief."

There is, too, a curious mental contrariness about the man that makes his character difficult to grip. It was not modesty that led him to write: "There are days on which the lowness of the clouds incommodes me and makes me feel cramped," yet a page later we find him writing humbly: "Ibsen says that the majority is always wrong, but I must try to remember that the minority is not always right," and in a still darker mood, "I would like to exchange all my thrills and passions for a life without desire, without hope, and without regret." At times he realised that he was in the wrong minority, poor man!

We have lingered over these notebooks partly because they are interesting in themselves and partly because they supply a good instance of the harm people do themselves in being reticent. It is clear that the writer was a man with a serious turn of mind coupled with an odd, individual outlook on life, and failing the society of his likes he expressed himself only in notes written for his own eyes, which is no kind of expression at all. For lack of impulse from without, such an impulse as we can all find in good talk, our disillusioned schoolmaster waned at the end to silent nothingness. He hardly even survives in his notebooks, for, as we have said, a large part of his notes are now meaningless. He is like one of those misers in whose coffers the impatient heirs find nothing but withered leaves, the fairies, who do not like misers, having substituted the sweepings of the forest for the sweepings of the city. In his lifetime he hoarded the little treasures of his mind instead of sending them out to win interest, and now his notes crumble to dust and all his new pennies are spoiled and brown. Greater men than he are making the same mistake.

MUSIC

WAGNER, with his puissant lure, is again drawing crowds to Covent Garden. Old men and women who have heard the "Ring" a score of times or more are there, reviving memories of their first never-to-be-forgotten visit to Bayreuth; young creatures who have never heard it are there, pressing to their seats with haste and hope; matrons from the country, bachelors from the clubs, fine ladies from Mayfair, still finer ones from the suburbs—'tis a varied and interesting throng that fills the house from floor to ceiling. Interesting, chiefly because it shows that the "Ring" has passed successfully through the dangerous age when Fashion might have weakened its hold upon the public taste. Time was when it was so clearly the "right thing" to have heard the Tetralogy that everybody felt bound to go, and the audience was composed half of enthusiasts, half of bewildered folk who, when some crash aroused them from the uneasy slumber indulged in during Wotan's long harangues, were heard to whisper, "Do you think it will soon be over?" or, more boldly, "Could we manage to slip out?" Then the "Ring" was performed again, and these poor, unworthy ones, their duty done, being able to stay joyfully at home, the enthusiasts had all the seats to themselves. Never had they worshipped God as they worshipped the deities that Wagner assembled round his throne. For many years this ecstatic state of things continued. When July came people in the enlightened sets did not ask each other, "When are you going to Scotland?" but "When are you going to Bayreuth?" Even the folk who had always considered "abroad" as a "horrid place," joined the flight to the little German town, and came back satiated with musical happiness and amorous of all that had to do with Germany.

But a few years since, a critical moment seemed to have arrived. Ring Cycles were announced at Covent Garden, Dr. Richter and the best artists assembled, yet the expected line "All seats sold" did not appear in the advertisements. The faithful saw with wonder that there were empty places, and now uprose audacious voices declaring that they had heard the "Ring" sufficiently often, and would give it a rest. Was great Wagner, then, going to submit to the common lot, and suffer a season of coldness and eclipse? It really seemed as if it might be so. But now these terrifying doubts need trouble us no more. Without Richter, and with several artists whom we had not known, the "Ring" has this autumn regained its ancient power. Two Cycles were announced, and, every seat for both being taken up, a third Cycle is to be given. When we look at the portentous musical announcements for this winter, with opera here, there, and everywhere, and concerts which promise to be of more than ordinary interest on every day of the week, we are unable to deny that this success of the "Ring" is significant indeed; we are forced to admit that Wagner continues to be the greatest hypnotiser among the composers—"The rogue has given us potions to make us love him."

The ardent patriots who insist to us that Great Britain is really the most musically-inclined country in the world will not fail to point to this enthronisation of Wagner among us as giving weight to their contention. They will say that we may be slow, but we are sure, that we take time to consider our music, but that when we have decided on its gusto, we are faithful. Thirty years ago, as they rightly point out, Wagnerians were in England as the Gnostics, now they are the οἱ πολλοί, and herein we are to admire the cautious good sense of our countrymen. They have discrimination, not appetite only, as Lord Rosebery wishes they had about libraries. As to this, some of us may wish they could have a little more discrimination while they are about it, and show themselves able to appreciate more than only one good composer at a time. At Munich, Berlin, and other towns where there are opera-houses, Mozart Cycles are given every year, and there is as great a demand for places as there is when the "Ring" is performed. We fear that the Bankruptcy Court would be the end of an impresario who should announce a Mozart Cycle in London. We celebrate at this time the centenary of Liszt, one of the most influential pioneers the world of music has seen, as well as one of the noblest of men, a man whose life is as a ray of sunshine in the murky history of composers' careers. But are we celebrating it here in England? Is there any sort of attempt being made on a serious scale by those who represent what is musically best in us, to arrive even at moderate acquaintance with the work of Liszt? We may be slow and sure, but about Liszt we will not ask for opportunity even to be slow. We simply remain in our ignorance, and judge him from a piano concerto, a piano piece or two, and a Hungarian Rhapsody, fragments of the fruits of his genius which chance has blown over the wall within which we entrench ourselves, outside of which so much that is beautiful is growing. The Times newspaper devotes an able and cautious article to Liszt, and puts the case very well by saying that the point to be noticed about him is that he saw where music was tending and took the path first.

But though the Times adopts a much larger and more just attitude towards Liszt than it used to do, its thoughtful critic writes as if he knew his Liszt better on paper than by performance, and he insists, as we think unduly, on the melodic weakness of the composer compared with his power of treating a subject and "creating atmosphere." He will find that a not inconsiderable number of the more catholic-minded musicians of France, Germany, Austria, and Italy, who have heard a great deal more of Liszt's music than we English, would wonder at, if they did not resent as a discourtesy, such expressions as "The interjection of some paltry tag of melody," or "The bombast and consequence with which little trivial phrases are asserted and reasserted." There is a "large carelessness" in the work of Liszt, no doubt; but there is enough fine power of using melodies which none but a genius of the first class could have invented, to balance the occasional over-estimation of the importance of an idea. Liszt had the genuine mother-wit in music, as opposed to the mere cleverness of the many musicians with whose works we are flooded, while the great man is neglected. We have no desire to quarrel with people who are honestly unable to see beauty and significance in Liszt's themes. We shall do well to remember that our neighbours the French, who have just as good a right as ourselves to set up as arbiters of correct musical taste, see little or no merit in the themes of Brahms or Tchaikovsky, and—shall we add?—of Elgar (though perhaps their knowledge of these composers is not very great; on a par, perhaps, with the ordinary concert-goer's knowledge of Liszt). Now most English music-lovers think that the melodies of Brahms and many of Tchaikovsky's are very fine indeed. Let us not, then, speak too contemptuously of those of Liszt, which are more esteemed by most competent persons in other countries than those of the German and the Russian who are so much admired here.

While London has been recanonising Wagner, and doing nothing to honour Liszt, the last of the important provincial Festivals has been gladdening the hearts of quiet dwellers in East Anglia. Sir Henry Wood and his orchestra and several excellent soloists have joined the Norwich Festival Choir in performing such eternal music as that of Bach's Mass in B minor and Mozart's Requiem, and such works as Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and Elgar's "The Kingdom," concerning the eternity of which it is permissible to have our doubts. Three years ago the first Norwich choir, under its new régime, showed that it was capable of producing a lovely tone, and that its intelligence could stand a comparison with that of its most celebrated rivals. This year, the choir has more than maintained its reputation in the difficult ordeal of singing music which is as familiar to the present generation of amateurs as "The Messiah" and "Elijah" were to their fathers. For the Norwich Committee had decided, wisely enough, to hazard the introduction of no new works. An audience such as that which triennially emerges in its best clothes from the parsonages and halls of Norfolk and Suffolk, and the comfortable Georgian houses of a score of country towns, is not made up of folk who hear much music in London. It consists of the class which at all times prefer the theatre to the concert-room.

The great people of the country, who are half the year in London, are very rarely to be seen in Queen's Hall, and the lesser people, when they get their week of dissipation, "do" as many plays as they can crowd into it, and reckon little of what is going on at Bechstein or Æolian Halls. But the triennial week of music in the local capital is really a festival time for them, and they are sure to be best pleased if it gives them an opportunity for becoming acquainted with the music which they have heard the enlightened amateurs discuss, and about the merits of which there is no longer much doubt. It is certainly better that the newest music should be first tasted in the great musical centres, to see if it is poisonous or wholesome, than that the inexperienced daughters of music in the country villages should be called upon to pronounce upon its savour. Everybody seemed satisfied with the music offered at the recent Norwich Festival and the manner of its performance. The only work about which we heard questionings was the "Golden Legend," which no longer thrills ears accustomed to Bach and Brahms. But there are still numbers of uncritical people who like it very much, and ask why they should not be allowed to hear it, since their neighbours who can appreciate Bach are allowed to hear the Mass. They remind us of the golfers who complain that all the holes are planned with a view to the enjoyment of the Scotch players. It is hard not to sympathise with their pleadings, and yet conscience warns us that we must not be satisfied with what is easy, but must try to get on terms with the difficulties. So the "Golden Legend," we fear, must go.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE PORTE ST. MARTIN: II.

VICTOR HUGO's next contribution to the romantic school met with still fiercer discussion. "Lucrece Borgia" formed the theme of violent polemics, and it is in connection with this play that Mr. Georges Cain, the director of the Carnavalet Museum, and author of many books on old Paris, relates in his "Anciens Théâtres de Paris" the following amusing dialogue between the director of the Odéon and Victor Hugo:—

At the first representation of "Lucrece Borgia" strident hissing was suddenly heard:

—Comment, on siffle? fit Harel, absolument ébahi.

Qu'est-ce que cela signifie?

Et Hugo lui répondit:

—Ça signifie que la pièce est bien de moi!

The Porte St. Martin next staged Hugo's "Marie Tudor," and "Angèle," by Dumas, which both obtained tolerable success, but no real triumph is to be recorded until the first night of "La Tour de Nesle," a curious and original play in more ways than one, for the true author was Dumas, although he did not appear in name on the playbill.

In 1840 Balzac braved public opinion on the stage of the Porte St. Martin with his "Vautrin," which, however, was soon prohibited by the Government, as it was considered to be lacking in respect towards Louis Philippe. The theatre was obliged to close for six months. It then reopened under a new management; but, in spite of the numerous attempts made to reinstate it in public favour, it is only from 1844 onwards that it again presents a real interest. At that date began the series of representations of d'Ennery's and Anicet Bourgeois's works, who both rejuvenated and perfected to a wonderful degree the then existing form of melodrama. One of the characteristics of their plays is an irreproachable moral tone. They disdained, however, the old formula of melodrama, and styled their plays simply "dramas."

These two authors deserve special recognition on account of the influence they exercised on modern French drama. They both began their literary career at about the same period. Anicet Bourgeois's first play dates from 1825, that of d'Ennery was produced in 1831. The titles are amusing as being curiously suggestive of the mentality of the time. Anicet's play was called "Gustave, ou le Napolitain;" d'Ennery's appeared with the thrilling title of "Emile, ou le Fils d'un Pair de France!"

The secret of the success of these two playwrights resides especially in their knowledge of the art of creating or suspending the interest of the plot, and of disposing appropriately of the events, so that, although extraordinary, they always appear probable. Anicet Bourgeois possessed, to the highest degree, the gift of invention; unfortunately his style is careless, as otherwise he would have ranked next to Dumas in the history of the theatre of the last century. In 1834 the Porte St. Martin gave his play "La Vénitienne," which was very popular.

D'Ennery's dramas contain the same plan as those of Anicet Bourgeois, but he possessed besides the talent of knowing how to mingle skilfully the terrible and the comical. We need not enumerate here d'Ennery's many triumphs, as they are universally known, and "Les Deux Orphelines," "Le Vieux Caporal," and "La Bonne Aventure" have enthralled thousands of simple, innocent souls of both hemispheres.

Later on the Porte St. Martin produced "Schamyl," by Paul Meurice, which furnished the occasion of a new triumph for the great actor Mélingue. At that time Mélingue was one of the last actors of the truly romantic school, and ranked next to Bocage, whom, however, he never surpassed notwithstanding his great talent. He possessed a splendid physique, and a superb voice which he knew how to modulate so as to produce the greatest possible effect. He had also what for an actor are indispensable qualities—a real scenic intelligence, and an unlimited opinion of his own value. Mélingue was the favourite of the great public, as he impersonated for them the reckless and handsome heroes of the romantic plays devised by the author's imagination. He was the artist of Paris who earned the most money at that time, and he was much in demand by the different theatre managers, who well realised the admirable capacity he possessed of exciting popular sympathy and interest.

The Porte St. Martin resumed for a time its old traditions, and produced some pièces à spectacle, such as the thrilling "Nuits de la Seine," and the captivating "Chevaliers du Brouillard." In 1862 "Le Bossu," by Anicet Bourgeois and Paul Féval, was presented for the first time. But it is whispered that still another name should have figured on the play-bill, that of one of the greatest modern dramatists, Victorien Sardou. Indeed, on comparing the construction of "Le Bossu" with that of some of Sardou's recognised plays, many points of resemblance can be found, especially in the masterly treatment of the plot and dénouement.

The old Porte St. Martin, so full of glorious souvenirs, was doomed to destruction during the gloomy days of the Commune. The last success it witnessed was when Sardou's "Patrie" was given in 1869. The subject of this play was suggested to Sardou by an incident recorded in Motley's incomparable "History of the United Netherlands."

It was impossible, however, that the well-known theatre should no longer form a part of the Boulevard St. Martin, of which it was nearly as prominent a feature as the fine old gateway whose name it bore. In 1873 a new playhouse was erected on the same site, bearing the same name; but until the 'eighties no artistic manifestation particularly worthy of mention is to be recorded. In 1884 the new Porte St. Martin rang with applause still louder than that which the old house had heard in days of yore. This was when Sardou's "Theodora" was given, with Sarah Bernhardt in the title-rôle. Three years later this artiste surpassed herself in "La Tosca," by the same author, and her creation of the capricious and tragic character of Floria Tosca ranks without doubt as one of her most stirring and wonderful achievements.

The Porte St. Martin possesses still one more reason for being considered one of the real temples of French Art, for Coquelin, the inimitable, after having abandoned the Théâtre Français, takes up his residence on the Boulevards, and creates there Rostand's chef d'œuvre, "Cyrano de Bergerac." The first night of "Cyrano" remains a never-to-be-forgotten event in the French literary world, for those who had "come to scoff" remained to applaud, to clamour for the author and his principal interpreter.

Since then many have been the successes scored at the Porte St. Martin. On its immense stage—far too vast, in fact, when the plays do not require a complicated mise-en-scène—comedies, dramas, and historical plays, from the pens of the most talented authors, have followed each other in rapid succession. One production, however, is specially notable—that of Rostand's "Chantecler," before an audience anxious both to applaud and to criticise.

The Porte St. Martin has represented for more than a century all the most interesting movements and changes of French drama. It is an essentially Parisian theatre, and those who would like to experience the agreeable sensation of visiting one of the shrines where real Art has ever been defended and worshipped should, during their stay in the French capital, pass an evening in the famous playhouse of the Boulevard St. Martin: they will not regret it.

MARC LOGÉ.

ART

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS

BY FRANK HARRIS

I HAD heard a good deal about the autumn exhibition of British Artists in Suffolk Street, so I ran in just to have a look at some of the pictures, and ended by spending a long afternoon of sheer delight. There are half a dozen pictures in it which are worth more than one visit. There is a landscape and seascape combined, by Elphinstone, which appears to me to achieve all that the best Post-Impressionists aimed at without losing charm or gay colour. There is a portrait, too, of Mr. Charles Holme, by Laszlo, a really fine piece of characterisation, as good, it seems to me, as the best of Sargent. A "Placid Morning," by Sheard, lives in my memory, too, and a picture of Brixham with the fishing-boats in the foreground and the lights behind as if seen in a dream by Rooke.

But the work that catches the eye, puzzling and pleasing at the same time, is a picture by Joseph Simpson called "Summer." A rather pretty woman, clad in a loose flowered dressing-gown, leaning negligently with her right hand supporting her head on a round table. The table is covered with a white cloth, and on a dish immediately in front of the woman are two or three green apples. There is a window immediately behind her, in which the figure of a man appears, the dark form telling in an extraordinary way. The room is flooded in brilliant sunlight. There is nothing particularly beautiful about the woman—a sort of languid softness in the figure as of expectancy. But the decorative value of the whole thing is superb, beyond praise indeed. Critics complain that Mr. Simpson's work cannot be classified. No original artist's work can be classified. But this picture might hang side by side with Whistler's famous picture "La Princesse du Pays de la Porcelaine," and hold its own. In that masterpiece Whistler paints the lady against a Japanese screen, with bright flowers on it and spots of colour—somewhat the same effect as Mr. Simpson gives us here in the woman's flowered dressing-gown.

I do not mean, of course, that Mr. Simpson has borrowed anything from Whistler, far from it indeed; Whistler never bathed any figure that I know of in such sunlight as this of Mr. Simpson. But the two pictures stand in my memory side by side, for Mr. Simpson's, too, is a decorative panel of extraordinary beauty, boldness, and charm.

THE MEDICI GALLERY

THE art of reproducing great pictures in colour has in these latter days been brought to a high pitch of perfection, and that this is so is due in no small measure to the work of the Medici Society. In old days such results were laboriously compassed by means of the Arundel Prints, reproduced from copies painfully and exactly made by skilled hands; to-day, the process, if in some respects easier, is no less exact and careful, and the result is unquestionably better. Photography lends priceless assistance towards producing the first copy, and even more in reflecting the very texture of the surface of the original; and upon its base of finely-balanced light and shade comes the difficult task of arranging the sequence of colour-blocks designed to produce the desired effect, and the yet more difficult and delicate task of so exactly superimposing them that the result shall be a true copy of a great and perhaps a vanished masterpiece. By such means we may still possess a copy of the lost Gioconda, may still contemplate the wonderful hues and the elusive personality of the lady whom Leonardo admired; and in this gallery are many other great works similarly repeated for the benefit of those who cannot gain access to the originals, and yet have soul enough to desire their company.

The selection now available is large and in the best sense representative. Among the latest additions to the Gallery is a splendid copy in colours of Hoppner's fine picture of "Lady Charlotte Campbell as Aurora," which was exhibited in the Royal Academy of 1796. It is one of the artist's happiest efforts, and the proprietors of the Gallery are fortunate in obtaining permission from its owner, the Duke of Argyll, to reproduce it for the benefit of the thousands who can never see the original in its distant home at Inveraray. Lady Charlotte Campbell, the daughter of one of the lovely Gunnings, was famous as a wit and beauty in her youth, admired for her talents by Sir Walter Scott, and toasted as a beauty by Byron, before she became known to a wider circle in the hard circumstances of her later years as Lady Charlotte Bury, the author of an indiscreet diary and of many once-admired novels and verses. The greatest and finest of the Italian Masters may here be studied to advantage—Leonardo, Raphael, Titian, Botticelli, Luini, Giorgione, Fra Lippo Lippi, Correggio, and Carpaccio are all represented; and we have, too, our own English Masters—Gainsborough, Reynolds, Romney, Raeburn, Hoppner, among the eighteenth-century giants, and Holbein, Lely, Vandyke, and Velasquez among those of an earlier day. French, German, and Dutch schools are also well represented—indeed, the excellence of the choice throughout is almost as marked as the mechanical perfection of the process of reproduction. The prices too are moderate, when the character of the work is considered.

A noteworthy feature of the exhibition is the fine set of reproductions from drawings of the Masters, of which some hundreds are offered at quite low prices. Both student and connoisseur will find much to delight the eye and mind in these. The delicacy and individuality of the originals is perfectly preserved.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By LANCELOT LAWTON

WAR AND SECRECY

"THE TIMES" of Wednesday announces that the despatch published the previous day from its special representative at Tripoli will be the last which will appear from him, "as the rigid nature of the censorship makes the transmission of independent news almost impracticable." It is safe to assume that the war correspondents who were hastened to the scene of hostilities in Tripoli were not a little surprised when they discovered that the Italian general staff had decreed secrecy in regard to all military operations. The cordial reception they had enjoyed at the hands of the authorities in Rome must have disarmed suspicion, and at the same time raised the most sanguine expectations as to the privileges to be accorded them in the field. The natural consequence of disappointment has been resentment, and in the circumstances it is not improbable that Italy is receiving only a scant measure of that fairplay which comes from unbiassed criticism, or from the hearing of both sides of the story. Meanwhile the rigid censorship which she has instituted cannot protect her from the calculated mis-statements of Constantinople. Before passing a final judgment on the tragic events of last week all clear-thinking people will await a more impartial account of the circumstances than is to be found in the Press of Europe.

It is not alone in the matter of restraining the activities of war correspondents that Italy, whose naval and military attachés were, of course, present throughout the Manchurian campaign, has followed the example of Japan; she has extended her control to the homeland itself, and Press and people are under the strictest supervision. In this connection it will be interesting to recall the methods adopted by the Japanese during the late war. In Tokyo and Yokohama the lives of many of the European residents and tourists were made unbearable. Private correspondence was tampered with in a manner which, after making full allowance for the exigencies of war, was wholly unjustifiable. Letters to ordinary individuals were ruthlessly torn open and clumsily sealed up again, so as to convey the impression that they had been damaged in transit. In numerous instances communications never reached their destinations. Many of the servants in the employ of the Legations, the hotels, and private households were in the pay of the Government; while it was notorious that the guides who were engaged by tourists, and the interpreters attached to foreign military and naval officers and to the war correspondents, augmented their incomes by the practice of espionage. The clumsy way in which these men went about their work deceived nobody. Frequently they were caught with their ears to keyholes, and over and over again they were discovered picking locks and opening boxes. Consequently, in front of their servants, or without first examining the corridors in the vicinity of their rooms, Europeans never indulged in conversation that might be construed as unfavourable to the Japanese. Any documents which for private reasons they wished to keep secret they carried about in their pockets. Apart from the organised secret service composed of servants, the towns swarmed with police agents in mufti. For a European to come under suspicion it was not necessary for him to speak against the Japanese. It was sufficient that he expressed, even with qualification, praise of Russian gallantry. As soon as he entered a 'rikisha a policeman did likewise, and trundled after him wherever he went. If he took train to the mountains or to the seaside he was assiduously followed. The mere knowledge on the part of the natives that he was under surveillance resulted in the ominous rumour being spread far and wide that he was a Russian spy, and the newspapers in various localities did not hesitate to record his presence as of one who was acting in that dubious capacity.

The man with the camera was exposed to particular danger and ill-treatment. If while taking a photograph of a museum or of a rural scene a detachment of soldiers with a field-gun happened to pass by, he was promptly pounced upon by a policeman, and requested to proceed to the police-station, where his plates or films were confiscated. A story is told of a Frenchman with a curious sense of humour, who, in wandering round Nagasaki with a filmless Kodak, was taken to the police-station at least twenty times. On each occasion he explained that he was "practising" snapshotting, and after the camera had been minutely inspected by the entire office staff he secured his release. With all their precautions, however, the Japanese succeeded in arresting only two men against whom they were able to bring specific charges of espionage. One of these presented a clear case. The other was extremely doubtful. But both men were convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. The doubtful case was that of a French officer who had been in the Japanese service, and who was well known and well respected throughout the land. The evidence was heard in camera, but in an official statement subsequently issued, upon which it must be assumed the case for the prosecution rested, it was shown that the accused had been communicating Japanese military movements to military officers in France and to a French newspaper. There was not the least evidence that he had acted the part of spy for the Russian Government. Considerable controversy arose in consequence of the conviction, and the Emperor soon saw fit to grant a pardon on the ground of the prisoner's ill-health. The officer, by this time in a very enfeebled state, did not long survive the disgrace inflicted upon him, and he died in his own country. That his communications had been harmful to the Japanese could not be doubted. But whether they amounted to espionage in the strict sense of the word is open to grave question, and probably the Japanese object would have been achieved in a more satisfactory and certainly in a more commendable way had they given him a preliminary warning instead of ending a long and honourable career by jumping to the conclusion that he was a spy.

Elaborate as was their system of espionage, it was by no means successful. To my knowledge the Russians were in possession of the plans of all the principal naval ports, and a Russian agent actually secured a passage on board a Government ship which voyaged to many of the dockyards and naval arsenals. He succeeded in obtaining a valuable series of photographs, but, owing to the inability of the Russians to take the offensive, these were of little use to them. The observance of secrecy in regard to their naval and military movements has been looked upon as one of the principal factors of Japan's triumph. On this subject, as well as on many others concerning Japan, mistaken views are held.

Again and again the police authorities found it necessary during the war to enforce the law which provided for punishment in cases where items of information contrary to the interests of the Army and Navy were given publicity, and at the same time they exerted their influence with the editors to induce them not to insert in their newspapers anything that might react unfavourably upon the situation generally. In spite of these precautions, however, news frequently leaked out and ultimately found its way into journals published abroad. The wisdom of the Japanese in seeking to suppress news that was prejudicial to military interests cannot be doubted. Before I comment upon their treatment of war correspondents, let me say that I write without the least bias. As far as I myself was concerned the restrictions imposed upon the newspaper representatives at the front did not apply, for during the war I was engaged either upon neutral territory in close proximity to the field of operations, and in the waters adjacent to Port Arthur, or else as correspondent in Japan with headquarters at Tokyo. While I am in perfect agreement with the principle of the censorship, I am entitled to complain of its hopeless inefficiency in so far as it came under my attention in the capital. The censors at the various Government Departments were constantly changed during the day, and that which one man refused another frequently passed. Thus a correspondent was under the necessity of repeatedly submitting the same message for inspection in the hope that he would ultimately find a more lenient or, as the case might be, a more intelligent official in charge of the Department. He was in duty bound to adopt this course for fear another correspondent might forestall him. Occasionally information contained in a despatch passed for one correspondent was rejected without rhyme or reason when tendered by another. For instance, the Japanese would not permit me to telegraph the news that ten Christian churches had been burned by the mob during the peace riots, but simultaneously they allowed the representative of a news agency to do so. Moreover, in rejecting despatches, they declined to give any idea of the time when such despatches might become acceptable, or to suggest amendments which would be likely to meet the official objections. The only course open to the correspondent was to keep steadily submitting the rejected item in various forms on the chance that one of these might meet with approval, or that some day the information itself would be permissible for publication abroad. Thus the censors by their inefficiency only increased the work of their own Departments and caused unnecessary irritation.

In spite of the precautions adopted with regard to journalistic despatches, news that the authorities were desirous of keeping secret frequently found its way into foreign newspapers. This was due to the fact that in the course of their duties Ministers and Consuls constantly transmitted items of important information in private cypher to their Governments, and in this way news sometimes leaked out which, had the Japanese possessed control, would never have been published. While correspondents were vainly endeavouring to send home the result of the first day's fighting in the battle of the Japan Sea, the United States Consul at Nagasaki communicated with his Government in code, and the despatch was published widespread. If the required secrecy is to be maintained in future warfare it will be necessary for the countries concerned not only to exercise supervision over correspondents on the spot, but also to obtain from the Foreign Offices of friendly Powers some definite guarantee that information relating to military operations and conveyed through diplomatic channels will not be prematurely divulged.

In the Russo-Japanese War the censorship was frequently abused in order to cover up the blunders of both sides. The entire absence of war correspondents from the field would probably lead to worse evils than those which result from their presence; for soldiers are only human, and in their reports they might occasionally be tempted to conceal some of their defects, if not their reverses. At the same time, it is intolerable that a general should be harassed in his work by having constantly at his heels a large number of critics—some of doubtful competency. While I am not prepared to say that the Russo-Japanese campaign made out a case for the abolition of war correspondents, I believe that it proved up to the hilt the necessity for placing them under proper restraint. My solution of the difficulty would be to permit only a limited number of men of known integrity, representing leading newspapers, to accompany an Army in the field. In the despatches or articles which they might communicate to their journals I would permit, under a strict censorship, only descriptions of events that had actually taken place, and would prohibit anything in the nature of criticism or speculation. I would not allow any of them to leave the Army while the operations were in progress. I would deal with any breach of the regulations relating to the maintenance of military secrecy with the utmost severity; while from each attaché following the Army I would require a promise that he would not forward his reports to his Government until the campaign was at an end.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE stockbroker and his co-partner the jobber are both heartily sick of doing nothing. They both know by long experience that the public will only come in upon a rising market. Therefore prices have been marked up, and the result has been an increase in business. The Stock Exchange would not mark up prices if there were any genuine sellers about. But there are none. The little men who were dispossessed of their shares last May-time have now come into the market again. The jobbers have bought back, and the shrewdest of the investors have been picking up stock. The natural result has been an improved tone in all markets and a distinct rise in prices. It is to the interest of everybody to see an advance in prices. The banks, who hold enormous blocks of pawned stock, do not wish to press forced sales, and will only sell as the market is strong enough to take delivery. The little gamblers who are in again would like a little longer run for their money, and the brokers and jobbers, having tasted blood, feel hungry for a boom. We must not forget that the past year has been good, in spite of political scares. Traders have made money which they have not spent, and the accumulated savings of the year will amount to quite three hundred millions, all of which must be invested either in securities or in new works. For some years past we have been lending freely to foreign countries. The interest on this money is coming back, and the money we have lent is being spent on reproductive works. Orders for material come here as a result of the loans made by the financiers. Thus a manufacturer who lends a thousand to a foreign railway not only gets his 5 per cent., but he may also get a good order, upon which he makes a still higher profit. Therefore, if foreign affairs calm down, we may look for a good period in trade, and a good period on the Stock Exchange.

The promoter evidently thinks that the public will be willing to put up all the money he wants, for he has numberless schemes ready. Sound investments are going well. Almost all the really good issues have been eagerly subscribed. I do not suppose that many people outside the Harrison and Crossfield group took shares in the new Lampard Company. Java estates are not very satisfactory investments. Few have done any good, and all have been purchased too dear. The Partington Steel and Iron was guaranteed by the Pearson and Knowles Company, and was therefore a perfectly sound 6 per cent. investment. The Alberta Land debenture was not attractive. In many of the Canadian issues the details given us are very meagre, and apparently the promoters consider that it is quite sufficient to say that the venture is Canadian. Canada is a great and growing country, but its advance will be retarded if those who ask for money persistently ignore the first principles of prospectus-drafting. No debenture issue should be put before the public unless an independent valuation has been secured. The Imperial Russian Railway Loan was, of course, a very sound investment, and I must congratulate Mr. Birch Crisp upon his enterprise in having secured the issue. The Bissagos Islands prospectus sent out by the Standard Union Trust need make no appeal to serious investors.

MONEY.—There is very little chance of any reduction in the Bank Rate at this period of the year. Egypt will be taking three or four millions for her cotton crop. The Argentine crop will be good, and Brazil will probably want more money to finance the rubber that comes down the Amazon at the end of the year. We have ample supplies for our own needs; all our Banks are in a strong position. But the French Banks have had a nasty shock, and we may see a movement on the part of the big credit institutions to hoard more gold. The Bank of France always keeps a huge stock, but the other banks work on a very narrow margin, and they now feel that, ample as their resources may be in times of peace, they are much too small when things go wrong.

CONSOLS.—It seems to me that the selling of gilt-edged paper has been overdone, and I should not be surprised to see a reaction early in the new year. We may not get any advance this side of Christmas, but the selling of Consols has now stopped, and small buying has begun. If the politician could only grasp the fact that a rise in Consols might prove useful to him he would agitate for the scheme of Consols to bearer in £5 lots. But he is incorrigibly stupid in all matters of finance.

FOREIGNERS.—The gradual closing of the Morocco question has at last had its effect upon markets. No well-informed person ever believed that Morocco would bring on war between France and Germany, but the newspapers talked such rubbish and talked so fast that in the end financiers got scared and foreign markets disorganised. However, all is now ended. Chinese bonds have not been sold in big blocks, but here and there nervous people have offered small lots. Perus are still gambled in, and no cautious person should fail to take his profit.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Rail market is good. The jobbers have turned round and are bullish, having laid in small lots that they desire to sell. The Labour leaders are attempting to force on a strike, but that is because they live upon dissension. I think that they will find that the men will refuse to follow them. The two leading lines having raised wages all round, all idea of a general strike must be abandoned. The companies will insist upon the Government keeping their word, and freights will be raised. The companies will declare that they lose money by the advance in wages, and they will probably show bad balance-sheets at the end of the current half-year. But that should not deter buyers from picking up stock. All the leading lines must be bought. The cheapest investments are Great Central 91 and 94 prefs. The soundest purchases are Great Western and North Eastern.

YANKEES.—The attacks upon industrial business that were initiated by Roosevelt and continued by Taft have quite destroyed all confidence. The Steel Trust will fight, but must lose, and the ordinary shares cannot be considered worth more than 45. When the trust was established this stock was promoters' plunder, and the company has really never made it good. The leading stocks, such as Unions, Pennsylvanias, New York Centrals, remain sound investments; but no gambler should go into the Yankee rail market to-day.

RUBBER.—The public cannot sell and will not buy rubber shares, and the only thing that keeps any interest in the rubber market is the bear squeeze in Malaccas, which being dealt in on the Paris Bourse, are a share apart. They are not worth their present price, and I advise genuine holders to get out whilst the squeeze is on and even cut any loss they may have made by purchasing at a fancy figure during the boom. The estate is big and the whole management improved, but that does not justify the silly premium in the shares.

KAFFIRS.—No one wants Kaffirs. There is no business doing, and though we have had a fall, I still find all the prices too high. The Goldfields report was colourless, and the dividend not as bad as the bears hoped, or so good as holders expected. The company appear to have bought big blocks of shares, as their cash is still at the same figure as last year, whilst they have issued £1,250,000 since the last balance-sheet.

RHODESIANS.—The magnates are furious at the new subsidiary of the Chartered Company. They say, with some truth, that the Chartered Company has opportunities of picking up information denied to the other companies, and that it is unfair that they should use private information to make money on. The argument is sound. The original idea was, no doubt, to let in the Goldfields Company, but that was modified, and now the Chartered Company take all the shares.

OIL.—The clever people talk Lobitos much higher. As I said they should be bought at 11s. I am inclined to advise people to take a profit if the rise goes on. Kims seem very cheap; Spies also appear undervalued. But there is no life in the Oil Market, and perhaps speculators would do well to hold their hands.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The gamble in Omnibus shares goes on, and wild stories of a 10 per cent. guaranteed dividend are told. We shall see. Some agreement about competition fares appears to have been arranged. The balance-sheet will be much better than last year, and the Baker-Mason crowd say that they will hold for 200. But the price to-day appears very high. There are many deals now on in the House. Cements look shaky, but may be held a little longer. Briseis tin are to be put up soon.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE FUTURE OF THE LIBRARY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The subject broached in THE ACADEMY of October 21st, under the title of "The Future of the Library," has many aspects—some personal, some literary—but its chief point may be regarded as the question: "What is the future of the novel?" as that form of literature is most frequently mentioned.

The public has almost ceased to buy new six-shilling novels. The shilling, sevenpenny, and fourpence-halfpenny editions, brought out so rapidly after the appearance of the six-shilling book, have practically destroyed the public market for the more expensive work. Besides which, in houses of fifty pounds a year or less there is becoming less and less room for books, particularly the bulky sort on featherweight paper. The smaller book is preferable for several reasons. There is a further reason for reduced sales. The motor-car is becoming a personal requisite to many, and, as an adjunct to the country house, a wonderful convenience. It gives opportunities for travel, for seeing friends, visiting town, and taking part in its social functions to which the carriage and pair were quite unequal. This, of course, means to many women less time, and indeed less inclination for reading, and books not being altogether indispensable to many people, they have become to some extent neglected.

It has often been said that the novel is dead, but this season's publishing list proves the opposite. And, in spite of all the facts above stated, there is an enormous public fond of reading a good modern novel. A fine novel is pretty sure of finding a large circle of readers, and for this reason the disappearance of the old expensive first edition is a matter to be deplored. Its publication generally covered the first cost and helped the work on nicely to its issue in a cheaper and more popular form. Perhaps it would be well if one or two first-class novelists decided to bring out their next books as an experiment at half a guinea net, and by means of liberal advertising cause such a demand that the libraries would be forced to take copies. Surely libraries are not always to be to publishers the terrifying spectres they are at the present time. Such a step, seriously taken, would help to lift up the quality of the novel generally, as no one publisher would bring out a poor novel at a high price. The best authors alone would be wanted. The young author would have to find some other method of making his voice heard.

After expensive publication, an issue at a price that would enable the public to buy—and not borrow—the book would probably meet with a huge demand. Of course much would depend on the book and the author; but the great point gained would be the reduction in the number of novels issued for library use. If fewer were brought out the libraries would be in a better position for buying, even at the higher price.

Probably the next step would be the first publication of more novels at one shilling—or some price that would correspond to the cheap thin-paper editions so popular on the Continent. No English reader can complain of the list of copyright novels offered him at one shilling at the present day. The selection offered is amazing, but the majority have proved their popularity in having previously gained the ear of the public in six-shilling form. In the shilling form they sell on their merits—or demerits, as the case may be. At this price, and in some such form as at present—although the majority are a little too bulky and too suggestive in the binding for the literary reader—there is evidently a vast market and probably an increasing one.

Whether this public wants really "good stuff" or "sex sensationalism" is a matter which booksellers who have handled both sorts of books would be better able to deal with than the present writer.

It would be interesting to know the opinion of Mr. Hall Caine on the future of the novel, as he was largely concerned in the drop from the guinea-and-a-half form to the six-shilling issue—in which edition his own books have been so successful.—I am yours, etc.,

JOHN NAYLER.

Wimbledon.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The future of the circulating library, to my mind, will be non-existent. It will cease to have "a local habitation and a name." Book-lovers never needed it; book-readers will be able to purchase their requirements. Wilkie Collins once, in a letter to the writer, deprecated the 31s. 6d. price of the novels of his day, stating that the exigencies of the publishers precluded a change. Had this famous sensational novelist lived in our times, his books would have been sold by the hundred thousand for 7d.!

The tendency of the age is to popularise the best literature and novels which have won favour by issuing them at prices within reach of the smallest purse. And it is this cheapening of good books which is gradually weakening, and will in the end destroy, the existence of circulating libraries.

The need of the circulating library is gradually disappearing. New books in vogue are not easily obtained in consequence of the libraries' limited supply; on the other hand, old ones are offered for sale at very reduced rates, proving that the original published prices are not warranted.

There is one phase of the subject, however, seldom commented on, which condemns the library en tout. Books passing through so many hands are apt to present a soiled, unwholesome appearance and hardly reek of "all the perfumes of Arabia." For this reason it is often impossible to read them. It is also a fact that these outwardly offensive volumes may carry with them the germs of zymotic diseases!

The circulating library is becoming an anachronism. It belongs to a past, when the publication of books was limited and their price beyond the small incomes of the majority. The large publishers now are catering for all tastes; the increasing number of readers will find it more profitable and economical to buy a few books whose merits are pointed out by the just and clever reviews of the hour than to depend on the rapidly becoming out-of-date circulating library.

In the meantime there seems to be no end to the multiplication of books of every kind and description at popular prices, which may mean a boon for the multitude, but a deterrent to new writers. The business mind of a publisher is not always on the qui vive for the aspirant, and unrecognised merit may knock at his doors in vain, in consequence of the disappearance of the library. The issuing of large editions of an unknown writer, necessitated by their cheapness, may not appeal to a publisher's mercantile instincts, but there are compensations even to this unfortunate state of affairs. The present period, crowded with great and original intellects, has no need to hail another genius. Their supply is sufficient, and as for new writers, there are still publishers who will give the world a chance to appreciate those who pay for the privilege of publication. At all events, be this as it may, it seems to me that the circulating library is eventually doomed to extinction.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

ISIDORE G. ASCHER.

Kensington.

ONE VOTE, ONE VALUE, AND MAJOR MORRISON BELL'S MODELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Major Morrison Bell's excellent models display in a very striking manner the anomalies in the size of constituencies, and must materially assist his campaign for redistribution. But much more is claimed for redistribution than it can possibly accomplish. It is contended that it will secure one vote, one value, and figures quoted from the publications of the Proportional Representation Society have often been used in its support.

No scheme of redistribution, so long as single-Member constituencies are retained, will secure one vote, one value. This can be demonstrated by a few simple facts. It will still be true, as it is to-day, that two majorities of four votes each in two separate constituencies will have twice the power within the House of Commons of a single majority of 4,000. Again, both in Wales and in Scotland the Unionists only by accident obtain any representation at all. The creation of equal electoral areas will leave this injustice untouched. The votes of the Unionist minorities there will still have little or no value, and the same may be said of the votes of the Liberal minorities in Birmingham, the home counties, and other Unionist strongholds.

Possibly the driving force behind the demand for equal electoral areas is a belief that redistribution will compensate the Unionist party for the changes in representation which may result from the adoption of "one man, one vote." This is a delusion. Redistribution will, it is true, reduce the Ministerial majority in Ireland, and it will give increased representation to the Unionists in the home counties. But these results will be negated by increased Liberal and Labour representation in Yorkshire and the northern counties. We are ready to furnish the data for these facts to all those who are unwilling to accept mere assertion. Had there been equal electoral areas at the last election the Government majority would have been 122 instead of 126. Practically no change would have taken place in the representation of political forces.

There is but one way in which "one vote, one value" can be secured, and that is by proportional representation. Under this system minorities and majorities will each obtain their fair share of representation, while electors will be given a much wider choice in the selection of their representatives. In brief, the House of Commons will then become in fact, what it is in theory, a reflection of the national will.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

JOHN H. HUMPHREYS, Hon. Secretary,
the Proportional Representation Society.
179, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, S.W.

THE RETURN OF MR. ALGERNON ASHTON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—When a short letter of mine concerning the neglected state of Lord Beaconsfield's tomb in Hughenden Churchyard appeared in the Times the other day doubts were expressed in various quarters as to the authenticity of that letter, because of the fact that nearly four years ago I publicly registered a vow never to write another letter to any newspaper. Since then many people, including some distinguished personages, have told me that my vow was a foolish and mistaken one, and as I have myself come to that conclusion, an occasional letter from my pen may henceforth again be seen in the Press, though my activity in this direction will in all probability be nothing to what it formerly was, being now too much occupied with musical work and other things.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

ALGERNON ASHTON,

10, Holmdale-road, West Hampstead, N.W.,
October 23, 1911.

ROBERT BURNS' ODE ON THE DUCHESS OF KINGSTON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a letter from a Mr. R. B. Henry in THE ACADEMY of September 2nd in reference to newly-discovered lines by Robert Burns, published in my book "The Amazing Duchess." Mr. Henry, apparently, has only seen a newspaper paragraph, and did not go to the book, where he would not only have found the lines complete, but evidence of their authenticity. The manuscript, in the writing of the poet, was sold by auction by Messrs. Sotheby some five months ago, together with an original letter of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and one of the Duke of Kingston. The entry in the catalogue reads as follows:—"Burns (Robert)—The original MS. of his ode 'On the Duchess of Kingston,' pp. oblong 4to., with note of authentication stating: 'This is the original MS. of Burns.—T. H.'" I presume both Messrs. Sotheby and the purchaser were satisfied that the MS. was genuine—certainly the high price paid warrants the supposition.

With the permission of the purchaser I copied the lines from Burns' MS., and I was very glad of the opportunity of publishing them in the second edition of "The Amazing Duchess." Perhaps Messrs. Sotheby could carry the inquiry further, both as regards "T. H." and the vendor, who, I may say, is unknown to me. Before asserting that the "ode" was being published for the first time I took the precaution of looking through several editions of the poet's collected works, but failed to find it.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CHARLES E. PEARCE.

Whitefriars Club.

THE LATE MR. CHURTON COLLINS AND ROBERT GREENE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of October 28th Miss Hester Brayne takes my praise of the late Mr. Churton Collins a little too literally. His attempts to track Shakespeare through the Greek plays used to make me smile as they make Miss Brayne smile. But surely the man who spent weeks and weeks poring over church registers to establish the exact date of Greene's birth must be allowed to love facts even beyond their value.

Miss Brayne is more kindly than correct in calling me "an expert" in Elizabethan literature. I think I know something about Shakespeare, and a little about Bacon and Jonson, but that is all: I have no interest in the Greenes.

The mistake in my review of Mr. Churton Collins, which was pointed out by Mr. White in your last impression, I regret extremely. How I came to make it I cannot explain. There are lapses of the brain, I suppose, as there are lapses of the pen.—Yours truly, FRANK HARRIS.

TATTERSHALL CASTLE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your contributor Mr. A. E. Cary makes the statement, in your issue of October 7th, that Tattershall Castle "perked up in some Yankee domain would merely move the beholder to contemptuous laughter." Now, Sir, I venture to suggest that the average American will not agree with Mr. Cary on this point.

One of the most responsible missions given to this great English nation of America is that of receiving, educating, and making good citizens of the millions of outside people who flock to these shores year in and year out. This work is only possible to a large extent by precept and example, and I hold that in such a community Tattershall Castle will be a source of inspiration to all beholders.

In virtue of our moral obligations, I believe we stand in greater need of the beneficial influence of such relics than do the people of England, and, provided they come within the limit of our "fair share of the heritage," such acquisitions should receive from our flesh and blood in the old country their friendly nod of approval.

At present the English treasures in this country can be compared, in point of numbers, to the crumbs that fell from the rich man's tables.

As a monument of ancient English splendour Tattershall Castle will, until the day of its fall, continue to throw across the path of those who approach it the lurid shadow of England's greatness.—With best wishes, yours faithfully,

REGINALD V. RICKCORD.

24, Second Street, Troy, N.Y., U.S.A.,
October 23rd, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS

L'Exotisme Américain dans la Littérature Française au XVII^e Siècle d'après Rabelais, Ronsard, Montaigne, etc. By Gilbert Chinard. Hachette and Co., London and Paris. 3f. 50c.

Scenes from Dickens for Drawing-Room and Platform Acting. Adapted by Guy Pertwee. Edited by Ernest Pertwee. With Forty-Eight Costume-Plates by Edward Handley-Read. George Routledge and Sons. 3s. 6d.

A Little Book of Twentieth-Century Duologues for Drawing-Room and Platform. Compiled and Edited by Ernest Pertwee. George Routledge and Sons. 1s.

Man and Beast in Eastern Ethiopia, from Observations Made in British East Africa, Uganda, and the Sudan. By J. Bland-Sutton, F.R.C.S. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 12s. net.

Deicide. Painted by Wm. Smith, Junr. Described by Robert Anderson. A. and C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.

The Armies of India. Painted by Major A. C. Lovett. Described by Major G. F. MacMunn, D.S.O. With Foreword by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts. A. and C. Black. 20s. net.

The "Flower of Gloster." By E. Temple Thurston. Illustrated by W. R. Dakin. Williams and Norgate. 7s. 6d. net.

Sport on the Nilgiris, and in Wynaad. By F. W. F. Fletcher. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 12s. net.

Archæological Survey of India. Annual Report, 1907-8. Illustrated. Superintendent Government Printing, Calcutta. 37s. 6d.

Edinburgh Revisited. By James Bone. Illustrated by Hanslip Fletcher. Sidgwick and Jackson. 21s. net.

The Practice of Water-Colour Painting Illustrated by the Work of Modern Artists. By A. L. Baldry. Macmillan and Co. 12s. net.

The A B C of Japanese Art. By J. F. Blacker. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 5s. net.

Pastels under the Southern Cross. By Margaret L. Woods. Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net.

Poems in Prose. By Aleck T. Ellis. Ebenezer Baylis and Son. Shakespeare, a Study. By Darrell Figgis. J. M. Dent and Sons. 5s. net.

Nuts and Chestnuts. By the Hon. Lionel A. Tollemache. Edward Arnold. 2s. 6d. net.

William Morris to Whistler: Papers and Addresses on Art and Craft and the Commonwealth. By Walter Crane. Illustrated with Drawings by the Author and from other Sources. G. Bell and Sons. 6s. net.

The Summons of the King. A Play by Philip Blacker Goetz. The McDowell Press, Buffalo, U.S.A.

A Sweeping by Edward of the Golden Heart. By the Author of "Letters to My Son." T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.

The 1912 Overture: a Man's Answer to the Suffragists. By W. Henry Lewin. Published by the Author at 56, Caledonian Road, N.

A Year of Japanese Epigrams. Translated and Compiled by William N. Porter. Illustrated by Kazunori Ishibashi. Henry Frowde. 6s. net.

Esto Perpetua: Algerian Studies and Impressions. By H. Belloc. (The Readers' Library.) Illustrated. Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

The Letters of Horace Presented to Modern Readers. Edited by Charles Loomis Dana and John Cotton Dana. Illustrated. The Elm Tree Press, Woodstock, Vermont, U.S.A. $3.

The Emir of Bokhara and his Country: Journeys and Studies in Bokhara. By O. Olufsen. Illustrated. Wm. Heinemann. 21s. net.

Report of the Proceedings of the National Conference on the Prevention of Destitution, May and June, 1911. P. S. King and Son. 10s. 6d. net.

Ways of Escape: a Book of Adventure. By Douglas Goldring. Illustrated by Edgar Lander. Andrew Melrose. 5s. net.

My Raggicker. By Mary E. Waller. Illustrated by Edgar Lander. Andrew Melrose. 2s. net.

The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne in the County of Southampton. By Gilbert White. With Illustrations in Colour by George E. Collins. R.B.A. Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.

Surnames of the United Kingdom: a Concise Etymological Dictionary. By Henry Harrison, assisted by G. Pulling. Vol. I., Part 16. The Eaton Press. 1s. net.

Fifteen Fiscal Fallacies. By G. W. Gough. B.A. Free Trade Union. 6d.

Stories of Indian Gods and Heroes. By W. D. Munro, M.A. Illustrated in Colour by Evelyn Paul. George G. Harrap and Co. 5s. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

A Book of Noble Women. By C. C. Cairns. Illustrated. T. C. and E. C. Jack. 7s. 6d. net.

Later Letters of Edward Lear to Chichester Fortescue, Frances Countess Waldegrave, and Others. Edited by Lady Strachey, of Sutton Court. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 15s. net.

The History of the Spur. By Charles de Lacy Lacy, M.A. Illustrated. "The Connoisseur" (Otto Limited).

The Glory that was Greece: a Survey of Hellenic Culture and Civilisation. By J. C. Stobart, M.A. Illustrated. Sidgwick and Jackson. 30s. net.

Hannah More: a Biographical Study. By Annette M. B. Meakin. With Portraits. Smith, Elder and Co. 14s. net.

"Hail and Farewell," a Trilogy. I. Ave. By George Moore. William Heinemann. 6s.

Gordon at Khartoum, being a Personal Narrative of Events in Continuation of "A Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt." By Wilfrid Scawen Blunt. With Portrait Frontispiece. Stephen Swift and Co. 15s. net.

When Life was New. By Horace G. Hutchinson. Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net.

Sir Henry Raeburn, R.A., his Life and Works. With a Catalogue of his Pictures. By James Greig. Illustrated. "The Connoisseur" (Otto Limited).

Sculpture in Spain. By Albert F. Calvert. Illustrated. John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.

Sophie Dawes, Queen of Chantilly. By Violette Montagu. Illustrated. John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.

The Life of John Ruskin. By E. T. Cook. With Portraits. Two Vols. George Allen and Co. 21s. net.

The Coming of the Saints: Imaginations and Studies in Early Church History and Tradition. By J. W. Taylor. Illustrated. Methuen and Co. 5s. net.

FICTION

The Long Hand. By Sir William Magnay, Bart. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

The Case of Richard Meynell. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. Illustrated. Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.

A Circuit Rider's Wife. By Corra Harris. Illustrated by William H. Everett. Constable and Co. 6s.

Phyllis and Felicity. By Diana Meyrick. Sidgwick and Jackson. 6s.

A South Sea Buccaneer. By Albert Dorrington. Illustrated. Andrew Melrose. 6s.

- Love on the Happy Hill.* By Violet A. Pearn. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
The Wind Bloweth. By Marion Mole. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
An Accidental Daughter. By Cosmo Hamilton. Hutchinson and Co. 6s.
Father Maternus: a Romance of the Sixteenth Century. By Adolf Hausrath. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s.
The Disputed Marriage. By Lilian Street. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s.
Bubble Fortune: a Story of 1720. By Gilbert Sheldon. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s.
Broken Arcs. By Darrell Figgis. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s.
The Stolen Bride. By W. H. Williamson. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
A Sheltered Woman. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. Alton Rivers. 6s.
Zuleika Dobson; or, An Oxford Love Story. By Max Beerbohm. William Heinemann. 6s.
Tante. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick. Edward Arnold. 6s.
The Breath of the Desert. By H. Clayton East. With Frontispiece. Duckworth and Co. 6s.
The Secret of Chauville. By David Whitelaw. Illustrated. Greening and Co. 6s.
Earth. By Muriel Hine. John Lane. 6s.
A Safety Match. By Ian Hay. William Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
A Question of Latitude. By Laura Bogue Luffman. John Lane. 6s.
Tom Bart Brown. By Wilfred Beet. Wilfred Mark Webb. 6s.

VERSE

- Miles Standish* by H. W. Longfellow. Dramatised for Performance by Edith Ashby. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.
The Cup of Quietness. By Alfred Hayes. Methuen and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
A Little Garner of Sonnets from Edmund Spenser to Christina Rossetti. Frontispiece. S.P.C.K. 1s.
The Epic of God and the Devil. By John Frederick Rowbotham, M.A. E. Baylis and Son, Worcester.
An Epithalamium, and Other Poems. By Roy Elliott Bates. Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
The Eclogues of Baptista Mantuanus. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Wilfred P. Mustard, Ph.D. The Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, U.S.A. $1.50.
The Songs of Bonnie Scotland. Selected by W. James Wintle. Illustrated. John Ouseley.
Advent Hymn. By "Marsyas." D. W. M. Burn, M.A., Gironde, Elgin-road, Mornington, Dunedin, N.Z. 6d.
Australia, and Other Poems. By William H. Elsum. George Robertson and Co., Melbourne. 3s. 6d.
The Muses' Library: The Earthly Paradise. Vol. I., March to June. By William Morris. With an Introduction by John Drinkwater. George Routledge and Sons. 1s. net.
Spires of the City. By "Francesca." J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 1s. 6d. net.
A Dream of Love in Eden, and Other Poems. By John Gregory. J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 1s. net.
Pervigilium Veneris. The Clarendon Press, Oxford. 4d.
Poems. By Charles Granville. Stephen Swift and Co. 5s. net.
Canned Classics, and Other Verses. By Harry Graham. Illustrated by Lewis Baumer. Mills and Boon. 3s. 6d. net.
The Anteroom, and Other Poems. By Wm. Hervey Woods. Illustrated by L. Neill Woods. The Author, 212, N. Carey-street, Baltimore, U.S.A. $1.35.

THEOLOGY

- Famous Sermons by English Preachers.* Edited, with Introductory Notes, by Douglas Maclean, M.A. Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. 6s. net.
A Fresh Study of the Fourth Gospel. By Rev. F. B. Montgomery Hitchcock, M.A. S.P.C.K. 2s. 6d.
Pilgrim Man. By William Scott Palmer. Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.
My Neighbour's Landmark: Short Studies in Bible Land Laws. By Frederick Verinder. With a Preface by the Very Rev. G. W. Kitchin, D.D., F.S.A. Andrew Melrose. 1s. net.
Gifts and Graces: Thoughts from the Writings of Christina Rossetti. Frontispiece. S.P.C.K. 1s.
Priests, Philosophers, and Prophets: A Dissertation on Revealed Religion. By Thomas Whittaker. A. and C. Black. 5s. net.
Concerning the Genesis of the Versions of the New Testament (Gospels). By H. C. Hoskier. 2 vols. Bernard Quaritch. 12s. net.

JUVENILE

- Elizabethan Adventurers upon the Spanish Main.* Adapted from the "Voyages" of Richard Hakluyt by A. M. Hyamson, F.R.Hist.S. Illustrated by E. Handley-Read. George Routledge and Sons. 3s. 6d.
Molly's Decision. By L. E. Tiddeman. Illustrated by W. S. Stacey. S.P.C.K. 2s. 6d.
Richard of Lympne. By Violet T. Kirke. Illustrated by Adolf Thiede. S.P.C.K. 2s.
In a Royal Nursery. By Gertrude Hollis. Illustrated by Adolf Thiede. S.P.C.K. 2s. 6d.
Fairies Afield. By Mrs. Molesworth. Illustrated by Gertrude D. Hammond. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d.
Queerie at the Pole. Created and Illustrated by J. R. Sinclair. Verses by John Lea. Andrew Melrose. 2s. 6d. net.
The Zoo Conversation Book. By Edmund Selous. Illustrated by J. A. Shepherd. Mills and Boon. 5s. net.
Honey-Bee. By Anatole France. Translated by Mrs. John Lane. Illustrated by Florence Lundborg. John Lane. 5s.
The Wonderful Garden; or, The Three C's. By E. Nesbit. Illustrated by H. R. Millar. Macmillan and Co. 6s.
Queerie Leary Nonsense. A Lear Nonsense Book, edited by Lady Strachey, of Sutton Court. With an Introduction by the Earl of Cromer, G.C.B. Illustrated. Mills and Boon. 3s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

Triad, Dunedin, N.Z.; Publishers' Circular; Ulula; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Windsor Magazine; Cornhill Magazine; Good Health; La Grande Revue; Bookseller; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The Idler; Cambridge University Reporter; Modern Language Teaching; English Review; Blackwood's Magazine; Imperial Review, Melbourne; Revue Bleue; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine; Friendly Greetings; Sunday at Home; Boy's Own Paper; La Licorne, Antwerp; Nineteenth Century and After; Peru To-day, Lima; La Revue; Educational Times; Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin, Boston.

Gospey-Otto-Sauer Method for the Study of Modern Languages

Just Out:

German Conversation-Grammar.

A Practical Method of Learning the German Language.

By

EMIL OTTO, Ph.D.

Revised by

FRANCIS E. SANDBACH, M.A., Ph.D.,
Lecturer in German at the University of Birmingham.

29th Edition. 8vo., 421pp., cloth, net 4s.

From the Preface:

In the present newly revised edition the chief aim has been as far as possible to adapt this well-known and widely used Grammar to modern methods of teaching without sacrificing its many excellent features. New exercises for translation have been composed, the detached sentences of the previous edition being replaced by short pieces of connected prose; great pains have been taken to introduce in each exercise as many examples as possible of the grammatical rules given in the preceding Lesson, and to avoid the introduction of difficulties not previously explained. The wording of the grammatical rules has been carefully revised and some Lessons have been rewritten. The arrangement of the Lessons has, however, been kept in the main as in the last edition. Part II., as rewritten, consists of 14 Lessons as compared with 20 Lessons in the last edition, but care has been taken not to omit any rules of importance and to bring the rules given thoroughly up to date.

KEY to German Conversation-Grammar

By Emil Otto, Revised by Francis E. Sandbach.

With Specimens of Letter-Writing.

21st Edition. 8vo., boards, 61pp., 2s.

London:

B. NUTT, 57-59, Long Acre. DULAU & CO., 37, Sebe Square.
 SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd., 100, Southwark Street, S.E.
 Heidelberg: JULIUS GROOS.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND ... THROUGH CANADA. ...

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

62-68, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE TO SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to
MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

... Ports of Call ...

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS,
MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA,
ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME,
PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA,

JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout
the Year,
according
to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE,

NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
112 Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, or Northumberland Avenue, W.C.2, LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Royal Charter dated 1839).

PLEASURE & HEALTH CRUISES.

For further particulars of which apply for Illustrated
Booklets to

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

TO	FARE	LENGTH OF TOUR	SAILING	FROM
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17.	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£10.	8 upwards.	Fridays.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
Round SOUTH AMERICA.	£100.	about 10 weeks.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR.

A Weekly Review
of Politics, Art,
Music, Literature,
and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY
of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers
for 6s. per annum (post-free)
or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London.

CONTENTS

PAGE	PAGE
Review of the Week 591	Reviews (continued)—
The Charm 592	Fiction 604
Clairvoyance 592	The Theatre..... 606
De Omnibus Rebus..... 592	Delhi in the Middle Ages 607
The Last of the Great	The Secret of Bruges 608
Victorians..... 593	Book Sales, Old and New 609
The Future of the Terri-	The Magazines..... 610
torial Force—I. 595	Art 611
The Hill of Montmartre... 597	The London Institution ... 612
Reviews—	Books in Preparation 612
Verse..... 598	Music 613
The Principles of Art... 599	Imperial and Foreign
"The East a-Callin'"... 600	Affairs 614
Business and Genius ... 601	Motoring 615
New Editions 602	In the Temple of Mammon 616
Shorter Reviews 603	Correspondence 617

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willings' bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

ECHOES of the trouble in the railway world which reached its height at the climax of the summer holiday season are still in the air, and before long the travelling public will know whether the platform strikers—as distinct from the actual railway workers—intend to upset the traffic of the country at the climax of the winter holiday, Christmas. Ballot-papers are issued this week to discover whether the men are prepared to accept the findings of the recent Royal Commission, and whether they are "prepared to withdraw their labour" in favour of "a recognition of the Trade Unions and of a programme for all railway-men to be agreed upon by this Committee;" these papers are returnable on December 5th. It will be with a most complete and suicidal disregard of their own interests, especially after the concessions lately granted under no compulsion, that any body of railwaymen will strike during the month of December, and they must expect little sympathy either from the public or the Managers' Conference if they proceed to extremes. Forewarned is forearmed; every Company is preparing itself for the possible emergency, and it says little for the character of the leaders of the men's Unions when we read in a responsible article that "if the plans (of the Companies) were known, there can be little doubt that the members of the Unions would strive their utmost to upset them in advance." They would strive their utmost, that is, to dislocate the traffic of the whole kingdom at the busiest period of the year, regardless of the misery which must inevitably follow, by reason of limited food supplies and loss of employment, to their fellow-workers in other spheres

It is of little use to touch upon the sentimental aspect of the question—to regret that at a season of "peace and goodwill" war and unhappiness should be meditated; a conversation we recently had with an official who reasoned with a "sympathetic" striker emphasises the fact that humane feelings are often left out of consideration. Pointing out to the man that owing to the deletion of workmen's trains in the early morning, scores of labourers who depended upon to-day's pay for to-morrow's food would go hungry, and that in the case of those with families it might very well mean suffering and perhaps death of wives or children who chanced to be ill, he received the astounding reply that "they didn't mind a little suffering and a death or two as long as they gained the day." Far be it from us to believe that such a brutal mood is general or representative; but that such a man can exist here and there and do untold harm provokes thought. If the men will only realise that they have everything to gain both in pocket and in happiness by remaining loyal to the Companies—as has been amply proved—such a lamentable and pitiful occurrence as a railway strike at Christmas will be impossible, despite the most persevering and loud-voiced of agitators.

It has been discovered by various medical men that birds are dangerous carriers of disease; that "even the fluttering of a canary in its cage may throw out infection," and that as for the companionable, impudent parrot, he frequently suffers from something called psittacose, which may be transmitted to his unsuspecting owner. This is really about the last straw; life is growing too complicated for the average unlearned human being. We eat a couple of strawberries, and immediately read that a strawberry-seed killed two men the day before, and we feel uncommonly queer; greatly daring, we nibble a nut, to learn that fifteen people were poisoned by the nut habit only the previous week. The unfriendly germ, the vindictive animacule, the blustering bacillus, hide in our books, browse on our carpets, hold swimming-races in the water we drink; they seat themselves by our side in the train, invade the very clothes we wear, and penetrate to the innermost portions of our anatomy by means of the atmosphere which we shall very soon be cautioned not to breathe. And when by the aid of science we persuade a few of these invisible desperadoes to enter the field of a microscope, they are simply tickled to death at the idea of being magnified by 500 diameters or so, and thrown on a screen and admired by humanity; they die content, posing in graceful attitudes for the benefit of the spectators. Shall we give up the struggle, or shall we venture to eat, drink, breathe, and be merry, and dare the Spectre of the Microbe to do his worst? Common sense seems to counsel the latter method, and so, despite the doctors, we will go our ways undisturbed; we will keep a parrot—two parrots, if need be, and a canary—and, scorning the intimidation of the infinitesimal, let the world wag as cheerily as it did before.

Mr. Laurence Housman and Miss Edith Craig open the autumn season of the Pioneer Players on November 26th, at the Savoy Theatre, by producing Mr. Housman's play "Pains and Penalties." The cast is a strong one, Miss Gertrude Kingston and Miss Auriol Lee being in principal parts, and the appearance of such well-known actors as Mr. Henry Ainley, Mr. Edmund Gwenn, Mr. Nigel Playfair, Mr. Ben Webster—to mention only a few from the lengthy list—should ensure a remarkably good performance.

THE CHARM

You, who once brought your life too near Where I in silence dwell,
Smiled then to know the stubborn sneer
Of me, your infidel :
For I, who neither lost nor won,
Suddenly, when an hour had run,
Saw heaven in every glance of you,
Felt heaven in every touch of you,
Heard heaven in every tone of you,
And could not tell.

And I, unknowing in my pride,
Rebellious even,
Went far away, from tide to tide
By soft lures driven ;
Fought, trusted, hungered, overset
My heart's strong ways ; strove to forget ;
Sought heaven elsewhere in spite of you,
Then came in sadness back to you ;
So, longing, loving, near to you,
Imagined heaven.

W. L. R.

CLAIRVOYANCE

My lady's truant glance
Is like a bird in flight,
And happy is the chance
That nets its flitting light.
But when with fondness fraught,
Or with her dreaming wise,
The landscapes of her thought
Are shadowed in her eyes :

Then if by her sweet grace
This privilege be mine,
To gaze upon her face,
I ask no meeter shrine ;
Nor for imperial power
Would I forego my right
To serve her in that hour,
Her humble acolyte.

Green solitudes are there
Of quiet reverie,
More virgin and more fair
Than fabled Arcady ;
And jealous gardens, walled
With high inviolate stone,
Whose flower-names, softly called,
Make music like her own.

No vasty Alps impose
Their hush of icy death ;
Her silence is the rose,
Her cool the sward beneath.
For Love hath made her wise,
Whose arts with dreams are fraught,
And shadows in her eyes
The landscapes of her thought.

PHIL. J. FISHER.

DE OMNIBUS REBUS

BY ARTHUR MACHEN

A WEEK or two ago I was dining in an old London tavern. To be precise, it was at "The George," in Southwark, and I mention the name boldly, without fearing the accusation of advertisement. If anything that I say prove a useful advertisement for "The George" I shall be only too glad. To add in the smallest degree to the prosperity of the last relics of the last galleried inn in London is, as I account it, an act of merit.

Well, we were dining together in this comely old place, full of gracious lines, odd corners, and queer passages and crannies, everything that delights the eye and the mind, when I said to the man next to me : "And the worst of it is to know that nobody will ever make a place like this any more." My friend was an optimist ; he thought that inns as gracious and as goodly would yet be built—after the social revolution. Then he "went off" on Socialism, and with the doctrines of Socialism we will not now concern ourselves. But he made a statement which, coming from a convinced Socialist, interested me very much.

"Look at all the strikes," he said. "The men think, and many of us think, that strikes are protests against long hours and bad pay. It isn't so : the physical disabilities of labour are not the chief cause of what is called industrial discontent. The fact is that the majority of the men are rebelling—though they don't know it—against the ugliness of their lives, not against the discomfort and physical hardship of their lives. They are rebelling in reality because they have to earn their daily bread by doing work that no man is meant to do, by being slaves to some kind of machine. And they are rebelling because, when this work of theirs is done, they go home to horrible houses in horrible streets. Insanitary houses ? Not a bit of it. It isn't the poor wretches who live in the reeking dens and black holes of London who strike ; the people who dwell in the pit don't strike, for the good reason that they have got no work. The strikers are the mechanics, well-to-do, or comparatively well-to-do, who live in clean houses, sometimes provided with bathrooms, and always 'sanitized' to a pitch of excellence that dukes and peers and paladins of the Middle Ages never dreamed of. The strikers, or the mass of them, live in neat little houses which stretch in unending rows on the outskirts of every big town. They are clean without and clean within ; there is usually a small garden front and back, and not a word to be said against the water-supply ; and these neat, trim, little houses make Gehenna for the soul. Why ? Mainly because they are the result of a forbidden art. Man, they used to say, can end desperately by aiming at knowledge too high for him. Magic is an effort to penetrate without permission into the council chamber of the Most High. But the same fate, or a worse fate, must attend the opposite effort. Look at these suburban dwellings : they are all alike as are the cells of a beehive, the cells of a prison. It may be just to punish criminals with this penalty of bestial, infra-human monotony, though even this may be doubted. But think of those house backs that you have seen so often from the train as it rounds the embankment ; of that line of washhouses, with every window, every door of precisely the same shape, in the same place, prolonged, it would seem, to some infernal π or x ; think, too, that inside those houses there is no single object, from a teacup to a table, that has not been turned out by the devilish engine of monotony, the machine ; think of the men who come home to these places every night after having spent eight, ten, or twelve hours in moving a piece of leather to a fixed position under a mechanical knife, and in watching a certain unchanging cut being made in unending pieces of leather all day long ; then, if you have any sense, you will understand strikes. Industrial civilisation treats men as though they were bees; brutes that have nothing to do but to accomplish so many hours' mechanical labour and then retreat to mechanical cells. Now, men are not bees; and so they revolt. They themselves think that what they want is more pay and less work. They know that they are miserable; they are furious and burning with misery all their days; and they know of no remedy but the purely material. I think that they are quite right so far as they go; I would have the masters take a less share of the profit and the men a greater share; but this is not the real root of the malady. The disease is not chiefly physical; it is chiefly spiritual. There is not a great gulf between the sorry meanness of the poor man's street and the sorry splendour of the rich man's hotel. There is the same deadly monotony about the unending corridors of this as about the unending avenues of that. A bad cake is still a bad cake, though it be iced, and the gaol of Giant Despair is still a prison-house and place of doom, though it be cased in marble."

Thus my friend the Socialist; and I agreed heartily with every word of it. We parted company on the question of the possibility of an improvement in this deplorable state. He thought that the social revolution would make things all right again; I was of opinion that the present struggle, mean and squalid and detestable as it is, was preferable to any conceived or conceivable Utopia of Socialism. I have read the case for Socialism put sweetly and reasonably by Mr. H. G. Wells in one of his collections of essays; and I say frankly that, recognising as I do all the horrors and abominations of our present state, I would as soon live in the Second Book of Euclid as in Mr. Wells' Socialistic commonweal. It is logical and rectangular; and to the soul of men logic and right angles enthroned in places where they have no business to reign are utter and final destruction, misery, and death. Why? Chiefly because they deny mystery; and mystery is the soul of all life and the salt of all life. Where, then, is the cure for our present ills? I am not sure that there is a cure, or that there is meant to be a cure. It is possible that people who, refusing to be bound by the dead hand of tradition and the dicta of mediæval chemists, decline to acknowledge the stereotyped dogma of the explosiveness of gunpowder, can only be cured of their disbelief by the process of being blown to bits by gunpowder exploding. An analogous process may be the only remedy for the presentsickness of the world.

But if there be a remedy, this I do know, that it must proceed from the centre and not from the circumference. I went to church the other Sunday and found, to my astonishment, that it was not the Twentieth Sunday after Trinity, as the Prayer-book seemed to say. It was Citizen Sunday, and Citizen Sunday meant, it appeared, that if the Church of this country did not interest itself pretty quickly in social subjects, it was lost; that is to say, I suppose, that it is the duty of Bishops to take a brisk share in the suppression of juvenile smoking and of boxing contests. Deans should be ready with exact calculations of the weekly wage justly due to a goods porter, Archdeacons will have strong opinions as to the merits or demerits of an eight hours' shift in the coal-mines, and Canons are to speak learnedly on the conditions of labour in the boot trade. And the whole body of clergy are to take a vivid interest in that ghastliest insincerity and humbug called politics. It is pitiable that such stuff as this should be talked by well-meaning and honest and devoted men; the horrible and tragical futility of such a doctrine surpasses the measure of tears. Conceive a great hall given over to icy cold and the chill damps rising from the earth, to the horror of great darkness; and on the hearth where the old wood should burn and illuminate and crackle merely dead embers and the sadness of ashes where once was flame. And then imagine a man coming into this place with some red and yellow tinsel and a paintpot; see him put his poor property sham of fire in the desolate hearth; see him paint the light of flame upon the walls; such is the real gospel of this silly "Citizen Sunday."

If there be a way; there is only one way of bringing warmth and light to the chamber of desolation, and that is to relight the central fires, to rekindle the sense of the mysteries in the heart of man. The highest wisdom, the only true wisdom that exists, is paradoxical. If a man would save his soul he must lose it, and, if our Mother Church would help the boot trade, it must forget that such a thing as the boot trade exists. By these paradoxes, and by paradoxes like to them, man gets salvation in body, soul, and spirit; there is no alternative, no other way open. A hundred bulls offered in sacrifice could not change the decree of death; and not by a hundred or a hundred thousand "social activities" shall society be improved one jot or one tittle. Look into the work of Thorold Rogers, the Radical politician and economist; you will see there that there was a time when the great mass of the English people lived, on the whole, in decent comfort and security, free from the gnawing and pitiful and shameful anxieties of the struggle for life—the struggles, as Mr. Wells expresses it, of man sinking slowly and surely in noisome slime, and sinking deeper for every effort of his to get free. This time was the Middle Ages, when the central fire was alight, when a great mystery was the foundation of all life, when the grand premises, being sound, the ultimate conclusions followed in sane and wholesome order.

The Christian Church came into existence when the world was full both of anarchy and tyranny. The two opposites seemed reconciled; the Roman Empire was governed by a tyrant who held power by the will of an armed mob. I am no historian; but I believe that every kind of social villainy, oppression, shame, and wrong was rampant in that world of Rome; the powers that reigned were as evil as any power well could be. And the Church, by its apostle, sent back the runaway slave to his master and impressed again and again on the faithful strict obedience to "the powers that be." It conquered this world of shame—not by social activities, interferences in the Senate, intrigues with the guards of the Emperor, nor by Citizen Sunday—but solely by the Lord's Day and by the Holy Mysteries thereon celebrated.

THE LAST OF THE GREAT VICTORIANS*

BY FRANK HARRIS

It was Matthew Arnold, I believe, who first pointed out the obvious fact that when Mr. Frederic Harrison called himself a Comtist he was merely showing that a disciple could be greater than his master. His loyalty to Comte was the one unreasonable devotion of a life directed and governed by reason. Among the great Victorians with every variety of genius, every kind of gift, this was Frederic Harrison's unique distinction; he served reason more simply and more consistently than any of his contemporaries; he was a surer guide than any of them in all the myriad public controversies and questions of his time.

Again and again he kept his head, and judged righteous judgment when the nation and its chosen guides all went amok; he was right about India and Ireland, Egypt and South Africa, about all our wars and all our conquests; he was right, too, about social reform and judicial reform and the reform of education and the Church; he has been more Radical than any Radical and yet he proclaims himself a Conservative; he loved Turner's pictures before Ruskin praised them and Browning's verses before he had become known as the husband of Elizabeth Barrett; he did more for the independence of Italy than any Englishman; he foresaw the growth of German militarism and industry and the decline of German letters and German philosophy; he kept from youth his admiration of France and French literature and French art; he has been justified in his praise as in his condemnation, in his fears as in his loves.

* Autobiographic Memoirs. By Frederic Harrison. (Macmillan and Co. 30s. net.)

His wisdom is astonishing: in '53 he was against the Crimean War, though he knew that the power of Russia was greatly exaggerated. A little later the terrible Indian Mutiny "roused up all my ingrained enthusiasm for real nationalities," he says, "and my loathing for all forms of race oppression by conquerors." He saw that English rule in India "has been very bad and is still not good;" with Munro, Metcalfe, and Malcolm, he declared that our rule is "a phantom and cannot last." He was a Parliamentary reformer before Bright in '58. In the Civil War of America in '60 he again chose the right side. In '61 he took part with the labourers in the first great Builders' strike for a day of nine hours. He worked for Polish independence, and distrusted Bismarck; in '63 he was sure that "Prussia is the real danger to European progress, not France." He used the same impartial judgment in British adventures; he did not hesitate to denounce our mistakes. He thundered against the war in New Zealand in '63, and the "abominable act of bombarding Kagosima in Japan;" the "infamous Jameson Raid," too, and its sequel in a useless, senseless war, which cost us hundreds of millions and placed the Afrikaner party in power.

His insight is often uncanny; he wrote in '63 wiser words than anything said by Carlyle or Matthew Arnold in their political tracts:—

I see the rise of a real People's party. We shall no longer have the cries of Political and Religious Toleration, Free Trade, Reform in Election Abuses—all remnants of sinful abuses—as the highest of our political ideas, but we shall wage war on the accursed barrier between the gentleman and the cad, the unholy assumptions of property, the arrogance of respectability, the fallacies which support world-old abuses which degrade man's moral nature—domestic serfdom, war, the idleness of the higher classes, the ignorance of the lower. From henceforth the contest between property and birth is closed. The really honourable contest is this moment beginning, numbers against property—that is, man against things, in which the true appeal to the individual's moral responsibility comes to light.

If to be right when all other men have gone wrong, to be always on the side of the angels, is a proof of wisdom—and surely there can be no higher or severer test—then Frederic Harrison is certainly among the wisest of men. He stands now as he has stood any time from 1850 to 1910 as the best exponent of the conscience of England in all public matters; an incomparably wiser guide than any of the politicians; more courageous, unselfish than any Churchman or Nonconformist.

His wisdom compels him to see even himself in true perspective. In his eightieth year he can look at himself from the outside, and put his finger unerringly on his own chief shortcomings. In childhood, he tells us, he never read the "Arabian Nights" or any German or Scandinavian fairytales; "this melancholy defect in my education must, I fear, be accountable for the prosaic insensibility to the mystical with which I am so often and so justly charged."

That may well be, in part at any rate, an explanation of the fact that Mr. Harrison is a Positivist with all things between heaven and earth ordered and labelled in his philosophy.

Though free of any mock modesty, he is not unduly puffed up: he is inclined to take a rather low estimate of his own work; he calls these memoirs "unconsidered jottings," and assumes that when he is gone "they will have little interest for any one outside my own family and my friends," and yet I have never in my life found two large volumes at once so interesting and pleasant to read, and so hard to summarise or describe. I want to quote pages in every chapter, wise thoughts on this and that and the other subject so admirably expressed, that it would be a shame not to give them in the author's own words.

Wisdom seems to have brought Frederic Harrison not only length of days and world-wide respect, but also happiness, or at least a happy contentment; the whole book is bathed in goodwill to men and a warm interest in life and joy in living. Frederic Harrison looks back with pleasure and forward without fear; he might be taken as Plato's ideal of a good citizen, or as Aristotle's perfect man: there is something of antique nobility in his exquisite balance of mind and serenity of soul.

One cannot help asking: What is the secret of this singular product? How came any man to grow so straightly, to get into such perfect relations with men and things; how is it possible to be wise and yet be happy; to be a fighter and yet beloved; to be pitiful and yet well off; to be honest and yet esteemed; to be old and still hopeful; to have missed all the great prizes of life and yet to rejoice in the race?

Of course he was gifted with a perfect constitution, and born in good circumstances. His father was a Scotchman of "severe economy," he tells us, "and abstemiousness;" his mother "religious and affectionate;" he had a happy childhood, which he describes charmingly, the wisest upbringing and an excellent education—the best of everything, in fact.

It would take too long to tell how he escaped the evils of a public school and University education in England. The masters had tried to teach him to write Latin and Greek verse, but he did not care for this "small gift;" no "vigorous mind," he thinks, "could endure such acrobatic feats; they explain why so many 'brilliant scholars' turn out to be ignorant and mindless men."

He condemns the "Public School system as a failure." The whole teaching is "wanton waste of time . . . for the discipline of the public school something may be said, especially by those who calmly ignore its secret evils." But he much prefers day-schools. Though a lover of cricket and hard exercise, he condemns the way compulsory games are forced on the boys at public schools without regard to health, and all forms of sport which involve cruelty, such as hunting, shooting, &c., have always been a matter of loathing to him.

His happy fortune or luck followed him all his life. He didn't marry till he was nearly forty, and then he married a cousin in her teens, a girl in love with him and in perfect sympathy with his ideals. His married life has been one of unbroken happiness.

Mr. Harrison's second volume is not so enthralling as the first, which is devoted to his period of growth and development, always the most interesting and characteristic time of life. When a man has reached maturity we judge him by his works.

But this second volume contains three astonishing chapters—one on the politicians and statesmen whom Mr. Harrison has known, another on the men of letters, and a third in which he contrasts the men of the past with the men of our time. Here, if anywhere, we shall find him at full stretch.

Let me hasten to say at once that his judgments of politicians seem to me absolutely impartial and fairly conclusive. Sir Robert Peel, Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, Disraeli, Gladstone, Robert Lowe, Sir W. Harcourt, W. E. Forster are all classified in his pages with scientific accuracy.

The lawyers, too, are treated in the same masterly way. But when we come to the great men of letters Mr. Harrison's fallibility, we think, with all deference, begins to show itself. The truth is the poets and writers are incomparably greater men than the lawyers and politicians. It is a thousand times harder, therefore, to classify Browning, Huxley, or Matthew Arnold than it is to classify Peel, Gladstone, or Disraeli, for the poets and writers belong to that strange class called immortal; they are fixed stars in the heaven and grow brighter with the centuries. Whereas the politicians—street-lamps, so to speak, of the time—are inconspicuous when seen from a distance. Think of the space filled in his time by Canning, the greatest Prime Minister whom England has known since Chatham, and the little druggist's apprentice, Keats. Yet who does not see to-day that the name of Keats is a thousand times more important than the name of Canning?

Mr. Harrison puts Tennyson "at the head of all the poets of the nineteenth century since the death of Shelley." He holds Robert Browning to have been "the most original and the most sane spirit of the Victorian writers," but there was "no music" in his poetry. Swinburne, on the other hand, had "the luscious music in him, but no deep or original thought;" and so forth and so on.

Now it seems to me that hardly any of these judgments will stand. Surely every one must see to-day what some of us have seen for the last quarter of a century—that Robert Browning is far and away the greatest English poet of the nineteenth century, the greatest poet indeed in England since Shakespeare. "Glorious Robert Browning!" Surely, too, every one would place Swinburne far above Tennyson?

Mr. Harrison asserts that we have no poets or writers to compare with these Victorians: declares we have not got "a sonnet to put beside 'The Ode to a Skylark' or 'The Grecian Urn';" no essay that Lamb or Coleridge would be proud to sign." This statement is very unfair. In all the preceding centuries there is nothing to equal "The Ode to a Skylark" or "The Grecian Urn," and yet I know a couple of sonnets in our own day by a poet unknown to Mr. Harrison which I would put beside either of them, and as for essays, I could find some that will be read in English when the best of Coleridge's prose will be forgotten.

Frederic Harrison reminds me on every page of Marcus Aurelius or of Socrates; there is something, I mean, of the antique world, something pre-Christian in his wisdom, in his happiness, even in the perfect health which has not known a day's illness in eighty years. Christianity, with its repentances and renunciations, its sadness, its soul-searching; chivalry with its extravagant, noble loyalties; modern life with its insatiate desires and demands, have never ruffled the equanimity of this tranquil spirit.

"De vivis nil nisi verum," as he would say himself. I met Frederic Harrison years ago, received kindly encouragement from him, tinged naturally with the superiority of the senior; I was always interested in his astounding balance of nature, always on the alert to welcome any new political pronouncement from him; but he made no deep, no ineffaceable impression on me.

He was profoundly religious in his own way; while still at Oxford in the early 'fifties he writes:—

I feel that there are many things defacing the earth which would be removed if men knew more of them, and which need a witness and a narrator; that monstrous ignorance exists because most men have no time to dispel it; that much remains to be found out, if men were not searching for something else. I do hold to a strong belief that I have some thoughts that are right, and I feel a strong impulse to let others know them.

And when sixty years later, "at the close of a long, happy, busy life," he composes his "Epitaph," he declares that—

All our mighty achievements are being hampered and often neutralised, all our difficulties are being doubled, and all our moral and social diseases are being aggravated by this supreme and dominant fact—that we have suffered our religion to slide from us, and that in effect our age has no abiding faith in any religion at all. The urgent task of our time is to recover a religious faith as a basis of life, both personal and social. I feel that I have done this, in my own way, for myself, and am closing my quiet life in resignation, peace, and hope.

And yet, his peculiar faith does not appeal to us, his hopes leave us cold. It has been enough for him, this vague French belief in humanity; it does not satisfy us. Already this one is seeking to be a superman, and that one with clearer knowledge something—

. . . For aye removed
From the developed brute; a god though in the germ.

Time is in travail with a new fulfilment; here new religions are springing up; there old spiritualities. We are all waiting; some in fear; some full of hope:

Heartily know
When the half-gods go
The gods arrive.

The inappeasable longing for certainty Frederic Harrison has never felt; he has contented himself with life and what it offered, and when we look at his work we are conscious of the irremediable shortcoming. Yes, he was wise; yes, he was brave; yes, he was true; yes, he was happy and busy and healthy, and yet—

What has he left? Ten or twelve good sound volumes, like loaves of bread; but no word hot from the heart, nothing to quicken the soul, no promise that heals, no hope that inspires, no love that is as water to the thirsty, as balm to the weary and heavy-laden, no sacred height of renunciation, no rose of supernal bliss. . . .

And yet it is the extraordinary alone that lives; the soul is content only with ecstasy.

THE FUTURE OF THE TERRITORIAL FORCE—I.

By COLONEL G. P. RANKEN

THE article by Mr. Turner in THE ACADEMY of October 7th, and the letter in the following issue by Colonel Quin, on the future of the Territorial Force, have called attention to the difficulty of filling the ranks which is now facing Territorial Commanding Officers, County Associations, and the Army Council, and one which must be overcome if the Territorial Army is to continue to exist as a real and not merely as a paper force. The shortage of numbers already exists. On January 1st of this year the force was nearly 50,000 short of establishment, and it seems probable that this deficiency will be largely increased as the engagements of the old Volunteers and of the first batches of four-year men terminate.

The root of the whole matter lies, as both Mr. Quin and

Mr. Turner point out, in the insufficiency of funds. If the country desires an efficient Territorial Army kept up to full strength it must be prepared to pay for it, but closely dovetailed into the question of numbers is the question of training, so closely indeed that it is impossible to consider the one without considering the other.

If the masses in this country realised the necessity for a Territorial Army, and if they realised also—which they certainly do not—that such an Army, and, indeed, any Army, requires long and careful training, and must be properly equipped and mobilised to render it a force of any real value, funds would be forthcoming at once, and the Territorial Army would soon become a force of which any nation might well be proud. Unfortunately the masses do not possess this knowledge, and their leaders are careful not to enlighten them.

Lord Ashby St. Legers doubtless enunciated the intentions of the Cabinet when he stated in the House of Lords that the Government would only accept compulsory service in the event of a great national disaster. Of what use compulsory service would be under such circumstances, or whether it would then be worth while putting it into force he did not explain. But apparently we must look on compulsory service as being out of consideration for the present. Lord Haldane, speaking at Birmingham a few days ago, certainly hinted at the possibility of that solution later; but he obviously referred to the indefinite future, and hitherto his principle seems to have been that, with a strong Navy to protect our shores, our Territorials can always rely on the six months necessary for mobilisation and the perfecting of their training. But whenever the question of the inadequacy of our Navy to protect our overseas commerce, our Colonies and our food supplies is raised, we are told that our strong Territorial force would enable our Navy to be detached from our shores. In the face of such conflicting statements, we must be excused if we fail to understand what are really the views of the present Government.

So also when our weakness as an ally is brought to notice, we are informed that we have an expeditionary force of 70,000 men ready to leave our shores whenever required; but in the same breath we are informed that this force will, of course, remain at home to guard us while our Territorials are completing their training. It is all indeed very mystifying.

The views of the Socialists and the Labour Leaders are more pronounced, if not more illuminating: a very large section is against Militarism on the ground, among others, that every disciplined man trained to the use of arms is a potential weapon in the hands of Government for use on behalf of Capital to frustrate strikes. And doubtless this objection applies equally to the Territorial Army and to Compulsory Service. Others take a different view and dismiss the question by an appeal ad hominem. Speaking last winter on the subject of Compulsory Training, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald is reported to have said, "They have a few Generals, Commanders-in-Chief, and others, knocking about and delivering speeches as to what a comfortable land this would be if every one became a private soldier and touched his cap every time some one passed who was not a private," and doubtless he voices the views of many of his followers. Others of the Socialists look to the international fraternity of labour to bring about general strikes in the event of war and so render war impossible and Territorial and other armies unnecessary. It is needless to point out that these men have read European history, even of the last fifty years, with little profit, have neither experience of war nor knowledge of what constitutes an efficient Army nor of what differentiates an Army from a mob.

Mr. Blatchford, who has experience and knowledge, holds very different views—very refreshing to read—and so also do the German Socialists. Herr Bebel, who still remembers his experiences in the War of 1870, in a recent speech, after dilating on the iniquity of war and its horrors, finished by telling his hearers that, in the event of war taking place, their duty was to throw themselves, heart and soul, into the contest in order to bring it as speedily as possible to a conclusion by crushing their adversary.

Such are the different views which animate German Socialists and English Socialists. The former are patriots first and Socialists afterwards. The German Socialist lion is perfectly ready to lie down with the English Socialist lamb, but the lamb must be—inside. It is not surprising that such different views should be held by the men of the two nations professing what they claim to be the same creed. Both Germany and France retain the memory of what war at their door means. Nearly all Frenchmen and the majority of Germans have passed through the ranks, and they know the training that is necessary to turn a mob, however enthusiastic, into a trained army, and the forethought and organisation that is necessary to make it effective. Our masses have neither this experience, nor have they this knowledge.

But while such views are enunciated by the Cabinet and held by the masses, it is obvious that it will not be easy to loosen the public purse-strings, but there is one aspect of the matter that should appeal to men of a business nation whether in favour of a Territorial Army or not. Money spent on an object which it does not attain is money wasted, and it is much better either to cease the expenditure altogether or to increase it to a sum sufficient to attain the desired end, and, if we can only convince the public that the present allotment for the Territorials is so insufficient that the practical return we get for it in the shape of an effective Army is nil, there is every hope that the grant will be increased to an amount adequate to make the Territorial Army a real live force, and one on which we could rely to fulfil the purpose for which it is intended. The last Budget allotment for the Territorial Army—some two-and-three-quarter millions—works out for the effective strength at about £10 a head, and were the force at its full strength the increased cost would be so little more (as, of course, much of the annual outlay, such as the pay of the permanent staff, the upkeep of drill-halls and rifle-ranges, and the cost of camps, would be but little affected) that the cost would probably be reduced to but little over £9 per head. Surely a very small amount when the cost of the German peace establishment, exclusive of Colonial troops and pensions, works out at the rate of about £64 8s. a head! The comparison is, perhaps, not quite fair, but, at any rate, Germany gets a very real and tangible return for her money. Probably even Lord Haldane would hardly contend that we are getting at present any real return for our money in the shape of an effective force, except on paper.

The shortage of numbers in the Territorial ranks has already been alluded to. The deficiency of horses is even worse. One horse is all that is provided for every five (5) men of the mounted branches. Boots, the most important item in a foot-soldier's equipment, are largely deficient: so also is camp equipage. Transport, except for a few lorries, is non-existent—wagons and harness have still to be provided. Sufficient ammunition is possibly in store, but much of it would in the first instance have to be used in giving larger numbers of the Territorials preliminary instruction on the range before they could reasonably be intrusted with their rifles in the field.

In the year 1909, sixteen Territorial battalions failed to make themselves efficient in musketry: of these, seven failed to put any men through the standard test, and the remaining nine failed to put 50 per cent. of their numbers through the course. Three of these battalions fired no ammunition, and of the rest, the average number of rounds per man varied from five to fifty-two.

In the year 1908-09, 106,651 men qualified in musketry, and 96,768 did not qualify.

In the year 1909-10, 126,912 qualified and 68,673 failed to qualify, and in addition some 18,453 "trained" men and 24,640 recruits qualified in the secondary test, mainly with the miniature rifle.

1,520 officers and 21,980 N.C.O.'s, rank and file, were absent from training in 1909, and Mr. Turner's figures show that in 1910 23,736 men did not attend camp, and 75,185 attended only for the shorter period.

With such figures before us, what can we think when we are told of "fourteen divisions of the Territorial Army possessing the complete organisation of a military force in every respect," and of "a complete military organisation capable of taking the field with transport and all other necessary accessories"?

THE HILL OF MONTMARTRE

AN autumn evening lights the crest of the Hill of Montmartre. Below, strange and grand in its silence, Paris lies, an opal set in grey silver, through whose luminous textures a thousand mysterious lights leap and die away. On the Butte, above the noise and turmoil of the city, one wanders at will in another land, the real Montmartre, which is in Paris, but not of it. An amber sky bestows its evening benediction as the night comes slowly up from the Seine.

Once a green hill, upon which were picturesquely perched one or two windmills, the Butte to-day is a wonderful region of illusion and romance, thanks to its distinctive air of aloofness, and an immigration of colour and verve from the Latin Quarter. Here art, poverty, vice, and religion go hand in hand. Little old-fashioned houses, shops, and inns cling with their gardens to the hillside in the narrow winding lanes and streets, and lie cheek by jowl with many a six-storied building or iron-gated mansion. They keep their secrets well, these stones of Montmartre: what stories could they not tell, which for humour would outrival those of de Maupassant, or for irony and sadness those of Anatole France! Artist, anarchist, poet, and priest come and go; some are broken on Fortune's wheel by the heartache of hopes unfulfilled, of work unfinished. The stones watch silent, immutable, and only the leaves in the lanes hear the whispering of the wind.

The guardian of the Butte is the Cathedral of the Sacré-Cœur. Seen from the Boulevard below, its huge Byzantine outlines look like a white fortress above the town, and as one climbs up the numberless steps of the Hill it seems to come no nearer. How many of the artist-dwellers who climb to their beds each evening, gaze upon it, and think of that other hill they are climbing, at the top of which, though ever the same distance away, gleams glorious the Panthéon! Were this simile placed before the average Montmartrois, he would probably shrug his shoulders and smile. Your struggling Bohemian is generally too polite to let you be concerned about his troubles; albeit, should he sell you a chanson, or a copy of something in the Louvre, he may not hesitate to give you a couple of francs short of your change, presuming that you are fresh to Paris and have but a vague idea of the currency. You probably hasten to assure him that you appreciate the value of money, and having stripped him of every argument, will finally discover that he has revolutionary ideas, and is a firm believer in a poor man practising, where he can, le droit du vol.

It is easy to understand. His ascetic face, marked with lines of care, his disreputable slouch-hat and still more disreputable trousers, the latter hanging on his attenuated limbs so loosely that the wind flaps them about, speak eloquently of the same sturm und drang that Millet, Audran, de Nerval, and a host of others knew; the many trappings of the Latin Quarter, the breadless days of the Square St. Pierre. His face, if sad, is dignified, and it will still light up with a smile of enthusiasm at times; as, for instance, when he meets you again in some neighbouring brasserie or café, and insists on buying you a drink and offering you a dirty and broken cigarette. Maybe he cannot pay for what he orders, but that is his affair; you are his guest, and he leaves you at length with a lordly wave of the hand and a renewed smile. On the morrow he will call again on the landlord, and offer to clean his windows or amuse the children. His methods are peculiar certainly; but then, is he not a Bohemian and a Montmartrois? Yet more gentlemen may be found in this careless community than on the Grands Boulevards.

Turn for a moment into the Cathedral. No service is being held, but in the soft light here and there worshippers are kneeling. Some nuns are close by. The murmur of prayer rises and falls. For a second the sound ceases, but comes again across the dim aisles, where before the statues of Our Lady and St. Joseph tapers are burning. The immensity of pillar, arch, and middle distance whose atmosphere and imposing grandeur seem to enfold us, is surely the home and mother of Montmartre, the home that shelters and the mother who soothes. The architecture of the Sacré-Cœur symbolises the meeting of East and West, pagan and Christian, just as everywhere in this vicinity one is reminded of the merging of ignorance and knowledge, beauty and sin. How wonderful are these airs of reverence and adoration, how mysterious, poignant, and compelling, where every heart must be an open book.

It has grown darker. Slowly we make our way through the narrow streets, towards the twinkling lights of Paris, half reluctant to leave these peaceful haunts for the realm of omnibuses and street-cries. In the Boulevard the cabarets echo with the sound of laughter, violin, and guitar. A café-concert announces in big lettering a new revue. The wheel of the Moulin-Rouge, brilliant with many lights, revolves steadily. The place itself looks inviting and prosperous. In the Chat-Noir the voice of the presiding genius rings out in a drinking-song. Presently he stops, chaffs some one in his audience, and adds "I'm thirsty," amidst much laughter. We know him well. Have we not paid three francs to be insulted by him, and enjoyed it immensely? He is a sort of Brazenhead, from whose lips much wit and truth escape. His lungs are brazen, likewise his manners, but he causes no offence. On the other hand, what would the Chat-Noir be without him? Night after night he keeps up his running fire of witty comment, his little lectures, and his chansons. At times he walks up and down the room, smoking a big pipe and pouring ridicule on his audience and the world in general, now taking up an interruption, now castigating the Premier. We move out of range of his voice, wondering if he is ever glad to climb the hill of Montmartre, and smoke his big pipe up there in rest and contemplation! It would be a welcome respite from a strenuous life like his.

Montmartre!—home of la chanson and les cabarets artistiques et littéraires—we bid you good night! The great cathedral looks down upon us as it watches the Hill. We lingered long under its shadow away from the noonday sun; and at St. Joseph's Rest we ate our chicken and drank our wine. Already, we feel, we are part of Montmartre. Arnold loved the moonlit gardens of Oxford, and Landor his Florentine cyclamen; we are citizens of Montmartre, and the Spirit of the Hill walks beside us.

REVIEWS

VERSE: A BIRTH, SOME RE-BIRTHS, AND A RESURRECTION

The Cup of Quietness. By ALFRED HAYES. (Methuen and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Bertrud, and other Dramatic Poems. By the Author of "A Hymn to Dionysus." (Edinburgh: William Brown.)

New Poems. By KATHERINE TYNAN. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 3s. 6d. net.)

Survivals. By R. CHARLES MOIR. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)

By the Way of the Gate. By CHARLES CAYZER. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co. Two Vols. 10s. net.)

HERE are six volumes of contemporary verse, picked out, we might almost say, at random, and the first thing that impresses us is their general high quality. There is not a failure among them, and yet only two are by authors whose reputation is anything like widely established. It is with one of those rare thrills of expectation that we take up the slender new volume that bears the name of Alfred Hayes. It is actually sixteen years since the last book with that superscription appeared, though Mr. Hayes' proven song was such that no diffidence need have imposed upon it so long a silence. Indeed, the author of "The Last Crusade" and "The March of Man" gave promise of even greater things than perhaps any of his melodious contemporaries and confrères who have since eclipsed him in gentle notoriety. So it was of "The March of Man" we thought as we took up this little green book, and, laying it down, still for the promise of that earlier volume we sighed. But "The Cup of Quietness" has been filled in that "Vale of Arden" from whose green retirement last the poet spoke. Well, at least Mr. Hayes has not overwritten himself, and the twenty-six short poems that go to compact this "Cup" are all fruit of an excellent vineyard. We get here and there an echo of that old prophetic note, as in "The Age of Iron," but chiefly his vision now is of gentler things, and he sings of the eternal mystery of love in "One Thing Wanting":—

Love is a hunger never here appeased,
A question never answered; vainly speech
Pursueth: long ere love's intent be seized,
'Tis out of reach.

I fear no disenchantment; I would prove
That here things seem less precious than they are;
My faith is, that the hearts of those I love
Are greater far

Than thought can comprehend, or tongue express;
If death reveal love's truth, then I rejoice
To die; meanwhile a silent wistfulness
Is love's best voice;

or of the twin mystery of death, in the "Elegy"—

O all bright things that knew him not, be glad;
O birds, that tune your love-notes o'er his grave,
Sing sweeter still; he would not wish you sad;
Fling your full hearts across
The silence of his death, that Earth may have
No feeling of her loss.

Since he has chosen his peaceful seclusion, may we not admit that he still sings sweetly and with charm?—though it was for something other than these "woodnotes wild" that we once trained our ears to him.

The author of "A Hymn to Dionysus" is, we understand, Lady Margaret Sackville, who has already claimed the public ear, both as an anthologist and on account of polished and distinctive verse of her own. The present volume—which is a glory of paper and type—consists of four dramatic poems, strictly speaking, with a short piece in blank verse, called "The Pythoness," and a proem. The authoress betrays considerable dramatic power and a remarkably Greek spirit. These poems are frankly pagan, and one could almost imagine in reading "Tereus" that it was a verse translation from some lesser-known Greek poet. The poem which lends its title to the volume is perhaps the best. It is essentially dramatic in conception and expression; is lighted by some fine flashes, as where Gerta asks Bertrud if it is from the heart that she forgives her, and Bertrud replies—

You cared no more
Than the wind cares for the leaf it whirls away
For my heart once—and the climax of Bertrud's changed disposition is a fine piece of psychology. Still, we like Lady Margaret best in lyric vein—as, for instance, in the Swinburnian chorus which concludes the first part of "The Wooing of Dionysus":—

Now that a warm wind lightens and passes
With trailing pinions through the green grasses,
And the ice is snapped and the glad streams flow—
What should I do then with love, I pray ye,
With love that hinders and would delay me,
Whose voice is solemn, whose feet are slow?
O love, if you will, come with me a-dancing,
Where shadow and sun through the new leaves glancing.
Mock at joy which is kin to woe.
Ah! but ruinous love's endeavour
To bind and blind and hold me for ever,
Who am I to be cheated so?
Nay, my lover—pardon and speed me,
Let me run wherever the wind shall lead me;
Speed at my side, though your heart reprove me—
Follow and blame—but I pray you love me,
Love me enough, in the year's new dawning—
Love me enough to let me go!

Mrs. Katherine Tynan Hinkson has the lyric gift to a remarkable degree. There is about her best work that inspired simplicity which is complete satisfaction, but which at the merely imitative hands of the uninspired is sheer banality. She has constituted herself the priestess of sacred maternity, nor do we know any poetess worthier of the office. Her wonderful sympathy, tenderness, and imaginative grace are continually interpreting afresh the beautifully symbolic figure of Mother Mary. Indeed, we whom this time-honoured conception leaves cold perhaps can at least catch some intimation of its tremendous appeal to the women of Catholic countries after reading some of "Katherine Tynan's" tender little poems. Take the first of these "New Poems" as an example. It is entitled "The Little Ghost," and describes how the "little son of seven" escaped from "the nurseries of heaven" and came to comfort the mother who had lost him. She is shown the lovely picture of "the little sleepy children" lying "'twixt Mary's arm and breast," and her heart is consoled.

We have just one small protest to make here. A little while ago Mrs. Hinkson gave us a really lovely and mystical little poem, "Sheep and Lambs," which ever so delicately conveys the Divine suggestions of a flock of footsore lambs. We do not hesitate to say that no future "Golden Treasury" can be excused for omitting it. Very good; but why does not Mrs. Hinkson leave it to its deserts instead of warming up the charming thought in an irritating way in this volume? There is one poem which is practically a repetition of it, and a distinctly poorer version at that; while the figure is reintroduced into at least two other poems. No more delightful example of her deft work could be given than these verses from "The Green Lady":—

She comes all unbidden, with wild eyes hidden;
Veils of mist cover her with a green dress.
Where her foot passes the dead under the grasses
Ask: Is it time? And she answers: Yes.

I have not seen her, but the grass is greener
For the white feet of her that glide and float.
I but divine her by a something finer,
Wilder and gayer in the blackbird's note.

To my highest chamber her white feet clamber.
Oh, the Spring, Spring's in my house and joys I lost.
In the grey twilight, the soft light, the shy light,
Comes and goes like a mist of green, a gentle ghost.

We imagine "Survivals" to be Mr. Moir's maiden volume of verse. If we are correct, then Mr. Moir is to be congratulated on exhibiting few of the solecisms that so frequently distinguish the apprentice to the Muse. But Mr. Moir's Muse is a very staid and sober one, a little too sparing, it may be, with her cup of divine intoxication. It is nearly all reflective verse, and there is little of that lyric spontaneity which is the hall-mark of the poet born. We should have liked a leaven of it in this volume; it would have saved it from a certain impression of dulness which somehow we feel the workmanship of these poems does not merit. In saying this we hang our head, of course, before the chilling dignity of Mr. Moir's proem. But young men really shouldn't write proems with a moral for the critic. The title "Survivals" belongs to eight more or less connected poems in the "In Memoriam" metre, but the ancient subject of Spring has lent most inspiration to Mr. Moir's lyre in "April Snows." "A Bach Fugue" has also some fine passages, as witness:—

Like to a temple of silver white
The soaring pipes of the organ stood,
Cradling the sleep of each music sprite
That shouts in metal, or throbs in wood,
Flute of the bird, and the thunder's shake,
That wait for the master's knock to wake.

We feel that Mr. Cayzer's volumes merit far more space than we can here give them. They represent something of a "collected edition," we suppose, some of the pieces dating from as far back as 1888. The second volume consists of three dramas, two of which—"Donna Marina" and "Undine"—manifest considerable dramatic power. The other, "David and Bathshua," suffers from over-comprehensiveness. Why Mr. Cayzer thought it necessary to give "potted scenes" from nearly all David's life previous to his meeting with Bathshua it is difficult to understand. The dramatic interest really begins with Act III., Scene 3. previous to which, practically speaking, the play has ample opportunity for a very conclusive damnation. But it is the other volume which reveals Mr. Cayzer most truly. From this we could quote appreciatively to the extent of several columns. It exhibits Mr. Cayzer as a poet of no mean power and of undoubted skill. If there is not quite the note of greatness in his work there is at least distinction, and we should not ourselves hesitate to place him at least with some of the distinguished poets who were considered as being "in the running" when the Laureateship last lay vacant. But let us briefly sum up and give examples. "Ad Astra" is a poem of clxxix stanzas, whose theme is "The Quest of Eden." Here is Stanza cxiii:—

Thus every sorrow hides a central joy,
And with all suffering and pain'd under-song
God mingles a bright tempering of alloy
That more than compensates the seeming wrong;
For to the maim'd Life's holiest joys belong—
A keener sensibility to bliss,
A finer insight into all that is.

Of the Love Poems "The Jewels of Dawn and of Dusk" is tempting to quote. The lines "A spirit hath flown from my hearth" are a genuine lyrical cry, and the sonnet "Love in Chains" is little short of perfect both as sonnet and as love poem. The songs that occur in the dramas are almost uniformly good; there is a very fine "Hymn of Empire," and a delightful poem "To Winifred (aged eighteen months)." We might do worse than take an example from what is so painfully often a refuge of banality, the piously inept and the revoltingly sentimental. Mr. Cayzer is never guilty of any of these things, and it is to us an excellent test that his "Sacred Poems" are so unaffectedly spiritual and yet so faithfully poetical. His "Hymn of Praise," the strong and simple "Morning Hymn," and the "Hymn of Sleep" are all worthy of note. But we submit the following short poem as being in itself evidence of a spirit and workmanship of very high quality:—

THE TEMPLE OF ART.

The Temple of Art lies open evermore,
And this the inscription set above the door—
*Faint not, nor falter, ye that enter here,
The deathless dead surround you everywhere.
All that life gives, they gave—in sacrifice,
The Deity demands no lesser price.*
In blood-red letters the brief legend runs:
And one man enters in a thousand suns.

We recommend all who have not lost interest in the welfare of our English lyre to obtain and sample these volumes for themselves.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ART

Water-Colour. By NEVILLE LYTTON. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. LYTTON set out modestly to discourse on the art of water-colour painting; what he has actually done is to produce a well-considered and unusually suggestive essay upon the purposes and essential meaning of Art generally. We all remember the query which Mr. Kipling places in the mouth of the enemy of mankind—"It's pretty, but is it Art?"—and this in effect is what Mr. Lytton, after some preliminary words on the aims and technique of water-colour painting, sets himself to answer.

The difficulty, of course, arises, as it has always done, from the absence of satisfactory definitions. If there were an acceptable definition of Art, it would be easier to decide whether any given work crossed the mysterious line which divides craftsmanship from Art. But this definition has never been formulated—at least in such a guise as to command universal acceptance. It is true that we have gone a certain distance on the way. Every thoughtful person recognises that a "School of Art" is a hopeless misnomer; we all admit that, however highly such a school may raise the standard of craftsmanship, Art in any real sense is incommunicable. Art is from within; it is something which the artist has brought into the world—a power, a gift, if you will, that he can exercise, but cannot pass on; a bow of Ulysses, which none but the hero can bend. The real artist must, moreover, be something of a prophet, a seer; the occasions on which the mantle of the prophet can be assumed by the disciple must be so few as to be negligible. And this brings us to a point which Mr. Lytton has stated with unusual happiness. Art, he recognises, is on a similar plane with religion. You can no more have literal realism in the one than in the other. Realism is death to both, for the philosophic or religious truth—that is, the external and even supernatural message which it is the business of both to communicate—is not expressible in terms of ordinary language or of the familiar objects which surround us. Mr. Lytton points justly to the Prima Vera of Botticelli as a strong instance of his meaning:—

In that picture everything actually is untrue. The plants are arranged in a formal, unnatural way, the trees are placed in a quite artificial semicircle, the draperies fall into a series of decorative lines, and have no tangibility or substance. The shapes of the forms are hardly human; yet, nevertheless, that picture contains the Spring.

The Spring intoxication, as he says, is embodied and explained in the Prima Vera. The picture is in essence more modern, more advanced, more realistic in the proper sense than any Spring landscape by Monet, with effects of sunlight on green trees.

This leads Mr. Lytton to emphasise the fact that the movement for actual realism in Art coincided almost exactly with scientific criticism of religious beliefs. Thus Monet wanted to show that Poussin and Claude did not paint Nature as she really was, just as Huxley, Darwin, and Lyell desired to demonstrate that the creation of the world was not truthfully described in the first chapter of Genesis. So he continues:—

Now is the time to realise that actual truth is worth nothing either in religion or Art. It may be true that Christ was not the Son of a Virgin, yet the Christian religion was the apotheosis of purity, humility, and reverence. With the disappearance of the belief in the Christian religion there is a corresponding disappearance of these qualities. This is disastrous to the human race.

Similarly he shows that though Claude and Poussin's trees may not be actually true to Nature, they do express the inner meaning of landscape as a laborious copy of Nature very seldom does. Art, then, is not concerned merely with scientific truth; the artist is a man with a message which he must deliver as best he can. The artist is concerned with the inner eye, not the physical eye. He cannot dispense with technique, but technique is within the reach of everybody, and the vision of the inner eye is the prerogative of a chosen few.

Mr. Lytton is as well acquainted with the technique of his subject as he is with its artistic side. It is inevitable, perhaps, that some of his statements will excite controversy, but in general we can confidently recommend him as an admirable guide. He is indeed an enthusiast, and has studied the possibilities of water-colour painting as few men have done; drawing a sharp distinction between the results legitimately obtainable by water-colour and oils respectively—a distinction which in these days requires to be strongly emphasised. Incidentally he has a fling at a form of water-colour painting which is now very popular, and which he names "garden water-colours." It is easier to deduce his meaning from the spirit of what he writes about this than from the actual letter, but in the main we believe him to be correct. The interest of a "garden water-colour" is altogether too diffused; the aim is to indicate precisely the different kinds of flowers and herbage composing the subject, and consequently there is no central point upon which the artist can—so to speak—focus his message. It is, in fact, a kind of picture through which no message can be delivered. Mr. Lytton is more lucid in his analysis of the so-called "Oriental water-colours" (to be sure, the fault in them is much more readily discernible), which he seems to select as an instance of that intolerable trickery in Art—or so-called Art—which has made the fortunes of more than one prominent painter in this decadent age. But we dare not permit ourselves to enlarge on this sore subject. Let us say again that Mr. Lytton's book is one that everybody who has any interest or ambitions in art should study and master to the utmost of his ability. If he cannot grasp Mr. Lytton's meaning he is no true artist; if he can do so, let him take heart and go on his way rejoicing.

"THE EAST A-CALLIN"

The Surgeon's Log. Being Impressions of the Far East. By J. JOHNSTON ABRAHAM. Illustrated. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

DR. JOHNSTON ABRAHAM and his friend the Pathologist were supposed to share a flat together; but we gather that the Pathologist's impedimenta made the share a very one-sided affair indeed:—

A microtome, two incubators, bottles of every shape and size—mostly with German labels—flasks, two microscopes under bell-jars, bundles of slides and boxes of coverslips, test-tubes, and Petri dishes, books and monographs, on chairs, on the table, on the floor—anywhere. Any space not occupied by these the Pathologist and I share.

When, however, the Pathologist suggested keeping four "control" guinea-pigs, our author very wisely put his foot down.

The Pathologist, in spite of the impedimenta of his profession, and his longing for guinea-pigs, deserves a word of praise. He it was who overhauled our author, and, after a careful diagnosis, suggested that the best thing his friend could do was to take a voyage, a modified rest-cure combined with the light duties of a ship's surgeon. We should like to thank the Pathologist for his excellent advice, because it resulted in his friend writing an extremely fascinating account of his experiences in the Far East. We have had many travel-books, but few that come up to the standard of Dr. Abraham's vivacious account. It is vivid and humorous from start to finish. The reader must be a dull and jaded soul who in reading these pages does not himself step on board ship and make friends with the Captain, known as the "Old Man," with the Doc., the Chief, "No. 1 Chinaman," and the other people who make up the good company of the ss. Clytemnestra.

The "Old Man," who could bellow on the bridge to some purpose when any of the crew required waking up, was extremely stout. He yearned to decrease his bulk, and with that object in view had a habit of taking a two-mile walk on deck with the Doc. Our author writes: "His idea was to reduce his weight, mine to get some exercise. But I had cooled off. He rolled so in his walk that we constantly impinged, a fact of which he was blissfully unconscious, being sixteen stone, and having the elasticity of an india-rubber man. I, on the contrary, was battered."

The Doc.'s medical treatment was not put to a very severe test during this voyage. On one occasion the Chinese cook treated tropical ringworm, from which he was suffering, with blue-black ink. The Doc. added sulphur ointment and carbolic. This concoction proved so efficacious that all the other Chinese on board wanted ink, with the result that "the ship's supply soon began to show signs of exhaustion owing to the unexpected demand!"

When the Clytemnestra reached Japan she was boarded by no less than eleven Japanese doctors, "in gold-braided uniform, looking like diminutive railway guards." The Chief sarcastically described the whole affair as an example of "European ideas overdone." It was the duty of these Japanese doctors to feel pulses, look at extended tongues, and to prod the Chinamen to see if they had the plague.

Our author does not seem to be over-impressed with Japan; but then it is scarcely fair to judge Japan by her ports. The Doc. is highly amused at seeing a Japanese man in elastic-side boots, and remarks that "in England one associates them with the Nonconformist conscience." We are glad to find that Dr. Abraham denounces Japan's imitation of the West. He writes:—

The Japanese, though they have such exquisite taste in everything pertaining to their own methods of living and furnishing, when they begin to copy European models, seem to lose all their good taste, and manage to imitate the very worst traits of the models, missing the best completely. As a consequence houses built and furnished in Japan on European lines are inimitable examples of how not to do it.

But the Doc., for all his terse criticism, comes under the spell of the Japanese woman, while Horner, one of the mates, falls desperately in love with a little Japanese lady named Ponta.

From Japan we are taken to Java. We should think that in Java the possibility of a railway strike is very remote. It is the passengers who have good reason to grumble. Our author writes:—

The trains in Java are very comfortable, and run at regular intervals during the day, but never at night. The engine-drivers are natives, and the Dutch do not care to trust them in the dark. Consequently, when night comes all trains stop at the nearest station, and the passengers put up for the night, in the Government passagrahan, or hotel, till the next morning, when they resume their leisurely journey onwards.

There is a glamour about this book that is difficult, if not impossible, to describe; but we can promise its readers a most fascinating voyage from Liverpool to Port Said, across the Indian Ocean to Pinang, and from Pinang to Japan, Java, and Macassar. We have heard "the East a-callin'" in these pages, and felt "the long, calm days, the quiet deck, the hot kiss of the tropical sun, and the soft velvet of the tropical night, the warmth of colour and costume denied one's eyes in Puritan England." If the Pathologist does insist on keeping four guinea-pigs, we hope the Doc. will take another voyage to the Far East. If he does so, then we wish him bon voyage and another book as delightful as the one before us.

F. HADLAND DAVIS.

BUSINESS AND GENIUS

Inspired Millionaires: A Study of the Man of Genius in Business. By GERALD STANLEY LEE. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

ANY man who in this age of huge accumulations of wealth and huge monopolies of commerce comes forward to tell us that the assembling of great riches is natural and right, and that in the hands of the right men they will lead to our social betterment, is bound to secure a great deal of attention:—

If the passion for making money is the passion that people actually have in our modern life, the next vision for us is going to be some way of making what we actually have beautiful. The beauty that builds the destiny of a civilisation always lies next neighbour to its greatest gift. If it is true that wealth is our greatest gift . . . the time is bound to come when we shall see that the wealth that comes to us . . . is holding in its hand the liberties of the world.

Such is the beginning of Mr. Stanley Lee's creed, and the inspired millionaire, the man of genius in business, is to be its high priest. Mr. Lee believes that commerce is not vile, and that scientific inventions do not represent a decadence from the best parts of any civilisation, ancient or modern. He is a firm individualist, we need hardly say, though not of the brutal, "get-on-or-get-out" type. He holds that if a man does what he aspires to do in his own way the result is apt to be more beneficial than if he does what a bureaucracy wants him to do in the way in which a bureaucracy wants him to do it. He thinks that Capital and Labour are obviously distinct, but not hostile to one another, and he blames Trades Unions as much as stupid and greedy employers for reducing the labourer to his present helpless condition; the former forbid men to be sufficiently interested in their work to forget their hours and wages, and the latter take no pains to make that work interesting. Modern industry, says Mr. Lee—

Is daily living. . . . in fear and slavery and drudgery all the way through, because it is a sick industry. And it can never be anything else but sick until it acknowledges that the soul must be as supreme in business as in everything else.

The inspired millionaire, who will be a monopolist simply because a man who has conceived an idea or built up a great business is more likely to make it benefit the world if he keeps its reins in his own hands, will change all this. He will overthrow the system of factory work, which condemns men to be the slaves of particular machines, ignorant of all but the way to pull a lever to the left or right, and offers them public libraries with which to save their souls in their spare time. He will see that every labourer, while naturally becoming the master of some particular process or part of a process, gradually serves an interesting apprenticeship to all other processes in his factory. Workmen will thus learn to criticise, to suggest improvements out of their own difficulties, and by the way to widen their own outlook. The capitalist of the future, the man who will supersede the Rockefellers and Harrimans, and will by his example prove such combines as the Standard Oil Company to be haphazard and short-lived bungles, will bring to his work the creative joy of the artist together with the perfect freedom of the man who is bound to nobody for his daily bread:—

The artist is never so hard put to it in this world that he has to look around in it to do good. He creates and likes it. After he has created (like God) he says it is good. The good is thrown in, and is too obvious to be mentioned, with a great artist, and the probability seems to be that the great millionaire, when he comes, like Leonardo da Vinci or Phidias, will do good in the same way, not by poking distastefully around the world and being on Committees, and trying to be self-sacrificing and trying vaguely to make people happy, but by being happy with some deep happiness himself, and overflowing the world with it.

This is an attractive doctrine, and we cannot resist its fascination, despite the doubts which it leaves upon us. We wonder, in this great blending of the material and the spiritual, in this hoped-for society of wealth justly acquired, what will happen, for example, to the smoky chimneys, the advertisement-boardings, the halfpenny newspapers, and the mountebank politicians. Will they be banished by a wider æsthetic sense, or will they simply go the way of the inefficient? And the artists, whom our author ranks with his inspired millionaires in the affections of the future, will they not degenerate a little when they become rich? Or will they only grow rich when they grow great beyond the possibility of degeneration? We do not altogether trust Mr. Lee in these matters, for we feel by the witness of his own methods of writing, by a certain raciness of style and a certain slanginess of metaphor, that he does not worship the gods which are greatest in art. He is as invigorating as a dash of cold water and as warming as the open rays of the sun, but we feel that there are many planes of thought which are more lofty than his own, and of which he has no knowledge. We cannot help a suspicion that his imaginative passages are merely that rather clumsy transcendentalism common to poetic Americans. He reasons upward, as it were, from the inspiring whirr of machinery, from the lights of theatres, from the rows of towering city edifices, and because there are elements of beauty in these things, he would seek for perfect beauty in the apotheosis of their spirit.

Such a creed certainly gives a meaning to the thing we call progress; but does it not trample blossoms by the way which are as valuable as any it charges on to seek? Is such progress really economical? Is it making the most perfect use of what we have, or is it only increasing the skill with which we create a few passing treasures? Is it, in the end, a good thing for a man to put his soul into factory work of any kind, or should these things be done, like washing and dressing, as the necessary work of the world, and forgotten as soon as possible? There would be fewer "modern improvements" certainly, but there would, we think, be more grace. Such are the thoughts which Mr. Lee's book rouses; but we must not overlook the fact that he has worked out a remedy while we have not. His attitude at the least is thoroughly healthy and natural, if it leaves out of account many things upon which we place a supreme value. Mr. Lee, for all his thoughtfulness, is a good deal of a "hustler." It is permitted to a mere reviewer to shake a meditative head over him.

NEW EDITIONS

The Roadmender. By MICHAEL FAIRLESS. Illustrated by E. W. WAITE. (Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Phantasmagoria, and other Poems. By LEWIS CARROLL. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. FROST. (Macmillan and Co. 1s. net.)

A Thoroughbred Mongrel. By STEPHEN TOWNSEND. (Simpkin, Marshall and Co. 3s. 6d.)

The Pickwick Papers: Nicholas Nickleby. By CHARLES DICKENS. With Illustrations (coloured) by SEYMOUR and "PHIZ." (Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d. each net.)

Paul the Minstrel, and other Stories. Reprinted from "The Hill of Trouble" and "The Isles of Sunset." By A. C. BENSON. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Widow Woman: a Cornish Tale. By CHARLES LEE. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE prevalent practice of producing a "colour-book" by taking a well-known volume, almost a classic, and republishing it with added illustrations more or less concerned with the text, is not always to be defended; but in the present instance the gentle essays of "The Roadmender" emerge unspoiled from the test. The pictures are excellent, and if they do not actually elucidate the text, they are, at any rate, companionable with it, and do not distract the attention of the reader. Mr. Waite has caught the colour and atmosphere of the peaceful country admirably, and artist, printer, and binder have combined to produce the best edition we have seen. The poor author, in this praise, seems somewhat neglected; but the fact that this is the twenty-eighth edition of his work is higher praise than any commentator can bestow.

There should be a large market for the humour of "Lewis Carroll" in verse, though comparatively few of those who fall under the spell of "Alice" are familiar with it. "Hiawatha's photographing," for instance, one of the funniest rhyming skits he wrote, is hardly ever heard of; and there are many verses not far behind in their laughter-moving qualities. With the Tenniel-like sketches of Mr. Frost this neat pocket edition should achieve success.

"The Tale of a Dog told by a Dog to Lovers of Dogs" is the sub-title of "A Thoroughbred Mongrel," and this new edition with Mr. J. A. Shepherd's illustrations should be welcomed by many who own a canine friend. We find it rather difficult to sustain a high interest in the humours and adventures of the various "characters," and the chapter which gives a dog's nightmare of vivisection had far better have been omitted; but on the whole the book is entertaining—the exposure of the imitation "Shiwawa" puppy being especially good.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall's reissue of the works of Charles Dickens is notable for its excellent printing and the tinted illustrations, most of which are, of course, more familiar in black-and-white. In considering this latest "Pickwick" the reader of a thoughtful turn of mind will be moved to musings over the mental picture of the young Dickens, waited upon by Messrs. Chapman and Hall of those days with a suggestion for the chronicles of the "Nimrod Club," anxiously meditating the matter, never dreaming that in those tentative first papers he had begun a classic work. "Nicholas Nickleby" in its present guise is just as attractive, though we are a little uncertain as to whether the colours are an advantage. In some cases, it seems to us, they detract from the effect.

Many readers devoted to the cult of the "prose poem" will be glad to possess the reprinted short sketches of Mr. A. C. Benson, which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. have just issued. Mr. Benson's placid style, curiously reminiscent of the "Morte D'Arthur" in some passages, does not appeal to all even in the literary world. The mystical legend of "The Gray Cat," the subdued terrors of "The Closed Window," are among the best things the author has done, in spite of the admission that they were written, with many other stories, for the benefit of his boys at Eton. "I wonder if they remember the old days and the old stories," says Mr. Benson in his charming Preface. We expect they do; and for them, and a far larger circle, this collection will prove a treasure.

We reviewed elsewhere Mr. Charles Lee's new book, "Dorinda's Birthday," and need only here put on record our pleasure at seeing his little volume "The Widow Woman" in a fourth edition. It is a perfectly delightful tale to readers who know Cornwall, and it is difficult to believe that even a stranger to that land of saffron-cake and cream could fail to gain keen pleasure from the irresistible fun of Mrs. Pollard's wooers. Mr. Lee hits off his characters—they are as accurate as photographs and yet have the pleasing "atmosphere" of a picture, and we can vouch for their fidelity. To this edition Mr. C. E. Brock contributes many illustrations, small as a rule, but astonishingly good and amusing. Not often do artist and author work so excellently together.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Good Cheer: The Romance of Food and Feasting. By FREDERICK W. HACKWOOD. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

ALL lovers of good cheer, and their name is legion, will welcome this entertaining volume, which is a veritable store-house of gastronomic lore. From the food of primeval man and antediluvian vegetarianism, it carries the reader through successive stages, like so many courses at a royal or civic banquet, to the dietary of the Scriptures, the culinary practices of the ancients, early English fare, monastic cuisine, baronial hospitality, Elizabethan fare, forks and refinement, the æsthetics of the dinner-table, and the modern art of dining. One chapter is devoted to good cheer in fiction, in which we read again that "immediately Gargantua was born he cried out 'Drink, drink!' so lustily that no less than 17,913 cows had to be provided to supply this vigorous babe with milk." Another chapter, dealing with anthropophagy, contains the following unique recipe for cooking human flesh quoted from the "Romance of Richard Cœur-de-Lion":—

Take a Saracen young and fat,
In haste let the thief be slayne,
Opened, and his skin off flayne,
And sodded full hastily,
With powder and spicery
And saffron of good colour.

National foods and prejudices form the contents of yet another chapter, with many allusions to the esculent or edible frogs and snails. The former are, by the way, much appreciated in Canada, where in Montreal alone £40,000 worth were sold in 1909, while one hotel in Toronto is said to sell about 1,500lb. of frogs' legs every year. Some three centuries ago snails were apparently more popular in England than they are now, for the fastidious author of "The Faerie Queene" gives this recipe for their preparation:—

With our sharp weapons we shal thee fray
And take the castill that thou lyst in;
We shal thee flay out of thy foule skin,
And in a dish, with onyons and peper,
We shal thee dresse with strong vynegars.

At "Pontack's Head," a famous house in Abchurch Lane, there was in 1731 "a guinea ordinary," at which were served such delicacies as "a ragout of fatted snail" and "chickens not two hours from the shell." These and many other curious dishes which found favour with our forefathers are now little more than a memory; but the priestly ham, the knightly sirloin, the noble baron of beef, and the princely venison pasty continue to hold their own. The illustrations—reproductions of ancient sculptures, old illuminated MSS., paintings and engravings of various times—are an interesting feature of the volume and add considerably to its value.

The Baganda: Their Customs and Beliefs. By the REV. J. ROSCOE. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 15s. net.)

FOR the ordinary lay reader this volume contains a wealth of interesting stories, some of which may be retold to the children on a winter evening, and some of which no self-respecting adult would venture to tell in the presence of the youngsters. The chapter devoted to folklore is rich in legends and stories with an "Uncle Remus" flavour, while scattered throughout the book are traditions of the race, adduced in support of various customs, which make good reading.

Even at the height of its prosperity the Baganda race never exceeded three millions in number, the author tells us; but, though a small nation for the amount of territory occupied, the Baganda, out of all South Central African tribes, well deserved this voluminous record of its manners and customs, for here are united the blind superstitions and witchcrafts of Central Africa with that higher form of civilisation—albeit a cruel form—which reached its apex in the Zulu nation under T'Chaka. Uganda stretches sufficiently far toward the equator to draw in all the vices of excess and lust with which native life in tropical Africa is associated; at the same time the southern borders of the country are adjacent to lands which had felt the influence, if not the presence, of cleaner living, stronger races in the south and south-east. The result of these opposing forces acting on the Baganda race produced a conglomerate which must prove of abiding interest to the student of anthropology.

With twenty-five years' experience as a missionary in Uganda, the author was well qualified to tell the story of its people. His work bears evidence of patient, careful study, and is marked by thoroughness rather than enthusiasm. He is impartial; his division of subjects makes this an admirable work for the use of the student; he writes as one certain of his facts, and shirks nothing in his relation—and the sociology of a South Central African tribe is not all pleasant telling. The book makes no pretence at being historical, but is rather a study of the people as they were before European influences were brought to bear on them, and its author's desire to "place the facts so collected in the hands of experts for scientific purposes" is fully justified by the facts themselves.

Though the prevalence of human sacrifice, together with a number of repellent customs, marked the rude government of the Baganda race, its people evinced the possession of a number of virtues—those of good faith and hospitality, for instance—which raised them above the level maintained by many African tribes. Space does not admit even of mention of their many curious customs, but it may be said that this book, which deals in such a minute fashion with the sociology of the race, is well worth careful study by all who may find interest, direct or indirect, in the subject.

Carlo Goldoni. (Corso di Lezioni fatte nell' Università di Roma nell' anno scolastico 1910-1911.) By ANGELO DE GUBERNATIS. (Successori Le Monnier, Florence. 6 lire.)

GOLDONI is one of the most interesting personalities in later Italian literature. The excellence of his comic art, his industry, and his successful reforms are well set off by a rare kindliness of disposition and an untiring delight in adventures and experiences. Like so many of the great Italians, much of his life was passed on foreign soil, and one of his masterpieces—his masterpiece tout court according to Signor de Gubernatis—was produced at Paris. This was the "Burbero Benefico," written in French, to the scandal of Rousseau—"Avec votre permission, on ne commence pas à votre âge à écrire et à composer dans une langue étrangère." The last period of his long life, more than thirty years of it, was passed in France, whither he had come in the hope of a pension for his declining years; but this period was, with the exception of "Il Burbero," comparatively barren in important works. He conceived a great admiration for Louis XVI. as the reforming king, but lived to see the tragedies of the Revolution, while the Moniteur, in an obituary notice, described his death as that of a sincere français et républicain. Goldoni's ready acceptance in France is easily understood when we remember that Voltaire welcomed him in advance as the "Molière of Italy," that he had himself taken Molière as a model for his theatrical reform, and had even written a play on an incident in the French comedian's career, and that finally the French demand for good plays was at that time much greater than the supply. The chief notes that Signor de Gubernatis, who is by no means unknown in England as a lecturer, brings out in his study are the nationality of his hero—Goldini was above all things a Venetian, and was most happy in his delineation of Venetian customs and character—his extraordinary industry—sixteen plays in a year, by contract—his opportunist reforms, and his marvellous adaptation of material. One play—the "Don Giovanni Tenorio"—is based on an unfortunate love affair of Goldoni's with his chief actress, his rival also figuring in the caste. The characters of his company were indeed una miniera perenne di tesori. Step by step he enfranchised Italy from the "Commedia dell'Arte," his own work culminating, on Italian soil, with the perfect comedy the "Locandiera." One of his less happy inventions was that of the claque, by the free admission of gondoliers to the performances.

Joanna Baillies "Plays on the Passions." (Wiener Beiträge zur Englischen Philologie. Band XXXIV.) By ALFRED BADSTUBER, Dr.Phil. (Wilhelm Braumüller, Vienna and Leipzig. 4 marks.)

Milton und Caedmon. (Wiener Beiträge zur Englischen Philologie. Band XXXV.) By STEPHANIE V. GAJSEK, Dr.Phil. (Wilhelm Braumüller, Vienna and Leipzig.)

THE "Wiener Beiträge" are a series of monographs, somewhat in the nature of theses for the doctorate, dealing with subjects in English literature that invite treatment, either through intrinsic interest or previous neglect. Of the two numbers before us that of Dr. Stephanie von Gajsek is distinctly the more interesting. The subject is seductive and not without critical thorns. The connection between the two epic poets is not very definitely established, but the probabilities of an acquaintance on the part of Milton with the "Paraphrasy," through his friendship with Francis Junius, are well presented. A textual comparison between the works of the two writers is given, and leaves a strong impression of literary filiation. Dr. Badstuber's work on Joanna Baillie is less convincing, as his subject is, in a literary sense, very and completely dead, and can only claim at best a page in literary history. It is on this last count, it is true, that the monographist strives to awaken our interest in the poetess, but, apart from a certain distrust of the value of "placings," we feel rather sceptical about the influence of Joanna Baillie on her successors. Incidentally we are not very sure about the competence of a foreign critic, pace Taine, to do any serious "placing" for a literature and tongue not his own.

FICTION

"MAX"—OR MR. BEERBOHM?

Zuleika Dobson. By MAX BEERBOHM. (W. Heinemann. 6s.)

WITH tender recollections of the time when we turned with a gentle thrill each Saturday to the columns of a certain weekly paper, sure of finding a page by "Max" which should reward us for our pluck in expending the coin of the realm demanded, we opened this long-promised novel. We were perfectly sure that we could suffer no disappointment—we could have wagered our whole estate upon it that Max (we cannot possibly call him by so plebeian a title as "Mr.

Beerbohm") would amuse, expound, descant, enthrall through three hundred pages as easily and dexterously as he did through twelve hundred words; had any poor, benighted, illiterate friend ventured to asperse this expected ability we should have remarked loftily, "My dear fellow, it's by Max; don't be absurd!"

Dare we confess that the impossible has happened—that Max has amused us, entertained us, but finished by boring us? It has to be written, though we feel as though such words ought to be in very small print. "Zuleika Dobson" opens brilliantly, and for a hundred pages or so proceeds brilliantly. The heroine and the hero—one a conjurress, favourite of the biggest "halls" in Europe and America, the other a Duke—are inimitably drawn, and their fooling is provocative of chuckles in plenty. Zuleika descends upon Oxford like a whirlwind. The young Duke of Dorset falls in love with her; the humble Noakes falls in love with her; every man whose eyes rest for a second on her superb grace and beauty loses his heart as surely as if Cupid himself had shot his arrows from the sweet ambush of her breast. Here is a pretty plot: all Oxford—described in digressions and asides as probably only Max could describe it—head over ears in love with racy, restless, ravishing Zuleika, "the toast of two hemispheres"! And because the Duke would not bow down to her Zuleika adores him; because she flouts him when he is subjugated, he hates or adores her—we are not quite certain which, nor is he. And in the end the Duke drowns himself—impetuously, magnificently, followed, impetuously and almost as magnificently, by all the undergraduates. Zuleika informs her grandfather, the "Warden of Judas," in a most cold-blooded fashion:—

"The reason why there were no undergraduates in your Hall to-night is that they were all dead."

"Dead?" he gasped. "Dead? It is disgraceful that I was not told. What did they die of?"

"Of me."

"Of you?"

"Yes. I am an epidemic, grandpapa—a scourge such as the world has not known."

So the joke finishes, with Zuleika turning her steps towards Cambridge; and by that time we are not sorry to be rid of her.

The best part of the book concerns the ducal lover, and is contained within the first hundred pages. The account of his wooing is in Max's most excellent vein, spun-gold of humour. For several pages the Duke sets forward in detail his attractions and his possessions. "Five ghosts permanently residing in the right wing of the house, two in the left, and eleven in the park—all noiseless and quite harmless." "Wherever I go," says the anxious lover, "there are two chefs in my retinue. Both are masters in their art and furiously jealous of each other. When I compliment either of them on some dish the other challenges him. They fight with rapiers, next morning, in the garden of whatever house I am occupying." And so on, until the Duke is hung round with splendour as a girl with jewels.

But from here, though interspersed with many a gem-like epigram and with words and sentences used in precisely the old, delightful way, the joke becomes thin; the book, in fact, is written not by "Max," but merely (alas! we are driven to it) by Mr. Beerbohm, and the change is not to our liking. There are snowflakes of delicate satire that we cannot resist, such as the diversion on the Duke in the thirteenth chapter:—

He wrote mostly in English prose; but other modes were not infrequent. Whenever he was abroad it was his courteous habit to write in the language of the country where he was residing—French, when he was in his house on the Champs Elysées; Italian, when he was in his villa at Baiae; and so on. . . . In his sterner moods he gravitated to Latin, and wrought the noble iron of that language to effects that were, if anything, a trifle over-impressive. He found for his highest flights of contemplation a handy vehicle in Sanscrit. In hours of mere joy it was Greek poetry that flowed likeliest from his pen; and he had a special fondness for the metre of Alcaeus.

Having a plot, however, it is the author's business not to "score" by the exquisite delineation which he gives to his characters, but by the action of the story itself; and this, we imagine, holds good even with a plot that is a huge joke, such as this epic of Zuleika and her capture of a city. The story flags, and the reader is betrayed into looking away from it, hunting for the verbal felicities and embroideries rather than following up the events for their sheer interest. Thus we leave Mr. Beerbohm with a faint, rebellious feeling akin to disappointment—a feeling which never came to us when reading his essays, never once. And we are fain to put on record that he really cannot expect to usurp in our affections the position already firmly secured by our old familiar friend and breaker of lances, "Max."

Daisy the Minx. By MARY L. PENDERED. (W. J. Ham-Smith. 6s.)

IN tracing the evolution of a priggish and egotistical young man to an ordinary human being, Miss Pendered has undertaken no new task. Novelists greater and less than Miss Pendered have taken this as their theme, but, all the same, the present portrayal of Humphrey Shaw's "undoing" is by no means lacking in interest. And Daisy, the bewitching music-hall artiste, chosen by our author for the accomplishment of this great undertaking, is a lovable and appealing little minx. Chancing one day to be dining with Mortimer Manners, an acquaintance of Humphrey, who should pass by the table at which they are seated but Humphrey Shaw, otherwise the "Sanctified Ass." Mortimer explains to her how tired Mr. Shaw has become of his son's overbearing behaviour, and that he has "offered a liberal reward to any man who'll knock the tommy-rot out of him." Daisy thinks that probably a woman would be better fitted for the task, and then and there decides "to take him on" herself. She pleads illness one evening as an excuse for not appearing at the hall where she is the principal attraction, and under the name of Juliet Teresa da Vinci attends a meeting of "The Sandwich Society," of which Humphrey is the leading spirit. From that moment poor Humphrey's fate is sealed. Daisy brings all her charms and fascinations, together with a naturally kind and sympathetic disposition, to bear on the young man. He on his part thinks that at last he has met a girl after his own heart, and the intimacy grows and develops, Humphrey having no idea as to "Miss da Vinci's" real name and profession.

Elaine, Lady Lofthouse's younger daughter, becomes enamoured of the stage, and goes to Daisy for advice and help to attain her heart's desire—to appear for one night only behind the footlights. Daisy promises her aid on certain conditions, and together they appear and sing a comic song. Supping afterwards at a restaurant, they encounter Lady Lofthouse with her fiancé, Colonel Rapier. Daisy is introduced this time as Lady Geraldine de Smythe; but Elaine confesses all on her return, and is forbidden to have any further intercourse with her friend. Knowing all this, one can easily imagine the consternation that takes place when Humphrey, still unconscious of the real personality of the girl he loves, introduces her as his affianced wife at Lady Lofthouse's reception, where she is openly snubbed by her hostess. The scene very fine, although one feels sorry for Humphrey's plight, and must agree that the minx has been very thorough in her teaching. Explanations ensue, and Humphrey is released from his engagement, and here we think is the weak portion of the story. He loves Daisy, and wants to marry her in spite of all. She also loves him, but refuses him on the grounds of their different social positions, although she ends by marrying Lord Reggie Colborne. We have thoroughly enjoyed the book and the pleasant half-hour or so spent in the company of Daisy the Minx and her many admirers.

Hetty. By SHAN F. BULLOCK. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)

THIS is another of Mr. Bullock's rather sombre studies—the brief chronicles of a stiff, bleak Ulster family. There is a stern, earnest old farmer, of the sort known as "dour;" a placid wife; a son, who is not earnest enough to please his father; one daughter, quiet, hard-working, another of the gayer sort, who comes back from Dublin with scents and high-heeled shoes and a will of her own; a big, lazy Irishman "with a way with him;" a shambling, gambling dreamer of a farm-hand; and a maidservant with a good heart and a hot tongue. These are old friends. Then there is a rebellion in the family, and a family feud, and the son runs away to come back with a bundle in a spotted handkerchief and a ship tattooed on his hand; and love-making, and an inconstant lover and a trap accident to help out the love-making. This is familiar stuff. But it is none the worse, for Mr. Bullock uses it honestly. There is no false sentiment, and he knows how to write of simple people and the little things. There are some good scenes—a little tragedy of ill-temper with the morning mists and then a hayfield for background; the discovery of the gambling farmhand weeping over his dead fighting-cock and consoled with the advice that now it is gone he will have the more time to give to his sweetheart. But the book would be none the worse for a little rollicking humour, something of the extravagant and fantastic. Such comedy as there is in it makes the reader want more. Mr. Bullock is sometimes too careful, one or two of his descriptions come perilously near mere inventories. And is the word "quandary" really to be found in the vocabulary of Irish maidservants? Mr. Bullock thinks so.

Tom Bart Brown. By WILFRED BEET. (Wilfred Mark Webb. 6s.)

TOM BART BROWN is an engaging little fellow eight years old who romps rather unceremoniously through the pages of the book to which his name gives the title. Left on the hands of a boarding-house keeper a year previous to the opening chapter by the death of his mother, Tom, of No. 7, St. Philip's Terrace, walks along the verandah, and makes friends with Mr. Fairfax, an impecunious artist at No. 9. Together they agree to seek their fortunes across the Channel, and with very little in the way of baggage, but with Wag, a mongrel of which Tom is very fond, arrive at Neuville, where they make the acquaintance of a Mr. and Mrs. Barowne. Mr. Barowne is an invalid; Mrs. Barowne a very beautiful woman. Fairfax, of course, paints her portrait, and, equally of course, imagines himself in love with her. Thanks to the lady's self-control and proper regard for her husband and friend, we are spared any painful scenes. Meanwhile Tom is making headway with Mr. Barowne, and finally gains the deep affection of that irascible old man. Complications arise owing to a previous marriage contracted by Mr. Barowne, and everything is for the time thrown into confusion. Eventually matters straighten themselves out, mainly owing to Tom, and every one appears to be satisfied in the end. The book is not great. Tom is the nicest person in it, and some of his letters to Mrs. Nudder, his late landlady, are typically boyish and sincere. We occasionally come across our old friend the split infinitive, which possibly may have been put in to balance the lack of semicolons.

Red Revenge: a Romance of Cawnpore. By CHARLES E. PEARCE. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

"RED REVENGE" is another of Mr. Pearce's thrilling stories of the Indian Mutiny. As his previous one ("Love Besieged") told the story of the siege of the Residency at Lucknow, so this present volume pictures the events incidental to the ghastly Cawnpore massacre, around which the author has woven his romance. All the terrible happenings of those days of horror are vividly brought before the reader with an historical accuracy as regards details that only a thorough acquaintance with contemporary accounts could furnish. The story is naturally a stirring one, full of emotion, in which facts have the leading place, and the course of events it depicts, the various personages that figure in it, with their actions and their surroundings, are all vigorously drawn to the life by a master hand. This is assuredly a novel that should be widely read by all of British blood, for it is far more than a mere recital of horrors. As Mr. Pearce very truly says in his Introduction—"Cawnpore stands for all that is noble, heroic, and enduring in the men and women of Great Britain, and as a monumental example of dauntless courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice it cannot be excelled in the world's history." Every reader of "Red Revenge" will acknowledge the truth of the statement.

The Believing Years. By EDMUND LESTER PEARSON. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d.)

A SLIGHT vein of humour runs through this little volume of short stories, which depicts the American schoolboy under various conditions, and shows that he is in the main very much the same as the lads of this country. One of the most amusing of the stories is "Arma Puerumque Cano," which tells how two small boys get the better of several bigger ones by unexpectedly turning the garden-hose on them. Another which will raise a smile is "Their Unaccountable Behaviour," unaccountable at least to Master Sammy when he took a letter to Miss Carew and found her in the summer-house with a young gentleman. Mr. Pearson has produced an inoffensive book, which will no doubt amuse a few, and take them back to their salad days, reminding them of similar pranks they played in days of yore.

John Temple, Merchant Adventurer, Convict, and Conquistador. By RALPH DURAND. Illustrated by William Sewell. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

IN "John Temple" Mr. Ralph Durand tells the story of Francisco Barreto's romantic attempt to establish a great Portuguese South African Empire in the sixteenth century. As he follows history very closely in his narrative, his book is as instructive as it is entertaining, and any one of an adventurous turn of mind is sure to take a delight in its perusal. Most of the characters are historical, and the author has drawn them to the life as far as extant contemporary accounts have enabled him to do so. Some of their stirring deeds are vividly portrayed in Mr. Sewell's spirited pictures.

THE THEATRE

"THE GREAT YOUNG MAN" AT THE KINGSWAY

MADAME YAVORSKA has opened her winter season in London with a "second edition" of the play written by her husband, Prince Bariatsky, which no lover of fine acting and high comedy should miss seeing. Even if the atmosphere of somewhat sordid intrigue be not altogether to his liking, the fine interpretations of character given by each member of the company, and above all the superb vivacity and skill of Madame Yavorska herself in a part (and sometimes in a dress) that fits her like a glove, will give him keen pleasure: unless, of course, he happens to be an irreclaimable misanthrope.

The "great" young man of the story, Nablotsky, who has married a princess for financial and social reasons, has ideas of life which lead us to hope that there are not many young men in exalted official positions in England who are "great" in the same way. He is great at many things: great at borrowing money, great at making love to other people's wives, great at making love to his own wife when he wants favours; most of all, however, is he great at . . . well, prevaricating and perverting the truth. He is, in fact, a compact, cultured, well-dressed, exquisite villain, and so is everybody else in the plot except the harmless, necessary servant. Even he, we suspect, must have an "affair" hidden in his gold-laced breast.

Variagin, Councillor of State, Nablotsky's chief, has displaced a poor schoolmaster by one of his feminine friends who was becoming awkward; the good Count Talysin (at least we thought he was good until, in the Third Act, he made terrific love to the Princess Nablotsky and ran off with her) hears of this bit of jobbery, and, as an influential person, demands explanations. Nablotsky, for excellent reasons, takes the blame upon himself, and the scene in Act II., in which he makes his false confession, expresses repentance, buries his face in his hands, and explodes with laughter immediately the Count and his protégé have left the room, is a wonderful ten minutes of sheer comedy; especially so since the whole effect lies with the three men, and owes most of its excellence to their fine command of facial expression.

The progress of the plot we need not detail. The dialogue is full of humour, energetic, and picturesque in phrasing, and there is not a suspicion of superfluous "padding." Mr. Kinsey Peile, with his rich, unctuous, high-pitched voice, had in the character of Variagin a part that suited him far better than that of Tesman in "Hedda Gabler," although his delivery always reminds us of the amateur who recites his lines with a faultless and rather lifeless intonation; in the great scene in the Second Act, however, he had a complete grip of the situation. Sambarof, a financier, was taken by Mr. Ivan Berlyn, wonderfully made up and funny without the farce to which he must have felt tempted. Miss Aimée de Burgh took her rather difficult, sneering part well; Mr. Charles Sugden appeared as Prince Belsky with good effect, and, as the poor schoolmaster Yahontof, Mr. Richard Neville gave the finest bit of acting for the evening as far as the men were concerned; by the way, we must except him from our black list of villains. The Count whom we had thought virtuous throughout two Acts, so stern and reproachful was his mien, but who at last made love to the Princess, found a capable interpreter in Mr. Lewis Willoughby, though he seemed a shade too fierce in his passion for our frigid English notions.

And as for the Princess of the play and of real life, Madame Yavorska, she was the same as ever—provocative, tantalising, suddenly grave, suddenly laughing, always charming and skilful to seize to the full every opportunity. Of her dresses it is not for us to speak; but we imagine that most of the ladies present took mental notes. It is pleasant to remark that the stalls and dress circle were fairly full; but it is a thousand pities that the considerable number of London's theatre-goers who patronise the pit—and they are by no means to be ignored in matters of taste and critical acumen—do not realise that here is a play which they ought to see, whether it is regarded as an exposé of official life in St. Petersburg or merely as an evening's entertainment.

DELHI IN THE MIDDLE AGES

"THE environs of Delhi are a wilderness of deserted cities and devastated tombs," said Lord Curzon: he spoke also of Delhi "with its imperial memories." It has been called the Rome of India. There were old sayings that no king was considered properly crowned unless he ascended the throne at Delhi, and that whoever was master of Delhi could be master of all Hindustan. The ruins which may be seen lying south of modern Delhi cover an area of about forty-five square miles, and are believed to be the remains of many forts and cities, built by different kings who cannot all be identified. Ample accounts of them, quite sufficient for the modern visitor and reader, will be found in the books by Fanshawe and Hearn, and in Murray's excellent Handbook to India, Burma, and Ceylon. Sir William Sleeman's "Rambles and Recollections," containing two chapters devoted to Old and New Delhi, well deserve perusal, though seventy-five years have passed since his journey of 1835-6. Among the oldest ruins, of Hindu times, is the Lalkot, or red fort, attributed to both Anang Pal II. of the Tomara clan in Upper India, and to Rai Pithora, Chauhan, the Prithvi Raja, said to have been built by the latter about 1180 A.D. This fort, quite near the Kutb Minar, ten miles south of modern Delhi, and the iron pillar, dedicated to Vishnu, now standing twenty-two feet above ground in the court of the mosque (the kuwat-ul-Islam, "the strength of Islam"), adjacent to the Kutb Minar, are the only remains known of the Hindu period. From the character of an inscription on it antiquarians assign the pillar to the third or fourth century A.D. Fergusson dated it at 400 A.D. Fanshawe writes: "The city is believed to have been originally colonised from Kanouj in the sixth century A.D., to which the iron pillar belongs, and was re-founded by Anang Pal I. in 730 A.D., and repopled by Anang Pal II. in 1052." One of the best authorities, Vincent Smith, dates Delhi as an historical city only from the time of Anang Pal, in the middle of the eleventh century, and adds:—

The celebrated iron pillar, on which the eulogy of Chandragupta Vikramaditya is incised, was removed by the Tomara chief, Anang Pal, from its original position, probably at Mathura (Muttra), and set up in 1052 A.D. as an adjunct to a group of temples from the materials of which the Muhammadans afterwards constructed the great mosque.

The pillar was originally erected to commemorate a victory. Anang Pal, the Tomara chief, and his successors from this capital, ruled over a small principality for a century until in 1151 A.D. Vigriha Raja, known as Bisaldeo, a Rajput chief of the Chauhan clan of Ajmere, conquered Delhi from the descendants of Anang Pal. Bisaldeo's nephew was Prithivi Raja, Prithiraj, or Rai Pithora, the Chauhan, Lord of Delhi and Ajmere, the popular hero of Northern India, remembered to this day as the personification of every Rajput virtue, the pattern of all Rajput manhood: it was he probably who built the fort above mentioned, and the old Delhi known to the Muhammadan invaders of the twelfth century: the walls of his city may still be traced for a long distance round the Kutb Minar.

Up to his time the Muhammadans had not reached Delhi. They had first appeared in India when the Arabs invaded Sind between 711 and 828 A.D., but then they advanced no further. The Muhammadan power had no real effect upon India until Mahmud of Ghazni, in Afghanistan, appeared upon the scene. He defeated the Rajputs at Peshawar in 1001 A.D., carried off the gates of the temple of Somnath to Ghazni in 1025-7, and altogether invaded India twelve times. He took Lahore from the Rajput King of Delhi and Lahore, but there is no record of his having visited Delhi as a conqueror or otherwise. When Shihab-ud-din, also called both Muhammad bin Sam and Muhammad Ghori, from Ghor in Afghanistan, invaded India, Prithivi Raja inflicted a severe defeat on him in 1191 at Tilawari, between Thanesar and Karnal, and forced him and his army to retire beyond the Indus. But the next year Muhammad Ghori renewed his invasion, and at the same place met Prithivi Raja in command of an immense host, took him captive, and executed him in cold blood. With his death the Hindu period of Old Delhi was closed: as it had twenty-seven Hindu temples it must have been an important town in Hindu times.

Delhi fell in 1193 to Kutb-ud-din, Muhammad Ghori's General, and the Ghori dynasty was established throughout Upper India, Muhammad Ghori being the first Muhammadan King of Delhi. On his death, at the hands of assassins of a wild tribe, the Ghori dynasty came to an end. His General, Kutb-ud-din Ibbak, who had originally been a Turki slave, proclaimed himself Emperor of India at Delhi in 1206, and commenced the Slave, the third Afghan, dynasty, to which, it has been said, Old Delhi owes its grandest ruins. Having governed for his master from 1193, he was an independent Muhammadan ruler of Delhi from 1206 to 1210 A.D. The memory of his victories and rule is preserved by the famous Kutb Minar, which he commenced. The great mosque called after him was commenced in 1193, completed in three years, and enlarged during the reign of his successor, Altamish, the greatest ruler of this dynasty, slave and son-in-law of Kutb-ud-din. He reigned from 1211 to 1236. During his reign there was great danger in 1217 A.D. of an invasion of India by the Moguls, under Chengiz Khan, but fortunately that great conqueror left India alone. The authoritative account of the mosque and the minar, which every visitor to India should see, runs thus:—

Of the courtyards of the mosque the inner one is surrounded by an exquisite colonnade, whose richly decorated shafts have been torn from the precincts of Hindu temples. Originally a thick coat of plaster concealed from the believer's eyes the profuse idolatrous ornamentations; but the stucco has now fallen away, revealing the delicate workmanship of the Hindu artists in all its pristine beauty. Eleven magnificent arches close its western façade, Muhammadan in outline and design, but carried out in detail by Hindu workmen. Ibn Batuta, the Moorish traveller, who was a magistrate in Delhi and saw the mosque about 150 years after its erection, describes it as unequalled for either beauty or extent. The Kutb Minar stands in the south-east corner of the outer courtyard of the mosque. It rises to a height of 238ft., tapering gracefully from a diameter of 47ft. at the base to nearly 9ft. at the summit. The shaft consists of five storeys, enclosing a spiral staircase, and was crowned by a now broken cupola, which fell during an earthquake in 1803. The original purpose of the minaret was doubtless as a muezzin's tower, whence the call to morning and evening prayer might be heard throughout the whole city. It was completed by Altamish. The site chosen for the mosque was that already occupied by the pillar, the central ornament of the inner courtyard. Around in every direction spreads a heap of splendid ruins, the most important of which are the tomb of Altamish and the unfinished minaret of Alauddin, commenced in 1311.

During the domination of the Slave dynasty, Rezia Begum, entitled also the Sultan, a daughter of the great Altamish, is remarkable as the only female who has personally ruled in Delhi; no other queen has ever actually occupied the throne of the Indian Empire, though such women as Ahalya Bai of Indore, and Nurjehan, wife of Jehangir, have shown themselves to be fully qualified to rule. Rezia Sultan is described as having been a beautiful and well-educated woman and an energetic and skilful ruler:—

Dressed in a tunic and cap, like a man, she sat daily administering justice. Her fondness for favourites marred the effect of her virtues and talents. A Turki chief called Altunia rebelled, defeated her, and took her prisoner. She won over her captor and married him; but the nobles carried on the civil war, which ended in the defeat and death of herself and her husband. She reigned three years and six months. India was now a prey to rapine, full of rebellions, reduced almost to desolation.

In an account of Delhi, it is not necessary or desirable to recapitulate the history of all India. It is sufficient to mention that the Slave-king dynasty was succeeded by other Afghan dynasties—namely, the House of Khilji (a tribe of Tartars), 1288 to 1321; the House of Tughlak, 1321 to 1412; the Saiyyids, 1412-1450; and the House of Lodi, 1450-1526 A.D. Thus the Afghans dominated India from the commencement of the Ghaznevites in 996 to 1526, a space of 530 years. Matters, however, which affected Delhi must be included in its story.

THE SECRET OF BRUGES

By all consent, it is the way of middle-age to take a becoming gravity to itself, to forswear the hilarity and irresponsibility of youth, and to order its ways with an eye to decorum, not to say utility and eupeptic complacency. This with men. But with the centuries it seems to have been quite otherwise. There, strangely enough, it was left to the Middle Ages to break into the wildest hilarity, into a veritable romp of irresponsibility and uproarious caprice.

Of this Bruges remains—happily remains—one of the splendid examples. To stroll through London—to take the nearest example—and to note the modern architecture that is massively raising itself on every hand, is to see a thing as entertaining as instructive. Actually it is massive—there is no other word for it—massive not only in result, but in conception. It is not pedantically proper, like Georgian architecture, nor is it severe without beauty, like the Queen Anne. It is massive as an alderman is massive, when that said alderman has achieved his monetary success and thinks it is about time he turned his belated attention to the decencies of art. It is, in the main, set out rectangularly because it is clearly wasteful not to include as much space as possible in the scheme; it would use up its corners and not leave them out in the air! Not that it denies ornament. But that ornament is ornament in the worst, not the best, sense; it is something stuck on from without, not something that bursts out from within. Such may be pillars, supporting nothing, or nothing that very much matters—Dorian, Ionian, or Corinthian, according to fancy—but pastiche things that are even on occasion, and symbolically, half-embedded in a massive wall.

One cannot conceive such a massive wall stuck all over with grinning, laughing, madly irresponsible gargoyles—or, rather, not a wall stuck over with gargoyles, but a wall that in its very vitality breaks into a rank of gargoyles that roar down an open-mouthed silent song at passers-by below. One cannot conceive a modern steeple, having achieved its precipitate rush upward, flaming out, like Tannhäuser's rod, into bud and flower, and so spoiling, in hilarious gaiety, its slender poise and proportion. It might be possible on occasion to conceive of a modern building electing to break the back of its perpendicular roof, and, thrusting in from each side, to send its dislocated spine upward to a "stary-pointing" angle; but it would be quite impossible to conceive of it, having done so, decorating it further with steps leading upward from each side to the topmost platform from which a further leap can be made into space.

It is not so impossible to do these things as it is impossible to conceive of them being done. The spirit, the fine irresponsible spirit, necessary to their accomplishment is lacking. That is why a walk through the streets of Bruges is like the breathing of a rarer air. It is actually like escaping from the company of pompous aldermen, over whose unadventurous souls a decorous respect for the externals of culture is worn, to a place where the children leap and live (if they be children), tumble and play.

It is truly that; but with a difference, for there is the addition of a brooding melancholy. It is impossible to forget that all this vigour of soul belongs to a day that is passed away, and that no more shall the steeples be encrusted with flowers, or the walls leap with gargoyles. To realise to the full the precise significance of the remoteness of it all, this youthful irresponsibility and grave gaiety that did things not because it needed them, but because it was driven to the making of them by an over-abundant energy, it is necessary to turn aside and see Bruges from a less familiar point of view.

The city has been called—from a hateful tendency to simplification—the Venice of the North: by which refinement is meant merely that it is laced with canals. It is, in fact, surrounded by a continuous canal, which disappears beneath the railway-station to re-emerge at the Beguinage. Thus it is possible to take boat at a jetty beside the station, which is not more than a garden, and proceed through and about the city, to arrive finally at the Beguinage after a circuit. Like most things that explain appearances, it is a painful journey. It is like peeping at the vitals of mystery. Yonder, facing the street, can be seen the brave turrets of the houses, with the upward steps appearing like patterns cut in the sky; but here to the water's edge the hindermost parts of them tumble in decay and ruin, covered with creeper and lichen. The gardens are rank with weed, maybe; balconies shamble to steps that shamble to the waters, maybe; or the garden is trodden to the brown earth, on which, about a kitchen-table, men sit in broken chairs, drink Bock, and play poker. Over the south of the city, where this same canal is concerned with the frontages and appearance of things, the mystery is more inscrutable; but here in the north it winds through intricacies and familiarities the knowledge of which is the clue to the haunting note in the splendid hilarity.

The truth is that the hilarity was, and is no more. Certain old houses seen from the canal waters show that: notably one ivied dilapidation in which, so it is reported, the city executioner lived. And so it is possible to discover why there is sadness with the exhilaration in a walk through the streets of Bruges. It is like breathing sea air when the sea itself has strangely been spirited away. The invigoration remains, but it is accompanied by the knowledge that it will spend itself more and more with time.

Acutely one realises this at times. At such times would be possible to fall into painful sadness, except that the irresponsible hilarity is still itself, banishing the deeper mood. In fact its strength is such that it may pluck one away from the melancholy that waits on reflection, and lift one to a unity with its own gaiety and vigour that seems, for the nonce, eternal, as indeed in a sense it is eternal. It will not be possible to cogitate then why gargoyles have always their mouths wide open, whether they are meant to be singing, shouting, or wondering. It will be realised that it would be quite impossible for them to keep their mouths shut; that if they kept their mouths shut the very stones in the streets would cry out. It will no longer be wondered why steeples break into flower, or roofs rush up into a multiplicity of peaks, or arches give over the poise of curves and leap into the startling abruptness of acute angles, or windows become sinuous as with serpents and break up into a family of windows, or walls erupt into every manner of living creature. It will be seen that in doing so they only realise the first law of being, which is life; and that they realise the beauty that is above all beauty—the beauty of living things, urgent and palpitating and imperious, indifferent to the sapient distinction between variation and redundancy.

Then the thought will come that, whatever the Middle Ages had or had not, they had this that we have forgotten—they knew how to live so completely that they could transmit life.

BOOK SALES, OLD AND NEW

THE sale of the first portion of the library of the late Mr. Alfred Huth, brought together by his father, Henry Huth, and augmented (to a somewhat greater extent than is usually recognised) by himself, begins at Sotheby's on Wednesday, November 15th, and ends on Friday, the 24th. If the more ardent bidders start the next day by a fast boat for New York they will arrive just in time for the second part of the sale of Mr. Hoe's collection. Whether the ardent bidders who do this will be few or many remains to be seen. The course taken by the first Hoe sale was dramatic and exciting, but it left the great majority of those who had come to bid as more or less passive spectators; and to travel 3,000 miles, stay a fortnight in New York hotels, and come home with a mere handful of purchases, is an experience which hardly invites repetition.

The record prices obtained at the first Hoe sale were the more interesting in view of the long uncertainty as to whether the collection would be sold in New York or London. It was even debated whether some of the books might not be sold in Paris. In many matters Americans are still content to wait upon Europe, and will pay a higher price for a purchase which has stood the criticism of English, French, or German experts. Perhaps as regards book-bindings and some classes of foreign books they would be wise to maintain this attitude a little longer. But in respect not only of Americana, but of all kinds of English books, they have no need to lean on any foreign judgment. Both their formal bibliographical work and the catalogues issued by their dealers and auctioneers are at least as good as anything which is being produced in England, and the importation of English books of every kind has been so great that in many cases it must be as easy to obtain a collation in New York as in London.

It is the fashion for English journalists to lament that so many fine English books cross the Atlantic. When a book is really unique its loss is to be regretted, and the regret may even be shared by wise Americans. New York started too late ever to become the headquarters for students of English literature, and since this is so every book which America withdraws from the possibility of comparison with all the rest represents a real hindrance to scholarship. If an American professor is obliged to study at London and Oxford, in any case it will be no advantage to him if he have to work also in New York, Boston, Chicago, and San Francisco. It only means additional labour, time, and expense, and in some cases final uncertainty. But, with this reservation, the passing of considerable quantities of rare English books to America is surely a matter for congratulation. For at least two hundred years rare French, German, and Italian books have been imported into England, and they have been paid for not only with money, but with appreciation and study. English bookmen can talk to French, German, and Italian collectors about their own books—now and again may even make some little contribution to their history. The Americans are repaying us in the same way. Not only in English bibliography, but in English literary history, excellent research work is being done in America, and the workers must not be grudged their tools. Even as to less important books, the collecting of which may be thought not to rise above a hobby, why should we gird at American competition in this pleasant sport any more than in polo, or golf and tennis? And if we like Americans to play with us, it is surely childish to grudge them a share of the toys!

While the lamentations when fine books are taken across the Atlantic thus seem unreasonable and exaggerated, such volcanic upheavals of book prices as occurred during the first Hoe sale are, of course, a very serious nuisance. It is not really a good thing for the book-market that rival American millionaires should be spurred on to bid against each other by the cheers in an auction-room filled with a fashionable crowd in evening dress. One wonders what the worthy Presbyterian divine who introduced book-auctions from Holland into England would have thought of such a development. He was a good patriot this Nonconformist, Dr. Joseph Hill, and, though driven from Cambridge to Middleburg by the Act of Uniformity of 1662, wrote a pamphlet in support of English diplomacy ("The Interest of these United Provinces: being a Defence of the Zeelander's Choice") which caused him to be packed home to England in August, 1673. In England he stayed some five years, and it was during this time that the first English book-sale took place, the books being those of Dr. Lazarus Seaman, sometime Master of Peterhouse and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and the sale being held at his house on October 31st, 1676, some thirteen months after his death. Now book-auctions had been held in Holland at least as early as 1599, when the library of Philip van Marnix was sold in this way. When, therefore, we find a well-known auctioneer, Edward Millington, subsequently thanking Dr. Hill for his "great Service done to learning and Learned men in first advising and effectually setting on foot that admirable and universally approved of way of selling Librarys by Auction amongst us," we can guess that Hill must have used his knowledge of the Dutch practice for the benefit of the estate of his old Cambridge friend Dr. Seaman.

We not only know how this first English book-sale came to be held. We know all about it. A bookseller named William Cowper acted as auctioneer, and a catalogue was drawn up, headed with a Latin title, and with a preface beginning:—

It hath not been usual here in England to make sales of books by way of Auction, or who will give most for them. But it having been practised in other Countreys to the Advantage both of Buyers and Sellers. It was therefore conceived (for the encouragement of Learning) to publish the Sale of these Books, this manner of way.

This was followed by five numbered paragraphs, the first pointing out the use of the catalogue, the second providing for re-sales in disputed cases, the third allowing bids to be cancelled on account of imperfections discovered before the book was removed, the fourth stipulating for payment on delivery within a month after the sale, the fifth announcing that sales would begin at 9 a.m. and 2 p.m. every day until all the books were sold. The catalogue itself was divided under the sizes Folio, Quarto, Octavo, and Duodecimo, and by a cross-division also under various theological headings.

The first book sold when Cowper mounted his rostrum at 9 a.m. on October 31st, 1676, was a long set of the works of St. Chrysostom in Greek and Latin, printed at Paris forty years before. It fetched £8 5s., and this proved the top price of the sale, the nearest approach to it being Walton's London Polyglott of 1657, which reached within three shillings of it. In those days book-buyers liked large folio sets in numerous volumes—one of many contrasts between the little gathering of clerics and students at Warwick Court in 1676 and the scenes in Madison Avenue last April, when books which the good divines would have thought dear at a few shillings sold for thousands, and even tens of thousands, of dollars.

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

THE MAGAZINES

IN the Fortnightly this month Mr. Wells writes about "The Contemporary Novel." The point of view that he takes is not unknown, and is, indeed, associated with him. Very rightly, we think, he argues that the novel should be made a matter of serious attention, instead of being turned over for the amusement and delectation of "that tired giant, the prosperous Englishman." He declares vigorously that he and other novelists propose to treat the novel as a means for the discussion of social abuses, perplexed moralities that require adjustment, and so forth, and that all this should be done by the way of moral suggestion. Wisely he is careful to insist that he does not mean that the novel should thereby become the preacher's pulpit or the teacher's desk, and to point out that the novel has always, more or less, been occupied with somewhat of the same ideal. We have not the space here adequately to deal with the question he has broached, but it would be well to point out that he seems, surely, to have overlooked the very essence of the matter—an essence that his remark about the novel hitherto should have indicated to him. For what he is saying is that it is the artist that is the pioneer, not the politician or the propagandist. The propagandist merely tub-thumps, and the politician merely enacts, and so both merely limit and enfeeble what the artist has already discovered and set in its proper proportion. The artist represents a certain philosophy of action or thought, and so helps to produce that type of action or thought in life. The others declare from platforms, or put into statute-books, things that may not affect action at all, or if they do, can only affect it in a wrong way, which is as much as to say that the further the artist keeps from propaganda or politics the stronger will he be.

In the same magazine Mr. McEvoy has an eminently sensible article entitled "The Law of Audiences." The point of it is, that to say, as Philistines are wont to say, that a play is not a success because it does not pay is an irrelevance. The commercial success or failure of a play may or may not have the remotest reference to its avowed intention. His argument is that plays of the "advanced school" have sometimes failed (as in the noteworthy Frohman experiment) simply because those in the business command of the movement have not co-related "the quality of a performance to the quality of an audience;" or because, failing this, they have omitted to adjust the "expenses to the probable receipts from an audience co-related to the performance." It was a thing that needed saying. There is an audience at present existing in London that is not concerned with the average West-end production, but which is vitally concerned with drama as drama—in fact, the first flows from the last. And such an audience is sufficiently numerous to make a venture pay if it be adapted to it. In the Fortnightly also Mr. Ellis Barker has an extremely informative article on "Doctor Sun Yat Sen and the Chinese Revolution." The mass of information that Mr. Barker has been able to gather together in so short a time is really remarkable, and his conclusions carry conviction with them. In "The Use and Abuse of Machinery" Mr. Edward Spencer surely overlooks the primary fact that machinery must always and necessarily be, in its effect on personality and its instinctive development, an immoral thing, and that the effect of the amelioration for which he argues is to obscure the fact, and is therefore a form of condonation. "The Italian Sources of Othello" is an article that more than repays reading.

One of the chief items in the English Review is a battle-royal between Mr. Alexander Carlyle and Mr. Frank Harris over the latter's article in the English Review of February last entitled "Talks with Carlyle." The combatants are certainly not sparing of their blows. One has seldom an opportunity of seeing quite so much literary blood shed in a modern and effete generation. Beneath this, in the list of contents, we caught the title "The Point of It," by E. M. Forster. On turning to the page, however, we found that it had nothing to do with the previous controversy, but was instead a very extraordinary short story by the author of "The Celestial Omnibus." We have seldom read a story that seemed so apt to miss the completion of its own form, yet not only completed it in its concluding paragraphs, but closed the circle so neatly and conclusively as to leave it memorable. In "My Little Bluejacket" Mr. Austin Harrison (who may be spoken of as the captain of the young challenging forces that the English Review is coming more and more to represent) deals whimsically, but not the less forcibly, with some of the lessons that Italy's action and Turkey's impotence, speaking from the naval point of view, have put before us. 'Tis pity 'tis true, and pity 'tis 'tis true, but money must go handsomely down for the maintenance of a more than sufficient navy. It is tied up inextricably with colonial aspiration, as Germany well proves. "The Revolution in China" is the subject of an article by Yoshio Markino; and surely no one reading it can fail to have his very active sympathies enlisted on behalf of the revolutionaries in China.

In the Nineteenth Century the article that chiefly drew our attention was "Shelley at Tan-yr-allt," by Margaret L. Woods. She does not add much to our knowledge, nor does she throw much illumination on Shelley's work; but the article is interesting inasmuch as it is the only one of literary matters in the whole magazine. All the others are concerned with various political and semi-political affairs. Noteworthy among them is a somewhat unsympathetic article by Mr. Norman Pearson entitled "The Idle Poor." Vagrancy is a profound problem; but the vagrant is more often sinned against than sinning. Once a man has passed a certain length of time in the disheartening task of seeking employment, vagrancy is inevitable. An illuminating article is that by Sir Bamfylde Fuller on "East and West: a Study of Differences."

The Anniversary of Trafalgar is the subject of a series of three articles in the Cornhill. Dr. Fitchett writes upon "The Most Famous Fighting Ship in History," Helen Wood on "Nelson and Lady Hamilton at Altona," and Hallam Moorhouse on "Nelson as Women Saw Him." The titles adequately represent the treatment of their subjects. Some of the letters from Lady Hamilton to Nelson, especially that to the victor of the Battle of the Nile, give Mr. Moorhouse's article a very piquant interest. Nevertheless, the article that we read with more joy than any of the others was Mr. George Dewar's on "The Wild Bird's Throat." In Blackwood's what provides greater interest than any of the other matter, in a number that could do with a little enlivenment, is the "Musings without Method" for this month. Its subject is Sir Henry Craik's book on Clarendon. It is particularly good, as showing that the fierce distinction between Whig and Tory is by no means only a matter for aloof historical examination. It can even now stir indignation.

ART

OLD MASTERS AT THE GRAVES GALLERIES

THE loan collection of Old Masters lately opened by the Duke and Duchess of Teck in aid of the Prince Francis of Teck Memorial Fund is both interesting and important. One would like to know something in more than one instance of the paintings exhibited, and whether they are actually originals or not, but for the most part there is no question of this kind raised, and even the copies—where they are such—have a real interest of their own.

Vandyck's work is never undistinguished, and the portrait of Philip, Earl of Pembroke, is clever and remarkable, though hardly up to the painter's highest form. Sir Joshua's "Miss Linley as Charity" is one of the preliminary studies for the famous window at Oriel; whether it is entirely from his hand is doubtful, but of the beautiful child-study on the left of the picture there can be little question; in technique and inspiration it is well worthy of the master. His portrait of Mary, Duchess of Ancaster, is marked by great distinction; it is painted in pure silvery tones, and, though the carnations, as so often happened with his work, have almost faded out, its simplicity and noble grace strike the beholder in quite unforgettable fashion. The portrait of Emilia Mary, Duchess of Leinster, is an acknowledged favourite, and deserves its popularity. The seated picture of Master Bunbury is probably not an original; it is a popular picture and offers a suggestive study of boyhood, a rather sad little figure, which if he was (as we believe) the little lad for whom his mother did not greatly care, and who was, therefore, adopted by his aunt, "The Jessamy Bride," is not surprising. Miss Gunning as Diana is, for Sir Joshua, a poor piece of work—so poor that it is very doubtful whether it is by him at all—and hardly suggests the distinctive type of beauty of the famous sisters. Of special interest is Robert Smirke's great copy of Sir Joshua's full-length portrait of Mary Isabella, Duchess of Rutland, which was destroyed in the disastrous fire at Belvoir. This copy was considered so exact that the Duke of Rutland of that day caused a copy to be made from this one, and this second copy now hangs, we believe, at Belvoir. It is a noble picture.

Hoppner is well represented by a beautiful and vigorous sketch, that of Jane, wife of the tenth Earl of Westmorland, which has benefited greatly from cleaning at some comparatively recent date. The artist has caught a not very pretty woman in a moment of happy abandon and bright good humour, and the result is quite delightful—graceful, fascinating, and altogether pleasing. Not nearly so inspiring, but a conscientious and careful piece of work, and marked by strong individuality, is his seated group of Charlotte Maria, Duchess of Beaufort, and her daughter, painted in 1806. The little girl—also a Charlotte Sophia—is not in Hoppner's happiest vein, and furnishes an unusual instance of his failing in child-portraiture; but the mother is dignified and simple. The colour-scheme of black slashed with red is rich and effective. An interesting Lawrence shows a head and shoulders of Georgina Frederica, Marchioness of Worcester, whom Hoppner had painted many years previously with her mother and sister in one of his sweetest pictures of a mother and children, the Lady Charlotte Fitzroy (afterwards Lady Culling Smith), which now hangs in Apsley House. The child grew into a lovely woman, here conventionalised into the stock Regency type, and only redeemed from commonplace by the touch of "naughtiness" which Lawrence loved to infuse into his feminine portraits as a substitute for the aristocratic grace which he could neither appreciate nor pourtray. The Mrs. Cunliffe-Offley from the same brush, which is sometimes admired, seems to us but a commonplace piece of work, though it has much technical merit. There are few instances in the history of art of such high technical ability, and even a certain measure of insight, being united with such an intrinsically shallow outlook on life, and such poverty of imagination as in the case of Lawrence. It is here that Hoppner's wholly opposite personality—generous, hasty, warm-hearted, and full of poetic feeling—infuses Hoppner's work with a note of genuine humanity that Lawrence seldom strikes unless by accident.

Another picture attributed to Sir Joshua which has exercised the critic somewhat, is "The Contemplative Youth," a fine, but not very characteristic work, which has suffered in cleaning, and is harder and more brilliant in tone than Sir Joshua probably intended, if it be from his hand. Of the remaining pictures, the most striking is the fine copy (in all probability) from Titian's picture in the Uffizi—a nude female reclining, with a gallant seated by her; a brilliant piece of work, but not an original. Morland and Teniers are represented by some doubtful pieces, and the former by an unquestioned little masterpiece, entitled "Boys Bathing," which is full of spirit and movement and the sense of the open air. Opie's early portrait of his father is ruggedly interesting. This artist always leaves one with a sense of large reserves of power which somehow failed to get themselves expressed. The so-called Nattier is a copy, and a staring one at that. The true Nattier is inimitable in his combination of softness with brilliance.

MR. ROTHENSTEIN'S PAINTINGS AND DRAWINGS

A VERY interesting exhibition has been open for some few weeks at the Chenil Gallery in Chelsea. It is singularly varied and at the same time complete, because of the thread of the artist's personality running through the whole; yet its charm and value are elusive and difficult to explain, its essence being suggestion. There is little of what is known as finish in the work—with certain particular exceptions among the silk pictures—no show of technique, and it falls every now and then into emptiness, as in the group of masked figures in the first "Carnaval." But it is the excellence of the method, if it can be called a method, that the painter seems always to be withholding his knowledge and restraining his skill. And yet a certain number of the paintings on silk—"The Smart Visitor," "Wayfarers," and others—are full of an almost pre-Raphaelite care for detail, united in a peculiar way to Japanese arrangements and exquisite colours.

Somebody has remarked in connection with this exhibition that it is pleasant to find an artist who gives us only his "delight." There is delight in these pictures, no doubt, but there is more than that in the beauty of "Le Spectre de la Rose" sketch, or "Trees on a Plateau," or "The Estérel." And the quality of the delight is the real matter. The idea of confetti, for example, belongs in every one's mind to light-heartedness; but Mr. Rothenstein has imparted something quite wonderful to his "Confetti" sketch, with what seem to be a dozen or so quick pen strokes. There are girls throwing it about with an exquisite suggestion of the rhythm of movement and laughter and sunlight. One dwells upon this sketch, though it is one of the slightest things in the exhibition, because it seems in a special way to show not only Mr. Rothenstein's individual feeling and power, but also that idea the realisation of which, in whatsoever degree, is the realisation of art—the expression, not of things which are seen only, but of things which are felt; the strange incommunicable something without which the picturing of the most beautiful realities is idleness, but which can make a battle of confetti into a little joy for ever.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION

MR. H. CHARLTON BASTIAN, in opening his lecture at the London Institution on Monday last, stated that the general opinion now held by scientists with regard to the Origin of Life Question was that at a certain period in the history of our planet, on account of various chemical and physical processes taking place, life came into being. He referred to Darwin as one of the pioneers of the evolution theory as opposed to the creative one, and drew attention to the fact that, while it was generally admitted by scientific men that these processes took place, there was a great difference of opinion as to whether they had occurred during a limited period and had not taken place since, or whether they had been, and in fact were still being, repeated. It is said by many that the conditions existing at a certain period of the world's history were altogether different from those of the present day, and were favourable to such a process. The only test is that of experiment, and it is 160 years since Needham in this country, followed by other scientists in France and Germany, first made his experiments. In 1870 the lecturer himself ascertained that bacteria could not exist beyond a temperature of from 60 to 70 degrees Centigrade. Other experiments which he made were received with incredulity by Professor Huxley and others. It was not until 1906 that he put into action the notion of using inorganic fluids for his tests. The solution used was put into glass tubes, which were sealed, and submitted to a heat of from 125 to 145 degrees Centigrade for from five to twenty minutes in order to make certain that all life was killed. The tubes were not broken for many months, and at the end of the prescribed time were found to contain organisms resembling blue mould, which in a few days more had greatly multiplied. He instanced carbon as an illustration of changes taking place in chemical substances, and contended that if these could occur there was no reason to suppose that living organisms could not undergo molecular changes and assume different forms. Mr. Bastian concluded his lecture with illustrations of the bacteria covering the deposit in the sealed tubes, and also showed a film representing those formed from the elements of a dead animal.

BOOKS IN PREPARATION

LOOKING to the fact that the books which are peculiar to this column inevitably become those that are either talked about or missed, there cannot be anything particularly inappropriate in writing of books whose preparation is over. It is, in fact, extremely interesting to pause in the discussion as to forthcoming books and to make a sort of rough estimate of the position. The first great outpouring is past. It is now possible to stand on a prominent place with field-glasses and metaphorically pick out those that by merit, luck, log-rolling, accident, or advertising have come out of the ruck and rounded Tattenham Corner. "The Case of Richard Meynell" is, if we may pursue the curious horse-racing language, coming home alone. It is always quite safe to predict a great success for the novel of a well-known writer when love is mixed with religion. "Penelope's Progress" is not far behind, because Lady Angela Forbes has not hesitated to write about her friends and others in a perfectly fearless manner. Then comes "The Reason Why," which is a woman's reason, and is therefore wholly without logic. It is to be presumed that this book is read as much, more perhaps, for what it is not meant to be than for what it is. It is crammed with unintentional fun. "The Common Law" and "An Accidental Daughter" are running level, and "Adrian Savage" is at their heels. "Juggernaut" moves a little stickily, but is well backed, while "The Chronicles of Clovis," "Ethan Frome," "Dan Russel the Fox," "Hail and Farewell—Ave," "A Duke and his Friends," and "The Critical Attitude" are much fancied.

No list for the libraries can be altogether satisfactory that does not include Mr. Francis Grierson's "The Humour of the Underman," Mr. Reginald Lucas's "A Cheerful Day," "The Life of Spencer Compton, Eighth Duke of Devonshire," "Penelope Rich and her Circle," "Love Like the Sea," "The Sport of Shooting," "India Under Curzon, and After," "Gordon at Khartoum," "Saints, Sinners, and the Usual People," "A Safety Match," "The Ealing Miracle," and "Zuleika Dobson."

Among forthcoming books, apart from the Christmas volumes, with which we are to deal exhaustively later, "The Splendour of a Great Hope," which Mr. Robert Scott is preparing, will be extraordinarily topical. The work, which deals with authority with China and the Chinese, is by the Venerable Archdeacon A. E. Moule, and has an Introduction by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mr. E. Crosby Heath's novel, "Henrietta Taking Notes," which is in Mr. John Lane's lively list, introduces us to the very young daughter of a dramatic critic, and it is to be hoped that the father is brought into the story. The home of a dramatic critic suggests very many new and interesting things. Somehow or other the dramatic critic is a less human person than the ordinary man, because he seems to spend his days among the ghosts of failures, and live optimistically in the hope of adding more to his collection.

Duckworth and Co. have added "The Hills and the Vale," by Richard Jefferies; "The Soul of London," by the ubiquitous Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer; "Villa Rubein," by Mr. John Galsworthy; and "Esto Perpetua," by Mr. Hilaire Belloc, to their admirable "Readers' Library."

We hear that Mr. Richard Claud Carton, whose delightful plays stand out in the memory of all playgoers, may be persuaded to write his Reminiscences. They should prove to be not only wittily related, but of really remarkable interest. Mr. Carton's connection with the stage dates back to the days of Henry Irving's earliest struggles.

MUSIC

It was a painful moment for the present writer when he found himself obliged to say, some few months ago, that the quality of Mme. Yvette Guilbert's wonderful art was no longer so high as in earlier days. He had always regarded her as one of the three or four most remarkable artists of her time, and never dreamed of its being possible to find fault with her as long as she confined herself to singing French songs. But when she began to apply French methods to peculiarly English songs, the result was not happy; and then, too, she came to indulge in exaggerations of style which contrasted sadly with her earlier manner. We know now, however, and are delighted to know it, that the deterioration was only temporary. Mme. Guilbert is at this moment singing and acting just as well as she ever did, if not better, and her first recital was a pure joy from beginning to end. All her songs were first-rate, and many of them, though old, were new to us. One felt inclined to ask if there exist any songs more difficult to sing well, and so as to make a real effect. Simple little things they are, three-fourths of them on the same subject—that of the fillette who wants to have a lover or a husband, and the lines are repeated over and over again. Yet Mme. Guilbert has a fresh nuance for each repetition, and each of the fillettes has her one distinct character. We will be so bold as to say that no exhibition of art more marvellous in its way than that of Mme. Guilbert is now to be witnessed in London. It is like the playing of Casals, like the dancing of the Russians, so good that we cannot imagine it possible to be better. And Mme. Guilbert has again brought with her the players who form the "Société des Concerts d'Autrefois." We could listen to their delicate playing of the music they have disinterred for a whole evening without any weariness or longing for something modern.

For how many years has this old music been lying forgotten? How well it is that it never occurred to any librarian to destroy it as "dead" music, as a cumberer of shelves! Lully, of course, could never have been forgotten, for if the musician had not appreciated his greatness, did not Mme. de Sévigné say that she supposed the music of heaven could not be more beautiful than his? and that remark would have made it immortal. Hasse, too, the German-Italian, has survived deservedly; but Sacchini, Naudot, Mouret, and Boismortier, were they not dead and buried long ago? Sacchini, once so popular, lives, indeed, in the pages of Maria Edgeworth, some of whose young ladies delighted in his music, and one has probably seen, and forgotten, Mouret's name when reading about the famous Duchesse du Maine, for whose splendid "Nuits de Sceaux" he composed the music. Naudot's memory may be preserved by flautists, for whom he appears to have written a great deal, but we met with the name of Boismortier for the first time when we opened Mme. Guilbert's programme. Searching for information about him, we have been rewarded by finding that he was a more sensible composer in one respect than many of his present-day successors, who, because they think they can compose, think also that they can conduct their own music. Boismortier held his own music in very small estimation, and, when some of it was to be performed at the Opera, said to the conductors, "Messieurs, voilà ma partition, faites-en ce que vous pourrez, car, pour moi, je n'entends pas plus à la faire valoir que le plus petit enfant de chœur." The French players had evidently chosen examples of these old composers' music with great judgment, for each was well worth hearing for its grace, simplicity, its natural melody, and in some cases for its artless skill of instrumentation.

At the last Symphony Concert of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra a very important novelty was heard—namely, the first Symphony composed by Dr. Walford Davies. This proved to be a big, serious, vigorous work. It was clear, after the first "Largo maestoso" had been heard, that there was going to be nothing common, nothing merely imitative, about this music. But it was equally clear that it was not going to be easy music, flattering to the ear, quickly to be understood and to be presently dismissed. We cannot profess ourselves able to understand it all after one hearing, unless we except the second movement, a Romanza of singular sweetness and gentle animation. But we think that this will, in the event, turn out to be the least lasting of the movements; we expect that, when the Symphony has become familiar, the robust massiveness of the first and the final movements will satisfy us more than the light and rhythmic Romance or the suave and long-drawn-out melody of the "Lento espressivo." We found the earlier pages of the Finale rather dull, but the movement increases in interest till a theme of high and noble spirit is given out, and this was so arresting that our attention flagged no more. The Symphony was followed by Tchaikovsky's brilliant Concerto with Mme. Carreño, the most powerful of all its interpreters, at the piano. Here was a composition which made, at our first hearing of it, a very different impression from that made by Dr. Davies' Symphony. Every bar of it could be followed and understood with the greatest ease; it was exhilarating, exciting, pleasure-giving. Yet after repeated hearings its attraction seems to have evaporated, and we do not care if we are destined never to hear it again. Now to Dr. Davies' music we could not apply the three epithets which we certainly were right in applying to Tchaikovsky's when it was new. We were not conscious of vivid enjoyment while the new Symphony was running its course. But we felt that we were listening to a work which we should come to enjoy, one which would probably retain our affection when more immediately effective music had lost its hold over us. But however this may be, it can be said even now that Dr. Davies has enriched British music with a Symphony that is dignified, deep, masterly; we have no hesitation in thanking him for it, and congratulating him on so fine an achievement.

One of the most largely attended concerts at which we have assisted of late was the recital of Mr. Backhaus, a pianist of not more than moderate ability, except that he has a neat touch and a fluent finger. Compared with scores of rival pianists who cannot (in London) do more than attract a respectable audience in one of the smaller halls, Mr. Backhaus is, indeed, a pianist of superficial attainments. He must, at any rate, be allowed the credit of possessing some power of attraction denied to his more highly intellectual brethren, for he had drawn together an enormous audience, which showed every symptom of delight and satisfaction. They had been allowed to choose the programme, and here one found interest in what would otherwise have been a very ordinary concert. This audience, which presumably cannot very well discriminate between the greater and the lesser pianist, had had the good sense and good taste to ask that two of Beethoven's sonatas, the "Moonlight" and the "Appassionata," should be played to them, and be followed by Schumann's "Papillons," Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso," and several of the most popular of Chopin's pieces, the Ballade in A flat, the Berceuse, &c. Well, it was precisely the programme which such an audience was likely to choose. The public which attends Symphony Concerts and the recitals of artists of the kind that used to be called "classical" would not have chosen it. Yet fifty years ago a similar audience would not have selected the same pieces. They would have chosen much Mendelssohn, no Schumann, Thelberg instead of Chopin, and so on. There is no question that Mr. Backhaus' concert gave us an interesting glimpse at the advance made in musical taste.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE CRISIS IN CHINA

THE man who could come boldly forward and predict with reasonable accuracy the immediate future of China does not exist. There is a note almost of humility, a suggestion of the realisation of human limitations, in the guarded language employed by all publicists of repute who are dealing at the present moment with the situation in the Middle Kingdom. Even Sir Robert Hart lived to see his prophesies falsified, and perhaps the saddest moment of his life occurred when the very people to whom he had devoted his talents and his energies, and in the good faith of whom he would willingly have staked his existence, not only forsook him, but trained their guns upon his house and forced him to seek shelter from their fanatical onslaught. It is, of course, true that since the memorable rising of 1900 China has advanced rapidly along the paths of enlightenment. But by reason of her immensity, of the mists of tradition in which to foreign eyes her modern development is still enshrouded, and of the still unfathomed character of her people, China to the rest of the world remains an enigma.

Had it been possible to approach the present tremendous problem on superficial evidence alone, then any one possessing a knowledge of the iron attributes of Yuan Shih-kai would a week or two ago have declared unhesitatingly that the safety of the dynasty lay in the hands of that rehabilitated statesman. Personality, experience, opportunity seemed to point clearly to leadership and domination. On the surface, all that was required to bring about general pacification and a settlement satisfactory to the turbulent elements in the land was for Yuan Shih-kai, with suitable retinue and armed with the Regent's mandate, to meet the rebel leader—himself a protégé of the Imperial plenipotentiary—and politely to discuss terms whereby tranquillity might be restored within the walls of the Forbidden City.

But a deeper inquiry reveals a more complicated and conflicting situation. There are at the moment not two but three parties in the State—the national adherents of the falling dynasty; its Chinese supporters, who, although not yet prepared for the abolition of monarchical institutions, have through the National Assembly demanded and obtained a radical curtailment of monarchical functions; and finally, there are the extreme progressists. The swift evolution of this latter party has led them to embrace and fight for principles far advanced from those laid down by Kang Yu-wei and adopted by the late Emperor as the basis for his remarkable but abortive edicts of 1898. In their present elation the revolutionaries will not pause to consider a compromise on the lines of monarchical perpetuation, even though the Throne has made unconditional surrender to the people of all its ancient prerogatives. On the other hand, the National Assembly, meeting for their second session in the capital, had already imbued a measure of that sense of responsibility which is inseparable from elective chambers. This being so, and taken in conjunction with the undoubted fact that no mutual co-operation on an organised scale has taken place between the Assembly and the militant party, the line of action adopted by the former becomes clearly intelligible. Until yesterday merely an experimental body whose functions were not permitted to stray beyond the privileged limits of deliberation and suggestion, the National Assembly, through agencies of independent creation, has suddenly been invested with a power and an importance that, had circumstances pursued their normal course, could not have attached to the promised Constitutional Parliament. There was no time for calm reflection. The rebels had captured most of the Yangtze strongholds. Sedition was hourly spread to the adjoining provinces. The Lanchau forces in the north had obstinately refused to march to the south unless the Throne consented to the delegation of all its prerogatives and to the renunciation of most of its privileges. And finally, throughout the cities of the Metropolitan Province itself there ran a feverish if suppressed enthusiasm for the cause of the rebels. The moment had come for quick decision, and the Assembly, as one man, asserted an authority which cowed the Throne, startled the world—and disappointed, because of its moderation (!), the ardent forces of the republican south.

The attitude of the Assembly has been characteristically Oriental. Although its members realised fully the powerlessness of the Dynasty, they were unable to determine with which side, the imperial forces or the rebels, the fortunes of war would lie. By their programme of reform, they believed that the latter would be appeased; while in the event of imperial success in the field, they had adequately provided for the Constitutional freedom of the people. In other words, they had accomplished the complete overthrow of Manchu domination. Time alone can prove whether the Assembly was well advised in not immediately joining hands with the republicans and thus effecting the overthrow of the dynasty. If an early peace is to be brought about, either one side or the other must abandon a declared position; and it would seem from present indications—although, as I have said, it is impossible to prophesy—that it is the Moderate Party that is destined to bow to force majeure.

The latest despatches from Peking point to a situation of extreme gravity. By the assassination of General Wu Lu-chen, the Governor-designate of Shansi Province, which seems to have been treacherously planned from the highest Manchu quarters, the backs of the revolutionaries have become stiffened, and it is unlikely now that they will pause in their operations until they have achieved their utmost aim—the overthrow of the dynasty and the establishment of a republican form of Government.

The pathetic impotence of the Court was demonstrated at the beginning of this week, when we were told that "the Palace is in such a state of confusion that no edicts have been issued and no business done to-day." It will be recalled that the last occasion on which there was a total suspension of official activity within the Forbidden City occurred when the allied forces of the Powers were marching on the capital and the Empress Dowager with her Imperial retinue fled across the mountains for safety. To-day it is stated that the Court is making frantic preparations for a retreat to Jehol in the north. Once more we turn to history for precedent. In October of the year 1860 the allied forces of France and England, after a weary march from the coast, were approaching Peking. Ambassadorial missions from both countries accompanied the expedition. There had been many wearisome delays occasioned by the obstinate refusal of the Emperor Hienfung to permit the plenipotentiaries to present their credentials with befitting ceremonial. Matters were further complicated by an act of treachery on the part of the Chinese whereby a little band, headed by Mr. (afterwards Sir) Harry Parkes, who had advanced from the lines by official invitation to discuss a suitable place of meeting between Lord Elgin and his French colleague and the Imperial representatives, were treacherously surprised, taken prisoners, and removed to the capital, where they were cast into dungeons. The story of their sufferings has been told by Mr. (afterwards Lord) Loch, who was Mr. Parkes' companion in captivity. He relates how, after many weeks of privation, they were at last informed that on the following morning they would be led out to execution. Prince Kung, acting at the head of the Government,